Mr. TRIMBLE, who explained the object proposed, which was simply that the Government should give the same permission with respect to the District of Columbia, as Virginia and Maryland had done respecting their own territory. As to the question whether some other route was preferable to that in view by the company, now to be incorporated, it was a question for the subscribers to the stock to consider; Congress had nothing to do with it in giving leave that the canal should come through the District of Columbia.

Mr. SHARPE disclaimed all opposition to the construction of a canal from the Ohio to the Chesapeake, but did not believe that this company, or any other, would ever accomplish the object. The real plan in view, by the friends of the bill, was first to get this act, and then, at next Congress, to ask an appropriation of from twenty-five to fifty millions of dollars. Such was the doctrine which had been held in the committee room. He had no objection to Internal Improvements, and was willing to appropriate liberally to promote them, provided the several States enjoyed their shares. But he was opposed to going into this measure before surveys had been obtained. Some Engineers said it would require 500 locks to ascend the mountain. Nor was it certain that there was sufficient water on the summit level, &c.

Mr. STORRS hoped the bill would not be laid on the table. Nothing else was asked than merely permission for the canal to go through the District of Columbia; if more than this was sought, he should decidedly oppose it. But he thought that this would be secured by the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi. If the latter part of the bill should be retained, it would amount to an express act of incorporation by Congress to this company—to this he should object, as bringing the House under a virtual pledge to do more. He was not opposed to the design of the canal, and he would vote any thing in reason to promote it; but he thought the amendment gave all that was now needed or asked.

Mr. MERCEK felt it due to himself to vindicate the bill from the imputations of the gentleman from New York. It was the first time he had ever known the private conversations of gentlemen in a committee room, brought forward on the floor of this House to prejudice a measure under discussion. What the personal views of individuals, as to certain great plans of internal improvement, had to do with the question before the House, he was at a loss to conceive. The conversations alluded to, did not, however, embrace this canal only, but many roads, canals, and other measures of a general character; and it was for the whole of these that the millions mentioned by the gentleman had been talked about.

Mr. M. denied that the bill was so greatly changed, and he adverted, in order, to the amendments which it had undergone. In reply to Mr. STORRS, Mr. M. admitted that the bill was an act of incorporation—such was its avowed object; but he contended that no evil could legitimately grow out of it, especially as now limited by one of the amendments. He opposed the amendment of Mr. RANKIN, as defective in several provisions, which were secured by the bill as reported, particularly respecting toll.

Mr. RANKIN supported the amendment. His main objection to the bill was, that it went to mingle the powers of the General and State Governments. He thought the views of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) were perfectly correct. The act of Virginia, now proposed to be confirmed, appointed commissioners for this work; if this were re-enacted by Congress at the next session, they would hear that they were bound to patronize the design by large appropriations, as they had put their sanction on it, by appointing commissioners. He thought the powers of the General and State Governments should be kept as distinct as possible. If the General Government engaged in internal improvement at all, it should either be by taking the work into their own hands entirely, or by subscribing to the stocks of private companies. The bill proposed neither. The moment the bill passed, Government might give up all the surveys made over the mountains; the whole design would thenceforth be a private concern. The amendment gave the company all which he thought they ought to ask, or expect.

The question was then put on the amendment, and carried—ayes 83, nays 58.

And the bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Maison Rouge Grant.

An engrossed bill concerning the grant of land to the Marquis de Maison Rouge, was read a third time.

Its passage was opposed by Mr. SANFORD, of Tennessee, and advocated by Messrs. ISAACKS, CAMPBELL, and J. T. JOHNSON; when, on the question being put, it passed by a large majority.

Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

An engrossed bill to confirm the act of the General Assembly of Maryland, confirming an act of the General Assembly of Virginia, to incorporate the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, was read a third time, and the question being, "Shall this bill pass?"

Mr. COCKE demanded that it be taken by yeas and nays, which was ordered.

The question was then put, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays.

So the bill was passed; its title was altered to read as follows: "An act confirming the act of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled 'An act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company,' and an act of the State of Maryland, confirming the same;" and then it was sent to the Senate.

MONDAY, February 28.

Florida Coast Wrecks.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill "concerning wrecks on the coast of Florida."

Mr. WEBSTER explained the circumstances under which the bill came before the House. It was the bill to which the President refers in his message, as having been passed and approved last session, but omitted to be signed. The opinion of the Judiciary Committee was, that the bill had no validity until signed by the President, and they therefore now reported the bill in its original form, but having a prospective operation only.

Mr. CALL stated that the act had been understood as in force, and had, in its operation, produced a large revenue to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day.

Abolition of the Slave Trade.

Mr. MERCER laid on the table the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to enter upon, and prosecute, from time to time, such negotiations with the maritime powers of Europe and America, as he may deem expedient for the effectual abolition of the slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

This resolve lies for one day, of course.

Mr. CONWAY, of Arkansas, offered the following:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a survey to be made of the obstructions in Red River, usually denominated rafts, and cause an estimate of the expense necessary to remove the same, to be laid before Congress at the next session.

Mr. CONWAY stated what had formerly been done on this subject, and explained the object of the resolution.

Mr. LIVINGSTON advocated the resolve, and Mr. SHARPE opposed it as unnecessary, and moved to lay it on the table; which was carried.

TUESDAY, March 1.

Suppression of Piracy.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COCKE in the chair,) on the bill from the Senate for the suppression of piracy. The bill was read by sections, and gave rise to the following debate:

Mr. FORSYTH, Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (to which committee the subject was referred in this House,) rose, for the purpose of briefly stating what would be the effect of the bill. For this purpose he gave a short summary of the amount of each section. The first section, he said, went to increase the present number of our sloops of war—a class of vessels now considered by the Executive as peculiarly fit for this service. It was true that, in 1822, a different opinion prevailed, and measures were taken corresponding to that opinion.

Suppression of Piracy.

The second section authorized the President to direct the officers, commanding this squadron, to land their forces when in fresh pursuit of pirates, to withdraw from the jurisdiction of Cuba and Porto Rico the persons apprehended, and to bring them to the United States for trial.

There did not exist any necessity for granting this provision of the bill, since the President has it already by the law of nations. And Mr. F. thought this part of the bill objectionable on another account. It referred only to Porto Rico and Cuba—but, if the right exists, it exists in relation to all other places, as well as to these islands. And if it does not exist, and is to be given by this bill, it ought to be given in relation to all places. If the section was proper at all, it ought to be made universal in its form.

The third section restricted the carrying of specie by armed vessels of the United States, unless when expressly permitted by the President of the United States, or the Navy Department. According to representations of our agent in Cuba, serious injury had resulted to the commerce of the United States, from this practice. The force which was intended to be employed in guarding that commerce against pirates, had been diverted to a different purpose. The section was intended to remedy this state of things.

The fourth section secured on all recaptures by merchant vessels, a certain salvage. The reasons for such a provision were obvious. But they did not apply more to Cuba or Porto Rico, than to all other parts of the world. Piracies exist in the Indian ocean; merchant vessels are armed by law, and are entitled to the same salvage there as in the West Indies. This section, if adopted, therefore, ought also to be universal.

The fifth section provided for the capture of piratical boats, &c., by vessels of the United States, and the distribution of the proceeds. The sixth section requires that no armed merchant vessel shall receive a clearance until bond has been given in double the value of the vessel, for the correct conduct of the officers and crew on board, and to secure their obedience to such instructions as shall be given by the President of the United States. The act of 1818 requires that all merchant vessels, arming in self-defence, shall give bonds for their correct conduct. The only difference between that act and the present, in this respect, is, that the amount of the bond is varied; by the act of 1818, the penalty is double the amount of vessel and cargo, and no obligation to obey the President's instructions is required.

The seventh section authorized the President to give suitable instructions to armed merchant vessels.

The eighth section allowed five per cent. of all prizes taken, for a pension fund.

The ninth and tenth sections designated the persons to whom the pensions are to be paid. The ninth provides for officers, and the tenth for widows and children.

The eleventh and last section limited the operation of the law to one year.

Having thus gone through a general sketch of the provisions of the bill, Mr. F. adverted to the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, on this subject.

That committee conceived that no legislative provisions were required by the posture of our affairs with Spain. For the reasons given in their report, our just claims upon Spain for spoiliations committed by Spanish officers, acting in obedience to Spanish decrees, and under Spanish commissions, should not be at present vindicated by the exertion of our power. The promised Minister, who comes with full authority to stipulate their payment, should be heard. Mr. F. could not, without doing injustice to his own opinions, avoid stating that he felt no confident expectation that justice would be done to the United States on the arrival of the recently appointed minister. He apprehended that the object of this mission was "to gain time;" the aim and the end too of all Spanish negotiation, and in which their diplomatists were eminently successful. As yet, however, the Government of Spain had not derived any signal advantage from the success of their labors. We shall, no doubt, be compelled, eventually, to do justice to ourselves, but, for our own character, he desired that measures of compulsion should be delayed to the last hour. Without recalling to the recollection of the committee the suggestions contained in the report, Mr. F. would make a single remark, which would place the members in possession of the views of the committee.

The situation of Spain was deplorable, and ours, in relation to Spain, peculiar. Spain had vast and rich possessions in our neighborhood. The Government was imbecile. Her colonies will be the property of any power that chooses to take them. It is the common sentiment of European politicians, that Spain must fall to pieces, and that the United States are happily situated to take advantage of that event. Mr. F. was deeply anxious to satisfy all mankind that the Government of this country looked forward to no such advantages, and that, if ever any portion of the dominions of Spain came under our power, our conduct should bear the scrutiny even of those most anxious to fix upon us the charges of ambition and avarice.

As it regarded the piratical depredations upon our commerce, and that of the rest of the world, Mr. F. said, no extraordinary measures were deemed necessary or proper. The Executive has all the power necessary for the suppression of piracy. If means are wanting, they should be given: If men are wanted, authorize their enlistment: If money, appropriate it: If a naval force of an unusual description, authorize its creation. Give all that is needed, and hold the Executive responsible for a just and effectual application of the means afforded. But no measures of an extraordinary character would be either for the interest or honor of the United States. By extraordinary measures, Mr. F. meant such measures as operated upon the Government of Spain, and would only be justified on the principle, that the Spanish Government was responsible for the acts of the pirates. The correspondence with the Spanish Government, laid before the House by the President, shows that our Executive does not hold Spain responsible for the piracies committed by persons who either sail from, or take refuge in the dominions of that power; nor has any step been taken to create that responsibility. The only application officially made is, for co-operation in putting down the pirates, and for permission to our forces to enter Spanish territory for that object. In December, 1822, prior to any official application from the United States, the Constitutional Government officially announced to the United States, that the naval force of Spain should be increased on the stations of Cuba, Porto Rico, Porto Cabello, and St. Juan de Ulloa, for the express purpose of suppressing piracy; and that orders were given to the Commanding General at Havana, to exterminate the pirates. In March, 1823, Gov. Mahy had issued at Havana a decree prescribing severe regulations of police to prevent piracy, and to facilitate the detection of the crime, should it be committed by persons belonging to the island of Cuba. In May, 1823, Gen. Vives issued a circular to the local authorities to aid Commodore Porter, then arrived on the coast, to suppress piracy. The correspondence of Commodore Porter proves that this aid was given; and so important did he deem this co-operation, that, in order to prevent any interruption of it, he sent off from Thompson's Island, a privateer of Colombia, lest he should be supposed desirous to give shelter and aid to a vessel which was interrupting the commerce of the island of Cuba. Within the last five days a correspondence has been published, in which Commodore Porter expresses to Gen. Vives his hearty thanks for the co-operation of that officer and those under his command. With this show of anxiety to do what is right by Spain, and her chief officer, added to the punishment of pirates in Porto Rico, which are known to have been inflicted, it would be scarcely justifiable to adopt any measures against Spain, especially as we have never given notice to Spain of such an intention. The United States have not yet said to Spain, Suppress these abominations, or we will hold you, in the sight of God and man, responsible for them: Exercise your power, or we will exercise our power. Until this was done, we should not think of acting upon Cuba. It was but too true, that an infamous depravity of moral feeling prevailed in Cuba on the subject of piracy, and the corruption of Spanish tribunals was sufficiently notorious. Can we act upon the dominions of a foreign power because the people are vicious, or the tribunals impure? The laws of nations do not permit us to enter into crusades for the correction of the vices of our neighbors, nor to enter into their territory to inquire into the purity of their tribunals. However well convinced we may be of their corruption, we cannot say that we, the people of the United States, are more unjustly treated than other foreigners, or than Spanish subjects. The charge of corruption has been of long standing against Spanish tribunals, with probably but too much reason. The mode of administering the laws leads naturally to corruption and injustice. Judges, often a single judge, decides upon matters of law and fact—the witnesses are examined ex parte; and whenever a suit begins, the first effort of the parties litigant is to influence the judge in their favor, by favor, flattery, or something worse. The judges, however, are, in one thing, quite impartial, they are as ready to be influenced on the right side as the wrong one; and when justice can, and will wield a purse as long as injustice, the tribunals of Spain can be trusted as safely as other tribunals. The rule of international law is well understood even in matters of property; every definitive sentence, regularly pronounced, is to be esteemed just, and executed as such. The rule admits of exceptions: they are, when justice is refused to a foreigner—palpable or evident injustice done, or rules and forms openly violated—or, finally, an odious distinction made to the prejudice of foreigners. In these cases, the Government whose tribunals are unjust, is responsible. Justice is, however, to be sought in the usual form, by regular demand upon the Government itself. You cannot, either by a well-founded charge of criminality in the population of Cuba, or of the corruption of the Spanish tribunals, act against the Spanish dominions without a previous demand of justice at the hands of their Government.

Mr. FORESTH said he should have come to this conclusion with the greatest pain, if the documents did not prove that ordinary measures were sufficient to prevent piracy, when properly and exclusively devoted to that purpose. Whenever our naval power was where it ought to be, piracy was suppressed. The moment that power was withdrawn, it revived, and with additional horrors. He hoped that the naval force provided, or to be provided, would be faithfully devoted to prevent piracies; and if there was too much reason, from past experience, to dread their recurrence, that explicit warning would be given to Spain, that we should, hereafter, act upon Cuba or Porto Rico, if it should be necessary for our security or repose. Mr. F. was solicitous that no step should be taken by the United States which they should consider not justifiable, if taken, by any other commercial nation. If authority to invade Cuba is given, where will you stop? Resistance to a temporary descent will be followed by conquest and continued occupation. If the whole is occupied, how will it be reclaimed? The consequences are apparent. The principle which justifies us will justify any other commercial power. England, France, Russia, may take and keep possession of Cuba for the common good of the commercial world. Suppose England (I take this Government as an example, because, quo ad hoc, she is the strongest, probably not more ambitious than either of her allies) should think proper to seize Cuba, could we permit that power to hold it undisturbed? With Halifax on the north, and Havana at the south, she would hold the ends of the bow string by which your coasting trade would be throttled at her pleasure. The commerce of the West Indies, and of the Gulf of Mexico, might be doled out to suit her convenience. I, for one, never will calmly look upon such a state of things. Let me not be misunderstood. I love neither the Government nor the people of Spain. The Government is detestable, and the people are scarcely worthy of a better, or they would long since have obtained it. But the Spanish Government and Spanish subjects, if not good, are not dangerous neighbors, and I prefer them infinitely to those who are.

Mr. FULLER said, that an examination of the provisions of the bill would show that it involved no question in regard to our negotiations with Spain; and that, consequently, the observations of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORBES) as to the present state of those negotiations, appeared to him unnecessary, and required no reply. The committee, of which that gentleman was chairman, had indeed reported at large their views; and whether they were correct or not, it was useless, in discussing the merits of the present bill, to determine. No attack upon Spain or her territories is contemplated, nor can any collision with her rights be apprehended by its adoption. It was, therefore, Mr. F. said, superfluous to settle any nice points of diplomacy, by considering whether we had borne the outrages of the pirates, and demanded redress from Spain for the shelter and countenance which they had received in her islands, long enough to justify against her an appeal to force or not.

Mr. BARTLETT, of New Hampshire said, he hoped for the indulgence of the committee a few moments. It was a request that, even at this hour, could not be granted with more reluctance than it was made. If an apology were necessary, it is in the nature of the subject before us—in a feeling, almost personal, which he could not easily control, excited as it was by the peculiarly aggravated sufferings of his immediate constituents. The object of our present legislation is the suppression of piracy.

A purpose, for which, said Mr. B., I know the opinion of many is, that the times demand of us action, rather than deliberation. But, sir, to act may be worse than in vain, unless we act efficiently. We betray our merchants and seamen into peril, by reliance upon pretended protection, and give confidence to the enemy, by our imbecile efforts. Could I believe the measure proposed calculated to effect the object desired, I would not, for an instant, stand between the proposition and the final decision upon it by this House.

Is piracy of a character, and has it existence to an extent, to demand of us effectual measures for its suppression? A question the whole country has answered; and yet, sir, our apparent indifference on this subject, and the negative character of the measures proposed, seem to reverse that decision. A general assent is, perhaps, yielded to the prevalence of piracy, without that deep feeling of the character and extent of the enormity, necessary to prompt us to efficient legislation. The scenes of blood which, for years, have been exhibited, not in Europe, not in South America only, but within our own borders, have rendered us too insensible to their repetition; and the cries of our suffering citizens, which are borne to us on every southern breeze, are still mingled with the din of foreign war. The high excitement of feeling, produced by the accounts of the first piratical depredations, seems lost in apathy at recent recitals of their aggravated horrors. But, sir, situated in the midst of a suffering community, the subject addresses itself to me in a manner that cannot but be felt. From the lips of one of the sufferers, whose life, policy, and not mercy, spared, have I heard the story of piratical torture. He was a gentleman of highly respectable character, and unquestioned veracity. Near the harbor of Havana, he was boarded by pirates—instantly felled to the deck with repeated blows—thrown headlong into the hold of the vessel—there assailed with daggers, and passes made at his throat and through his flesh—hanged by the neck to the yard-arm;—after being cut down and lying till symptoms of returning life appeared, he was then literally whipped through our whole squadron—at each blow of the rope, being told the name of the vessel for which it was inflicted. The horrid cruelties connected with the murder of Captain Blount, can hardly be realized, but by those who knew him as one of the most valuable citizens of Portsmouth—by those who witnessed the grief of his numerous relatives—the inconsolable sorrow of an afflicted wife and family. To that ill-fated neighborhood is carried the recent account of the capture of the brig commanded by Captain Hilton—with the murder of the crew—the bearer of the sad intelligence being compelled to say, “I alone have escaped to tell thee.” And, within the last two days, a report has reached me, which I pray Heaven may prove untrue, of the destruction of another ship from Portsmouth, by the same hands, and the death of every individual on board. But it was not my purpose to have referred to particular instances of a crime, records of the repetition of which fill every gazette, till our surprise is, not that our vessels are captured, our citizens murdered, but that one escapes. In the letter of our agent, of the 6th of September, after a long catalogue of other captures, he says, "In the bay were found the wrecks of twelve vessels, recently destroyed by the pirates, the crews of all which are supposed to have been murdered." Such are the monuments the island everywhere exhibits of their plunder, while the coast is whitened with the bones of their victims. Well might the honest seaman, who recently witnessed and gave account of these scenes, conclude, as he did, with the exclamation, "How long! how long will our country suffer these horrid deeds!" Are the measures proposed by this bill such as must—such as probably may, accomplish the object desired? What is proposed? The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has stated to you, very distinctly, the purport of each of the eleven sections, which, in short, is—a provision for building sloops of war; authorizing fresh pursuit of pirates; prohibiting freighting specie, but by order of the President; regulating armed merchantmen; providing for distribution of prize money, by capture of pirates, and creation of a pension fund from the same.

Will either—will all these provisions remedy the evil complained of? I answer no. An opinion, I am aware, entitled to no authority further than it may be supported by the considerations upon which it is founded—and in stating the reason of such opinion, it cannot be necessary for me to add professions of the high regard which I entertain for the distinguished gentlemen, personally and officially, from whose views on this subject it is my misfortune to differ.

In our efforts to vanquish, or exterminate the common enemy, we may make war with him upon the ocean, or upon the land, or both. The former mode seems to be relied upon in this bill; and that, by the employment of our national vessels, such attempt will not, cannot, succeed. If a temporary suspension of the enemy's operations could be produced, still the measure is unjustifiable; which, with such profusion of life and treasure, does not reach the source of the evil. It must be ineffectual, from the character of the enemy. Who are these pirates, that we go out with all the "pomp and circumstance of war" to meet them? What injuries do we expect to inflict by our national ships? What trophies are we to gain? They have indeed some small boats, with which they lurk about the bays and harbors; but is it believed they will give battle to your frigates or sloops of war, or attempt to make prize of your captains and commodores? Unless they do, what right have you to molest them? What evidence, unless you take them in the act of piracy, of their guilt? It is not to be understood, that they carry a label upon their forehead, to designate their character; and should the Gulf of Mexico be covered with these "gentleman rovers," as they may choose to be called, we have not the proof, and therefore not the power, to touch them, unless discovered "flagrante delicto!" But it may be said, we can, by such means, detect and capture them assailing our merchant vessels; we may, if they first give notice to us of the time and place the robbery is to be committed; but they have the means and the vigilance to discover our national ships at quite as great a distance as their own small boats may be seen from such vessels; and experience proves, that at the moment of the most flagrant outrages, our squadron has sailed round the whole island, and every hour discovered traces of their recent depredations, and yet not touched, or come near to the offenders. Captain Porter, in his letter of April 8th, 1824, after describing a voyage through all the islands, and a minute inspection of the most noted haunts of these robbers, says: "In the course of this long route, although we have visited places formerly the rendezvous of pirates, and saw evidences of their having been recently there, we have not been so fortunate as to capture any, nor have we seen any vessel of a suspicious character, until two days since, when we pursued a small schooner, which took shelter among the Colorado Reefs," &c. Such a result was to have been anticipated from the character of the enemy, as given by the Secretary of the Navy, in his letter of the 1st December, in which he says, "there are few, if any, piratical vessels of a large size in the neighborhood of Cuba, and none are now seen at a distance from the land; but the pirates conceal themselves, with their boats, in small creeks, bays, and inlets, and finding vessels becalmed, or in a defenceless situation, assail and destroy them. When discovered, they readily and safely retreat into the country, where our forces cannot follow, and by the plunder which they have obtained, and which they sell at prices low and tempting to the population, and by the apprehensions which they are able to create in those who would otherwise give information, they remain secure, and mingle, at pleasure, in the business of the towns, and transactions of society, and acquire all the information necessary to accomplish their purposes." That "no naval force can afford complete protection against such a system," is proved by experiment—while, year before the last, of all our vessels of every description in commission, twenty-one of the thirty-one were on that station; and last year, fourteen of twenty-three were in the same service. It is not forgotten that the President, in his message, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, told us these measures had been successful, and that piracy was no more. That was rather the expression of his and our wishes, than of the fact.

we then had hardly "scotched the snake, not killed it." A momentary suspension of their depredations might have happened till they could better suit their system to our measures. The result has been only to make them more wary, more vindictive, and more numerous. They now more usually take life to prevent detection; and where that is not done, our increased force only adds new tortures to the captive, by an additional rope for every additional vessel. With accounts of such facts is every gazette filled; but where is the record of our success? Reasons for this want of success, I know, are urged, in the shape of charges against the officers employed upon this service; that they neglect the duty upon which they were ordered to engage, in the business of freighting on their own account. No, no; it is an accusation I will not for a moment believe, but upon the most irrefragable proof. Can it be possible, that those gallant men, as distinguished for humanity as bravery, would turn from the cries of their countrymen, bleeding in the hands of robbers, to engage in a pitiful money speculation? That they, whose names are identified with the glory of their country, would sell the mighty meed of their large honors for the contemptible commissions of a cargo! would strip from their brows the wreath which the nation has placed there, to creep into the garb of a miserable Jew broker! Never! never! Nor could the truth of such charge be admitted, without extending its reproach to the Head of the Department, and the President of the United States, who have power to enforce their own orders. The evidence of your official documents is against it. Captain Porter, in his letter of August 10th, says, "the whole history of my operations against the pirates, renders any defence of my conduct, or the conduct of those under my command, against any imputations of neglect, from any quarter, unnecessary, as it is well known to the Department, that we have been devoted to the inglorious service, sacrificing health, comfort, and personal interests, for the sole object of suppressing a system of long continuance, the existence of which was disgraceful to the civilized nations, whose citizens were victims to it." "It is," says our intelligent agent, in his letter of October 1st, "in vain for commercial nations to rely upon mere preventive measures at sea." This experiment, then, of this description of force, has been tried, and fairly tried: and has failed.

If, however, the employment of such force in this manner, had continued a check upon the practice it temporarily produced, so long as it touches not the source of the evil, the sacrifice is greatly disproportioned to the result—and it is inexpedient and impolitic. Are we never again to travel the common highway of nations, but with such formidable array, and its actual presence, to guard our lives? In his letter of July 14, our agent says, "Notwithstanding the large armament maintained by the United States on this coast, attended with a profuse waste of treasure, and with the sacrifice of the health and lives of so many of their gallant crews, the only result has been, the temporary and partial interruption of the practice, while the source and cause of the mischief have not been reached." If the attempt had not served rather to destroy than save the lives of those intended to be protected, the expense would be of less importance. But the entire want of success has rendered the service, as it is justly called, "inglorious,"—a despondency, a depression of spirits, is produced among the officers and crews which would make them victims of disease in any climate—but when to such causes is added, the unhealthiness of that station, we have daily melancholy proof of the sacrifice we make. I have before me an official list of more than eighty officers, who have perished in this service in two years past. I forbear to repeat from that list, names familiar to this House—names dear, not to their friends only, but to their country.

But another provision of the bill relates to the permission for merchant vessels to arm. The arming of merchant vessels is undoubtedly the only effectual mode of making war with pirates on the ocean. Captain Porter, in his letter of the 10th August, so expressly tells us—and from the very character of the enemy, and the mode of their warfare, we could hardly have needed such authority. Yet there is nothing in this bill but incumbrances upon a permission that before existed. And of what avail is such permission? The persons engaged in the West India trade are not wealthy: all such find their way, with better hopes, to the other Indies. They are merchants of small capital, who, with the most persevering industry and rigid economy, can but just keep that commerce afloat. A single gun, and the expense of men, would sink it forever.

True it is, this bill authorizes the fresh pursuit and capture of pirates upon the land; but what are we to expect from the fresh pursuit of pirates by a force that, in two years' search, has scarcely come in sight of one; and what need have we of an enactment to do that which we are authorized to do without it? While nothing is added, by implication it takes away the right we always possess to attack them at all times and in all places. But this, it is said, would be war; war with whom? I must dissent from a conclusion stated in the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, high as is that authority, on this subject. In that report, it is alleged that Congress cannot authorize the pursuit and capture of pirates, in the towns upon the island of Cuba, "without wresting from Spain her municipal jurisdiction." If Spain has not the power herself to arrest and punish them, then we wrest from her no jurisdiction. If pirates are protected and aided in such towns, and Spain does not choose to exercise such power, then the inhabitants of those places are partakers in the crime, and Ferdinand himself is the king of pirates. Sir, I am for peace—that peace which secures us protection in our lives and property—not a nominal peace, the fruits of which are only rapine and murder. By the chairman of that committee, we are just told, that Spain is not notified that we hold her answerable for such outrages. However informal may have been the notice, the repeated, the loud complaints of our sufferings must, long since, have reached even the heavy ears of that Government. Two years' display of our forces upon her shores, and the demands for her interference, must have made her understand our complaints of wrong, and claims for redress. One year since, from the same source, further deliberation was advised; it is still urged. It is presuming too much, to believe that such a suggestion can be heard with calmness by those of our countrymen who are suffering the cruelties of these barbarians. But we must wait, it is said, for further negotiation. When we were colonies of Great Britain, and Jenkins, whose case has recently been referred to, suffered some indignity from a Spanish cruiser, he was brought to state, in person, his wrongs before the legislature of the nation, and the exclamation then was, not to negotiate, but to require concession and indemnity, as a sine qua non to the commencement of negotiation. I am willing to make all reasonable sacrifices to the etiquette of diplomacy—outfits, salaries, and time of Ministers; but not to add the offering of hecatombs of our fellow-citizens.

It has been my purpose to show—

That increase of our naval power, to be employed as is contemplated, promises no efficient remedy for the evil complained of:

That, while it does not afford us protection, it is prodigal both of life and treasure:

That a mere permission to merchant vessels to arm, is perfectly nugatory:

The idea of rewarding captors of pirates out of their prizes, and pensioning the wounded and widows of the slain, out of five per cent. of the proceeds, seemed to me not to require so much elaborate detail of legislation; in truth, that all the bill proposes is, to build ten sloops of war, a part of which, some years hence, may be at sea.

On the other hand—That our duty requires of us to furnish merchant vessels with armament, and to authorize reprisals upon the inhabitants of Cuba: That these measures are demanded, to avenge the insulted sovereignty of our country, to rescue our violated flag from the bloody hands of barbarians, to shield the unprotected heads of our citizens from the lifted axe of the murderer.

Mr. FORSYTH rose, in reply, and observed, that his opinions must have been very badly expressed, if gentlemen could suppose that he had intended to deny that piracy exists—that it exists in an atrocious form, and ought to be suppressed. But I think, said Mr. F., that the President now has, and has had, both means and power to suppress it. This bill is useless; it diminishes the executive power. All that is sought, by the President, in his communication on this subject, is authority to go to the Spanish islands. The Committee of Foreign Relations think that he has already power to go to those islands, and to all the islands in the world. The law of nations gives him this power, as the Executive Magistrate. Why, then, are we called to legalize the act? Is it because there exists some fears that the Executive will be blamed for not having done his duty? Why has piracy not been suppressed? Because the force given to suppress it has been withdrawn. But, inasmuch as complaint is made that the means are not adequate, I am willing to give more means. Two years ago you were told the same thing—the means were inadequate. And you then gave what was supposed to be sufficient, and what you were told, subsequently, effected the object.

In 1822, you were told that light vessels were wanting, to go into the shallow waters; and you gave them. Now you are told that the pirates withdraw from the shallow waters and go into creeks; and that launches are wanting to follow them. Could not launches follow them into creeks last year? Where are all the amount of means that you gave? Dissipated like chaff. The attention of this House and of the public was lately called to a large vessel, recently fitted out. It was a magnificent object, and gentlemen left their seats here to contemplate it with admiration. But the money that it cost would have been better spent on a squadron for the West India Station. Where is this magnificent vessel to be sent? Report says on a Quixotic expedition up the Mediterranean, where it is to display the greatness of our nation and bear what is called the broad pendant. The simple state of the question is this: pirates have been suffered to exist when they ought not. The President says he wants powers. He has had powers. He says he wants means. He has had means. I would not, said Mr. F., shelter from responsibility any officer of the Government, however high may be his station. The President has wanted neither men nor money. This House has done its duty. A strange opinion seems to have gone forth, that this is a degrading service; that the foe is worthless, and that victory will, therefore, be inglorious. I am of a different opinion. These are the only victories which may be said to be unstained. I am content to leave the task to our naval heroes. I believe them to be fully sufficient successfully to accomplish it. I trust they will continue as they have done to strike down these murderers.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said that he had supposed some other gentlemen would offer the motion which he was now about to present. But, as they had not done so, he moved to strike out the second section of the bill. The purport of that section, as he understood it, was to impart to the President the power of ordering our forces to land in fresh pursuit of pirates. He objected to any such enactment, as this power was not the subject of municipal legislation. All the authority of gentlemen, on that subject, was derived from national law, and there was a want of fitness in legislating on what the law of nations already settles. The principle of that law, as to pirates, was, that they were enemies of the human race, and that, as such, all Governments were, ipso facto, always at war with them. We have a right to suppress piracy, according to the law of nations, and that law expressly allows of landing in fresh pursuit of an enemy.

Suppression of Piracy.

We cannot increase our rights in respect to other powers by municipal legislation, and certainly we do not wish to diminish them. The principle by which we are to be governed is obviously this: If we wish the Executive to act intraterritorially, then a municipal act directs him what to do. But if we wish him to act extraterritorially, his act falls within the law of nations, and a municipal law is therefore useless. The law of nations is the rule of the Executive, without our saying so, and he has the same right to carry that law into effect which he has to carry into effect any municipal law. All our rights as a nation already exist, and depend on sources beyond our control. For these reasons he thought it was proper that the section should be stricken out, and not because he was opposed to landing in fresh pursuit of pirates.

Mr. POINSETT expressed his agreement with the views of the gentleman who had just taken his seat. He had intended to speak on the general subject, but considering the lateness of the session, and the time which had already been occupied, he relinquished that intention, and implored other gentlemen to do the same, and let the House vote on the bill.

Mr. STRONG expressed a similar sentiment.

The question was then put on striking out the second section, and carried.

Mr. STRONG then moved to strike out all the remainder of the bill after the first section. On the call of Mr. HOOKS, these sections were read.

Mr. WEBSTER observed, in relation to the third section, (which restricts the carrying of specie except as ordered by the President,) that he presumed the Committee on Foreign Relations could tell the House whether any thing now existed to prevent the President from giving such instructions as are contemplated by this section. It was certain that great complaints existed in relation to this matter. They were known to exist in Britain on the same subject. And notwithstanding what had been observed by the gentleman from New Hampshire, much dissatisfaction was felt.

Mr. CROWNINGSHIELD observed, in reply, that the President has full power—that when he formerly held the office of Secretary of the Navy, he had himself issued directions on the subject.

The remaining sections were then stricken out.

Mr. FULLER offered a substitute, which, after a short discussion, was rejected.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to strike out the words, “for the more effectual suppression of piracy in the West Indies,” (which follow the authority to build the vessels.) He thought the House ought to be careful to avoid all encroachment on the power of the Executive. He believed there was no necessity for particularizing the purposes for which we build vessels. The true course was for the Executive to state what he needs, whether in men, ships, or money; and if we conclude to grant it, we are to leave him to use it on his own responsibility. For his own part, he believed that sloops of war would be necessary in times of peace as well as war, and after piracy should be suppressed as at the present.

The motion prevailed, and the words were stricken out.

Mr. FULLER proposed to add a section to the bill, empowering the President to dispose of the schooners and other vessels at present in use, and which were in a state of decay.

Mr. CROWNINGSHIELD offered a section of somewhat greater extent, and suggested to Mr. FULLER to accept it instead of that proposed by him. Mr. FULLER consented, and the section was adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved to amend the bill, by reducing the number of sloops of war from ten to five, and the sum appropriated from $500,000, to $425,000.

In support of his motion, Mr. B. observed, that the present was a bill for the suppression of piracy, and not for the increase of the Navy. He thought that if Congress gave the Executive all he asked, they certainly did all that was needed. The Secretary of the Navy asked only for four sloops of war; he was willing to give him five. (Here Mr. B. quoted the letter of the Secretary.) He thought it was wisest in Congress to keep the power in their own hands. It was manifest, that only 5 sloops could be built, for the $500,000 would build no more—$425,000 was sufficient for this purpose, and he therefore proposed that sum. He did not wish to be understood as holding the opinion that it was not proper to increase the Navy, but he did not think it proper to authorize so large an increase of it at the present time.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped that this motion would not prevail. He called the attention of the committee to the situation of the United States, and hoped that while they considered the expense, they would also consider the mode in which it is to be applied. He thought there was much pertinency in a remark made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BARTLETT;) the nation came out of the late war, under a strong excitement in favor of the Navy. The Navy had crowned the nation with glory, and that glory had been won by the use of large ships. Many such were accordingly ordered. But ships of a large size, put at hazard great sums of money. They are often employed for service which might be equally well done by smaller vessels, which would cost, and which would hazard less. But we have no such smaller vessels. If we looked at the naval service in other nations, we should see what a great disproportion existed between the number of our large and our smaller vessels. The service in the West Indies, and the service beyond Cape Horn, did not require such heavy ships—vessels of a smaller class would answer every purpose, at a far less expense. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) says it is enough if we give as fast as the Department asks. But this surely is not a compulsory matter. The Department may ask one thing and we may give another. The Secretary of the Navy asks for frigates, we do not give them—but instead, we give more sloops of war. These will be of important service on our eastern frontier, where the British vessels, to say the least, had committed very great mistakes about the bounds of our fisheries. The same observations would apply to the Mediterranean. In the British Navy this class of vessels were in constant use. That Government had 80 or 100 sloops of war, all actively employed in various species of service, which do not require a great array of power. Why should we not go so far as to build ten of these vessels? A similar measure had been recommended at the last session. We are told that the Executive is to be held bound to do all he can do without further legislation. Let us then pass the bill as it is.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, in reply, that he was sorry at this late hour to come in collision with the gentleman from Massachusetts. He could not but notice, however, that that gentleman had not thought fit to reply to what he had advanced as a principal argument in favor of the amendment he proposed, that only $500,000 were appropriated, and five sloops of war would cost $425,000. Could we not repose confidence in the next Congress; could we not leave them to judge, since only five ships could be built this year, whether five more would be wanting next year? It was vain to say that a number of ships should be built, not exceeding ten, and then to give means only for five. If ten were intended to be given, they would cost $850,000. Perhaps it was not held politic to spread such an amount before the people. The Senate had passed a bill for ten sloops of war in the early part of last session. But, during all of last session, and all of the present, until now, the House had refused to take up that bill. Was it proper, at this late moment, to enter into a discussion about the increase of the Navy? We had already spent eight millions on the Navy—he wanted to know how this had been spent; and whether the ships which had been built corresponded with the law. He wanted to know whether the ancient discipline was still continued. He doubted the propriety of incorporating in a bill for the suppression of piracy, provisions which went, in fact, to increasing the Navy.

Mr. TREMBLE, of Kentucky, observed, that he should vote for the provisions of the bill, because he believed that their tendency in practice would be to diminish the expense of the Navy, and to improve its discipline. The complaints which exist, had arisen from the employment of too many large vessels. There would be no need to put all our large vessels in commission, if we should build small ones. This would be a saving of expense, for we are now driven to use the large, because we have no small. Look at the disproportion in the different branches of our service. The whole amount of our commerce to the Mediterranean, is about one million of dollars, and it has one hundred and ninety guns to protect it. Our trade to Cuba amounts to six or seven millions, and it is protected by only one hundred and fifty-eight guns. This irregularity was occasioned chiefly by want of small vessels.

Mr. FULLER observed, in reply to Mr. BUCHANAN, that it was true that $500,000 were insufficient to complete the ten sloops of war. But the Senate, in passing their bill on this subject, adopted the principle that ten ought to be built, but only half the money appropriated at first, because the whole could not be used at once. Many advantages and much economy would arise from such an arrangement. Contracts could at once be made for the whole of the timber, and materials could thus be more cheaply obtained.

Mr. MCCOY observed, that the bill was now broken down, to what he had at first expected. He thought there was rather an unnecessary agitation about the pirates. He believed that the President had force enough now. But five sloops of war at once was surely enough. Let us leave some to be provided by our successors.

The question was then put on Mr. BUCHANAN's amendment, and carried—yes, 78, noes 57.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended.

The House concurred in all the amendments of the committee, saving the last, viz: that reducing the number of sloops, and the sum to be appropriated.

The bill having received its third reading, and the question being on its final passage,

Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, spoke in earnest opposition to it. The question had now become this: Whether we will increase the navy of the United States? The bill was no longer a provision against piracy, but a bill for the increase of the navy. If vessels of the kind proposed were needed, he thought we had enough of them already. We had twelve or thirteen schooners, a kind of vessel very similar to those now to be built, as well calculated for the purpose intended as these sloops of war; and the debate came back to the simple question, whether this House will grant an appropriation for the general increase of the navy? and not for any specific purpose. He wished to turn the attention of the House to the expense unavoidably attendant on such a measure. He thought that, when that expense was duly considered, gentlemen would feel inclined to pause, and would endeavor to be better satisfied of the necessity of the expense before they passed this bill. It was not to be disguised, that the argument which had prevailed thus far with the House was based on the necessity of building these vessels for the avowed purpose of putting down piracy. This, however, was now discarded and thrown quite out of view, and we were to build these sloops of war to increase our naval force. It appeared, from the estimates, that each of these vessels will cost 85,000 dollars. If ten of them are built, they will cost 850,000 dollars. The contingent expenses of one of these ships are 61,000 dollars; for the ten, it will be 610,000 dollars. The interest of the cost, together with this contingent expense, will cost the nation upwards of 1,000,000 dollars annually; and this expense is to be permanent so long as these vessels continue in service. We are called upon to do this directly in the face of the law of 1821-'22. We are called upon to alter the policy we then established, and appropriate 1,400,000 dollars, instead of the small sum which we then determined should be appropriated for the increase of the navy. If it was necessary then to reduce our expenses, Mr. R. was by no means convinced that it was as necessary now why we should add the difference between 500,000 and 1,400,000 to the national burden. The vessels we purchased before are still in existence, and our seaports are lined with officers. The bill had indeed been trimmed down, but he was still opposed to it as unnecessary and extravagant.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, followed on the opposite side. He said it might be thought, that as he represented that State, which was the furthest of any from the ocean, he neither knew nor cared much about a bill which related wholly to naval affairs; but if any gentleman had drawn that conclusion, they had misunderstood him, and misunderstood the West. The Western country knows and feels that it is dependent for its prosperity, to a very great extent, on the owners of our shipping. It is through them that the trade of the interior gets an outlet to the ocean, and it has experienced the vast advantage which has been conferred by the navy on the security and advancement of the commerce of the country. The West has an extensive interest in enjoying a market for its product. In the present state of the country, the only market for a very large portion of the interior, is found at New Orleans; and the Western States have, therefore, a direct concern in the protection of the trade in the Gulf of Mexico, from those vile marauders, who have so long vexed and harassed it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, observed, in reply to Mr. ROSS, that that gentleman was mistaken in supposing that this bill was at war with the principles of economy. On the contrary, experience had proved, that there was no class of vessels so cheap as that now proposed; the plan of the bill was eminently an economical plan. The expense of a 74 gun ship was five times as great as that of a sloop of war. Allowing one of the latter to cost $70,000, five of them will cost $350,000, but one 74 costs $370,000. These sloops, while costing less than a 74, employ at the same time, 200 more men. There was no comparison as to the efficiency of the two kinds of vessels in time of peace. Our 74s, as such, are now in a great measure useless. They are employed only for the want of smaller vessels. Sloops of war employ more men and more officers. They afford a desirable opportunity of making our midshipmen into masters, and furnish the best and only effectual means to train up officers for the navy service. It is in vain you give them education in a school, of however excellent a kind; a naval officer must be a sailor, or he is utterly inefficient. If Congress mean to make the navy an effectual arm of defence, they must provide it with officers who have not only theory, but practice. To this end, the plan of the present bill is the most efficient, while it is the most economical.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, supported the bill. If the House should now reject it, it was too late to originate a new one, and the commerce of the country would be left to the depredation of the pirates to the next session. A state of things which would cost the nation fifty times as much as the whole amount of the bill.

[The Senate subsequently concurred in all the amendments made to the House by this bill.]

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. HERRICK in the chair,) on the bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause a road to be marked out from Missouri to the confines of New Mexico; it was reported without amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE objected to the bill, as being for External Improvement, and moved that it lie on the table. The motion was carried—Ayes 68, Noes 48.

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

Mr. TUCKER offered the following, which lies on the table:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to ascertain the probable expense of extinguishing the Indian title to a portion of the country lying west of the Rocky Mountains, that may be suitable for colonizing the free people of color, the best known route across the said mountains, and the probable cost of a road and military posts necessary to a safe communication with such colony, and to report thereon to the House at the next session of Congress."

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said he wished the gentleman would withdraw his motion, to give him an opportunity of expressing his sentiments on so extraordinary a proposition, on which there prevailed a distempered enthusiasm, which ought, for the interest of the country, to be repressed.

The motion was not withdrawn, but, after some further remarks, the resolve was ordered to lie on the table.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning the Copper Mines on the south side of Lake Superior.

Mr. COOKE inquired for further information; and a letter from Mr. Schoolcraft, the Mineralogist, was read.

Mr. OWEN moved to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and substitute the body of another bill for adjusting certain land claims.

The Chair pronounced the motion out of order.

Mr. COOKE then stated that he had just received information from the delegate from Michigan, which induced him to believe the Copper Mines in question were of great value—and that the longer the purchase was deferred, the more its price would be enhanced.

Mr. ELLIS opposed the bill. It was beneath the dignity of the Government, he said, to seize upon a feature of value in the Indian country the moment it was heard of, &c.

Mr. RANKIN deprecated the interference of the United States in mining property. The experience of the Government, in relation to lead mines and salt springs, afforded a warning on the subject. He moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. RICHARD, Delegate from Michigan, stated the facts of the case. One vein of very pure ore had been discovered, of six feet in thickness, he said, and of great, and at present, unknown length. The value of this mine made it very important to legislate on the subject, &c.

Mr. CONWAY, the Delegate from Arkansas, corroborated this statement. Masses of copper had been found there, he said, weighing several hundred pounds. He replied to the remarks of Mr. RANKIN. The bill only looks to the extinguishment of Indian title to a small tract of country embracing the mine, which, if not worked by the Government, might be sold to great advantage.

Mr. WHIPPLE opposed the bill. He did not doubt the existence of quantities of copper there—but the transportation, &c., would make it cost more than that imported.

Mr. STRONG advocated the object of the bill. Its object was not to extinguish the Indian title to the tract, but to have the country thoroughly explored, and, if copper exists, as is represented, to get the right over it for the United States, by purchase.

Mr. McCOR opposed the bill. Mines were the last property, he said, for which he would vote away the public money.

Mr. WOOD stated facts, and quoted Long's Expedition, to show that the mine would be of no value till local commerce required copper in that neighborhood.

The question being put, the enacting clause of the bill was stricken out.

So the bill was rejected.

The bill from the Senate to authorize the President of the United States to cause a road to be marked out from the western frontier of Missouri to the confines of New Mexico, yesterday laid on the table, was again taken up.

Mr. McCOR moved to lay it again on the table. The motion was negatived—ayes 49, noes 79.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate.

Evening Session—8 o'clock.

Mr. CALL moved to take up the bill establishing a navy yard at or near Pensacola. The motion was agreed to—ayes 66, noes 44.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair, on that bill.

A debate arose upon this bill, of considerable interest, in which Mr. CALL, WOOD of New York, CLAY, and TATTNALL, took part, in which the bill was supported with great earnestness by Mr. CALL and Mr. TATTNALL, and opposed by Mr. BARTLETT. On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the bill was modified by an amendment, so as to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to locate the navy yard on any point in the Gulf of Mexico. In this form it was advocated by Mr. WOOD and Mr. CLAY, and having been reported, it was ordered to a third reading—and was subsequently read a third time, passed, and returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment.

THURSDAY, March 8.

Mr. FORSYTH laid upon the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That while this House anxiously desires that the slave trade should be universally denounced as piracy, and, as such, should be detected and punished under the law of nations, it considers that it would be highly inexpedient to enter into engagements with any foreign power, by which all the merchant vessels of the United States would be exposed to the inconveniences of any regulation of search from which any merchant vessels of that foreign power would be exempted."

The resolution lies on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH also offered the following:

Resolved, That the purchase of lands from the Indians occupying it in the State of Georgia, is a peaceable extinguishment of their title; and that a purchase should be made, if it can be effected on reasonable terms, although the residue of the tribes to which the said Indians may be attached should not join in the contract."

This resolution, also, was, on motion of the mover, ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. MARKLEY, of Pennsylvania, it was

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Hon. HENRY CLAY, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and unpleasant duties of the chair, during the present session of Congress."

A few minutes after this vote, Mr. OLAY, the Speaker, having resumed the chair, addressed the House as follows:

"GENTLEMEN: For the honorable testimony which you have been pleased this day to express to my official conduct in this highly distinguished station, I pray you to accept my profound acknowledgments. Near fourteen years, with but two comparatively short intervals, the arduous duties of the Chair have been assigned to me. In that long period, of peace and of war, causes from without and within, of great public excitement, have occasionally divided our councils, disturbed our harmony, and threatened our safety. Happily, however, past dangers, which appeared to encompass us, were dispelled, as I anxiously hope those of the present will be, in a spirit of mutual forbearance, moderation, and wisdom. The debates in this House, to which those causes gave rise, were sometimes ardent and animated; but, amidst all the heats and agitations produced by our temporary divisions, it has been my happy fortune to experience, in an unexampled degree, the kindness, the confidence, and the affectionate attachment of the members of the House. Of the numerous decisions which I have been called upon to pronounce from this place, on questions often suddenly started, and of much difficulty, it has so happened, from the generous support given me, that not one of them has ever been reversed by the House. I advert to this fact, not in a vain spirit of exultation, but as furnishing a powerful motive for undissembled gratitude.

In retiring, perhaps forever, from a situation with which so large a portion of my life has been associated, I shall continually revert, during the remainder of it, with unceasing respect and gratitude, to this great theatre of our public action, and with the firm belief that the public interests and the liberty of our beloved country will be safely guarded hereafter, as they have been heretofore, by enlightened patriotism.

Gentlemen: In returning to your respective families and constituents, I beg all of you, without exception, to carry with you my fervent prayers for the continuation of your lives, your health, and your happiness."

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, called for the consideration of the resolve yesterday submitted by him, looking to the Colonization of the free people of color beyond the Rocky Mountains; which motion the House refused now to consider.

Soon after this the House adjourned sine die.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE.*

MONDAY, December 5.

Agreeably to the provision of the constitution, fixing the period for the meeting of Congress, the two Houses assembled in their respective Chambers, in the Capitol, this day, and commenced the First Session of the Nineteenth Congress.

At twelve o'clock, the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, ex officio PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE, took the chair, and called the Senate to order. The roll of the Members being then called over, it appeared that a quorum was present.

On motion, a committee was ordered to be appointed jointly with such committee as should be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are assembled, and ready to receive any communication he might have to make; and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

The usual orders, for furnishing the Members with a certain number of newspapers, &c., were adopted, and

The Senate adjourned to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 6.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, reported, from the Joint Committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, agreeably to order, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day.

Soon after which,

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of Mr. J. Adams, Jun., his private Secretary; which was read, and 8,000 copies ordered to be printed, together with 1,500 of the accompanying documents.

Message of the President.

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In taking a general survey of the concerns of our beloved country, with reference to subjects interesting to the common welfare, the first sentiment which impresses itself upon the mind, is, of gratitude to the Omnipotent Disposer of all Good, for the continuance of the signal blessings of his Providence, and especially for that health which to an unusual extent, has prevailed within our borders; and for that abundance which, in the vicissitudes of the seasons, has been scattered, with profusion, over our land. President's Message.

[SENATE.]

Him the glory, that we are permitted to enjoy the bounties of his hand in peace and tranquillity—in peace with all the other nations of the earth, in tranquillity among ourselves. There has, indeed, rarely been a period in the history of civilized man, in which the general condition of the Christian nations has been marked so extensively by peace and prosperity.

Europe, with a few partial and unhappy exceptions, has enjoyed ten years of peace, during which all her Governments, whatever the theory of their constitutions may have been, are successively taught to feel that the end of their institution is the happiness of the people, and that the exercise of power among men can be justified only by the blessings it confers upon those over whom it is extended.

During the same period, our intercourse with all those nations has been pacific and friendly—it so continues. Since the close of your last session no material variation has occurred in our relations with any one of them. In the commercial and navigation system of Great Britain, important changes of municipal regulation have recently been sanctioned by acts of Parliament, the effect of which upon the interests of other nations, and particularly upon ours, has not yet been fully developed. In the recent renewal of the diplomatic missions on both sides, between the two Governments, assurances have been given and received of the continuance and increase of the mutual confidence and cordiality by which the adjustment of many points of difference had already been effected, and which affords the surest pledge for the ultimate satisfactory adjustment of those which still remain open, or may hereafter arise.

The policy of the United States, in their commercial intercourse with other nations, has always been of the most liberal character. In the mutual exchange of their respective productions, they have abstained altogether from prohibitions; they have interdicted themselves the power of laying taxes upon exports, and, whenever they have favored their own shipping, by special preferences, or exclusive privileges in their own ports, it has been only with a view to countervail similar favors and exclusions granted by the nations with whom we have been engaged in traffic, to their own people or shipping, and to the disadvantage of ours. Immediately after the close of the last war, a proposal was fairly made by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1815, to all the maritime nations, to lay aside the system of retaliating restrictions and exclusions, and to place the shipping of both parties to the common trade on a footing of equality, in respect to the duties of tonnage and impost. This offer was partially and successively accepted by Great Britain, Sweden, the Netherlands, the Hanseatic Cities, Prussia, Sardinia, the Duke of Oldenburg, and Russia. It was also adopted, under certain modifications, in our late commercial convention with France. And, by the act of Congress of the 8th January, 1824, it has received a new confirmation, with all the nations who had acceded to it, and has been offered again to all those who are, or may hereafter be, willing to abide in reciprocity by it. But all these regulations, whether established by treaty or by municipal enactments, are still subject to one important restriction. The removal of discriminating duties of tonnage and of impost, is limited to articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the country to which the vessel belongs, or to such articles as are most usually first shipped from her ports. It will deserve the serious consideration of Congress, whether even this remnant of restriction may not be safely abandoned, and whether the general tender of equal competition, made in the act of 8th January, 1824, may not be extended, to include all article of merchandise not prohibited, of what country soever they may be the produce or manufacture. Propositions to this effect have already been made to us by more than one European government, and it is probable, that, if once established by legislation or compact with any distinguished maritime state, it would recommend itself, by the experience of its advantages, to the general accession of all.

The Convention of Commerce and Navigation between the United States and France, concluded on the 24th of June, 1822, was, in the understanding and intent of both parties, as appears upon its face, only a temporary arrangement of the points of difference between them, of the most immediate and pressing urgency. It was limited, in the first instance, to two years, from the 1st of October, 1822, but with a proviso, that it should further continue in force till the conclusion of a general and definite treaty of commerce, unless terminated by a notice six months in advance, of either of the parties to the other. Its operation, so far as it extended, has been mutually advantageous; and it still continues in force by common consent. But it left unadjusted several objects of great interest to the citizens and subjects of both countries, and particularly a mass of claims, to considerable amount, of citizens of the United States upon the Government of France, of indemnity for property taken or destroyed under circumstances of the most aggravated and outrageous character. In the long period during which continual and earnest appeals have been made to the equity and magnanimity of France, in behalf of these claims, their justice has not been, as it could not be, denied. It was hoped that the accession of a new sovereign to the throne would have afforded a favorable opportunity for presenting them to the consideration of his Government. They have been presented and urged, hitherto, without effect. The repeated and earnest representations of our Minister at the Court of France, remain, as yet, even without an answer. Were the demands of nations upon the justice of each other susceptible of adjudication by the sentence of an impartial tribunal, those to which I now refer would long since have been settled, and adequate indemnity would have been obtained. There are large amounts of similar claims upon the Netherlands, Naples, and Denmark. For those upon Spain, prior to 1819, indemnity was, after many years of patient forbearance, obtained, and those upon Sweden have been lately compromised by a private settlement, in which the claimants themselves have acquiesced. The Governments of Denmark and of Naples have been recently reminded of those yet existing against them; nor will any of them be forgotten, while a hope may be indulged of obtaining justice, by the means within the constitutional power of the Executive, and without resorting to those measures of self-redress, which, as well as the time, circumstances, and occasions, which may require them, are within the exclusive competency of the Legislature.

Republic of Colombia has made satisfaction for well-established claims of a similar character. And among the documents, now communicated to Congress, will be distinguished a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with that Republic; the ratifications of which have been exchanged since the last recess of the Legislature. The negotiation of similar treaties with all the independent South American States, has been contemplated, and may yet be accomplished. The basis of them all, as proposed by the United States, has been laid in two principles: the one, of entire and unqualified reciprocity; the other, the mutual obligation of the parties to place each other permanently upon the footing of the most favored nation. These principles are, indeed, indispensable to the effectual emancipation of the American hemisphere from the thralldom of colonizing monopolies and exclusions—an event rapidly realizing in the progress of human affairs, and which the resistance still opposed in certain parts of Europe to the acknowledgment of the Southern American Republics as independent States, will, it is believed, contribute more effectually to accomplish. The time has been, and that not remote, when some of those States might, in their anxious desire to obtain a nominal recognition, have accepted of a nominal independence, clogged with burdensome conditions, and exclusive commercial privileges, granted to the nation from which they have separated, to the disadvantage of all others. They are now all aware that such concessions to any European nation, would be incompatible with that independence which they have declared and maintained.

Among the measures which have been suggested to them by the new relations with one another, resulting from the recent changes of their condition, is that of assembling, at the Isthmus of Panama, a Congress at which each of them should be represented, to deliberate upon objects important to the welfare of all. The Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, have already deputed Plenipotentiaries to such a meeting, and they have invited the United States to be also represented there by their ministers. The invitation has been accepted, and ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations, and to take part in them, so far as may be compatible with that neutrality from which it is neither our intention, nor the desire of the other American States, that we should depart.

The Commissioners under the seventh article of the Treaty of Ghent, have so nearly completed their arduous labors, that, by the report recently received from the agent on the part of the United States, there is reason to expect that the commission will be closed at their next session, appointed for the 22d of May of the ensuing year.

The other commission, appointed to ascertain the indemnities due for slaves carried away from the United States, after the close of the late war, have met with some difficulty, which has delayed their progress in the inquiry. A reference has been made to the British Government on the subject, which, it may be hoped, will tend to hasten the decision of the Commissioners, or serve as a substitute for it.

Among the powers specifically granted to Congress by the constitution, are those of establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, and of providing for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. The magnitude and complexity of the interests affected by legislation upon these subjects, may account for the fact, that, long and often as both of them have occupied the attention, and animated the debates of Congress, no systems have yet been devised for fulfilling, to the satisfaction of the community, the duties prescribed by these grants of power. To conciliate the claim of the individual citizen to the enjoyment of personal liberty, with the effective obligation of private contracts, is the difficult problem to be solved by a law of bankruptcy. These are objects of the deepest interest to society; affecting all that is precious in the existence of multitudes of persons, many of them in the classes essentially dependent and helpless; of the age requiring nurture, and of the sex entitled to protection, from the free agency of the parent and the husband. The organization of the militia is yet more indispensable to the liberties of the country. It is only by an effective militia that we can at once enjoy the repose of peace, and bid defiance to foreign aggression; it is by the militia that we are constituted an armed nation, standing in perpetual panoply of defence, in the presence of all the other nations of the earth. To this end, it would be necessary, if possible, so to shape its organization as to give it a more united and active energy. There are laws for establishing a uniform militia, throughout the United States, and for arming and equipping its whole body; but it is a body of dislocated members, without the vigor of unity, and having little of uniformity but the name. To infuse into this most important institution the power of which it is susceptible, and to make it available for the defence of the Union, at the shortest notice, and at the smallest expense possible of time, of life, and of treasure, are among the benefits to be expected from the persevering deliberations of Congress.

Among the unequivocal indications of our national prosperity, is the flourishing state of our finances. The revenues of the present year, from all their principal sources, will exceed the anticipations of the last. The balance in the Treasury, on the first of January last, was a little short of two millions of dollars, exclusive of two millions and a half, being the moiety of the loan of five millions, authorized by the act of 26th May, 1824. The receipts into the Treasury, from the first of January to the 30th of September, exclusive of the other moiety of the same loan, are estimated at sixteen millions five hundred thousand dollars; and it is expected, that those of the current quarter will exceed five millions of dollars; forming an aggregate of receipts of nearly twenty-two millions, independent of the loan. The expenditures of the year will not exceed that sum more than two millions. By those expenditures, nearly eight millions of the principal of the public debt have been discharged. More than a million and a half has been devoted to the debt of gratitude to the warriors of the Revolution; a nearly equal sum to the construction of fortifications, and the acquisition of ordnance, and other permanent preparations of national defence; half a million to the gradual increase of the Navy; an equal sum for purchases of territory from the Indians, and payment of annuities to them; and upwards of a million for objects of internal improvement, authorized by special acts of the last Congress. If we add to these, four millions of dollars for payment of interest upon the public debt, there remains a sum of about seven millions, which have defrayed the whole expense of the administration of Government, in its Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary Departments, including the support of the military and naval establishments, and all the occasional contingencies of a Government co-extensive with the Union.

The amount of duties secured on merchandise imported since the commencement of the year, is about twenty-five millions and a half; and that which will accrue during the current quarter, is estimated at five millions and a half; from these thirty-one millions, deducting the drawbacks, estimated at less than seven millions, a sum exceeding twenty-four millions will constitute the revenue of the year; and will exceed the whole expenditures of the year. The entire amount of public debt remaining due on the first of January next, will be short of eighty-one millions of dollars.

By an act of Congress of the third of March last, a loan of twelve millions of dollars was authorized at four and a half per cent., or an exchange of stock to that amount of four and a half per cent. for a stock of six per cent., to create a fund for extinguishing an equal amount of the public debt, bearing an interest of six per cent., redeemable in 1826. An account of the measures taken to give effect to this act, will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury. As the object which it had in view has been but partially accomplished, it will be for the consideration of Congress, whether the power with which it clothed the Executive should not be renewed at an early day of the present session, and under what modifications.

The act of Congress of the 3d of March last, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe, in the name and for the use of the United States, for one thousand five hundred shares of the capital stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, has been executed by the actual subscription for the amount specified; and such other measures have been adopted by that officer, under the act, as the fulfilment of its intentions requires. The latest accounts received of this important undertaking, authorize the belief that it is in successful progress.

The payments into the Treasury from proceeds of the sales of the public lands, during the present year, were estimated at one million of dollars. The actual receipts of the first two quarters have fallen very little short of that sum; it is not expected that the second half of the year will be equally productive; but the income of the year from that source may now be safely estimated at a million and a half. The act of Congress of 18th May, 1824, to provide for the extinguishment of the debt due to the United States by the purchasers of public lands, was limited, in its operation of relief to the purchaser, to the 10th of April last. Its effect at the end of the quarter during which it expired, was to reduce that debt from ten to seven millions. By the operation of similar prior laws of relief, from and since that of 2d of March, 1821, the debt had been reduced, from upwards of twenty-two millions, to ten. It is exceedingly desirable that it should be extinguished altogether; and to facilitate that consummation, I recommend to Congress the revival for one year more, of the act of eighteenth May, 1824, with such provisional modification as may be necessary to guard the public interests against fraudulent practices in the resale of the relinquished land. The purchasers of public lands are among the most useful of our fellow-citizens; and, since the system of sales for cash alone has been introduced, great indulgence has been justly extended to those who had previously purchased upon credit. The debt which had been contracted under the credit sales had become unwieldy, and its extinction was alike advantageous to the purchaser and the public. Under the system of sales, matured, as it has been, by experience, and adapted to the exigencies of the times, the lands will continue, as they have become, an abundant source of revenue; and when the pledge of them to the public creditor shall have been redeemed by the entire discharge of the national debt, the swelling tide of wealth with which they replenish the common Treasury may be made to reflow in unfailling streams of improvement from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The condition of the various branches of the public service, resorting from the Department of War, and their administration during the current year, will be exhibited in the report of the Secretary of War, and the accompanying documents herewith communicated. The organization and discipline of the Army are effective and satisfactory. To counteract the prevalence of desertion among the troops, it has been suggested to withhold from the men a small portion of their monthly pay, until the period of their discharge; and some expedient appears to be necessary to preserve and maintain among the officers so much of the art of horsemanship as could scarcely fail to be found wanting, on the possible sudden eruption of a war, which should overtake us unprovided with a single corps of cavalry. The Military Academy at West Point, under the restrictions of a severe but paternal superintendence, recommends itself more and more to the patronage of the nation; and the number of meritorious officers which it forms and introduces to the public service, furnishes the means of multiplying the undertakings of public improvements to which their acquirements at that institution are peculiarly adapted. The school of Artillery Practice, established at Fortress Monroe, is well suited to the same purpose, and may need the aid of further legislative provision to the same end. The reports of the various officers at the head of the administrative branches of the military service, connected with the quartering, clothing, subsistence, health, and pay, of the Army, exhibit the assiduous vigilance of those officers in the performance of their respective duties, and the faithful accountability which has pervaded every part of the system.

Our relations with the numerous tribes of aboriginal natives of this country, scattered over its extensive surface, and so dependent, even for their existence, upon our power, have been, during the present year, highly interesting. An act of Congress, of 25th May, 1824, made an appropriation to defray the expenses of making treaties of trade and friendship with the Indian tribes beyond the Mississippi. An act of 3d March, 1825, authorized treaties to be made with the Indians for their consent to the making of a road from the frontier of Missouri to that of New Mexico. And another act, of the same date, provided for defraying the expenses of holding treaties with the Sioux, Chippeways, Menomonies, Sauks, Foxes, &c., for the purpose of establishing boundaries and promoting peace between said tribes. The first and the last objects of these acts have been accomplished, and the second is yet in a process of execution. The treaties which, since the last session of Congress, have been concluded with the several tribes, will be laid before the Senate for their consideration, conformably to the constitution. They comprise large and valuable acquisitions of territory; and they secure an adjustment of boundaries, and give pledges of permanent peace between several tribes which had been long waging bloody wars against each other.

On the 12th of February last, a treaty was signed at the Indian Springs, between Commissioners appointed on the part of the United States, and certain chiefs and individuals of the Creek Nation of Indians, which was received at the Seat of Government only a very few days before the close of the last session of Congress and of the late Administration. The advice and consent of the Senate was given to it on the 3d of March, too late for it to receive the ratification of the then President of the United States; it was ratified on the 7th of March, under the unsuspecting impression that it had been negotiated in good faith, and in the confidence inspired by the recommendation of the Senate. The subsequent transactions in relation to this treaty, will form the subject of a separate Message.

The appropriations made by Congress, for public works, as well in the construction of fortifications, as for purposes of internal improvement, so far as they have been expended, have been faithfully applied. Their progress has been delayed by the want of suitable officers for superintending them. An increase of both the corps of Engineers, Military and Topographical, was recommended by my predecessor, at the last session of Congress. The reasons upon which that recommendation was founded, subsist in all their force, and have acquired additional urgency since that time. It may also be expedient to organize the Topographical Engineers into a corps similar to the present establishment of the corps of Engineers. The Military Academy at West Point will furnish from the Cadets annually graduated there, officers well qualified for carrying this measure into effect.

The Board of Engineers for Internal Improvement, appointed for carrying into execution the Act of Congress of 30th of April, 1824, "to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, on the subject of roads and canals," have been actively engaged in that service from the close of the last session of Congress. They have completed the surveys necessary for ascertaining the practicability of a canal from the Chesapeake Bay to the Ohio River, and are preparing a full report on that subject; which, when completed, will be laid before you. The same observation is to be made with regard to the two other objects of national importance upon which the Board have been occupied; namely, the accomplishment of a national road from this city to New Orleans, and the practicability of uniting the waters of Lake Memphramagog with Connecticut River, and the improvement of the navigation of that river. The surveys have been made, and are nearly completed. The report may be expected at an early period during the present session of Congress.

The Acts of Congress of the last session, relative to the surveying, marking, or laying out, roads in the Territories of Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan, from Missouri to Mexico, and for the continuation of the Cumberland Road, are, some of them, fully executed, and others in the process of execution. Those for completing or commencing fortifications, have been delayed only so far as the Corps of Engineers has been inadequate to furnish officers for the necessary superintendence of the works. Under the act confirming the statutes of Virginia and Maryland, incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, three Commissioners on the part of the United States have been appointed for opening books and receiving subscriptions, in concert with a like number of Commissioners appointed on the part of each of those States. A meeting of the Commissioners has been postponed, to await the definitive Report of the Board of Engineers. The light-houses and monuments for the safety of our commerce and mariners; the works for the security of Plymouth beach, and for the preservation of the islands in Boston harbor; have received the attention required by the laws relating to those objects respectively. The continuation of the Cumberland Road, the most important of them all, after surmounting no inconsiderable difficulty in fixing upon the direction of the road, has commenced under the most promising auspices, with the improvements of recent invention in the mode of construction, and with the advantage of a great reduction in the comparative cost of the work.

The operation of the laws relating to the Revolutionary pensioners, may deserve the renewed consideration of Congress. The act of 18th March, 1818, while it made provision for many meritorious and indigent citizens, who had served in the War of Independence, opened a door to numerous abuses and impositions. To remedy this, the act of 1st May, 1820, exacted proofs of absolute indigence, which many really in want were unable, and all, susceptible of that delicacy which is allied to many virtues, must be deeply reluctant to give. The result has been, that some among the least deserving have been retained, and some in whom the requisites both of worth and want were combined, have been stricken from the list. As the numbers of these venerable relics of an age gone by diminish; as the decays of body, mind, and estate, of those that survive, must, in the common course of nature, increase; should not a more liberal portion of indulgence be dealt out to them? May not the want, in most instances, be inferred from the demand, when the service can be duly proved; and may not the last days of human infirmity be spared the mortification of purchasing a pittance of relief only by the exposure of its own necessities? I submit to Congress the expediency either of providing for individual cases of this description by special enactment, or of revising the act of 1st May, 1820, with a view to mitigate the rigor of its exclusions, in favor of persons to whom charity now bestowed can scarcely discharge the debt of justice.

The portion of the Naval force of the Union in actual service, has been chiefly employed on three stations: the Mediterranean, the coasts of South America bordering on the Pacific Ocean, and the West Indies. An occasional cruiser has been sent to range along the African shores most polluted by the traffic of slaves; one armed vessel has been stationed on the coast of our eastern boundary, to cruise along the fishing grounds in Hudson's Bay, and on the coast of Labrador; and the first service of a new frigate has been performed in restoring to his native soil, and domestic enjoyments, the veteran hero whose youthful blood and treasure had freely flowed in the cause of our country's Independence, and whose whole life had been a series of services and sacrifices to the improvement of his fellow-men. The visit of General Lafayette, alike honorable to himself and to our country, closed, as it had commenced, with the most affecting testimonials of devoted attachment on his part, and of unbounded gratitude of this people to him in return. It will form, hereafter, a pleasing incident in the annals of our Union, giving to real history the intense interest of romance, and signally marking the unpurchasable tribute of a great nation's social affections to the disinterested champion of the liberties of human kind.

The constant maintenance of a small squadron in the Mediterranean, is a necessary substitute for the humiliating alternative of paying tribute for the security of our commerce in that sea, and for a precarious peace, at the mercy of every caprice of four Barbary States, by whom it was liable to be violated. An additional motive for keeping a respectable force stationed there at this time, is found in the maritime war raging between the Greeks and the Turks; and in which the neutral navigation of this Union is always in danger of outrage and depredation. A few instances have occurred of such depredations upon our merchant vessels by privateers or pirates wearing the Grecian flag, but without real authority from the Greek or any other Government. The heroic struggles of the Greeks themselves, in which our warmest sympathies as Freemen and Christians have been engaged, have continued to be maintained with vicissitudes of success adverse and favorable.

Similar motives have rendered expedient the keeping of a like force on the coasts of Peru and Chili on the Pacific. The irregular and convulsive character of the war upon the shores, has been extended to the conflicts upon the ocean. An active warfare has been kept up for years, with alternate success, though generally to the advantage of the American patriots. But their naval forces have not always been under the control of their own Governments. Blockades, unjustifiable upon any acknowledged principles of international law, have been proclaimed by officers in command; and though disavowed by the supreme authorities, the protection of our own commerce against them has been made cause of complaint and of erroneous imputations against some of the most gallant officers of our navy. Complaints equally groundless have been made by the commanders of the Spanish Royal forces in those seas; but the most effective protection to our commerce has been the flag, and the firmness of our own commanding officers. The cessation of the war, by the complete triumph of the patriot cause, has removed, it is hoped, all cause of dissension with one party, and all vestige of force of the other. But an unsettled coast of many degrees of latitude, forming a part of our own Territory, and a flourishing commerce and fishery, extending to the islands of the Pacific and to China, still require that the protecting power of the Union should be displayed under its flag as well upon the ocean as upon the land.

The objects of the West India squadron have been to carry into execution the laws for the suppression of the African slave trade: for the protection of our commerce against vessels of piratical character, though bearing commissions from either of the belligerent parties: for its protection against open and unequivocal pirates. These objects, during the present year, have been accomplished more effectually than at any former period. The African slave trade has long been excluded from the use of our flag; and if some few citizens of our country have continued to set the laws of the Union, as well as those of nature and humanity, at defiance, by persevering in that abominable traffic, it has been only by sheltering themselves under the banners of other nations, less earnest for the total extinction of the trade than ours. The irregular privateers have, within the last year, been in a great measure banished from those seas; and the pirates, for months past, appear to have been almost entirely swept away from the borders and the shores of the two Spanish islands in those regions. The active, persevering, and unremitted energy of Captain Warrington, and of the officers and men under his command, on that trying and perilous service, have been crowned with signal success, and are entitled to the approbation of their country. But experience has shown, that not even a temporary suspension or relaxation from assiduity can be indulged on that station, without reproducing piracy and murder in all their horrors; nor is it probable that, for years to come, our immensely valuable commerce in those seas can navigate in security, without the steady continuance of an armed force devoted to its protection.

It were indeed a vain and dangerous illusion to believe, that, in the present or probable condition of human society, a commerce so extensive and so rich as ours could exist and be pursued in safety, without the continual support of a military marine—the only arm by which the power of this Confederacy can be estimated or felt by foreign nations, and the only standing military force which can never be dangerous to our own liberties at home. A permanent naval peace establishment, therefore, adapted to our present condition, and adaptable to that gigantic growth with which the nation is advancing in its career, is among the subjects which have already occupied the foresight of the last Congress, and which will deserve your serious deliberations. Our navy, commenced at an early period of our present political organization, upon a scale commensurate with the incipient energies, the scanty resources, and the comparative indigence of our infancy, was even then found adequate to cope with all the powers of Barbary, save the first, and with one of the principal maritime powers of Europe. At a period of further advancement, but with little accession of strength, it not only sustained with honor the most unequal of conflicts, but covered itself and our country with unfading glory. But it is only since the close of the late war, that, by the number and force of the ships of which it was composed, it could deserve the name of a navy. Yet it retains nearly the same organization as when it consisted only of five frigates. The rules and regulations by which it is governed, earnestly call for revision, and the want of a Naval School of Instruction, corresponding with the Military Academy at West Point, for the formation of scientific and accomplished officers, is felt with daily increasing aggravation.

The act of Congress of 26th May, 1824, authorizes

ing an examination and survey of the harbor of Charleston, in South Carolina, of St. Mary's, in Georgia, and of the Coast of Florida, and for other purposes, has been executed so far as the appropriation would admit. Those of the 8d of March last, authorizing the establishment of a navy yard and depôt on the coast of Florida, in the Gulf of Mexico, and authorizing the building of ten sloops of war, and for other purposes, are in the course of execution: for the particulars of which, and other objects connected with this Department, I refer to the Report of the Secretary of the Navy, herewith communicated.

A Report from the Postmaster General is also submitted, exhibiting the present flourishing condition of that Department. For the first time for many years, the receipts for the year ending on the 1st of July last, exceeded the expenditures during the same period, to the amount of more than forty-five thousand dollars. Other facts, equally creditable to the administration of this Department, are, that, in two years from the 1st of July, 1823, an improvement of more than one hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars in its pecuniary affairs, has been realized; that in the same interval the increase of the transportation of the mail has exceeded one million five hundred thousand miles, annually; and that one thousand and forty new post-offices have been established. It hence appears, that, under judicious management, the income from this establishment may be relied on as fully adequate to defray its expenses; and that, by the discontinuance of post-roads, altogether unproductive, others of more useful character may be opened till the circulation of the mail shall keep pace with the spread of our population, and the comforts of friendly correspondence, the exchanges of internal traffic, and the lights of the periodical press, shall be distributed to the remotest corners of the Union, at a charge scarcely perceptible to any individual, and without the cost of a dollar to the public treasury.

Upon this first occasion of addressing the Legislature of the Union, with which I have been honored, in presenting to their view the execution, so far as it has been effected, of the measures sanctioned by them, for promoting the internal improvement of our country, I cannot close the communication without recommending to their calm and persevering consideration the general principle in a more enlarged extent. The great object of the institution of civil government, is the improvement of the condition of those who are parties to the social compact. And no government, in whatever form constituted, can accomplish the lawful ends of its institution, but in proportion as it improves the condition of those over whom it is established. Roads and canals, by multiplying and facilitating the communications and intercourse between distant regions, and multitudes of men, are among the most important means of improvement. But moral, political, intellectual improvement, are duties assigned, by the Author of our existence, to social, no less than to individual man. For the fulfilment of those duties, governments are invested with power; and, to the attainment of the end, the progressive improvement of the condition of the governed; the exercise of delegated power, is a duty as sacred and indispensable, as the usurpation of power not granted, is criminal and odious. Among the first, perhaps the very first instrument for the improvement of the condition of men, is knowledge; and to the acquisition of much of the knowledge adapted to the wants, the comforts, and enjoyments of human life, public institutions, and seminaries of learning, are essential. So convinced of this was the first of my predecessors in this office, now first in the memory, as, living, he was first in the hearts of our country, that, once and again, in his addresses to the Congresses with whom he co-operated in the public service, he earnestly recommended the establishment of Seminaries of Learning, to prepare for all the emergencies of peace and war—a national university and a military academy. With respect to the latter, had he lived to the present day, in turning his eyes to the institution at West Point, he would have enjoyed the gratification of his most earnest wishes. But, in surveying the city which has been honored with his name, he would have seen the spot of earth which he had destined and bequeathed to the use and benefit of his country, as the site for a university, still bare and barren.

In assuming her station among the civilized nations of the earth, it would seem that our country had contracted the engagement to contribute her share of mind, of labor, and of expense, to the improvement of those parts of knowledge which lie beyond the reach of individual acquisition; and particularly, to geographical and astronomical science. Looking back to the history only of the half century since the Declaration of our Independence, and observing the generous emulation with which the Governments of France, Great Britain, and Russia, have devoted the genius, the intelligence, the treasures of their respective nations, to the common improvement of the species in these branches of science, is it not incumbent upon us to inquire, whether we are not bound, by obligations of a high and honorable character, to contribute our portion of energy and exertion to the common stock? The voyages of discovery, prosecuted in the course of that time, at the expense of those nations, have not only redounded to their glory, but to the improvement of human knowledge. We have been partakers of that improvement, and owe for it a sacred debt, not only of gratitude, but of equal or proportional exertion in the same common cause. Of the cost of these undertakings, if the mere expenditures of outfit, equipment, and completion of the expeditions, were to be considered the only charges, it would be unworthy of a great and generous nation to take a second thought. One hundred expeditions of circumnavigation, like those of Cook and La Perouse, would not burden the exchequer of the nation fitting them out, so much as the ways and means of defraying a single campaign in war. But, if we take into the account the lives of those benefactors of mankind, of which their services in the cause of their species were the purchase, how shall the cost of those heroic enterprises be estimated? And what compensation can be made to them, or to their countries, for them? Is it not by bearing them in affectionate remembrance? Is it not still more by imitating their example? by enabling countrymen of our own to pursue the same career, and to hazard their lives in the same cause?

In inviting the attention of Congress to the subject of internal improvements, upon a view thus enlarged, it is not my design to recommend the equipment of an expedition for circumnavigating the globe for purposes of scientific research and inquity. We have objects of useful investigation nearer home, and to which our cares may be more beneficially applied. The interior of our own territories has yet been very imperfectly explored. Our coasts, along many degrees of latitude upon the shores of the Pacific Ocean, though much frequented by our spirited commercial navigators, have been rarely visited by our public ships. The river of the West, first fully discovered and navigated by a countryman of our own, still bears the name of the ship in which he ascended its waters, and claims the protection of our armed national flag at its mouth. With the establishment of a military post there, or at some other point of that coast, recommended by my predecessor, and already matured, in the deliberations of the last Congress, I would suggest the expediency of connecting the equipment of a public ship for the exploration of the whole Northwest coast of this continent.

The establishment of a uniform standard of Weights and Measures, was one of the specific objects contemplated in the formation of our constitution; and to fix that standard, was one of the powers delegated by express terms, in that instrument, to Congress. The Governments of Great Britain and France have scarcely ceased to be occupied with inquiries and speculations on the same subject, since the existence of our constitution, and with them it has expanded into profound, laborious, and expensive researches into the figure of the earth, and the comparative length of the pendulum vibrating seconds in various latitudes, from the Equator to the Pole. These researches have resulted in the composition and publication of several works highly interesting to the cause of science. The experiments are yet in the process of performance. Some of them have recently been made on our own shores, within the walls of one of our own colleges, and partly by one of our own fellow-citizens. It would be honorable to our country if the sequel of the same experiments should be countenanced by the patronage of our Government, as they have hitherto been by those of France and Britain.

Connected with the establishment of a University, or separate from it, might be undertaken the erection of an astronomical observatory, with provision for the support of an astronomer, to be in constant attendance of observation upon the phenomena of the heavens; and for the periodical publication of his observations. It is with no feeling of pride, as an American, that the remark may be made, that, on the comparatively small territorial surface of Europe, there are existing upwards of one hundred and thirty of these light-houses of the skies; while, throughout the whole American hemisphere, there is not one. If we reflect a moment upon the discoveries, which, in the last four centuries, have been made in the physical constitution of the universe, by the means of these buildings, and of observers stationed in them, shall we doubt of their usefulness to every nation? And while scarcely a year passes over our heads without bringing some new astronomical discovery to light, which we must fain receive at second hand from Europe, are we not cutting ourselves off from the means of returning light for light, while we have neither observatory nor observer upon our half of the globe, and the earth revolves in perpetual darkness to our unsearching eyes?

the result of the first enumeration of the inhabitants of this Union, he informed them that the returns gave the pleasing assurance that the population of the United States bordered on four millions of persons. At the distance of thirty years from that time, the last enumeration, five years since completed, presented a population bordering upon ten millions. Perhaps, of all the evidences of a prosperous and happy condition of human society, the rapidity of the increase of population is the most unequivocal. But the demonstration of our prosperity rests not alone upon this indication. Our commerce, our wealth, and the extent of our territories, have increased in corresponding proportions; and the number of independent communities associated in our Federal Union, has, since that time, nearly doubled. The legislative representation of the States and people, in the two Houses of Congress, has grown with the growth of their constituent bodies. The House, which then consisted of sixty-five members, now numbers upwards of two hundred. The Senate, which consisted of twenty-six members, has now forty-eight. But the Executive, and still more the Judiciary Departments, are yet in a great measure confined to their primitive organization, and are now not adequate to the urgent wants of a still growing community.

The naval armaments, which, at an early period, forced themselves upon the necessities of the Union, soon led to the establishment of a Department of the Navy. But the Departments of Foreign Affairs, and of the Interior, which, early after the formation of the Government, had been united in one, continue so united at this time, to the unquestionable detriment of the public service. The multiplication of our relations with the nations and Governments of the old world, has kept pace with that of our population and commerce, while, within the last ten years, a new family of nations, in our own hemisphere, has arisen among the inhabitants of the earth, with whom our intercourse, commercial and political, would, of itself, furnish occupation to an active and industrious Department. The constitution of the Judiciary, experimental and imperfect as it was, even in the infancy of our existing Government, is yet more inadequate to the administration of national justice at our present maturity. Nine years have elapsed since a predecessor in this office, now not the last, the citizen who, perhaps, of all others throughout the Union, contributed most to the formation and establishment of our constitution, in his valedictory address to Congress, immediately preceding his retirement from public life, urgently recommended the revision of the Judiciary, and the establishment of an additional Executive Department. The exigencies of the public service, and its unavoidable deficiencies, as now in exercise, have added yearly cumulative weight to the considerations presented by him as persuasive to the measure; and in recommending it to your deliberations, I am happy to have the influence of his high authority, in aid of the undoubting convictions of my own experience.

The laws relating to the administration of the Patent Office, are deserving of much consideration, and, perhaps, susceptible of some improvement. The grant of power to regulate the action of Congress on this subject, has specified both the end to be obtained, and the means by which it is to be effected—to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing, for limited times, to authors and inventors, the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries. If an honest pride might be indulged in the reflection that, on the records of that office, are already found inventions, the usefulness of which has scarcely been transcended in the annals of human ingenuity, would not its exultation be allayed by the inquiry, whether the laws have effectively insured to the inventors the reward destined to them by the constitution—even a limited term of exclusive right to their discoveries?

On the 24th of December, 1799, it was resolved by Congress that a marble monument should be erected by the United States in the Capitol, at the city of Washington; that the family of General Washington should be requested to permit his body to be deposited under it; and that the monument be so designed as to commemorate the great events of his military and political life. In reminding Congress of this resolution, and that the monument contemplated by it remains yet without execution, I shall indulge only the remarks, that the works at the Capitol are approaching to completion; that the consent of the family, desired by the resolution, was requested and obtained; that a monument has been recently erected in this city, over the remains of another distinguished patriot of the Revolution; and that a spot has been reserved within the walls where you are deliberating for the benefit of this and future ages, in which the mortal remains may be deposited of him whose spirit hovers over you, and listens, with delight, to every act of the Representatives of his nation which can tend to exalt and adorn his and their country.

The constitution under which you are assembled is a charter of limited powers. After full and solemn deliberation upon all or any of the objects, which, urged by an irresistible sense of my own duty, I have recommended to your attention, should you come to the conclusion, that, however desirable in themselves, the enactment of laws for effecting them, would transcend the powers committed to you by that venerable instrument which we are all bound to support; let no consideration induce you to assume the exercise of powers not granted to you by the people. But, if the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia; if the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; if the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to establish post offices and post roads; to declare war; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying these powers into execution. If these powers, and others enumerated in the constitution, may be effectually brought into action by laws promoting the improvement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the cultivation and encouragement of the mechanic and of the elegant arts, the advancement of literature, and the progress of the sciences, ornamental and profound,—to refrain from exercising them for the benefit of the people themselves, would be to hide in the earth the talent committed to our charge—would be treachery to the most sacred of trusts.

The spirit of improvement is abroad upon the earth. It stimulates the heart, and sharpens the faculties, not of our fellow-citizens alone, but of the nations of Europe, and of their rulers. While dwelling with pleasing satisfaction upon the superior excellence of our political institutions, let us not be unmindful that liberty is power, that the nation blessed with the largest portion of liberty, must, in proportion to its numbers, be the most powerful nation upon earth; and that the tenure of power by man, is, in the moral purposes of his Creator, upon condition that it shall be exercised to ends of beneficence, to improve the condition of himself and his fellow-men. While foreign nations, less blessed with that freedom which is power, than ourselves, are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement; were we to slumber in indolence, or fold up our arms and proclaim to the world that we are palsied, by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence, and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority? In the course of the year now drawing to its close, we have beheld, under the auspices, and at the expense of one State of this Union, a new University unfolding its portals to the sons of Science, and holding up the torch of human improvement to eyes that seek the light. We have seen, under the persevering and enlightened enterprise of another State, the waters of our Western Lakes mingled with those of the Ocean. If undertakings like these have been accomplished in the compass of a few years, by the authority of single members of our Confederation, can we, the Representative authorities of the whole Union, fall behind our fellow-servants in the exercise of the trust committed to us for the benefit of our common sovereign, by the accomplishment of works important to the whole, and to which neither the authority nor the resources of any one State can be adequate?

Finally, fellow-citizens, I shall await with cheering hope, and faithful co-operation, the result of your deliberations; assured that, without encroaching upon the powers reserved to the authorities of the respective States, or to the people, you will, with a due sense of your obligations to your country, and of the high responsibilities weighing upon yourselves, give efficacy to the means committed to you for the common good. And may He who searches the hearts of the children of men, prosper your exertions to secure the blessings of peace, and promote the highest welfare of our country.

Committee on Agriculture.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. FINDLAY:

"Resolved, That the 30th rule of the Senate be amended, by adding thereto 'a Committee on Agriculture.'"

culture was not within the scope of that body, and that they could not, therefore, legislate respecting it beyond the District of Columbia. Mr. F. said it was his opinion, that the three great branches of domestic industry, Commerce, Manufactures, and Agriculture, were all equally entitled to the care and protection of the Government. The Senate had directed the establishment of a Committee on Manufactures as well as on Commerce, and he saw no reason why agriculture should not receive the same attention from the Senate. It might be alleged, that the connection between commerce and agriculture rendered a committee on the latter subject unnecessary. To this position he thought there might be exceptions. In legislating on commerce, certain laws might be passed, which might operate to the depression of agriculture; laws encouraging to a great extent the importation of articles in a raw state, which might come in competition with the home materials which agriculture furnished in abundance. Things could not be in this state without the agriculturists having a right to complain, and all their complaints would amount to nothing at all, if there were no committee to which their petitions could be referred. All subjects coming before the Senate that might particularly interfere with the interests of agriculture, ought to be referred to such a committee, who would report a modification of the laws, or suggest new ones. Mr. F. concluded by saying, he had submitted this resolution from the dictates of duty, and he did not think it necessary to say any thing further on the subject.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, wished very much that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had informed them what such a committee would have to do. Could any of them know what its duties would consist in? Could he point out any one thing it could report upon; any thing relating to the raising of cotton or of cattle? What power would the committee have? Was it to afford information to the people on the subject of agriculture, or to bring in reports on which Congress was to act? Mr. H. said he was opposed to the appointment of a committee of information; but, if the gentleman would point out any one thing which properly belonged to such a committee, or show how the committee was to act, he did not know but he should be disposed to indulge him with his vote; but he confessed he could, himself, think of no one thing: it was, perhaps, owing to his want of understanding on the subject, but he could not see what the committee would have to do. If he were one of that committee, and that gentleman were the chairman, and could give no further information on the subject than he had now done to the Senate, he should, certainly, be greatly at a loss what to do.

The question was then taken on the resolution of Mr. FINDLAY, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Chase,

Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Willey, and Woodbury—22.

NAYS.—Messrs. Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Eaton, Gaillard, Harrison, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, Macon, Mills, Rowan, Van Buren, and Van Dyke—14.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Imprisonment for Debt.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted on Wednesday last, by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt."

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, said this was a subject which had occupied much of the time and attention of the Senate, and he should be glad to have it thoroughly examined, that some course might be adopted, some proposition made, which should meet with the approbation of a majority of the Senate. But he was opposed to the appointment of a Select Committee at the present time for that purpose. Amongst the great variety of subjects in the President's Message, Mr. M. said, there was one he had recommended—and he thanked him for it—the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States, in pursuance of the express delegation of that power to Congress by the constitution; and it was easy to see that it was a subject connected with the proposition now brought forward; and, whenever they exercised that power, all the evils, of which there was so much complaint, would be effectually remedied. As soon as the Standing Committees were appointed, that part of the Message which related to the subject of bankruptcy would be referred to one of them, probably the Committee on the Judiciary, and, when it was so referred, that committee would then have before it the very subject to which the gentleman now wished to call the attention of the Senate, and for which he wished the appointment of a Select Committee. Mr. M. was of opinion that, where two subjects were so intimately blended together, that they could not legislate on one without involving the other, both ought to be referred to the same committee. In digesting and preparing an act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, the subject embraced by this resolution would come before that committee. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would permit his resolution to lie on the table till the Standing Committees of that House were appointed, and it would then be referred to one of them, under whose examination it would more immediately come.

Mr. JOHNSON said, it was the good fortune of his friend from Massachusetts, to have a Presidential recommendation in behalf of his favorite measure to satisfy his mind. But, for himself, Mr. J. said, he was obliged to bring forward his favorite project in the same manner, and ask for it the same course that it had taken the two preceding sessions. He had not opposed the proposition for a bankrupt law; but, if he had that subject not so much at heart as the measure he had now, for the third time, presented to the Senate, he hoped he should be pardoned for asking an opportunity of bringing it forward. He said this was the third time he had introduced this proposition. The first session, the bill for abolishing imprisonment for debt, passed this body, but unfortunately it was at the close of the session, and, like every thing which at that period goes from one House to the other, it was swallowed up and ingulfed, for want of time, with the other unfinished business of both Houses. That was the fate of the bill the Senate acted on; and, last session, when he again introduced the subject, he was unsuccessful. Mr. J. said there was not a member of the community who would deny the isolated proposition for which he contended, that imprisonment for debt ought to be abolished; yet, for want of perfection in the details, it was, last session, lost by the casting vote of the presiding officer. He denied, most unequivocally, that this subject was embraced in that of a uniform system of bankruptcy; he denied that it had ever been embraced in any system here or in Great Britain, or in any other proposition made here by a standing committee, and, if his life were spared, he should submit it annually as long as he had the honor of a seat on that floor, although, out of respect to his associates, he should never complain of the result, if he failed, but content himself with having discharged his duty to God, his country, and his conscience.

Mr. MAOON observed, that, to his mind, there was a clear distinction between the measure proposed by the resolution and a bankrupt law. A law to abolish imprisonment for debt would apply to all honest debtors of whatever class, or vocation; whereas a bankrupt law would apply to a few comparatively, as he understood that bankrupt laws embraced merchants only; the latter were also highly penal, and if a fraudulent bankrupt was caught, he would be severely punished. [Hanged, said Mr. MILLS, in an under voice.] The gentleman from Massachusetts says, hang him. I did not know, sir, that the people in this part of the country were so fond of hanging; but I confess I prefer relieving debtors, honest ones, by the mode proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, and shall vote for his resolution.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, said he had that morning the honor of submitting a resolution on the subject of bankruptcies; in so doing, his object was not to call for the immediate decision of the Senate on that proposition, but to refer it to some committee, when they shall have been appointed. He should be particularly desirous, if the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) should obtain his Select Committee, with a view of considering the subject in all its bearings, to ascertain how far process in the courts of the United States might be modified, and how far general relief might be extended throughout the Union; that the committee, viewing the whole of the subject, might present the result of their deliberations to the Senate. He should still maintain his resolution, and if the gentleman from Kentucky should succeed in his proposition, he intended to move, at the proper time, to refer it to that committee. He was not disposed to object to that proposition, and he hoped that, in the spirit of mutual accommodation, he would not object to the suggestion which he now made. The proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. H. said, would afford relief to unfortunate debtors of a particular class, for that bill never did propose to extend it beyond the courts of the United States. The relief afforded would, therefore, only be as one in a hundred; but a mild and judicious bankrupt law would not be confined to this class, but its benefits would be extended to every class throughout the Union.

Mr. MILLS then moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Tuesday next, which, after a few remarks from Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was agreed to.

MONDAY, December 12.

This day was principally occupied in the election of Officers of the Senate. After several ballottings, WALTER LOWRIE, of Pennsylvania, (late a member of this body,) was chosen Secretary. MOUNTJOY BAILEY was chosen Sergeant-at-Arms, and HENRY TIMS Doorkeeper. The Rev. Dr. STAUGHTON was chosen Chaplain to the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 13.

Judicial Proceedings.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday, by Mr. KANE, of Illinois:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the acts of Congress regulating processes in the courts of the United States, as to place the persons and property (with regard to the proceedings against them) of citizens of the States admitted into the Union since the 29th of September, 1789, upon a footing of equal security with the persons and property of citizens of the original States."

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he should be much gratified if the honorable gentleman who had moved the resolution would briefly state his object in making the motion, as his views would probably be useful to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KANE then rose, and said, that the explanation required by the honorable gentleman from Maine, lay within narrow limits, and might be explained in few words. The object is, as expressed upon the face of the resolution, to procure such amendments in the acts of Congress, regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, as will place the citizens of the several States upon a footing of equal security in their persons and property. The process act of the 28th September, 1789, amongst other things, in effect, provided that the modes of process in the Circuit and District Courts, in suits at common law, should conform to those then used in the Supreme Courts of the States. By "modes of process" was meant, as is decided in the case of Wayman vs. Southard, by the Supreme Court, every step taken in a cause; and "indicates the progressive course of the business from its commencement to its termination." Thus, the persons and property of the citizens of the States then in existence, were placed under the protection and guardianship of their own laws. This provision continued in force, without modification, until the act of May, 1792, was passed, by which the same was made subject to such alterations and additions as the Circuit and District Courts might make, and to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States should, by rule, prescribe. He did not understand, nor did he know that it was so understood anywhere, that these "modes of proceeding" were by this latter act made subject to any alterations, additions, or regulations, other than such as time and practice should show to be indispensable to the correct administration of justice. The benefits of the provisions of '89, have been adjudged to have application to the citizens of those States only which had existence when the act was passed. It was for the purpose of placing the citizens of other States upon the same footing, that he ventured to introduce this resolution. These citizens, in their persons and property, are now subject to be dealt with, not in a manner prescribed by their own laws, but according to such rules as the courts may think proper to adopt. The State which he had the honor in part to represent, as is the case with its neighbors, Indiana and Missouri, has no other than a District Judge. No inference was, however, to be drawn from the few remarks he had submitted, that the judges are blamable for the manner in which they have exercised so large a discretion. The principle is to be dreaded; and the cause of complaint may be removed by extending the benefits of the act of '89 to all the States, or by the passage of a law establishing a system uniform and impartial in its operations. It was not essential to the explanation required of him, nor to the purpose of the resolution, that he should, on this occasion, indicate a preference for any particular plan; but he would think himself fortunate if he had succeeded in convincing the Senate that further legislation was necessary.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said his object was attained by the clear explanation given by the honorable mover. He had pointed out the evil, and the remedy he proposed: this was the object he had in view in calling on him, and he was perfectly satisfied.

The question was then taken, and the resolution agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 15.

On the Judiciary.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, on the subject of the Judiciary.

Mr. JOHNSTON said, that the resolution he had submitted required no illustration. The subject was familiar to the Senate, and especially to the committee to whom it was proposed to be referred. It had been repeatedly pressed upon Congress; and, at the past session, it had been deferred, under the assurance, that, at the present, something definitive should be done. Mr. J. said, that, when this subject was thrown open, so many different views were taken; so many projects for the reorganization of the courts were presented; such diversity of opinion prevailed, that every scheme successively failed. The new States, aware of the difficulty of perfecting, in any short time, any new system of reconciling public opinion to it, as well as the time necessary to arrange all the details of an extensive and complicated plan, had now to ask of Congress to extend to them at once the benefits of Circuit Courts; and, at the same time, to remedy all the inconveniences from the defective arrangements of these courts, as well as the laws regulating the jurisdiction and the mode of proceeding. Mr. J. said, the first part of the resolution related to the Supreme Court, and, unless some amendment could be obtained in its terms, it would be useless to ask an extension of the Circuit Courts. He said he presumed that, at every term, 70 or 80 causes were left undecided; and that, at this time, more than twice that number were on the docket, and that that court could not, in the short space allotted to them, determine half those causes. The effect was, that no judgment could be had in the court of last resort under two years, and sometimes three; that the court could not now keep pace with the progress of business, and the docket would constantly augment; that a great mass had already accumulated, involving constitutional construction, property to an immense amount, and principles of great interest. Such a distribution of the Circuit Courts must be made, as will afford a longer session to the Supreme Court, and, even then, it is feared that some time will elapse before they will discharge the accumulated business. He said the establishment of Circuit Courts was required by nine States, the state of the country imperiously demanded that the system should be equal and general, and he hoped it would be no longer delayed under the idea that some other system would be adopted. He concurred with all those States in asking this now at the hands of Congress. We shall then be upon an equality, and prepared to discuss any new project that may be submitted. Mr. J. then went at length into the inconvenience which had resulted from the expression of the Judiciary act of 1789, prescribing to the Courts of the United States the mode of proceeding. He said the mode of proceeding, in the several States, at the date of the act, had been prescribed. The consequence was that the States admitted since had no law on the subject. He said it was submitted to the gentlemen representing the old States, to be governed by that law still; but it deprived those States of all improvement which might have been made since in their legislation, especially with regard to executive laws. It destroyed the conformity which ought to exist in the rules and practice in all the Courts administering justice, within the same limits, upon the same contracts. It created some confusion and some inequality, by prescribing different measures of justice to different parties; besides, almost every State had found it necessary to adapt her laws to the peculiar circumstances of the country, and sometimes to alter them under the pressure of events which the State thought justified their interposition.

In regard to the State, admitted in the Union since the Judiciary act, they had no law, and the courts of the United States had undertaken, not only to prescribe rules of proceeding, but to exercise the highest act of sovereignty, by making laws to supply the defects of our legislation—a power which Congress cannot delegate. This subject was clearly explained yesterday by the honorable member from Illinois, (Mr. KANE.) Mr. J. said, that, if we prescribed the laws of the several States for the government of the United States Courts, there is still another difficulty—those laws may violate contracts; they may be unconstitutional; and, in that event, those courts would have no authority to enforce their judgments. The only law which they could employ, to give effect to their judgment, would be declared by themselves null and void. It must be our duty, therefore, to provide for such an occurrence by a general law applicable to such a state of things. For himself, he could only wish, that the courts of the United States, in Louisiana, should be governed, in all cases, by the laws of the State.

Mr. J. said that under the present Judiciary act, a deviation from the laws of all the States had been permitted, as unfriendly to civil liberty as it was vexatious and oppressive. It permitted the judgment creditor to take execution: in the first instance against the body of the debtor, to hold him in prison until the money was coerced either from him or his friends. It is arming a vindictive creditor with a power over the personal liberty of the debtor—to exercise the most malignant vengeance, and at once to degrade and ruin him. He said that the law which permits a man to be deprived of his liberty, while he possesses property, on the faith of which the contract was made, can only be equalled in absurdity by a law which authorizes his perpetual imprisonment because he has the misfortune to have none. This power had been, in many instances, seized on and exercised in a most unfeeling manner. It is believed not to be consonant with the laws of any of the States, and to be unworthy of our legislation. Mr. J. remarked, he had merely hinted the propriety of restraining the jurisdiction of the courts in civil cases. It was known that the States had competent courts for the administration of justice, conveniently situated to the parties, to which they could resort without much inconvenience or expense. That justice was uniformly and impartially administered. It was now known that the distrust and jealousy of the States was without foundation. That, in fine, there was no necessity for a court to decide causes between citizens of different States. The Courts of the United States had unlimited jurisdiction over a great extent of country, and were often used oppressively. Citizens of States are often sued at the distance of two hundred miles from the seat of justice; they are inconveniently carried to a great distance, with an expense which they cannot afford, deprived of the means of defence, and removed from their witnesses; and what is gained by the other party? The cause is tried by the same laws—by a judge and jury, resident in the same State. He submitted to the committee whether it would be advisable to limit the jurisdiction; and, he said, as it was an onerous and odious jurisdiction, it ought to be restrained to the immediate parties to the contract; even in commercial cases. Mr. Johnston said he had only taken a desultory view of the subject, merely to point out these objects to the attention of the committee, and to ask of them at once to extend the Circuit Courts over all the States, and to make some reformation in the Judiciary act.

The resolution was agreed to.

Amendment to the Constitution—Election of President.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BENTON:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of amending the Constitution of the United States, so as to provide for the election of President and Vice President, by a direct vote of the people, in districts.

Mr. HAYNE was rejoiced to see that the gentleman from Missouri had thus early called the attention of the Senate to this important subject; but he thought he had not made the inquiry sufficiently extensive; he had confined it merely to the mode of election; but Mr. H. thought an attempt ought also to be made to secure the election of President of the United States from the intervention of the House of Representatives; and he, therefore, moved to amend the resolution, by adding the following:

“And that the committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution as to secure the election of President and Vice President of the United States, without the intervention of the Senate or House of Representatives."

Mr. MACOON said that it would be wise, in adopting a resolution of this kind, to give the committee all the latitude that could be given, that they might examine the subject in every particular, and make the inquiry as broad as possible. He had not the same opinion of any particular mode of electing a President of the United States as he formerly had, but inclined to favor the district plan.

Mr. DICKERSON said it was highly desirable that the President and Vice President should be elected without the interposition of the Senate or House of Representatives; but it was a question with him, whether it could be completely effected. He did not think the constitution could be so amended as to prevent, at some time or other, and under some unforeseen contingency, the election coming to the House of Representatives. If any mode had been devised, it had not yet been shown to them. It was hardly correct, that the members should commit themselves on this point, thus early, on preliminary propositions, and he should, therefore, vote against the resolution.

Mr. HAYNE said the proposition merely proposed an inquiry. The gentleman allowed it was expedient that it should be done, and, by voting for the inquiry, he would not in any way commit himself. The only object was, for the committee to ascertain whether the propositions contained in the two branches of the resolution could be carried into effect. This was what had been done in Congress the last session. A proposition was submitted, similar to that now submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, but in a positive shape, not for an inquiry. It was referred to a committee; and a variety of propositions that were made on the same subject, were referred to the same committee; and if the gentleman from New Jersey should wish to submit any proposition himself, he should be perfectly willing it should accompany this resolution to one committee.

Mr. BENTON said, as one taking a deep interest in the subject, he should be glad that any gentleman in the House, who had turned his attention to the subject, and could suggest any mode that promised to be beneficial, would submit his resolution, which should be referred to the same committee with the resolution he had submitted. Whatever committee might be charged with this subject, he should feel obliged to any gentleman that would contribute any thing that would tend to turn the attention of the committee to it. He wished the proposition he had submitted should have an examination. Since it resolved nothing, and committed nobody, it was perfectly innocent and harmless in its present shape. As to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, it only tended to enlarge the field of inquiry, and he could not object to that or any other proposition that was calculated to promote that end.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he generally voted in favor of resolutions of inquiry on almost every subject; but he had not much confidence in amendments of the constitution, of any kind. He thought the time was gone by for amending the constitution, and perhaps it was well that it was so. It was easier for them to break it ten times than it was for them to amend it once, and if they tried to mend it only in those places where they had broken it, they would have enough to occupy them for a considerable time. He should not vote for the resolution under the expectation that much would be done; but he was willing that an inquiry should be made. He was not in favor of the measures of either of the gentlemen, but he should vote in favor of the amendment to the resolution, and then for the resolution as amended.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, he was happy to find that the proposition to appoint a committee embraced a specific proposition to amend the constitution relative to the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States. The gentleman from Maine had, he feared, uttered a solemn and awful truth, when he said that the time had passed for amending the constitution, and that it could be broken with more facility than it could be amended. Mr. J. said he should be more apprehensive of the truth of this belief, if this spirit of opposition should apply to amendments which proposed to vest the people of this country with the exercise of the great essential principles of self-government; principles upon which he conceived the prosperity, happiness, and perpetuity of our free institutions principally depended.

If, in the infancy of our Republic; if, in the first year of our political Jubilee, we discovered this opposition, what might we expect in mature age? He said our first political jubilee commenced the 4th of July last. This was the fiftieth year of our independence. For his part, he said, he never wanted to see any friend of his called upon, as a member of Congress, to vote for the President and Vice President of the United States; for the world was invidious, and no matter what purity members could boast of, even if they possessed the purity of angels, their vote, in many cases, would make them obnoxious to imputations. This was one reason why he was in favor of the proposed amendment, an amendment proposing that, in no event, and in no contingency, should the duty of electing devolve upon Congress, or either House. His desire was, by such amendment, to place the members of Congress not only beyond temptation, but beyond suspicion. Till then, he looked in vain for that harmony, concord, and affectionate feelings, which should always exist among those associated for the same great object, of giving laws and rules of conduct and action to a free people. In vain he expected to see a President elected by Congress hailed as the President of the nation; and, finally, till this right was exclusively vested in the people, or some other agents than Congress, we should never see members voting for and against measures proposed by the administration, without being charged with being partisans on the one hand, or opponents on the other. If we have any political principles and maxims, Mr. J. said, in which we all concur, he thought it was, or would be, admitted by all, that, wherever it was practicable, the people should be vested with the exclusive right of choosing men to rule over them. It was as practicable, in this instance, he thought, as it was to elect Representatives to Congress. And why not give the power? The gentleman from New Jersey seemed to doubt its practicability. This Mr. J. regretted very much; he thought the gentleman had given a timely caution how we committed ourselves on any one proposition, and, at the same time, expressed his conviction that the proposition to give the exclusive right to the people could not be realized. Mr. J. regretted this the more, when he recollected the long services, the general attainments, and the democratic principles of the worthy member from New Jersey. For his part, Mr. J. said, he should pursue one undeviating course in this matter, and that would be to vest in the people at the polls the right exclusively, under all contingencies, to elect the President and Vice President of the United States; and if he could not obtain that result, he would give such votes as would more nearly bring the power to the exercise of the people, and in no event to vest the power in Congress.

The question was taken on Mr. HAYNE'S amendment, and carried.

Mr. COBB then rose, and said that, without entering into the inquiry whether they could strike out a mode for the election of President and Vice President, without the intervention of either branch of Congress, he would offer an amendment that went to another point: its object was to instruct this same committee to inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution, as to prohibit the appointment of any member of Congress to any office of honor or trust under the United States during the term for which such senator or representative should have been elected. If this amendment were adopted, the evil would not be so great in referring the election of President to the decision of either branch of Congress. While he had the honor of being a member of the other House, he said, he submitted a similar proposition, and though there was not a sufficient vote to carry it through, he had the consolation of knowing that the vote in favor of it was very respectable. He thought there could be no better time than the present to renew the proposition; if the committee could not devise a mode by which the election could be effected, without the interposition of Congress, then it became the more proper to inquire whether they should not remove from those on whom the election must devolve all temptation that might bias them in that election. He would not make any observations as to the fact of how far any member of Congress might be influenced by the hope of office, in voting; but every member would see, from the fallibility of human nature, that it was almost impossible for men sometimes not to be influenced. Mr. C. said he wished to cut off every thing that could tempt a man, and entirely destroy all hope of office, and all imputation whether they should vote right or wrong. Mr. C. concluded by moving an amendment to the resolution, corresponding to what he had stated in his remarks; and

The question being put on Mr. C.'s amendment, it was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. MACON said he still thought that, instead of referring to the committee separate and distinct propositions, it would be better to commit the whole subject of the election of President and Vice President of the United States, that the committee might devise and report such plan as they should think best to avoid the existing evils, and secure the benefits which were deemed desirable in the mode of electing those officers. He therefore moved the following as a substitute for the resolution, and the several amendments already adopted, viz:

"That a select committee be appointed, who shall inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution, in the election of President and Vice President of the United States, as to attain the best, most preferable, and safest mode in regard to such elections."

After some conversation as to the expediency of this general reference, in preference to the propositions previously offered, between Messrs. HOLMES, MACON, JOHNSON of Ky., and COBB,

Mr. MACON'S motion was agreed to, and his amendment adopted.

Mr. VAN BUREN then said, that this was a subject on which great diversity of opinion had existed, as was manifested both at the last session, and at the present, by the number of propositions that had been offered. It was from this consideration that he thought a larger number should compose the committee to whom the subject was now to be referred, than was usual, and, therefore, he should move that nine be appointed.

That number was agreed to. *

ed, with instructions to prepare and report a joint resolution, for an amendment of the constitution, prescribing and defining the power Congress shall have over the subject of internal improvements, and subjecting the same to such restrictions as shall effectually protect the sovereignty of the respective States, and secure to them a just distribution of the benefits resulting from all appropriations made for that purpose."<sup>a</sup>

In introducing these resolutions—

Mr. VAN BUREN said that it would be recollected that he had, some days since, given notice of his intention to ask for leave to introduce a joint resolution, proposing an amendment of the constitution on the subject of the power of Congress over the subject of internal improvements. Upon the suggestion of gentlemen who feel an interest in the subject, and think the principal object can, in that way, be better effected, he had consented so far to change the course originally contemplated, by substituting resolutions expressive of the sense of the Senate on the constitution, as it now is, and proposing the appointment of a select committee to report upon the subject, under such instruction as the Senate may think proper to give. Such resolutions he would now take the liberty of submitting. He did not, of course, wish to press their immediate consideration, but would call them up at as early a day as would comport with the state of public business and the ordinary course of proceeding in the Senate. He hoped he would be excused for expressing an earnest wish, that the conceded importance of the subject would induce gentlemen to turn their attention to it as soon as they conveniently could, to the end that, when it was taken up, it might be carried to a speedy decision, and not exposed to those unprofitable delays and postponements which had heretofore attended measures of a similar character, and ultimately prevented an expression of the sense of the Senate on their merits. He deceived himself, if there was any matter in which, at this moment, their constituents felt a more intense interest, than the question of the rightful and probable agency of the General Government in the great work of internal improvement. Whilst, in the States, measures of that description had been harmonious in their progress, and, as far as the means of the States would admit of, successful in their results, the condition of things here had been of a very different character. From the first agitation of the subject, the constitutional power of Congress to legislate upon the subject, had been a source of unbroken, and, frequently, angry and unpleasant controversy. The time, he said, had never yet been, when all the branches of the legislative department were of the same opinion upon the question. Even those who united in the sentiment as to the existence of the power, differed in almost every thing else in regard to it. Of its particular source in the constitution, its extent and attributes, very different views were entertained by its friends. There had not been any thing in the experience of the past, nor was there any thing in the prospect of the future, on which a reasonable hope could be founded, that this great subject could ever be satisfactorily adjusted by any means short of an appeal to the States. The intimate connection between the prosperity of the country and works of the description referred to, would always induce efforts to induce the General Government to embark in them, and there was but little reason to believe that its claim of power would ever be abandoned. As little reason was there, in his judgment, to expect that the opposition to it would ever be given up. The principles upon which that opposition is founded; the zeal and fidelity with which it has hitherto been sustained, preclude such an expectation. If this view of the subject was a correct one, and it appeared to him that it was, he respectfully submitted it as a matter of imperious duty, on the part of Congress, to make a determined effort to have the question settled in the only way which can be final—an amendment of the constitution, prescribing and defining what Congress may, and what they shall not do, with the restrictions under which what is allowed to them shall be done. It appeared to him, that, not only every interest connected with the subject, but the credit, if not safety, of our enviable political institutions required that course; for it must be evident to all reflecting men, that the reiterated complaints of constitutional infraction must tend to relax the confidence of the people in the Government, and that such measures as may be undertaken upon the subject, must be constantly exposed to peril from the fluctuations of the opinion of successive legislatures. The subject, he said, had been viewed in this light by some of the best and ablest men the country has produced. As early as 1808, the propriety of an appeal to the States upon the point in question, had been suggested by Mr. Jefferson, in his last message to Congress. The same course had been recommended by Mr. Madison, and the recommendation repeated by Mr. Monroe.

Revolutionary Bounty Lands.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. WOODBURY, relating to Bounty Lands, was taken up. Some discussion took place between Messrs. KING, BARRON, and EATON, as to the best mode of proceeding in the case, and the most eligible committee for the reference of the motion.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, observed, that the course pursued by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WOODBURY,) was the correct and proper one on this occasion; he had no doubt there are many meritorious officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, still living, and the descendants of many who are dead, that are entitled to the Bounty Lands, promised by Government, who had not applied, from ignorance of their claims. The object of the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire was, to inform them of their rights. This subject, Mr. L. said, had been pending for nearly thirty years, and ought to be brought to a close; he hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. MAOON said he had his doubts as to the beneficial effects proposed to be derived from the resolution. It appeared to him, that, instead of preventing speculation, it would encourage speculators to ride over the country, buying up these claims. In early life, in Congress, Mr. M. said he remembered there was one question that bordered on this: it was, to get the statute of limitation suspended for revolutionary services. Speculators went out and administered all over the Union, on the property of persons having claims, and, in one case, two administrators came forward upon the same estate, and the man himself, the original claimant, upon whose estate they pretended to have administered, came afterwards. He was thought an impostor—but his captain happened to be in Philadelphia, to prove his right, and the man received his claim. Publishing these names, Mr. M. said, would be to set all the speculators abroad throughout the nation. If the law had expired, allowing these people time to obtain their warrants, he would submit whether it would not be better to revive it, that they might get their warrants, without any speculations on the subject.*

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, thought that, at present, all the advantage was on the side of the speculators; but, if the names were published, there would be something like an equal chance. He knew of some speculators who had been riding about the country, informing these claimants that they could obtain these land warrants for them. If the information were distributed throughout the country, it would be understood that the best way would be for the claimants to apply to their members of Congress, who would charge them nothing for obtaining them.

Mr. RUGGLES thought it was desirable that some measures should be adopted to bring this business to a close. In consequence of these warrants being outstanding, there was land in the State of Ohio, which could not be sold, or brought into use, and it was highly important to that section of the country, that those who were entitled to those warrants should not remain in ignorance of their rights. He suggested

* The experience of thirty years more has confirmed the wisdom of these remarks. The speculations have been greater in the thirty years since 1826 than in the thirty years before. Speculation in these land warrants has become a profession in the United States—one of the industrial professions; and is most industriously pursued.

whether it would not be more advisable to lay the resolution on the table, till some mode should be devised that would be of service to the old soldier, without benefiting the speculator. He would, he said, unite in any motion by which Congress might satisfy these claims, and let the land in the State, which should remain unclaimed, be sold.

Mr. WOODBURY said he should have no objection to the resolution's being laid on the table, if delay would throw any light on the subject; but, as it was only for an inquiry into the expediency of the measure, he thought it would be as well that the resolve should be acted on now.

After some further observations from Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, to show that there was no danger of speculation in this matter, as the laws now stand—and an ineffectual motion, by Mr. EATON, to lay the resolution on the table, it was adopted.

The Senate adjourned to Thursday.

Captain Porter.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a letter from David Porter, a Captain in the Navy of the United States, and late commander of the squadron on the West India station for the suppression of piracy, requesting that the subject of certain communications from Thomas Randall and John Mountain, communicated to the Senate at the last session, and which he deems highly injurious to the character of himself, and the other officers of the squadron, may be investigated, and a decision pronounced thereon; and,

On motion, it was ordered, that this letter be printed for the use of the Senate; and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of a resolution, submitted yesterday, by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, calling for an inquiry into the law of the Territorial Government of Florida, relating to wrecks.

Mr. MILLS said he should be obliged to the honorable mover, if he would point out some source from which the Judiciary Committee might derive the necessary information: it would be desirable, if it could be procured, that the law of Florida referred to in the resolution now under consideration, should be laid before them, that they might know what it was; but, as the resolution now stands, it would be impossible for them to ascertain from what source they were to procure the information required.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, the gentleman was aware that it was the business of the Governors of Territories to forward copies of the laws of the Territories, to undergo the supervision of Congress, and that they would remain in force, unless disapproved. The resolution he had submitted, called the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the laws of the Territory of Florida, particularly to the law relating to wrecks. These laws had doubtless been transmitted to the proper Department, to be laid before Congress; and the committee, by applying, could obtain them. Mr. J. said he had handed to the chairman of the committee some letters and publications relative to this subject, from which it appeared that great abuses existed. The act of Congress, passed last session, requires that the whole amount of property wrecked should be carried into the ports of the United States. He understood that a very summary process had been instituted at Key West, by which all property that was wrecked was decided by four or five individuals, who were perhaps interested in the event—a large property has been condemned, and a salvage of from 70 to 90 per cent. allowed. Mr. J. then adverted to the immense amount of commerce which passed through the Gulf of Mexico, and to the heavy losses that are every month sustained by casualties; and stated the fact, that, in the month of September last, no less than ten vessels were lost on that coast. Mr. J. said this had been a great subject of complaint, from our own citizens, particularly from the Insurance Companies; and he had a knowledge that two of the Foreign Governments had applied to this Government for redress, stating, that the abuse is so enormous, it is worse than piracy. If the laws had not been transmitted from the Territory, Mr. J. said he had not the means of obtaining them; and he could not tell how the Judiciary Committee would act on the subject.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said he recollected one instance of this kind which had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, who made application and obtained the Act of Florida from the Department of State. A bill was reported by that committee to repeal certain acts of the Territory of Florida in regard to unreasonable taxes imposed. That bill passed both Houses of Congress: he recollected that case distinctly, and he believed that the act regulating the Government of Florida required that copies of the laws should be transmitted, to be laid before Congress, who possessed the power of revising all the laws of the Territories.

The resolution was then agreed to.

THURSDAY, December 29.

Captain Porter.

Mr. HAYNE rose, and said, that, in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, the Secretary of the Navy had transmitted to the Senate the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, and of the Court Martial, on Commodore Porter. Since this report had been made, the Commodore had addressed a letter to the presiding officer of the Senate, which had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That the committee might have the whole subject before them, Mr. H. moved that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, and proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and Court Martial, be referred to the same committee.

Mr. LLOYD of Massachusetts, said he thought it necessary to state to the Senate the circumstances under which he had become connected with this subject. A few days after his arrival at Washington, Commodore Porter called on him, and handed him a letter, requesting he would move a call for the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry, which was held on him and his officers, who had charge of the squadron on the West India station, in the years 1823 and 1824. From the good disposition which he felt to all the gallant officers of the Navy, and certainly the distinguished hero of Valparaiso was one of them, he said he had no objection to the call being made, although he was not in possession of the circumstances of the case. In consequence of this, Mr. L. said, as he had no views of his own to answer, he thought it proper to ascertain whether the call was ready to be complied with, and, in prosecuting this inquiry, he found that the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and of the Court Martial had been printed, and bound up together in one volume, of which there was a considerable number with the Navy Department, ready to answer the call of either House of Congress. In consequence of this, Mr. L. stated these facts to Commodore Porter, who assented to the resolution's being presented in the shape in which it passed the Senate. Some days after this, Commodore Porter asked him what measures he intended to adopt with regard to the communication from the Navy Department: that communication had not then been received, and Mr. L. said he knew nothing more of the subject than was contained in a pamphlet the Commodore had sent him, and what he had collected from the newspapers; and until the communication from the Navy Department had been received, and he was better acquainted with the subject, he did not think it consistent with the decorum due to the Senate to adopt any further measures in reference to it. His object, he said, was answered, by obtaining the communication from the Navy Department, and having it laid before the Senate. Another reason which had induced him not to come to any determination on the subject, was this—he had seen that, when a similar motion was made, in the other House, it was stated there was other information connected with the case, which he believed had been ordered to be furnished; and wishing to know what that might contain, he had determined not to proceed. Mr. L. concluded, by observing that he thought the respect due to the Senate, and to himself, had required that this explanation should be made.

The motion of Mr. HAYNE prevailed, and the documents were referred accordingly.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1826.

Import of Wines.

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, rose, and said that a communication had been laid on the table this morning, from the Treasury Department, relative to the quantity of wines imported into the United States since the year 1800. Mr. L. said that the object of procuring the information from the Treasury Department, in answer to the call that had been made for it, was to lead to an investigation, as to the expediency of endeavoring to restore a trade to the United States, which had formerly been one of much advantage, but which in some of its branches, from the heavy rate of duties imposed on it, had of late years been greatly diminished. This could be done, as he apprehended, only by a reduction of the rate of the existing high duties on the importation of certain wines. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his Annual Report, had suggested the propriety of reducing the rates of duty on teas, coffee, and cocoa, and, as he believed, had wisely done it; but all the reasons in favor of such a reduction, applied as strongly at least to the importation of wines. The trade with the wine-growing countries had formerly been more strictly a barter-trade than almost any other enjoyed by the United States; the wines were received in return for the shipment of our domestic products—the flour, corn, staves, and provisions of the country—whereas the trade in teas, and in coffee, so far as it was received from Java, Sumatra, and Arabia, was prosecuted with specie; and although he had no alarms respecting the exportation of specie, believing that, in a time of peace at any rate, and in an open market, the supply would be generally equal to the demand; yet, as he did consider a trade which was commenced by the exportation of our own domestic products, and which gave two freights to our vessels instead of one, was equally worthy of consideration, he had moved for the information which had been given; and, as he understood the Committee of Finance had under consideration the subject of a reduction of duties on importations, he would move the reference of the statement received from the Treasury Department to that committee, to consider thereof.

The reference to the Committee of Finance was then agreed to.

THURSDAY, January 5.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, stated, that he had received a memorial, which he was requested to present to the Senate, on the important and interesting subject of a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, across the Peninsula of Florida. It appears that the Legislative Council of Florida, deeply impressed with the importance of a work which they suppose will relieve the commerce of the United States from heavy losses now sustained from shipwrecks, had, in December last, passed an act appointing Commissioners to report on the expediency of opening such a canal. Three of the most eminent citizens of the Territory had been appointed, pursuant to the provisions of that act, one of whom (Col. James Gadsden) was advantageously known to the country as formerly a distinguished officer of the Army of the United States, and a man of great talents as a civil and military engineer. It appears from the memorial forwarded by these gentlemen, that they are ready to enter into the duties of the appointment, which are to be gratuitously performed, so soon as such aid should be afforded by the United States as was deemed essential to the successful execution of the task. It was deemed by these gentlemen essential that skilful engineers should be appointed by the United States to accompany the Commissioners in making the necessary explorations, and the memorial asks of Congress the necessary aid to enable them to enter immediately on the work. Mr. H. said he presumed that whatever might be the final decision of Congress on the subject of this canal, it was due to the respectable source from which this memorial emanated, that it should receive the most respectful consideration. He, therefore, moved that the memorial and the act of the Legislative Council of Florida be printed for the use of the members. Mr. H. then presented the memorial of James Gadsden and Edward R. Gibson, Commissioners, appointed by the Legislative Council of Florida, "to examine into the expediency of opening a canal through the Peninsula of Florida, from the waters of the Gulf of Mexico to the waters of the Atlantic," accompanied by the said act, and praying for aid of Congress for the immediate exploration of the country, under the direction of skilful engineers: which, on motion of Mr. HAYNE, was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said the gentleman from South Carolina had presented a paper on a subject which he himself was just about to rise to bring to the notice of the Senate in the shape of a bill; and he now gave notice that he should, on Monday next, ask leave to introduce a bill for a survey and estimate of a canal through the Peninsula of Florida, from the mouth of St. John's River to Vocassassa Bay, in the Gulf of Mexico, and to ascertain the practicability and expense of a ship channel.

MONDAY, January 9.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as related to the Judiciary, together with the several resolutions which had been submitted on that subject, rose to make a report. The subject of amending the Judicial System of the United States had, he said, been before that committee for the last two or three sessions, and had always proved a matter of great difficulty. During the last session of Congress the Judiciary Committee of the Senate had reported a bill "to increase the number of Associate Judges from six to nine, and of the Circuits from seven to ten," which, together with an extension of the time for holding the term of the Supreme Court, was all the improvements that were then contemplated. That bill was discussed, and received the assent of a majority of the Senate, but was not finally acted on for want of time. The committee had again considered the subject, and had bestowed on it all the attention which its importance required; and a majority of the committee had concluded to report a bill containing similar provisions with that which was reported last session; although they believed it not to be free from objections, still it was less objectionable than any the committee were able to devise. What was of still more importance, they believed it was a measure which was likely to succeed; and this opinion was strengthened by the fact, that a bill containing substantially similar provisions, had been reported by the Judiciary Committee of the other House, where it had apparently been received with favor, and partly acted on.

Mr. VAN BUREN then reported the bill "further to amend the Judicial system of the United States;" and the bill "altering the time of holding the session of the Supreme Court of the United States;" which were read, and passed to a second reading.

TUESDAY, January 10.

A proposed Perpetual Act.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill "to revive and make perpetual an act, entitled 'an act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian.'"

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, said, although he knew it was a received maxim, de minimis non curat lex, yet, often, in small matters, bad precedents crept into legislation; therefore, he should move to strike out the words making this act perpetual, because he did not think there ought to be any perpetual law, under this or any other Government, except the fundamental or constitutional law. He believed it was very well that these acts, and all other acts, should come under the revisal of the Legislature, from time to time. A very wise provision was made in relation to the appointing power of the President, appointing certain officers only for a limited time, that the appointments might be revised from time to time by this House; and if it held good in relation to appointments, it would, a fortiori, hold good in relation to laws. As it would be necessary, after striking out, to put in some period of limitation, he would propose it should continue in force till the 3d of March, 1830.

A division of the question being required, it was first taken on striking out, and decided in the affirmative; and, after some conversation between Messrs. EATON, HOLMES, and RANDOLPH, as to the time to which the act should continue in force, Mr. HOLMES moved to insert "four years, and thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer." Mr. CHANDLER moved "three years, and thence," &c., which was carried, and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Florida Canal.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of La., said he would make a few remarks in explanation of the object of the bill. It provides, said he, for an examination of all the country south of the St. Mary's and Appalachicola Rivers, to ascertain the most eligible route through which to connect the Atlantic and the Bay of Mexico. It contemplates, after this reconnoissance, a scientific survey of the several routes, with a view to obtain all the facts in relation to the localities of the country and the coast, and to obtain such plans, estimates, and opinions, as will hereafter enable Congress to act on this subject.

The measure proposed has in view two distinct objects: 1. A canal in connection with a general system of inland navigation. 2. The practicability of a ship channel. I feel it, said Mr. J., my duty, as well from the public station which I fill here, as the peculiar interest and position of the State I represent, to bring before this House, separately, a subject which concerns my State, which unites every interest, and in which, happily, we can all concur without violating any constitutional principle. The connection of the Gulf of Mexico with the Atlantic forms a part of the great system of inland navigation. It is the most important link in the chain of communication. It is the point of union between the two great portions of our country—the east and the west. Its political, military, and commercial advantages need not be illustrated here. The public opinion is already sufficiently enlightened and determined. It remains only for us to give it effect.

In regard to a canal navigation, it is satisfactory to know, that the work is not only practicable, but of easy execution, and at a small expense.

Many routes have been indicated, all of which are probably convenient, but it requires an accurate survey and estimate, to obtain a knowledge of the localities and expense, to enable us to decide. Two routes have been particularly mentioned in the bill. That from St. Mary's to Appalachicola is deemed practicable, and thought to possess many advantages. It passes through a sandy soil, of moderate elevation, abundantly supplied with water, and communicates with both seas in a deep channel; its distance not exceeding two hundred miles, and may be, in time, with increased advantage, extended to Pensacola Bay, and thence to Mobile Bay. That from St. John's to Vacassausa Bay, is a work of easy execution. The Peninsula is of secondary formation, or alluvion, with little elevation, and penetrated by a chain of lakes, which deviate only a small distance from the shortest line of communication between the two seas. The distance is not more than 92 miles, 18 of which are already navigable by the river. Throughout the remaining 74 miles, the soil is light, with little elevation, easily excavated, and many natural facilities. From the St. John's River, the first 16 miles are alluvion, with an elevation of only three feet above the waters of that river. From thence the line passes over a region whose elevation is estimated at eleven feet, but indented throughout by lakes, valleys, and creeks. It is formed of a strata of sand and clay, and bedded on limestone, lying probably below the point of excavation. The remaining 25 miles of the line is a gentle inclination from the Great Prairie Alachua to the Bay of Mexico, with sand, clay, and broken fragments of stone, mixed, and easily removed. Throughout the whole line there is an adequate supply of water, with an elevation of four feet in the centre, and a declination from that height to the Atlantic in 31 miles, and to the Bay of Mexico in 84.

It is, moreover, to be observed, that, by uniting the channels of a chain of lakes that extend into the interior, you will greatly diminish the line of excavation, the labor, and expense, while you will only increase the line of communication 18 miles. Thus much, said Mr. J. I have deemed it necessary to say, in regard to the two routes designated. But there are other and higher considerations connected with this subject, that claim the attention of this body. I mean the possibility of a ship channel across the Peninsula—an object which, if accomplished, would operate an extraordinary revolution in the navigation and commerce of this continent. From the information which I have on this subject, and the opinions of practical, experienced, and scientific men, I do not entertain a doubt that the work is practicable—at an expense which the object fully justifies—and within the means which we can fairly devote to it.

At present, more than one-half of the territory of the United States depends on the Mississippi River, and one-third of the population, and this proportion constantly increasing, have their commerce through the Bay of Mexico. It is the object of this bill to supersede the passage round the Gulf of Florida. Of the political and commercial advantages of this communication, I shall reserve the exposition until the bill is reported to the House.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

WEDNESDAY, January 11.

Florida Wreckers.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill "to annul an act concerning wreckers and wrecked property, passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida."

Mr. VAN BUREN moved to strike out so much of the bill as deferred the period of its going into operation, until the first day of March next. He observed, that, as the provision of the bill was a matter of considerable interest, he would state as briefly as the subject would admit of, the reasons which had induced the Committee on the Judiciary to report it. He said, that, by an established principle of maritime law, a reasonable compensation is allowed to every person who saves property wrecked on the high seas. The salvor has a lien on the property for his salvage, and his remedy in the District Court of the United States, to ascertain its amount and enforce payment. By the established practice of that court, appropriate proceedings are prescribed, which enable it to do justice to all concerned, by securing to the owners of the wreck the best practical notice, by making order for the security of the property during the progress of the claim, and by instituting an examination into the circumstances of each case, and settling such rate of salvage as is just and equitable: which, in the absence of treaty stipulations between the Governments of the salvor and owner, was left entirely to the discretion of the court; and, finally, by making disposition of the residue, after deducting the salvage allowed, including the right of adjudicating upon contested claims thereto, if any such existed. Such, he said, had been the result of this mode of proceeding, that there did not now exist a legislative provision upon the subject as it respects civil salvage, nor had any, to his knowledge or belief, been thought necessary since the establishment of the Government. By the act establishing a territorial government in Florida, the judicial power was vested in two Superior Courts, and those courts are clothed with all the powers of the District Courts of the United States, including exclusive original admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It is made the duty of the courts, respectively, to hold their terms at Pensacola and St. Augustine: thus affording to the wreckers on that coast, all the advantages for the recovery of their salvage, and to the owners, all the security for their property which, by the law of the land, was extended to the citizens of the United States in general.

It appears that the inhabitants and Legislative Council of Florida, are not content with the law as it stood, and have passed the act proposed to be annulled by the bill under consideration. The act, he said, had been read, and would be found to contain many provisions of an extraordinary and highly exceptionable character. By it, the wrecker, instead of libelling the property in the Superior Court, and subjecting it and its future disposition to the order of that court, is directed to report it to a justice of the peace or notary public, who is authorized to summon a jury of five men; two of whom to be selected by the wreckers, two by the owner, and one by the justice or notary; or, in the absence of the owner, (a case, doubtless, of common occurrence,) the other three jurors to be selected by the justice or notary. To the award of this jury, is submitted the whole interest in question; including not only the rate of salvage, but the disposition of the wreck; and the Clerk of the Territory is charged with the execution of the award. Notice of it is to be published, for twelve months, in a paper published in the Territory, and if not claimed within that time, the whole property to belong to the salvors; if not claimed, the Territory to have 10 per cent. on the value of the property; if claimed, 5 per cent. on the surplus, and, in all cases, 3 per cent. on the whole value of their property—the justice, notary, and clerk, have also their per centum, and the jury a per diem allowance. The circumstances under which the law was to be executed, he said, left little doubt that its execution, for the most part, devolved on men who had personal interests in the subject, and would, of course, lead to gross perversions of justice. That such had been the result, the committee, he said, entertained no doubt. From the general statements which had been made, and which the committee thought entitled to credit, it appeared that the greatest abuses had been practised under the act in question—by omission to provide for the safety of the property during the time allowed for ransom, by improper conversion of the fund, and by the allowance of unexampled rates of salvage from 75 to 90, and, in one instance, as high as 94 per centum. The case of the brig Hercules had been particularly stated to the committee. From the documents on the table, it appeared that this vessel had been carried into Key West, having received but little injury, at least in comparison with the amount of salvage allowed. The underwriters in New York, on receiving information of the fact, sent their agent to the spot. On his arrival, he found a great part of the cargo already on board of a vessel for Havana, and other vessels ready to take the residue to different places, where it would have been impossible for the owners to have followed it, the packages broken, the marks effaced, and a salvage allowed by the jury, which induced him to pay $72,500 for the ransom of the brig and cargo. This sum he paid, and submitted, moreover, to the most vexatious and oppressive impositions by the wreckers and their friends and abettors. But there was, he said, one view of the subject which superseded the necessity of further observation on the provision of the act in question, or the abuses which had been practised under it, and that was, that the Legislative Council had no authority to pass it. By the act establishing the territorial government, a limit is put upon the legislative authority, that they shall pass no law inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. By the same act, the Superior Courts of the Territory are vested with exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The act proposed to be annulled, gives to justices of the peace admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, in palpable violation of the fundamental law of the Territory.

Mr. V. B. said, that he had been informed, since the report of the committee, that the Supreme Court had decided that the law in question was unauthorized and void. He had not learnt on what grounds that decision was made, but presumed it was, as well it might be, on the plain principle he had stated. It was on that account that he wished the bill amended, so that it might go into operation immediately, and that the assent of Congress might in no way be given to its validity, which would be the case if the bill passed as it now stands.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12.

Prevention of Desertion.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the following bill, "to prevent desertion from the army, and for other purposes."

[The remedy proposed by the bill was an increase of pay, and retention of part of the pay.]

Mr. RUGGLES said, as no gentleman seemed disposed to oppose the passage of this bill, and as he had some objections to it, he would state them very briefly to the Senate. He was sensible that his colleague, who reported the bill, must be better informed on this subject than himself, in consequence of his long experience in the military service. The object of the bill is to prevent desertion in the army. Any law that could be passed that would effect this object, would be a salutary one, and a sound measure of policy. But will this bill accomplish this desirable result? The first section provides that one dollar and fifty cents per month shall be retained out of the wages of the soldier, until the expiration of his term of service. Congress has, heretofore, thought that even increased pay and bounties were necessary to induce the soldier to enlist and serve faithfully. Large sums, in the shape of bounties, were given during the last war, to enable the Government the fill the ranks of the army. This bill changes the policy that has been heretofore pursued by the Government, and refuses payment for services actually rendered. This will not satisfy the soldier—it will not prevent desertion. The most effectual mode that can be adopted, is to pay them well and pay them promptly. Mr. R. said, if he had a correct knowledge of that class of our population, who filled the ranks of our army in time of peace, he was satisfied that it was the pay that induced them to enlist and serve. They will not look to the termination of five years to receive their reward; the very act of withholding it will induce them to desert. The period is too remote to satisfy them; present enjoyment and prompt pay alone satisfies the soldier. There are many that enlist who have families to support, who stand in immediate want of their earnings, and whose families must suffer, unless they receive the just reward for their service. Congress has no more right to withhold the pay of the soldier, than the farmer has the wages of the laborer on his farm. What has been the principal cause of desertion, mutiny, and rebellion, in the armies of Europe, and particularly Spain? The answer is ready—The withholding the pay of the soldier. By this act, Congress is about to legalize a proceeding which has done so much mischief, and produced such great difficulties in Europe. Mr. R. said he would repeat, the only way to prevent desertion was to pay your soldiers well, and pay them promptly. The second section of the bill provides, that the soldier, who has served out one tour of duty, and re-enlists, shall receive one dollar per month more. This will produce great difficulty and dissatisfaction in the army. There can be no substantial reason for such a discrimination. They ought all to receive precisely the same pay—they stand in the same ranks, fight the same battles, and perform, in every other respect, the same duties. Will the soldier, under such circumstances, who receives one dollar less per month than his fellow soldier, be satisfied? He will not. He will complain; and, Mr. R. said, in his opinion, he would have just ground of complaint. This dissatisfaction, arising from an unequal distribution of wages, will induce him to desert, and leave the service in which they are not rewarded equally. The soldier who re-enlists at the end of five years' service, is, upon no just principles, entitled to greater pay than the man who leaves the plough and enters your army. Mr. R. said it was from a belief that the bill would not attain the object desired, and also that it was unequal and unjust in its provisions, that he should feel compelled to vote against it.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, said, to save the trouble of further opposition to particular parts of the bill, he thought it due to the committee to give a general outline of the principles on which the bill had been adopted, and in so doing, he trusted he should give an answer to his friend and colleague. No one, Mr. H. said, who had turned his attention to the subject, would doubt that the system which the United States had pursued in relation to the organization of the peace establishment was a wise one: the laws on the subject show that they had in view the formation of a large and effectual army, when the circumstances of the country should require it. He believed that there was never an army of its size capable of so much expansion as that of the peace establishment of the United States. As far as related to the staff of the commissioned grade of the army, they had, he thought, nearly arrived at perfection. But he could say with truth, that he believed the non-commissioned officers and privates of the army to be in a worse state than had ever before existed in America. The documents on which the committee had acted, were now before him. He had obtained from the Adjutant General's office a statement of the number of desertions amongst the non-commissioned officers and privates during the last three quarters of a year, and they amounted to 701. If this proportion should continue, the amount in one year would be 934; and it was to be remembered that these were enlisted chiefly from our own population. In deliberating on this subject, there were two modes which offered themselves to the committee to put a stop to this state of things: one by increasing the punishments now inflicted for desertion; and the other to restrain the soldier, by holding out inducements to him for a faithful performance of his duty, and to make him believe that the path of duty is the path of interest. In addition to this document, Mr. H. said, he was in possession of another, which went to show the amount of money drawn from the treasury, on account of desertions, by which it appeared that the sum of $10,099 had been paid for apprehending deserters, and $536 for the pursuit of those not taken.

The bill now presented contains two propositions; the first, in the 1st and 2d sections, providing a bounty for re-enlistment; the other in the 3d section, relates to increasing the pay of the non-commissioned officers of the army. The committee had adopted this plan in preference to that proposing an increase of punishment, and in doing so, they acted in accordance with what they thought would be the view of the Senate, and they were sure they acted in accordance with the feelings of the American people.

Mr. H. said, it would be proper to state the manner in which desertion had hitherto been punished. At the commencement of the American Revolution, America having had little or no intercourse with any other part of the world than Great Britain, in regard to desertion, had adopted the system of that country—the punishment was death or flogging, at the option of the court-martial. He was not aware what effect this kind of punishment had on the soldiers of the Revolutionary war, but whatever it might be, it could not form a criterion for us; for there were circumstances operating on the mind of the soldier in that war, such as extreme suffering in some instances, and the ardent attachment to the cause, which pervaded every class of society, which is not likely again to occur. After the peace, the articles of war prohibited courts-martial from inflicting the punishment of death, except when sanctioned by the Supreme Executive authority—an exception which prevented it from ever being recurred to. There then remained no other punishment but flogging. The smallness of our military establishment at that time created no difficulty in keeping the ranks full; but, when the difficulty which arose between us and the Indian tribes on the north-west frontier, created the necessity of a large military force, though no law was passed on the subject, on a recurrence to the advice of the Executive, sanctioned by the opinion of the Attorney-General, that, though war had not been declared by the Legislature, it existed in fact, and that the punishment of death might be inflicted by a court-martial—under Generals St. Clair and Wayne, this thing was often done. It was found impossible to restrain desertion by flogging, and death was often inflicted. In a plain adjacent to the town of Pittsburg, Mr. H. said, the spot could be pointed out where ten or twelve, or perhaps twenty men, had suffered death for desertion. This enormous waste of American blood raised a great commotion throughout the country, and notwithstanding the popularity of General Wayne, it was the occasion of strong remonstrance from the citizens to the Executive. The wisdom, and even humanity of the course pursued by General Wayne, was manifested by the result: for, from this period, few desertions took place, and a recurrence to capital punishment was seldom necessary. At the conclusion of the war, by the peace of Greenville, the right of inflicting the punishment of death no longer pertained to courts-martial. Nothing was done but flogging, which was carried to such an extent, as to create a very great dissatisfaction throughout the country. Immediately before the last war, Government thinking, and very properly too, that this mode of punishment would be the means of preventing the filling up of the army, repealed that section, and declared that stripes should no longer be inflicted. I feel considerable satisfaction in stating, that I am one of the officers who were consulted on that occasion, who gave an opinion favorable to the abolition of that disgraceful punishment.

Since the conclusion of the last war, the usual punishment has been what is called the ball and chain, and hard labor; and what has been the result of this? In one year there have been 984 desertions—it is surely time that some remedy should be applied. Will you again recur to the system of flogging, or will you again authorize the infliction of the punishment of death? The feelings of the American Congress are too strongly in unison with those of the nation, to recur to that, till the one which is recommended by the committee shall have been tried—one which is more lenient, and is addressed to the mind of the soldier. Such was the intention of the committee in reporting this bill. It has been supposed by some persons who have turned their attention to the subject, that the first section of the bill which relates to the retention of a portion of the soldier's pay, would be sufficient to answer the desired end. There have also been some objections to it: for my colleague thinks it will have an injurious effect on the recruiting service. Alone it would not be sufficient, but taken in connection with the other sections of the bill, I trust will be found useful. My colleague asks, what is the motive which induces men to enlist in the army, and to a faithful performance of their duty? He says it is the pay. I allow that it is so with regard to the first enlistment; but an old soldier enlists from other and better motives. The only objection I could think of to the first section is, that, at the expiration of his period of service, he will have his pocket full of money, and would go home to spend it instead of re-enlisting. But, sir, it is the humane practice in the army to grant furloughs to the old and faithful soldiers. An old soldier, therefore, who has $100 in his pocket, and wishes to re-enlist, would be allowed to go home and spend amongst his friends the money he has gained.

In regard to the second section of the bill, it is not only a measure of justice, but a measure of humanity, and I may add of economy, also. My colleague has asserted it will produce dissatisfaction amongst the soldiers of the army, where one man is paid more than another. Sir, there is not a service in Europe in which this system does not prevail; and in those services where this idea is most prevalent, there has been a more efficient and better conditioned army. England commenced a plan of this kind under the administration of Charles Fox, a man whose policy, wisdom, humanity, and whose excellence of character, are equal to any other that ever guided the helm of state. When this plan was first adopted, a small addition was made to the pay of the soldier; each soldier having served a certain time, was entitled to an additional penny a day, and for the second period, of two-pence a day; and this, however insignificant it may appear to us, is to the British soldier a matter of great importance. I have some knowledge of British soldiers, and whilst conversing with the prisoners of the British army, I could distinguish by the erect attitude and correct deportment, the pride they felt in being called veterans.

This plan has been adopted by every army in Europe. The value of an old soldier to an army, sir, is known to every military man. There is not an officer who has served in the army but knows that, for a considerable time after he has enlisted, a recruit is worth nothing. The money that is paid him, the clothes which are given him, and the arms which are put into his hands, and which are frequently destroyed, are so much loss to the Government. I have in my hand, sir, a calculation, made by an excellent officer in the army, Major Wool, from which it appears that, in consequence of the loss of arms, the expense of provisions, &c., each recruit, sent, for instance, to Green Bay, will cost eighty dollars. So that an old soldier, who will re-enlist, is worth eighty dollars more to the Government than a recruit, exclusive of the chance of desertion. To this may be added the pay and subsistence of the recruit till he arrives there, which will swell the amount to upwards of one hundred dollars.

Mr. CHANDLER said he believed that when the Senate considered what sort of men the ranks of the army were filled with, in time of peace, they would perceive how difficult it was to prevent desertion; for so long as such quantities of wild land remained, which is so easily obtained, it is impossible to induce men to enlist into your army, who have any thoughts of laying up any thing for themselves, those who do enlist in a time of peace, are generally a class of men, who enlist for the sake of the small amount of pay given, merely to supply them with something to drink, which is about all they wish. The object of the bill is to prevent desertion, and I don't know but what it will have the effect, for, if you stop one dollar and fifty cents a month from their pay they will not enlist, if they do not enlist they will not desert; but so long as your army is made up of such materials as are enlisted in a time of peace, they will desert, if enlisted; neither stoppage of pay, or appointing of chaplains, as suggested by the Chairman, will prevent it. I will, however, pass by the first section of the bill, and make a few observations upon the residue of it. With respect to the second section, which provides for increasing the pay of the soldier on his re-enlisting, Mr. C. asked, to what kind of men do you give this additional pay? Why to this same class of men whom you enlist in time of peace; and the Chairman of the Committee has just informed us, that in one year, about nine hundred of them out of less than six thousand, say one-sixth of the whole, have deserted, including thirty or forty non-commissioned officers; they enter your service with habits and morals not the most correct, and they are not generally bettered by being in the service. The bill proposes, after the soldier has served five years, to add one dollar per month to his pay if he re-enlists for five years more, and at the expiration of that five years, if he re-enlists to add to his monthly pay two dollars and fifty cents more, making three dollars and fifty cents per month more to this soldier, who is broken down by bad habits after ten or more years' service, than you give to the soldier who enlists at the commencement of a war, when your army is made up of a different class of men, men who enter it from far higher and better motives than those who enlisted in a time of peace. Those who enter the service at the commencement of a war, are men who have families and property to defend, men of correct habits, and after a few months' service one of them is worth three of those who have been fifteen years in service in time of peace; and I appeal to any officer who has seen service, whether he does not find this to be the case. As to the third section of the bill, Mr. C. said, he agreed with the Chairman, that the pay of the non-commissioned staff was rather low, as also the first sergeant, and that they were a very important part of the army; but if the pay of a sergeant major and quartermaster sergeant, must be fifteen dollars, which he thought too high, he thought that the first sergeant of a company should not be more than twelve dollars; it would be more in proportion to the grade and the services performed, and quite as satisfactory. It may be well for gentlemen to remember when they make comparisons between the pay of the subaltern officers and the non-commissioned officers, that the latter are furnished with clothing by the Government in addition to their pay, while the former furnish their own clothing, which leaves less difference in their pay and emoluments than at first sight might appear.

The question then being on engrossing the bill for a third reading, was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Bouigny, Chase, Edwards, Ellis, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Ky., Johnston of La., Kane, King, Lloyd of Mass., McIlvaine, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Woodbury—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Eaton, Findlay, Macon, Randolph, Ruggles, Smith, Willie, Van Dyke—12.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MONDAY, January 16.

Mr. HAYNE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made the following report:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a letter from Captain David Porter, of the United States Navy, 'requesting an investigation of charges contained in communications from Thomas Randall and John Mountain;' and to whom was also referred a letter from Thomas Randall, on the same subject, together with a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, covering the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and Court Martial, in relation to Captain Porter, report:

"That they have had these several communications under consideration, and find nothing in the character of the transactions to which they relate, that requires the interference of this House.

"It appears that the case of Captain Porter has been submitted to the proper tribunals; and the committee do not feel themselves warranted in forming any opinion unfavorable to their decisions, or indulging any impression that their proceedings require revision. The committee consider it due alike to the preservation of a proper discipline and to the reputation of our officers, that appeals should not be encouraged from the decisions of the Military Courts. Under this view of the subject, and seeing no satisfactory reason for interposing the authority of the House in matters which have been finally settled by the competent authorities, the

Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee, to whom was referred the several resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, made a report, in part, accompanied by the following joint resolution:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution:

"That, hereafter, the President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen by the people of the respective States, in the manner following: each State shall be divided, by the Legislature thereof, into districts, equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such States may be entitled in the Congress of the United States; the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the constitution, and to be laid off, for the first time, immediately after the ratification of this amendment, and afterwards at the session of the Legislature next ensuing the apportionment of Representatives by the Congress of the United States; or oftener if deemed necessary by the Legislature of the State; but no alteration after the first, or after each decennial formation of districts, shall take effect at the next ensuing election after such alteration is made. That on the first Thursday, and succeeding Friday, in the month of August, of the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, and on the same day in every fourth year there after, the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, shall meet within their respective districts, and vote for a President and Vice President of the United States, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with himself, and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President, in each district, shall be holden to have received one vote; which fact shall be immediately certified to the Governor of the State, to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, and on the same day in every fourth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted: the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; but if no person have such majority, then a second election shall be held on the first Thursday and succeeding Friday in the month of December, then next ensuing, between the persons having the two highest numbers for the office of President; which second election shall be conducted, the result certified, and the votes counted, in the same manner as the first; and the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be the President. But if two or more persons shall have received the greatest and equal number of votes at the second election, the House of Representatives shall choose one of them for President, as is now prescribed by the constitution. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, at the first election, shall be the Vice President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given: and if no person have such majority, then a second election shall take place between the persons having the two highest numbers, on the same day that the second election is held for President; and the person having the highest number of votes for Vice President, shall be the Vice President. But if two or more persons shall have received the greatest, and an equal number of votes in the second election, then the Senate shall choose one of them for Vice President, as is now provided in the constitution. But when a second election shall be necessary in the case of Vice President, and not necessary in the case of President, then the Senate shall choose a Vice President from the persons having the two highest numbers in the first election, as is now prescribed in the constitution."

The resolution was twice read, and made the special order of the day for Monday, the 30th inst.

Mr. ROWAN of Kentucky, said, as this was a subject in which the dearest interests of the people were vitally involved, he should wish a large number of this Report to be printed, to be distributed amongst the people of the Union, that the Senate might, by its diffusion, have an opportunity to learn their sentiments, and be enlightened by their wisdom on the subject. Whether considered with regard to the great interest which the subject possessed, or to the great ability with which it had been discussed, it merited that the highest number should be printed which it was customary to print of interesting documents, and he moved that three thousand be printed;

Case of Commodore Porter.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, made some days ago:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a letter from Captain David Porter, of the United States Navy, 'requesting an investigation of charges contained in communications from Thomas Randall and John Mountain;' and to whom was also referred a letter from Thomas Randall, on the same subject, together with a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, covering the Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

Discriminating Duties.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following bill, reported by the Committee on Commerce, "in addition to an act, entitled 'an act concerning discriminating duties on tonnage and impost.'

"Be it enacted, &c., That upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States, by the Government of any foreign nation, that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost, to the disadvantage of the United States, are imposed or levied in the ports of the said nation, upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon the produce, manufactures, or merchandise, imported in the same, from the United States, or from any foreign country, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost, within the United States, are, and shall be, suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said foreign nation, and the produce, manufactures, or merchandise imported into the United States in the same, from the said foreign nation, or from any other foreign country; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and their cargoes, as aforesaid, shall be continued, and no longer."

Mr. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, said, the object of the bill was to clothe the Executive with the authority to proffer to any foreign nation who would reciprocate the same liberal conditions to the United States, an entire equality of commercial intercourse; in other words, that the vessels and merchandise of foreign powers, agreeing to this condition, should be admitted into the ports of the United States on precisely the same terms, and be subject to no other or higher rates of duty, whether of tonnage or of impost, than the vessels and cargoes of the citizens of the United States. This, it would be perceived, when acceded to, amounted to a complete removal of the system of discriminating duties with the parties agreeing to it. The report, he said, which had been made by the Committee of Commerce, laid on the tables of the members of the Senate, would give the general reasoning on the subject, and more especially would the minute statements accompanying it, furnish precise data, on which gentlemen could correctly form their opinions as to the expediency of adopting the course of policy recommended, and of passing or rejecting the bill. Most gladly, he said, he would leave the subject on this ground, but he had been informed, in the position in which he stood, as Chairman of the Committee, that something more was expected from him; and that other elucidations of the bill should be given. These expectations he would endeavor, then, as briefly as in his power, to comply with, and, in doing it, attempt to trace the origin, progress, and effect of the discriminating duties, adverted, in his remarks, to three or four marked eras in the commercial history of the United States; showing the relative amount of the foreign trade at the different periods referred to; the proportion of it enjoyed by the citizens of the United States, and that part of it occupied by foreign navigation; also, the present state of this trade, and the amount of it exhibited at the date of the latest returns from the Treasury Department in 1824. He would then advert to the effect to be produced by the passing the bill, on the commerce of this and other countries, and leave it to the better judgment of the Senate for its decision.

The discriminating duties, he said, were coeval with the Government, being among the first acts after its adoption; the effect was salutary and beneficent in a high degree; at this time the navigation of the United States was in not only a depressed, but nearly a prostrate state. We had, before the adoption of the Federal Constitution, scarcely recovered from the impoverishment and exhaustion of the war for Independence; we had no common head to protect our rights or property in foreign countries; alien duties abroad were laid on our navigation, which we had no power to retaliate; for, if one State retaliated these duties, and the others did not follow her example, her situation was only changed from bad to worse—as it drove the little foreign trade she might have from her ports to those of the States where no duty was imposed. The consequence was, we could not compete with foreign navigators; they taxed our vessels, but we could not tax theirs; and this inequality was decisive against us; the consequence in a little while would have been, that the whole, or nearly the whole carrying trade of the United States, even for our own products, would have been in the hands of foreign navigators. At this period the General Government was most happily adopted, and the discriminating duties were imposed; the effect was electrical; the merchants and navigators of the United States saw the whole revenue of enactments of the Government based upon the interest with which they were most nearly connected; they felt they had a Government, not only able, but willing, to protect them; and that the countervailing duties would place them in some degree on a footing with other nations; from this moment the navigation and commerce of the United States most rapidly expanded, increasing in a ratio unexampled in the records of any other people. In 1789, the whole tonnage employed in the foreign commerce of the United States, was only 234,000 tons, of which more than 100,000 was in foreign navigation; but in the short space of 17 or 18 years the tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States had swelled to no less an amount than 1,200,000 tons, giving an increase, in this short space, of more than five fold, of which not nearly one-half, as in 1789, was in foreign navigation, but only 86,000 tons, out of 1,200,000 tons; giving an increase of the American tonnage, nine times over—it having increased during this time from about 120,000 tons to 1,100,000 tons. This was the second period to which he should allude. But this highly gratifying state of prosperity for the commerce and navigation of the United States, he could not contend, arose exclusively, or principally, from the imposition of discriminating duties; nor did it arise mainly from them; it arose from other and more powerful causes; from the political events of the times; from the wars of the French Revolution, which soon followed—which continued for twenty years, embracing in their vortex within that time, all the navigating States of Europe; deranging and overturning their commercial systems, and, when engaged in war, sweeping all their shipping from the ocean, with the single exception of Great Britain, whose naval preponderance enabled her to protect her mercantile marine. In this state of things, the commerce of the world was almost entirely thrown into the hands of American merchants and ship owners; and this, to the greater extent, was the source from which the unexampled success of American commerce and American navigation had arisen.

At this period, he said, the two great combatants of Europe were struggling for their political existence; and a great object on each side undoubtedly was, to gain powerful auxiliaries, or allies, in the contest. This motive, increased by a jealousy of the unrivalled prosperity, and growing power of the United States—and perhaps also by something of cupidity to reap a part of the profitable business they were prosecuting—probably led to that series of wrongs and insults, captures and plunderings, to the amount of not far short of one hundred millions of dollars, with which the United States were visited; and which, from necessity, first led to remonstrances, which produced nothing; to measures of restriction, and withdrawal from the ocean, which were scarcely more efficient; and, finally, eventuated in a war with the more powerful of the maritime belligerents.

These two eras, he said, for a reason before assigned, would not test the operation of the discriminating duties. But he had now reached the period when the evidence to be derived from their existence could be perceived, and their influence estimated. The war with Great Britain was terminated by the treaty of Ghent, in December, 1814; the peace of Europe had been secured not long before, by the treaty of Paris. The Temple of Janus was now closed, and each nation would thereafter re-occupy its former commercial habitudes, resume its colonial relations, and cultivate its own resources to the extent of its means and ability.

As soon as this state of things was known in the United States, and intelligence had been received of the treaty of Ghent, the Government of the United States, accommodating itself to the change of circumstances, and acting up to those liberal principles of equal trade, which the late President of the United States, a few years since, in his message to Congress, correctly stated had ever characterized its proceedings, from the first commercial treaty it had formed, that with France, in 1776—passed the act of March 8, 1815, repealing the discriminating duties on vessels and merchandise, so far as regarded the produce and manufacture of such foreign nation, to which the vessel belonged, as should abolish, in their ports, all discriminating duties on American vessels and merchandise. This act, at the time, attracted no great attention; it was considered, in some degree, as embracing an abstract proposition, which might or might not be realized; but shortly after, to wit, in July, 1815, of the same year, a convention was formed with Great Britain, by which it was agreed that the same, and no other or higher rate of duties, should be payable on the vessels of the respective countries, entering the ports of the other, with their cargoes, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of either, than on their own vessels when entering such ports.

This was reducing theory to practice; the American ship owners and navigators became somewhat alarmed; they very naturally concluded, that, as a large mass of our imports were of British manufactured goods; as these were procured from, and shipped by British manufacturers or merchants; that, if British ships could come into the ports of the United States, precisely on the same terms as American ships, that a fellow-feeling between the British merchant and ship owner would arise, and that the greater part, if not the whole, of the importations from Great Britain to the United States, would be made in British shipping, to the exclusion of American navigation; such also was the impression of the British ship owners; for they prepared to put some fine ships into the trade; two, he believed, went into the trade with Boston; our merchants knew British ships could be constructed on about the same terms as American ships; but, as they last longer, in the end they might be cheaper. The British oak being more durable than the American oak—he did not mean the live oak of the country, which is the best material for ship building in the world—but it is too scarce, too costly, and perhaps too heavy, for the purposes of mercantile navigation. They also knew, that, in time of peace, the wages of American seamen were one-third, or one-half higher than the British; that, although provisions were generally cheaper in the United States than in Great Britain; that as we gave our seamen more indulgences and comforts, especially in port, that the cost of subsistence was also probably dearer. These were disadvantages the American ship owner knew he had to contend with, but he did not shrink from the contest; he breasted himself to meet it: also put fine ships into the trade, taking more care than usual to select active, vigorous, spirited young men, to command them, who would never strike a topsail while a mast could carry it. The result was, before the end of a twelve-month, it was perceived the American ship would perform nearly three trips to the other's two; and that goods, shipped by the former, would be received more frequently, and enable the importers better to supply the market than by British ships; the consequence of which was, the latter quitted the trade, and we have now the whole of it in American vessels.

This, he said, was to his mind conclusive; and this was the period when the first suspension of the discriminating duties had taken place. He would trace further the operation of the act of Congress of 1815. The convention with Great Britain was for four years. In 1818, it was renewed for ten years, and is now in existence. In that year a treaty was also formed with Sweden, embracing the same provision, and for the same period. This principle has been still further extended, by diplomatic arrangements with Russia, Prussia, Norway, Oldenburg, the Hanse Towns, France, and Sardinia. Negotiations, it is understood, are depending, in relation to it, with some other of the powers of Europe, and the States of South America, and will, probably, issue in the same result.

This, then, is the third period, 1815-'16, and the principal one, in connection with the next era, or 1824, on which a correct estimation may be formed of the effect of the discriminating duties. It was a time of peace, and they were unaided. In 1816, the whole amount of tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States, was 1,800,000 tons; of which 258,000 were in foreign navigation. Part of this had to come in under the disadvantage of the discriminating duties. What did not come in on equal terms with American shipping, had this quantity of foreign navigation increased in 1824, when the tonnage duty had been taken off from the vessels of nearly all the navigating powers of Europe? Let the same record answer. The amount of tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States, in 1824, the latest to which we have returns, had fallen off, owing to the causes before mentioned; but it amounted to 985,000 tons. What proportion had foreign ship owners of this, when relieved from the tonnage duties? Not nearly one-half, as in 1789; not more than one-fifth, or 258,000 tons, as in 1816. No, sir, they had not a tithe, a tenth part, having only 88,000 tons out of 985,000; and this is decisive: it shows that, on a fair field, and a clear stage, your merchants and navigators, on equal terms, are able successfully to compete with any nation on the face of the earth, with or without discriminating duties. This, however, is only the statement of the tonnage employed: it does not show the amount or value. Pursuing the inquiry on this head, we have authentic information at command. It is to be derived from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury; and, notwithstanding ing the predictions which have been made of the general distress which was to pervade the United States, in consequence of the balance of trade being against us; the high price of exchange; the exportation of specie, and the sale of American stocks in Europe,—so far is this from being the case, the country, generally, is in a state of great prosperity. Specie, where the laws have their force, and credit is good, hardly bears any premium. American stocks stand higher than any other foreign stock in European markets; and the portentous balance of trade, so far from being against us, is, in fact, a million of dollars in our favor; the exports, according to the Secretary's account, being ninety-two millions of dollars, and the imports only ninety-one millions. This spectre, he hoped, had vanished forever; and this account was the more cheering, as it appeared that, of these ninety-one millions, eighty-six millions were transported in our own navigation; showing the sympathy which exists between the tonnage and the value. This result, he said, if it did not give every thing that could be desired, as there was a little residuum still possessed by foreign navigators, gave, as he believed, if foreign nations were to have any concern in it at all, as much as any rational man could either anticipate or expect.

Mr. DICKERSON rose to submit a resolution. He said, as, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appeared, that, after the year 1830 the whole amount of the public debt, on the principles assumed in that report, would stand at about forty millions of dollars, and as our revenues upon commerce are increasing in a way to leave large surpluses, beyond the exigencies of the General Government, it has been deemed important that such surplus should be appropriated to the purposes of education and internal improvement; but as these improvements, by the arm of the United States, meet with constitutional as well as other objections, the only way to obviate these difficulties, and at the same time serve the public interest, would be to distribute these surplus funds to the different States and Territories for these important purposes, to be appropriated according to their discretion. The sums to be distributed may be taken in part from the sinking fund—in part from the retrenchments in our present expenditures—and in part from future excesses of revenue above the present receipts. Mr. D. concluded by offering the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to authorize and require the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute, annually, to the States and Territories of the United States, three millions of dollars for the purposes of education and internal improvement—to be apportioned among the States and Territories according to the rate of direct taxation.

WEDNESDAY, February 1.

Death of Senator Chambers.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, rose, and said it had become his painful duty to announce the death of his honorable colleague, HENRY CHAMBERS, who died on the 25th of last month, while on his way to the Seat of Government, to enter on the discharge of his duties in the Senate.

Mr. KING said he would not attempt the eulogy of the deceased; but Alabama would long have cause to regret the loss of the valuable services of one of her best, and most enlightened, and most useful citizens: and his numerous friends would long deplore the loss of one of the best of men. Without further comment, Mr. K. said he would offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable HENRY CHAMBERS, deceased, late a Senator from the State of Alabama, will go into mourning for him, one month, by the usual mode.

The resolution having been agreed to unanimously, Mr. KING again rose, and said that no case had occurred in the Senate, precisely similar to the present, but it was well known that the other House had thought proper to adjourn, on learning the death of one of its members while on his way to the Seat of Government. Mr. K. therefore moved the following additional resolution:

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the honorable HENRY CHAMBERS, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to, nem. con.

TUESDAY, February 7.

Maison Rouge Claim.

The Senate took up the bill "to authorize the legal representatives of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, and those claiming under him, to institute a suit against the United States by petition, in the courts of the United States, to try the validity of their title."

[This case has been repeatedly before Congress in one shape or other, has been often discussed with great attention, and is familiar to most readers. The claim is for two or three hundred thousand acres of land, in Louisiana, and the title rests on the validity of a Spanish grant to De Maison Rouge. The claim has passed from hand to hand, and is now understood to be owned by Mr. S. Girard, of Philadelphia.]

On this bill a debate took place, which continued more than two hours, comprehending, in its scope, the history of the claim, the propriety of giving to an individual the new privilege proposed by the bill, the other modes by which it was suggested the title might be ascertained, &c. Those who advocated the bill, were Messrs. VAN BUREN, BERRIEN, ROWAN, and JOHNSTON of Lou.; and those who opposed it, were Messrs. RANDOLPH, TAZEWELL, HOLMES, and EATON. In the course of the debate, Mr. RANDOLPH moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; and, on the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Hayne, Lloyd of Massachusetts, Macon, Marks, Randolph, Tazewell, and Woodbury—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Boulogny, Branch, Chase, Clayton, Cobb, Ellis, Findlay, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Knight, McIlvaine, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Van Buren, Van Dyke, White, Willey, and Williams—28.

The question then being on certain amendments reported to the bill by Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Judiciary Committee, a motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed.

MONDAY, February 18.

Repair of Post Roads in Mississippi.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill "appropriating a sum of money ($15,000) for the repair of the post road between Jackson and Columbus, in the State of Mississippi."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, (Chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,) explained the object of this bill, which appropriated $15,000 for the repair of the post road, in the Indian country, between Jackson and Columbus, in the State of Mississippi, to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster General. A similar bill had, he said, passed the Senate, during the last session of Congress, but failed for want of time, in the other House. The committee who had reported the bill, had received ample information, from the Postmaster General, and from other quarters, of the vast importance of this road, of its being out of order, and of the necessity of the appropriation at present asked for. The road runs through the Indian lands, over which no State has any control, therefore would not involve any constitutional question. In its present state, the road is so bad that the communication is very precarious, and sometimes impossible.

Mr. CHANDLER, of Maine, said he should be unwilling to lay out any money within the State of Mississippi, for making a post road, especially as the writer of a statement (read by the Secretary) on which the committee seemed to rely, was doubtful whether this was the best road that could be had. In the State of Maine, when they made a road passing through lands owned by Indians, they were under the necessity of doing it themselves; and he thought the State of Mississippi was as well able to make its own roads as they were in the State of Maine.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, said the State of Mississippi had not the power to make this road. The road runs through the Indian country, over which the State of Mississippi had no control. The appropriation asked for is not more than sufficient to accomplish the desired purpose. They had formerly made an appropriation for the object contemplated by this bill—how that had been expended he could not say. The committee had had the subject under their consideration; they had communicated with the Postmaster General, and Mr. K. said he was not disposed to delay the passage of the bill, as from the great confidence that was placed in the Postmaster General, they might be satisfied he would not require a larger sum than would be sufficient to put the road in a proper situation for the transportation of the mail.

Mr. ELLIS, of Mississippi, said the object proposed was, that this route should be so improved as to enable the mail to be transported with safety from Jackson to Columbus, in the State of Mississippi, and this could not be effected unless this appropriation was made. The water-courses which intersect this road in various directions, require bridges, the swamps also require causeways, that post carriages may pass in security. He knew, from an experience of several years, that the mail arrived at Natchez and New Orleans in a very wretched and torn condition; and merchants complain that their losses are immense, in consequence of the negligence of Government in this respect.

The gentleman from Maine had said that, because this bill did provide for opening roads in Maine, that it should not be done in the present instance; but this road has already been opened by the Government of the United States, and it is now proposed to put it in such a state, that the mail might be transported in covered carriages to Natchez and New Orleans; this he thought was an object well worthy the attention of the Government, and he hoped no opposition would be made to the passage of the bill, as the question did not involve the constitutional power of Congress in regard to roads, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER could not see why the constitutional question would not be brought up as much in this case as in making any other road—if the committee were in possession of no further information on the subject, sufficient proof had not been produced to show that this road was the best possible road that could be had; and he was not willing that the United States should lay out any money on it. If any were to be laid out, he admitted there was no officer in whom he would place more confidence than in the officer at the head of the Post Office Department. Let the State of Mississippi make the road, and the United States would have no objection to giving them all the authority they could require.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said this was not a road belonging to a State, but was one in which every part of this nation was interested in keeping open. All communication, by land, from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, all the great cities on the seaboard, and all the towns and villages in the country north of the southern point of our Union, must pass on this route. It was a road opened by the United States, according to a treaty stipulation with the Indians; and because it served to connect the United States together, they had appropriated seven or eight thousand dollars for the purpose of opening it, and the present appropriation was required to put it in a state of repair.

Mr. CORB, of Georgia, was perfectly satisfied of the expediency of opening this road, if it were to be considered merely as a matter of expediency—but he concurred in the opinion of the gentleman from Maine, that, if the constitutional question was not involved in this bill, it would not be involved in any one. Did the circumstance of this road passing through the Indian territory, change the principle at all? In what way does it? [Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, by treaty stipulation.] A treaty stipulation gives to the United States no other powers than are conferred on the Government by the constitution. Suppose the Government of the United States stipulated by treaty with Great Britain to do a thing it was not constitutional to do, was a power thereby communicated to the Government to do that thing? Mr. C. said he did not like this plan of the United States acquiring power by stipulations of treaty. It was a dangerous doctrine. It seemed to him that when they came to view this question fairly, it involved all the great principles as to the power of this Government to make roads and canals. Supposing they were to take the reason assigned by gentlemen in support of the present measure, that this road was necessary for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of the mail. In the route from Baltimore, somewhere on towards Philadelphia, it was just as necessary that the road should be repaired; the mail is obstructed almost daily on that route for the want of a proper road, and in some weather it is almost impossible to get on at all; and was it not just as expedient to have the route from Baltimore towards Philadelphia repaired, so as to facilitate the transportation of the mail between those two cities, as it was to have a road through the Chickasaw or Choctaw territory, to facilitate the transportation of the mail between New York and New Orleans? Certainly it was. Mr. C. said he should like to see which was the clause in the Federal Constitution under which they claimed authority to make this road through the State of Mississippi; he could not see any reason why this circumstance of the road passing through the Indian country should change the principle in the smallest degree, or confer any new power on the General Government. His ideas on this subject, Mr. C. said, he had occasion to submit to the Senate some time ago, and it was not his intention now to go into any remarks that would make him repeat what he had advanced. There was no power in this Government to make this or any other road through the States.

Mr. ELLIS said the road did not pass through one-seventh part of the State of Mississippi, and it was impossible for the State Government of Mississippi to have any authority over those lands till the title to them was extinguished. The gentleman seemed to suppose that the great power which had so often been controverted in that House was now about to be advocated by the friends of the bill. Mr. E. said he was not about to advocate it, nor to indicate an idea of this kind, that this Government possessed the power to establish a road, or to cut a canal, through the several States, without their approbation; but the power does exist in the Congress of the United States, under the existing state of things relating to the Indian country within the several States, to establish roads, in the exercise of the provisions established by the Federal Constitution.

Mr. EATON, of Tennessee, said a treaty had been entered into in 1801, between the United States and the Choctaw Indians. The question of State rights had not then arisen, and the Government of this country was in the hands of Mr. Jefferson. Under such an administration, no attempt would have been made to enter into a treaty with a distinct sovereignty, that went to invade the principles of the constitution. By the second article of that treaty, the Indians gave their consent that a wagon road should be constructed through their lands, and if the idea was a correct one, that to make such a road was unconstitutional, was it not strange that the Senate should not have conceived this idea in 1801, or, if they did conceive it, that they should have acted as they did. Mr. E. said, a road had been made from the State of Georgia to the State of Tennessee, which was at present the main highway between these two States. A road had also been made through Alabama to Fort Stoddard, and the road which was at present the subject of discussion, was considered in this House, and an appropriation made for it. Ever since this Government had existed, Mr. E. said, they had proceeded on the principle that the Indians are a distinct sovereignty; it was an anomaly that one sovereignty should exist within the orbit of another, but they always had proceeded on this principle, and if they had any right to interfere with them, why did they proceed with them in the character of sovereignties? Mr. E. was present when the Postmaster General made an inquiry of the mail contractor for this section of the country, as to the state of the road, and the answer was, it is almost impassable. The principal part of this road was opened in 1801, and the portion for which they were now about to make an appropriation, was opened some years ago. It is against the religious principles of an Indian to work in any way, and the consequence is, that the roads through their country are worse than elsewhere. If there was any force in the objection urged by the gentleman from Georgia, at least so far back as 1801, something would have been thought about it in the Senate, when they entered into this treaty with the Indians;

by the second article of which, privilege is granted to the United States to open a road through their country.

Mr. CHANDLER had no doubt the road wanted repairs; but the treaty announced nothing more than that the United States had extinguished the Indian title to that portion of the country. If the State of Mississippi had no jurisdiction over the land, let them come to Congress and ask for it.

Mr. EATON contended there was no cession of property, on the part of these Indians, by the provisions of this treaty; there was not even a cession of sovereignty. They, in their sovereign capacity as Indians, yielded their consent to the United States to open a road. The United States could not give the State of Mississippi any sovereignty over it.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, observed, that the Indians were considered as sovereign within the States wherein they reside, unless the title and jurisdiction are extinguished. We are in this singular predicament. The United States is a great wheel; there are twenty-four little ones within it, and there are several others within each of these little wheels. If the United States have no right to make a road through either of these sovereignties, and the Indians will not make a road, it follows that we are to have no road. Mr. H. said he did not perceive the force of the constitutional objection bearing on that part of the State that is under the jurisdiction of the Indians. The State cannot exercise its laws; it cannot administer justice; its laws could not reach the Indian country. The State could not lay out the road through the Indian country, unless they legislate for the Indians, and consider them as citizens of the State. There might arise a very grave question out of all this, whether Indians, within the limits of an individual State, can be considered as sovereign power, acting with and negotiating with the United States. The Constitution of the United States, in apportioning the Representatives among the several States, in that enumeration, says, "and excluding Indians, not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons." The constitution contemplates Indians not taxed as not coming within the power of the Government of the United States. But there is still another question behind that; the question whether the State has the power to tax the Indians within the limits of that State. Until they have done that, till they consider the Indians as subject to their laws, so long will they legislate for themselves, and the State jurisdiction will not extend to them, and they will have a control over the territory, exclusive of the State. How, then, would this constitutional objection apply? It was contended that we had no right to exercise jurisdiction over a road of our own making, within the limits of a sovereign State. The reason of this was, that the State had reserved to itself this jurisdiction, and had never given it to us by the constitution. Mr.

H. said he understood this treaty was made before that State became a State; the stipulation was made by the Indians to the United States, and the United States had the power to stipulate with the Indians and to receive stipulations from them. Could the State, by being incorporated into the Union, do away with any of those stipulations previously made, and which, at the time of making them, they had a right to make? The compact was made by powers competent to contract, by which a road was to be made through this identical territory. If this compact is done away, by admitting the State of Mississippi into the Union, then that goes for nothing.

Mr. WOODBURY, of New Hampshire, observed, that the State of Mississippi could not tax the land, because the land was exempted from taxation—it belonged to the United States—it was Congress alone that could tax it. When roads passed through lands owned by individuals in Mississippi, the State did not ask Congress to interfere—they taxed the land. But, when roads passed through the United States lands in Mississippi, they taxed them by asking for a grant from Congress; and, the question was, Mr. W. said, whether Congress should make that grant, when it was so much for the public benefit?

Mr. CONN was sorry he did not see this question in the same point of view as the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) and he would put this question to the gentleman: To what clause in the Federal Constitution did they trace the power of making this road? The gentleman from Tennessee had supposed his objections to be, that it was an invasion of State rights. Mr. C. said, whenever they exercised a power, which was not authorized by the constitution, it was an invasion of the rights of the States or the rights of the people. The great objection he had to adopt these measures was, that it was a usurpation by the Federal Government, of power not conferred on it. He denied that any thing could confer a power on the Federal Government, but the Federal Constitution; and this brought him again to the question put to the gentleman from Maine—to what clause in the constitution did he trace the power to make or repair this road? Would the gentleman say it was from the treaty-making power? Mr. C. admitted, that the Government of the United States, so long as the territory was theirs, perhaps might, under the clause of having a right, exclusively, to legislate for the territory, adopt ways and means to have a road made through the territory. When this treaty was made with the Chickasaws, it was the Territory of the United States, and the Government at that time proceeded to open the road, precisely on the same principle that it had done in the territory of Florida, or in Michigan, or in any other Territory, before being admitted into the Union. Mr. C. said his idea was, that the moment a State was admitted into the Union, that portion of the sovereignty of the United States which could be exercised under the constitution, and which might be defined to be the right of jurisdiction, ceased, except in cases specially provided for by the Federal Constitution. Sovereignty consisted, he thought, in something more than the right of soil. The mere right of soil is a very small portion of the sovereignty of a nation. He admitted that, till the lands were sold by the United States, they had the right of soil; but, as soon as the State of Mississippi was admitted into the Union, the whole right of State jurisdiction accrued to that State, so far as regarded the exercise of any sovereignty, except what was specially conferred by the Federal Constitution. The United States have no other jurisdiction in the State of Mississippi, than they have in the State of Georgia or Maine.

As to the expediency of this measure, Mr. C. admitted the road might be very necessary, and the gentleman from Maine stated this difficulty: The State of Mississippi cannot, or will not; the Indians will not; the General Government cannot make it; therefore there must be no road. Concerning the road in Maryland, to which he had before adverted, Mr. C. said, one portion of the inhabitants of Maryland and part of Delaware, wished to have it in one direction, and another part wished it to be in another. The upper portion of the people are not rich enough to make it themselves, or have not the power, and they apply to Congress for an appropriation to repair the upper road; here is a case presented to us: they want to make the road where it ought to run, and where the mail is subjected to all those inconveniences to which it is subject in the road which we are now discussing. Mr. C. said, his idea was, that whatever power the United States could have exercised over the territory, in opening this road, the moment the State of Mississippi was admitted into the Union, so far as regards the right of jurisdiction over this road, it devolved to the State. Look to the treaty, said Mr. C., and see whether the Indian title is not extinguished to this portion of land; and all gentlemen would admit that the moment the Indian title was extinguished, the jurisdiction would accrue, over the lands thus extinguished, to the State. Mr. C. then quoted the treaty—"and the same shall continue forever a highway for the citizens of the United States;" and contended that it was as clear a renunciation of jurisdiction by the Indians as ever was made; they gave up their power; they ceded to the United States the right of making this road; and from the moment the treaty was ratified, the power was vested in the United States, because it was a territory; and so soon as the State of Mississippi came into the Union, this jurisdiction over the road, which belonged to the United States, as sovereign over the country, whilst it was a territory, devolved on the State.

Mr. HOLMES said, he felt a little alarmed when he saw his friend from Georgia rise, and ask the question which he had put to him, with so much confidence—and if he could not put his finger on that clause of the Constitution of the United States which authorized the appropriation for this road, he would not make it. He was not one of those who believed that they might obtain that power by construction, which was not plainly and unequivocally granted in the instrument. He was not an advocate for constructive or implied powers. He understood that, at the time this Territory belonged to the United States, they made a compact with the Indians that a road might be made, which should not be interrupted. Afterwards the State of Mississippi was admitted into the Union, and the road had not been made, and now they applied to Congress to make this road. This was the clause of the constitution on which he relied for the power to make it: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." The main proposition here, Mr. H. remarked, was connected with another clause: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States: and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State." This, Mr. H. said, was all to be taken into consideration, referring to the Territory that then was to be carved into States, and the Territory that should afterwards remain. The last clause was a very important one; "new States may be admitted into the Union." Connect the last clause with that, "nothing in this constitution shall be so construed," &c. Why was it inserted? "New States may be admitted into the Union," but the property which was reserved for the Territories was intended, some of it, to belong to the States, when they should become States. This clause was intended to preserve all the rights of the United States and of the States, when they were admitted into the Union, and all the stipulations previously made between the United States and the Territories of the United States, were to be firm and inviolable, in this latter clause of this article of the constitution. If that were the case, and Mr. H. said he could conceive no other reason why this clause should be inserted, he would recur to the fact, that the right of the United States to make a road within the Indian country, had been stipulated for, and had been vested in the United States, before that State came into the Union. The State afterwards came into the Union, and there was nothing by that admission that would go to prejudice the claim of the United States to make this road, or the claim of the State to any thing that was granted to it as a Territory of the United States. The stipulation was fairly made and never rescinded, and was reserved by the express clause in the constitution to be valid, and effectual. Mr. H. thought, on this point, from this clause of the constitution, the power might be fairly inferred.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, referred to the second volume of the Laws of the United States, and cited, as cases in point, in answer to Mr. COBB, the roads which had been made by the United States, from Fort Hawkins, in Georgia, and Fort Stoddart, in Alabama. These precedents he thought conclusive, as to the power to make the road now under discussion. There had been an appropriation for opening this road, and they now asked for an appropriation for repairing it. The appropriations for opening this road, had been made under the administrations of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe; and, if his friend concurred with him as to the expediency of the measure, and it was not to be doubted, where repeated appropriations had settled this question, he hoped he would permit the constitutional question to rest, till he came to matters of greater moment, when it would give him more pleasure to hear him, and he always heard him with pleasure on that great and vital question. On the present occasion, Mr. J. did hope that, if the Senate believed in the propriety and necessity of the measure, they would make the appropriation, after what had been stated, by way of matter of fact, on the subject.

Mr. COBB remembered the circumstances alluded to by the gentleman from Kentucky; he was a member of Congress at that time, and he voted against the appropriation for the road from Fort Hawkins, although it was in Georgia. He hoped the time was not yet come when the Senate were to be tied down by a precedent of such a character as that. He could refer the gentleman to other precedents. In that same book, he would probably find a certain law, called a sedition law: the gentleman would certainly not deny that that law was unconstitutional; if he admitted that, it was no precedent to settle a question of constitutionality, and it would be still lawful for them to object to another sedition law, on the ground of its unconstitutionality. The gentleman would also find a law for the making of the Cumberland Road, which originated during the good old days of Jefferson. Mr. C. said, in his opinion, that also was unconstitutional, and, so far as regarded himself, it would form no precedent to him, and he should make the same reply in regard to every other statute that the gentleman should bring in support of this bill. He contended that no constitutional question could be settled in that way. When a measure was brought forward, every man would judge for himself, and he was bound to do so, not only by the general principles of duty, but by the solemn and only oath he had taken in this House. Therefore, when gentlemen produced precedents of this kind, he gave notice now, he should not admit them in constitutional questions. They might do very well for a Court, but not for a Legislature. On constitutional principles, there could be no precedent.

Mr. ELLIS moved to lay the bill on the table, at the suggestion of a friend from Georgia, but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. HOLMES made some further remarks, in support of the positions he had advanced, and in reply to Mr. COBB.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, supposed that the gentleman from Georgia had been so completely driven out of the field, on the constitutional question, that he would not have entered it again; but he found he was like the character ascribed to the American soldier by the European soldier: it was very difficult to make him believe he was beaten. With regard to this point, Mr. H. said, he should consider him so, and should say nothing in relation to the constitutional part of this question. And, then, the question recurred, as to the expediency of the measure. They were told this was the only approach, by mail route, to the great commercial depot of New Orleans; and it was in such a state as to be nearly impassable. From this statement of the case, he imagined there was no member in the Senate that would deny the necessity of this work. The question was, who was to do it? It was one of those cases, he acknowledged, that presented the importance of the constitutional power, vested in Congress, to make these roads, in a better point of view than any other that he knew of—the right of passing through an intermediate country (a State if they pleased) in which the interests of all other States of the Union were more involved than the State through which the road passed. Such was the fact, in the present instance. There was not a State in the Union—certainly ten of them—but was more interested in passing this road, than the State of Mississippi. They were told that the State could not do it if she would, because she would be considered a trespasser on those parts of it which did not belong to her, and to which no title had been given by the United States. Under these circumstances she could not; and if she could, she would not do it; because she is less interested in it than many of the States. Therefore, it is, that an application is made of a grant of this small sum of money, to facilitate the conveyance of the mail on the most important route in this country. Mr. H. said it was his belief, that, from the situation the road is at present in, a much larger amount of property might be lost, by losing a single mail, than what was asked for by this bill. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would pass. He hoped no further objection would be made to it on constitutional grounds; for gentlemen might be sure there would be plenty of opportunities for discussing that question during the session.

Mr. BERRIEN, of Georgia, said, the motion made by the gentleman from Mississippi, to lay the bill on the table, was made at his suggestion.

At the moment when this question first presented itself to his view, he did entertain a serious doubt whether the great question which agitates and divides this Union, and which perhaps is destined still more to do so, was not involved in the subject now presented to the consideration of the Senate. If he could believe it necessary to trace to the treaty of 1801, the rights of the United States to do that act, which it was contemplated by this bill to do; in other words, if he could think it necessary to affirm the general proposition, that the United States could acquire, by force of any treaty, the right to do an act, the right to do which could not be traced to the only legitimate source of its power, the constitution, he should still be disposed to pause. But the moderate reflection he had been able to bestow on this subject, during the discussion, had reconciled his mind to the admission of the principle, that the effect of this treaty was certainly of limited extent. This treaty was concluded before the admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union, and the parties to that treaty being considered as distinct sovereignties, might have imposed on the United States certain obligations, from which obligations they could not disengage themselves by any new compacts entered into with the people of Mississippi, on their admission into the Union. To this extent, Mr. B. said, the power of the United States was to be deduced from the treaty, and might be admitted without involving the question of which he desired, to steer clear in this discussion.

As to the general right asserted for the Union, to make roads through all the Indian countries, against such a doctrine he should desire to protest. He would draw a distinction between those lands of Indians, living within the limits of the States which came into the Confederation, with certain chartered limits, and those living within States, who, at the time of the formation of the constitution, had no limits, and whose limits were only defined by the laws regulating their admission into the Union. It seemed to him, that the present bill steered clear of all these difficulties; and, though they had desired this question to rest, yet, if they were required to act on it, he was prepared to act according to the best of his judgment. The general subject having been presented in a formal manner, and in such a manner as to require a formal discussion, he was solicited by no manner step to interfere with that course which the convictions of his duty had prescribed to him; but, if the members of the Senate, generally, were satisfied that, as to this question, the bill was free from doubt, he should not press on their consideration, at this moment, the motion for laying it on the table.

Some further conversation then passed between Messrs. COBB and WOODBURY, and after an ineffectual motion to postpone the bill to Wednesday next, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

Florida Canal.

TUESDAY, February 14.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, proceeded to the consideration of the following bill for the survey of a route for a canal, between the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico :

"Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be made an accurate and minute examination of the country south of the St. Mary's River, and including the same, with a view to ascertain the most eligible route for a canal, admitting the transit of boats, to connect the Atlantic with the Gulf of Mexico, and, also, with a view to ascertain the practicability of a ship channel; that he cause particularly to be examined the route from the St. Mary's River, to the Appalachicola River or Bay, and from the St. John's River to the Vassalousa Bay, with a view to both the above objects; that he cause the necessary surveys, both by land and along the coast, with estimates of the expense of each, accompanied with proper plans, notes, observations, explanations, and opinions, of the Board of Engineers, and that he cause a full report of these proceedings to be made to Congress; and, to carry the same into effect, the sum of twenty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Va., rose, and said he was not so much of a political Quixote, as, at the end of six and twenty years of public life, to run a tilt against a wind-mill in full operation; he would only say, that, it being his misfortune to doubt the constitutional power of Congress to act on a subject of this sort within the body of a State, he was equally stupid, he would not say "ineffably" so, to doubt its power within the body of a Territory: for he really could not very well see the distinction, the difference—indeed, it was a distinction without a difference—of pouring out the money of the Treasury—the money of the people of the whole United States—upon these projects, whether within the body of a State, or within the body of a Territory. He thanked God he was not so much of a political metaphysician, as to think such nice distinctions of any great importance. It was one of those cases where the play was not worth the candle. It was from this motive that he had voted against the bill, which had, to-day, passed the Senate, for making a road through the State of Mississippi. This Government, said Mr. R., has been in operation now some seven and thirty years, and what road, or what improvement has been made at its expense, in the adjoining States of Maryland, Virginia, or Carolina? I appeal to the honorable Senator from South Carolina if there is any piece of road—and, in South Carolina, I understand—I hope I may be mistaken—that there exists none of this political squeamishness, which exists in us Virginians, about the exercise of this right—I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina, if there is a piece of road, in the whole world, that more requires the interposition of Government, than that road about Marlborough Court-house—the causeway on this side of Pedee? No, sir. Has there been any proposition to mend it at the expense of the United States? None at all. I, therefore, who go for the fact, do not care one button, whether the public treasure is poured out in doing for the States, that which it behooves the States to do for themselves, or in doing it in the first instance for those particular favorites of Executive patronage, the Territories; where the power of this Government, the Executive branch in particular, is almost all powerful, that they may be dandled and swaddled, and nurtured up, into ready made States, and gain all their improvements at the expense of the General Government. I have not the slightest idea of arguing this question; it has been argued so often, and so much better and abler than I can pretend to do it, that I rise only for the purpose of recording my vote on the present question, and asking for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, said this was a question of mere expediency; a question which has often been decided. It was a question for a survey; one on which a general law, and a general appropriation, had heretofore been passed; and, in reference to which, an item in the appropriation bill had passed the other House during the present session, and was now before the Senate. If, on this proposition, the constitutional question was to be canvassed, a broad field would be opened, and a broad discussion would of course ensue. Mr. H. said he would state, as briefly as he could, the object of the committee in reporting this amendment to the bill. The bill itself authorizes a survey and examination of the Peninsula of Florida, with a view to a canal to connect the Atlantic coast with the Gulf of Mexico, at the Appalachicola or the Suwannee Bay. The section under consideration authorizes a continuance of the same survey and examination to the Mississippi River. The committee were induced to report this amendment from an examination of maps of the coast, from the Appalachicola to the Mississippi, and from other sources of information on the same subject. The maps of the coast alluded to, show, with little interruption, a continuation of lakes, bays, sounds, and inlets, almost the whole distance; show the practicability of a perfect inland navigation for 850 miles, by cutting at various points, short distances; which, according to the information given, and now on the table, amount to no more than twelve miles. The importance of this communication may not, at first view, appear. It may be said that from the mouth of the Mississippi to the Peninsula of Florida, the Gulf is open, admits of safe and easy navigation, and that an inland navigation is here unnecessary. This may be good doctrine for ship owners, and those who follow the coasting trade, but it is very much otherwise for the growers of, and traders in, the produce of the western country. If the navigation be thrown into the open Gulf, the produce of the West, seeking a market, is stopped at New Orleans; and if it would progress any further south, it is subjected to the expense and delay of transhipment. Even the Mobile and Pensacola Bays, to which the navigation is at present almost complete, are shut against the produce and the navigation of the western country. Sir, said Mr. H., more than one-half the Territory, and more than one-third of the population of the Union, depend on the Mississippi River for the transportation of produce to the southern market. That whole extent of country, and mass of population, are interested in the success of the measure proposed. This inland navigation completed, and the produce of the western country, in the same vessel in which it shall have been shipped at Pittsburg, or at any point on the Mississippi, or any of its tributary streams, may pass directly into the harbors of the Florida coast, into the canal of the peninsula, and find its way to the Atlantic borders and the markets of Georgia; and if in a vessel calculated to stem the currents of the Mississippi, may return laden with the cotton and sugar of Louisiana and Florida, and with the productions of all the countries watered by the rivers which fall into the Gulf of Mexico, through the coasts of Florida. The half of the States of the Union are in a greater or less degree interested in the measure now before the Senate. But, the constitutional objection, so often urged against the power of Congress to construct roads and canals, is brought to bear on this amendment. This objection he did not expect to meet on a mere proposition to explore, to survey, to do that which is doing every day by the Secretary of War, under the authority of Congress. Two years ago, a law of Congress was passed, authorizing surveys, estimates, &c., and the employment, for that purpose, of the topographical and civil engineers of the country. This bill appropriated $30,000 for carrying the objects of the law into effect, and, sir, but for the fact that the appropriation under this law is exhausted, the Secretary of War would direct the progress of this very work, which according to the opinions of some gentlemen, we have no power to direct here. How many roads have you surveyed through the various States, and what are some of your engineers doing now? Are they not employed in surveying a road from this city to New Orleans? This, said Mr. H., is, according to my humble judgment, a work to which considerations of expediency will alone apply; and, in this view of it, it was to be presumed, there would be but few objections to the amendment. Sir, said Mr. H., what is the cause of our solicitude about Cuba? It is, that Cuba is the key of the Gulf Stream. It is because this island, in the hands of a maritime power, could command and control the navigation and the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the West Indies. This canal from the Atlantic to the Mississippi completed, and the power of this position over our commerce, must, in a great measure, cease. The exports of the half of the Union would no longer be exposed to the piracies of the West Indian seas, or the no less fatal casualties of shipwreck off the Florida Cape. This canal would afford an inland navigation, which would avoid the dangers of the cape; and the day is, perhaps, not far distant, when a canal, at the isthmus of Panama or Darien, would give to it much of the commerce of the East Indies, and of the Pacific Ocean. This, properly speaking, is a measure for the protection of commerce, and not a question of internal improvements.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said that the object of the amendment was to continue the survey along the coast, according to the plan which was presented about two years ago. His opinion was, that if a ship channel were practicable, it would supersede the necessity of an inland navigation; but while the Engineers were on the spot, it was a matter of economy to continue the survey. It was a saving of time, and it would enable the Government to act more speedily. He was apprehensive, however, that it would embarrass the bill by presenting constitutional questions; though, in relation to our Territories, he believed our power was sovereign, and that we could exercise over them all the rightful powers of legislation; and this was the first time he had ever heard an intimation that Congress did not possess it.

Mr. J. said he had no objection to the amendment. It proposes merely to extend the survey along the proposed line of interior communication, the whole of which is extremely interesting. But the ship-channel which this bill contemplates, is of infinitely more importance, and calculated more strongly to engage the attention of this House.

The object of this work is to draw all the navigation of the Bay of Mexico, which now passes through the strait between Cuba and Florida, to a more convenient and safe channel through the peninsula, the effect of which will be to diminish the length of the voyage; to produce great economy in time and expense; to avoid the usual dangers and losses; to give to the western country, at all times, in peace and in war, a free and open communication with the Atlantic; to deprive Cuba of her position, and to place the trade of that sea under the control of this Government.

Of the localities of the country, I have before spoken: of the practicability of the work, not a doubt exists on the minds of the scientific and experienced Engineers; and I wish not to detain the House by an account of the magnificent works of this kind which genius, labor, patience, and enterprise, have accomplished in other countries, for objects of comparatively small importance. The Caledonian canal, uniting the two seas through Scotland, constructed with twenty-three locks, and forming a line of seventy miles, and the canal from the Helder to Amsterdam, of forty-eight miles, below the level of the adjacent sea, both capable of passing frigates of thirty-two guns, demonstrate the practicability of such works, where nature nas not interposed physical impossibilities. I understand that a work of great magnitude in Sweden is still continued with unabated zeal and confidence; that the apparent delay is owing to the extent of the work—the partial appropriations of the Diet—not to any insuperable difficulty, or physical impossibility. It is under the direction of an able minister, who perseveres in the object with a zeal that ensures success. It is expected to be completed in 1828. They began by survey, as we do; they acted as we shall, upon the opinions of Engineers. A failure is not anticipated.

To form some idea of the present and future extent and value of commerce of this region, we must look to the great expansion of this Mediterranean Sea, the country that surrounds it, with the population that inhabits it, and the productions it affords for exchange.

It extends from Appalachicola Bay, west, along our own coast and the Bay of St. Bernard; thence, south, to the same extremity of the Isthmus of Darien: thence, twenty degrees east, through the Caribbean Sea, and thence, northwardly, along the coast of Jamaica and Cuba, occupying all the space between those islands and Florida, Louisiana, Mexico, Guatemala, and Colombia.

It embraces a country of immense extent, with a population of fifteen millions, and producing the richest productions of the earth; the whole of whose commerce necessarily passes through the only outlet to the Atlantic, a narrow, crooked, and dangerous channel between Cuba and Florida—bound by shoals, reefs, and keys, with a strong, irregular, and unequal current, exposed alike to the calms and the storms that prevail there.

The loss of property and lives is incalculably great. I have evidence of the loss of sixty-four vessels, estimated at $700,000, during the last year. Here Mr. J. said he had an accurate schedule of all the losses during the last year, furnished by a gentleman of Boston. It appeared by that statement that the five first vessels were estimated at $470,000.

But let us take a more accurate and particular view of this commerce. The whole of the country west of the mountains, and by far the best and largest portion, depends on the Bay of Mexico, and furnishes alone an extensive trade. It produced last year 273,000 bales cotton, (Mississippi River, 208,294; Mobile Bay, 58,797; Florida, 6,000 bales.)—nearly half of the productions of the United States, besides sugar, molasses, tobacco, flour, and other provisions. They are stated to have equalled twenty-three millions last year, and to have employed, from the Mississippi alone, 150,000 tons shipping. There entered the port of Orleans, in 1825, seven hundred and thirty-two vessels, making 1,464 voyages; and, including the Mobile Bay and Florida, probably amounted to 850 vessels and 1,700 voyages.

To form a correct opinion of the value of this interior communication, we must bear in mind that our vessels will pass due east, from the mouth of the Mississippi River, in the shortest time, on an open sea, free from danger, almost out of the range of the violent winds of the West Indies, and under the protection of a naval force that will find in Pensacola the same advantages of position that Cuba presents to a maritime power, and that each of these vessels, in each of these voyages, traverses fourteen degrees of latitude in distance, and increases her passage about eight days, and the outward voyage will require a long time to beat up against the current. It may be safely calculated, that on the outward and return voyage from New York to New Orleans, one-half of the time, and one-third of the distance, will be saved, and a corresponding diminution of expense.

This export of our country, which employs so many vessels and seamen, of which I have spoken, is entirely the production of the earth, from our own labor, and not liable to any deduction for raw material, foreign skill, or capital. It is the production of three millions of people, with ample space, a rich soil, and favorable climate, which, in twenty-five years, will, probably, double their number, and whose productions will increase in a corresponding ratio. Besides this export, it must also be remembered, that a supply equal to the consumption of nine States, is brought into our ports from the Northern States, or from Europe; that these importations must likewise increase with our numbers and wealth.

I am unable to furnish a full statement of the navigation and commerce of the Spanish Americas, bordering on the Bay of Mexico. The exports of Liverpool alone, for the South American markets, of British goods, at the custom-house price, for the year 1823, amounted to thirty-four millions of dollars, of which more than twenty millions pass by this route. This is independent of the amount shipped from other ports in England, or from the rest of Europe, the re-shipments from this country, and the direct trade of American supplies, which is equal to six millions. In addition to which, a large amount of the export trade of Jamaica and Cuba pass by this route. The whole of this trade, with the exports of Mexico, Guatemala, and Colombia, will employ 150,000 tons of shipping, equal to seven hundred vessels, forming an aggregate, with our own, of 300,000 tons of shipping, and 1,500 vessels.

This country, like our own, is rapidly augmenting in numbers, and daily developing its resources. They have just emerged from a long and ruinous war; and the influence of peace, independence, and freedom, has not yet produced its effect upon the industry of this portion of our hemisphere; and we may anticipate, when this influence shall be felt, that, from the extent of territory and population, and the value and variety of their productions, this trade will greatly increase.

We might cast our minds forward, to a period not distant, when a similar work, now contemplated, will open a safe and short passage to India, through the Isthmus of Darien, which will form, with this connection with Florida, a new and interesting field of enterprise.

It is in vain to calculate the extent of trade in twenty years through this sea, with the rapid increase of population, and the new springs of industry and enterprise which this commerce will excite.

There are other considerations, of little less weight, of a political character. The island of Cuba occupies a strong position on our continent. She is called by military men the key of the Bay of Mexico, and capable, with equal naval force, to lock up the navigation of that entire region. She holds the same relation to this continent that England holds to Europe—and to the Bay of Mexico, the same position that Gibraltar holds to the Mediterranean; and in the possession of a people equally enterprising, skilful, and powerful, would attempt to exercise over us and our trade the same uncontrolled influence that the greatest maritime nation has for a long time exercised over the rest of the world.

I do not doubt, myself, that into whatever hands it may fall, we shall be at all times competent to defend our trade, and able to maintain in that sea a force sufficient to restrain the power of the most ambitious. Yet, it is true, that a naval force, with a secure and fortified harbor in possession of the island, would operate with advantages which nothing but superiority of force could conquer, and would cost great sacrifices to maintain. This is the point where a naval force could act upon us with the greatest effect. This is our vulnerable point. The occlusion of the gulf would have a powerful influence on the social and political condition of the West. It would result in the ruin of agriculture, and the annihilation of commerce, or in the sacrifice of their independence; and, perhaps, in consequences fatal to the Union. This sentiment is so strongly felt, that any attempt to occupy this position would rouse this country.

But there is reason to believe, at some future day, when war is renewed, that the dominion of this sea, and perhaps this island also, may become a prize to be fought for; that a great naval action may decide the question of power, and that day may not be far distant.

This view of the subject will strikingly illustrate the value of our naval force to the union, independence, and security of our country, which some supposed was required only to protect the commerce of the Atlantic States; but which, to my mind, is equally necessary to the safety and liberty of all. The time is rapidly approaching when our increasing numbers, strength, and means, will place us beyond the reach of danger. But if a competent force could, by any combination in Europe, be collected to close this narrow passage, we should instantly feel the necessity of this private covered way of our own through the peninsula, which would induce the navigation to desert its natural channels—deprive Cuba of her position, and the enemy of his power. It would produce an entire revolution in commerce. The difference of expense alone would give so decided an advantage, that no State could compete with us in that sea; and if the unjust discriminations and unequal regulations of foreign nations render it necessary to countervail their measures, we shall have the means of rendering it effectual.

In fine, whether we take a commercial, political, or military view of this subject, whether in a state of peace or war, whether at present or any future time, we shall be convinced of the advantages it will give, the security it will afford, and the power it will confer.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he did purposely abstain from entering into the merits of this question: he did purposely abstain from entering into the principle, much less into any of the details: he would not even go into one of the least degrees of that principle: but he felt called up by a remark which had been made by a gentleman who had just taken his seat, that this is the first time he had ever heard it questioned, that Congress possesses sovereign and omnipotent power over the Territories of the Union. I am very much afraid, said Mr. R., that the gentleman and myself will be found, in the course of our political journey, to differ, not on this point only, of constitutional law; and I ask his leave to tell him, that not only is the power of Congress, whether Legislative, Executive, or Judicial—of either branch or all combined—and much less of a single branch—not sovereign and omnipotent over the Territories, but that the power of no other free Government under the sun is sovereign and omnipotent anywhere; it is utterly inconsistent and incompatible with the principles of free institutions that a Government should be sovereign and omnipotent. I know, sir, we hear a great deal about the omnipotence of the British Parliament, and, I am afraid, we hear more of it than we rightly understand. In some senses of the term, the British Parliament has been said to be omnipotent, and some of the worshippers at the shrine of power have gone so far as to say, that Parliament can do any thing but change a man into a woman, or e converso; but it is well known to those who have studied the constitutional law of England—it is well known to those who have been conversant with the history of that country, and who have seen its system emerge from the darkness of barbarism and feudalism, to its present state, that there is a great deal that Parliament itself cannot do, although that is an integral and simple Government, totus teres atque rotundus, complete within itself, and not a dependent and limited Government, owing its power entirely to a grant, the voluntary grant, of free, sovereign, and independent States. Now, the idea, that a Government, confessedly instituted for certain purposes, and those principally of exterior relation; a Government that cannot show any power it possesses out of the deed of gift; a Government that has to resort perpetually to the parchment to uphold its capacity to act; a Government which, so far from being self-dependent, rests entirely on the will of its creators;—put a case: suppose the several States refuse to send delegates here, what becomes of your omnipotence?—I say, sir, to suppose such a Government to be sovereign and omnipotent anywhere, is a figure of speech, which I believe rhetoricians call catachresis—but, thank God, I am not a rhetorician. If it were necessary, I could state a great many things which the Congress of the United States, and the President of the United States, cannot do, even in these poor, miserable, abject Territories. They cannot violate the person of a free American. “I am an American citizen;” this is a protection, a panoply that their spears cannot pierce. In regard to those Governments, from the first institution of that of the North-west Territory, down to the last, which I believe was Arkansas, I have held them to be abhorrent to the nature and genius of our institutions. I shall not go into the point, and why? For the same reason that I did not go into the expediency and benefits of this canal. They are Governments proconsular in their very nature, and they are exercised over obscure and remote provinces by a satrap who never forgets that he has been a satrap.

Sir, I did not rise to favor the Senate with a geographical lecture, though, even on the subject of geography, I too have had some shallow spirit of judgment; nor to give a statistical lecture, or a lecture on the subject of commerce, which would come much better from the Chairman of that Committee. I merely rose to state that I am one of those who are so stupid—I said, expressly, not “ineffably stupid”—as to believe that Congress does not possess this power; therefore, all I asked, was the yeas and nays, so as to be able to record my vote. I said, that, after so many years of public life, I was not so much of a Quixote as to run a tilt against a windmill in full operation, with the wind at north-west; but, if I had been disposed to favor the Senate with a geographical lecture, I certainly should not have been able to inform them that either Cuba or Great Britain occupied positions on this or the other continent. I have always been under the deplorable mistake, that both of them were insular; I readily admit that Cuba occupies the same position on this continent that Great Britain does on the other continent; because, neither of them occupy a position on either continent.

With regard to this question of canals, if we must go into the expediency of a canal of some three or four hundred miles, between the Apalachicola and the Mississippi, it will extend through two very large States, and part of another—through the whole breadth of Alabama and Mississippi, and a small part of Louisiana. It is very well known to persons conversant with canals, that it is much easier to dig even through the granite of Scotland, than to make a canal through morasses and quagmires. The difficulties which have been experienced in the construction of the Chesapeake Canal have not been found in the hard ground, but in the nature of the ground of an opposite quality—in the quagmires. We are told of the canal that the Dutch have cut, from the Zuyder Zee to the North Sea. Really, sir, the distance which is in that little narrow strip of land in North Holland, or West Friesland: for it bears both appellations—between the Zuyder Zee and the German Ocean—what is it? If Holland, itself, were put down on this country that we propose to cut through, you would hardly be able to find it; either the Marquis de Maison Rouge’s, or the Baron de Bastrop’s, claim would go very near to cover it. Holland is the country, of all others in the world, the most dense in population, and most abundant in disposable capital and labor, except, and that very lately, this same island, which occupies a position on the continent of Europe; and this country is to be put in competition with the sand-banks, the hammocks, the savannahs, pocosons, and swamps of Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana! How many inhabitants are there to the square mile? What the surplus disposable capital? All this only shows that, when once the fever is up, whether it is for internal improvement, or external operations; for Colombian scrip, or Poyas’s bonds—look to the situation of England now—it will run its course, unless the doctor should cut it off, and the patient with it, by the plentiful administration of the lancet and calomel. What, sir, is this argumentum ab inconvenienti which induces us not to look at the charter of our powers, because it is very convenient for us to have a canal here, or a road there, or a something else elsewhere? I will push it to its legitimate consequence; and, if we must have an appropriation contrary to the constitution; if we must pour out the money of the whole United States for these purposes, because of the position which Cuba occupies on this continent; I say, let us annex Cuba to this country in fact. While you argue from the convenience of the thing, totally forgetting all the great landmarks of the constitution, I am clear that, instead of cutting this canal, we should take Cuba; and there never was a better time for it—let that committee, or some other, bring in a bill for really making Cuba take a position on this continent: To be sure, there are consequences that might ensue; but what are the statesmen, the poor purblind and timid statesmen, who look to consequences? No, sir, your gallant statesman, when once he is mounted on his Rosinante, and fairly in the lists, looks to no consequences but to his own consequence.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, said he designed to have voted for the bill in its original shape, believing, for one, that they had the power to make an appropriation for the object specified in it, though he was not so sanguine as some other gentlemen as to the practicability of this canal. Should the present amendment prevail, however, the bill would assume a new shape. It provided not only for an examination for a route for the canal in Florida, but also for a pretty extensive route for a canal through States. Mr. W. said that it might be that the Congress of the United States, under the constitution, is vested with the power to make such roads and canals; and when he was satisfied that such was the fact, and a fit case presented itself, he should agree to exercise it. While, however, he doubted this power, he could not consent to exercise it, and, therefore, in the shape which the bill would assume if the amendment were agreed to, he could not be amongst those who would vote in favor of its final passage. He should, on this account, be sorry if this amendment was adopted, as he wished to vote for the bill as first introduced.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, rose to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Virginia. He was very unwilling to enter into any discussion with that gentleman; he would reply to the arguments he had used, without taking any notice of the manner in which he had thought proper to treat this subject. Mr. J. regretted much that that gentleman should have thought it necessary, in the discussion of a bill of so much importance, to have changed the customary style of argument in this House, and to make such a display of raillery as he had thought proper to apply in relation to him (Mr. J.) They stood in different relations in this House, and, Mr. J. said, the age and standing of the gentleman from Virginia forbade his taking the same liberties with that gentleman that he had taken with him.

[Mr. RANDOLPH explained. He meant no personal offence to the gentleman from Louisiana. It was his argument only which he had referred to.]

Mr. JOHNSTON proceeded. He had stated that Congress possessed over the Territory of Florida all the powers of rightful legislation, and, on those subjects, her power was omnipotent. Could he be supposed to be so ridiculous as to say that Congress possessed omnipotent power to legislate over Territories?

[Mr. RANDOLPH again rose. If the gentleman had used the expression that Congress possessed all the powers of rightful legislation, he should not have questioned the gentleman's position. He was willing to believe that he intended to say it, and he was also willing so to understand him; but he could assure him, on his word, that if he did mean to express himself so, he had done what he (Mr. R.) had often done—he had not succeeded in so expressing himself. He was not such a caviller as to take him or any other gentleman in this House, in a sense in which he did not mean to be understood.]

Mr. JOHNSTON resumed. He believed he had said that Congress possessed all the rightful subjects of legislation, and that it had complete power over all the subjects of legislation. He did not mean to say that Congress might exercise arbitrary power over the Territories, that they might exercise the power of life and death, or the judicial or executive powers over them. No one could suppose him to be so ignorant as to say so. But, in relation to all the usual powers of legislation, in regard to all the subjects on which legislative bodies usually act, he said they possessed omnipotent power. There was no limitation to the power. The present was a proper subject for legislation, and it was a power which could not be exercised without legislation. This being a subject of legislation, and Congress having all the rightful subjects of legislation within its jurisdiction, it followed they had a right to legislate on this subject. The gentleman from Virginia had cavilled on the phrase, "occupies a position." Mr. J. had said that the island of Cuba occupied a position on this continent, or in relation to this continent, that England occupied in relation to Europe. It was a very common expression. We say a fleet has anchored on our coast; a fleet has taken a position on our coast. It is a common military expression. Great Britain occupies a position, in relation to the continent of Europe, and on the continent of Europe, though not connected with it. All the islands in the Mediterranean are positions on the coast of the Mediterranean, exactly as a fleet anchored in our waters has taken a position on our coast and on our waters.

Mr. HOLMES was in favor of the bill and against the amendment. He had no doubt that Congress has the power to survey this ground for the purpose of making a canal in the Territory, or a right to make it. He believed, however, his friend from Louisiana had defined that power by a figure a little too broad; but he was well satisfied of his meaning, even before he had made the explanation. Congress, Mr. H. said, possessed the same power of legislating over the Territory as it had over the District of Columbia; and it was a legislation over these Territories, subject to the stipulations of the Constitution of the United States. No one would contend that they could regulate the religion of the Territories, nor that they could quarter troops on the inhabitants in time of peace, because it was prohibited by the constitution. They might legislate, subject to the rights of the people of the Territories, but they could not take the property of these individuals, and convert it into this canal, without giving them an equivalent. Whether the attempt to make the Florida canal succeeded, or not, Mr. H. said he was willing to incur almost any expense, if there was a prospect of success. He would do almost any thing to avoid the navigation round the cape, the keys, and reefs of Florida. It is the bane of sailors; it is a Golgotha—a graveyard. He should not think it much of a loss to the United States were the whole Peninsula of Florida sunk into the Gulf of Mexico. He believed it would be a blessing to this country if they could dig it down with shovels and sink it into the deepest place in the gulf. He thought that, within the last half century, it had been the grave of more persons than now inhabit the whole of both Floridas. He considered the present subject as most important in every point of view, whether as regarded the United States, or the mariners; and he would venture almost any thing to avoid this dangerous navigation. Mr. H. said the Western and South-western States were usually very modest in their claims; but they seemed to have adopted the maxim, never to lose any thing for want of asking, and perhaps it was a very good one; but he thought the better maxim was the one they were accustomed to teach their children—(though he did not look on them in that light), if they wanted to get much, to ask for a little at a time. On their tables there was an appropriation bill, which appropriates a small sum for the purpose of surveys. If this doctrine was to be established, first, that they had a right to survey routes for roads and canals, and afterwards that they had a right to make them—a doctrine which he had always combated—yet, if he was to be beaten in that, he agreed with the gentleman from Virginia, that, if they broke open the chest and took out the money—though, Mr. H. said, he protested either against breaking open the chest or giving up the keys—give him his share. A little money is to be applied for this purpose of surveys, and surveys have been made in almost every State and Territory, except in Maine, the Ultima Thule, a place which had been quite disregarded. Mr. H. concluded by saying, if the amendment prevailed, he should be constrained to vote against the bill.

Mr. FINDLAY, of Pennsylvania, said, this bill contemplated nothing more than to make a survey to ascertain the capacity of the country for improvement—a thing which they had been in the practice of doing for several years. Mr. F. was against the proposition, that the United States had the power to make roads and canals through the sovereign States, without their consent; but he did not think they were warranted in drawing the inference that they possessed this power from the circumstance of employing the United States engineers, to ascertain the capacity of the country for improvement. He thought this canal was important to all the States bordering on the Mississippi, and the tributary streams. At present, there is only one market for the sale of their produce; but, if this canal was found to be practicable, they would have a choice of markets; and there would be another advantage to be derived from it—in case an epidemic raged in one place, they might proceed to another. He was, therefore, in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, offered a few remarks in support of the bill and the amendment, both of which he considered of great importance. The gentleman from Maine thought the new States were not remarkable for their modesty, and that, on all occasions, where they could get any thing by asking, they never failed to demand it.

Mr. H. said he had never known that the portion of country which the gentleman came from, was remarkable for its modesty; and, if it was, the gentleman himself was in a fair way to get rid of it: for he had told them he was about to ask for something for his Ultima Thule. Mr. H. said he should not have noticed the remark that fell from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) on his own account: for it was a matter of indifference to him, what that gentleman thought of the persons who had the good or bad fortune to exercise the appointments of Governors of Territories; but it was necessary to defend his constituents. He represented a State, the inhabitants of which understood all the duties, and were alive to all the feelings of freemen, as well as that State which the gentleman himself represented, and for which he (Mr. H.) had the greatest respect. Mr. H. said he had, for twelve years, exercised the power of Satrap, and, he trusted, during that period, he had never forgotten that he was an American citizen; and that they were citizens for whose benefit the power was conferred upon him. There was evidence now in this city to show, that one, at least, of the very respectable States that composed the Territory that he had the honor to govern, had very different feelings on this subject from those which were entertained by the gentleman who had alluded to the subject.

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, thought a few moments' reflection would satisfy the gentleman who had offered the amendment, that it involved a principle different from that which was involved in the bill. When questions agreed in the same principle—if, for instance, it was proposed to act on a single case, there was no reason why you should not embrace others of the same class: but, when it could be shown that an object, which every one agreed was a proper one, would be jeopardized by being connected with another of a different character, then they certainly ought not to be placed together. In the present case, the original proposition was to make a survey through a Territory of the United States, for the purpose of ascertaining whether an object was practicable, which all admitted to be very desirable; and it was now proposed, as an amendment, to make another survey through a Sovereign State, without a provision for the consent of that State, when gentlemen well knew, that there were several individuals on this floor who believed that the power of the General Government extended to the one case and not to the other. Without entering into the argument on the subject, Mr. H. said, it appeared to him that the two subjects ought not to be connected together, because they involve, in the declared opinion of many gentlemen, a different exercise of power. The gentlemen from Tennessee, and from Maine, had both stated this to be their opinion. It would, he therefore thought, be best to finish one subject first. Let us ascertain, by a survey, whether the ship channel could or could not be cut across the Florida Peninsula, over our own territory, and then it would be time enough to proceed further, and inquire whether this additional survey, from the Chattahoochee to the Mississippi, would be necessary, and was fairly within our constitutional powers. He would entreat the friends of this measure not to embarrass it by a proposition differing somewhat in principle, and also in its details.

Before he sat down, Mr. H. said, he would notice a remark that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had made, in speaking of the State he (Mr. H.) had the honor to represent, though not in any terms of which he complained. He had asked, whether South Carolina had received any portions of the favors of the Federal Government, in this respect, and whether some of her roads did not need it? It so happened, Mr. H. said, that he never had, like the gentleman from Virginia, travelled the road to which he alluded; he, therefore, could not say what was its present condition; but he would inform the gentleman that the State of South Carolina, within a few years, had expended nearly two millions of dollars in cutting its own canals, and making its own roads; and if that gentleman should ever honor that State with another visit, and accept of the hospitality of its citizens, he would find the ways open, and in good order, and he would, he hoped, have a pleasant journey. As regarded the favors of the General Government, Mr. H. said, it was true they had received none. Though their harbors had been surveyed with a view to fortify them, the works had not yet been begun. They had never asked for favors, and were not much in the habit of complaining; but, when they did ask, he hoped they would not be refused.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the gentleman from South Carolina had misapprehended him; and it was probable it arose from the clumsiness of his (Mr. R.'s) own expression—a fault to which he was afraid, from the consequences that had followed his addressing this body, he was too much addicted. He did but mean to state that there was a distinction between these questions, taken upon political metaphysics—between the power of Congress within a State, and over a Territory, taken upon political metaphysics—but he was almost sick of political metaphysics. He did not believe that Congress had all the powers within a State, that they had within a Territory; but he did not see the difference between Congress putting their hand into his pocket, for the purpose of cutting a canal in the State of Alabama, which was a Territory yesterday; or in the Territory of Florida, which will be a State to-morrow. Some of the earliest lessons he received in politics, Mr. R. said, were under that great teacher, old Roger Sherman; and another great teacher, the most sagacious man, perhaps, that Virginia ever bred, old George Mason. They always went for the substance of the thing, and not for the shadow. Sherman's rule was, give me the vote, and take the argument. He was for the practice; as the gentleman from Maine said, he was for the money—keeping it within the Treasury of the United States, or in the pockets of its constituents, where it was more safe to lodge it than in any Government under the sun, and from which it was Mr. R.'s belief, it ought to be, by no Government that consults the interest and happiness of the people, ever taken, without real and obvious necessity. In regard to this necessity, in regard to this Scylla and Charybdis, it has been about as much exaggerated, as in the old story that we have read of in our youth, in the blind old man of Scio's Rocky Isle. Go to the insurance offices, and ask what is the insurance against the sea risk, pirates and all? Was it ten per cent.? It was long, Mr. R. said, since he had any thing to do with the Treasury; it was long since he had devoted his mind to statistics—to such minutiae; but he was convinced that insurance of the United States, to no part of the world, even doubling Cape Horn, amounted to ten per cent. A gentleman near me, of commercial experience, says it is from one and a half to two per cent.

Mr. R. said he did expect that, when the gentleman from South Carolina gave him so warm an invitation to his native State, he would have reminded him that the first step in this, as in some other cases, constituted the chief difficulty—he meant from this place to Fredericksburg, the great Serbonian bog between Ocoquan and Chapawamsic. He would only say to the gentleman from South Carolina, that such was the hospitality of his reception, when in that State, that he did not require an invitation to repeat it. The hospitality of South Carolina was proverbial.

Mr. R. was very sorry, that, in the use of ridicule as an argument on this floor, he had fallen under the censure of any member, but he should be permitted to take shelter under a high authority—one of the strong positions on the continent of Literature. As this very high authority had asserted that ridicule was the best weapon by which to cut up great things, a fortiori, it must apply to little ones.

He could not agree, with the gentleman from Maine, that Congress possesses the same power over their other Territories that they possess over the District of Columbia; and why so? Because it was not necessary for him to tell the gentleman from Maine that nullum simile est idem. The Territory of Florida or Arkansas is a Territory, and the Territory or District of Columbia is a Territory; and so far they are alike—as like as Macedon and Monmouth;

there is a river in Macedon, and there is a river Monmouth—so says Fluelen; and there are salmons in both: this was to prove the parallel between Alexander the Great and Harry the Fifth; but in no other respects, but that they are called Territories, is there any similitude, much less identity. Indeed there is not even a similarity—not even in name. What are the words of the constitution? Mr. R. said he was very sorry that this book [holding up the constitution] was so seldom resorted to. It was like the Bible, in which we kept receipts, deeds, &c.: and never looked into it except when we happen to want them; and even then we are so little in the habit of using it, that we forget where they are mislaid. The words of the constitution are these: "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." Here, said Mr. R., was their authority over the District of Columbia; which, adopting the nomenclature of the constitution, was not even a Territory—and now for the authority over the Territories. "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the Territory or other property belonging to the United States." If Congress possesses the same power over the other Territories, Michigan for instance, that it possesses over the District of ten miles square, then Michigan could never become a State—and he should not be very sorry to hear it. Could this ten miles square ever become a State? No, it could not. If it were to become as populous as London, and the district ten miles round London, it never could become a State; it never could have a Representative in the other branch of the Legislature, or two Senators on this floor. It could only have a Delegate, to speak, but not to vote; and he was not quite certain that the constitution would authorize even that. What was the case with Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, &c.? They were under a certain ordinance, which will live forever in the statute book and in history, a monument (he was sorry to say it) of the folly, the infatuation of his parent State. They are, if you please, a Territory over which Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations. Does that sound like omnipotent sovereign authority? But let that pass. But they are in an inchoate condition: they are—as old Lilly hath it, in the future in res—about to become a State. And is it possible? I cannot believe that the authors of this instrument, who were very sagacious men, though their sagacity did not, because it could not—it was not in the nature of things—it is not in the nature of man—that it should extend to the point of seeing how this political machine, when they put it into operation, would work. I cannot believe that they intended, by "needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory," any such monstrous grant as this—that is now claimed for "The Congress." We have had to cobble several parts of it, and we are now tinkering the very same part of it again. Such is political foresight. I hope to be permitted to speak as a plain and unlettered man. I never shall enter into a dispute on the subject of philology as long as I live. I speak in the plain vernacular tongue, level not only to the comprehension of this august assembly, but to that of my constituents, the people, the State of Virginia. Men commence with the control of things—they put events in motion—but after a very little while, events hurry them away, and they are borne along with a swift fatality, that no human sagacity or power can foresee or control. All Governments have worked so, and none more than ours—no man ever supposed that the British constitution, taken theoretically, was to produce the present result; no man ever supposed that the different French constitutions, with their councils of ancients and their councils of youngsters, were to turn out as they had done. A government on paper is one thing—it is such a government as we find here in this book—and a government of practice is another thing—it is such a government as we find here—in this body I mean. The authors of the constitution would never have used separate sets of words to convey one and the same thing. If they had been scriveners from the Inns of Court, and wanted to draw out their parchment to the greatest professional length, though they might have used the set of words applied to the District, they would have used the same set of words applied to the Territory—but you see there are two distinct, and in some regards, discrepant grants of power.

I have learned a lesson to-day (said Mr. R.) which I hope will not be thrown away upon me; that is, hereafter, when I want to record my vote on a question that I conceive to be of consequence in its principles, however regarded by others, not to be betrayed into a discussion, even of that principle, where I know discussion will do no good, or into details, when the details are quite foreign to the matter in hand. I accord my thanks to the Senate for the patience with which they have heard me, and I promise them not very soon to trouble them again.

Mr. HOLMES offered, in reply to Mr. R., a few reasons for the difference between the phraseology of the two clauses, and then said, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. HARRISON,) he did not, when he observed that, from the modesty of his Western brethren, they never lost any thing for want of asking—he did not intend any disrespect to their very respectable Representative. If the people required him, he was obliged to urge their claims. He did not wish to enter into any discussion with the gentleman as to which of the two possessed the most modesty. If they were to agree to renounce their modesty, they would have no difficulty in doing it, and their intimate friends would probably not observe the loss.

Mr. MAOON, of N. C., said, the opinion had been expressed that, while the Territories remain such, it was competent for the Government to make improvements in them; but, suppose improvements begun, and before they are finished, the Territory becomes a State—what is to be the consequence? The moment a Territory becomes a State, the General Government must cease to act, and if it cannot go on, all the money and labor expended may be thrown away. In the work now proposed, Mr. M. said, they ought to have proceeded as in all other similar objects—they ought to have estimates of the cost before they begin the work. As for himself, he did not now, and never did, like these Territorial governments; and, by this course of making improvements in them, it only retards their becoming States: for, when they acquire the requisite population, they will still put it off, until all the improvements they desire are made. One wants a canal, another a road, and when they get all they want, they come into the Union flourishing States, with nothing more to ask.

Mr. M. thought gentlemen in an error when they spoke of ten per cent. being charged for insurance to Cuba; he was under the impression it was never so high as that, and now, he understood it was from one to one and a half per cent., and this includes the dangers of the coast, particularly the two Capes of North Carolina, &c. Mr. M. did not agree with Mr. HOLMES, about sinking this Territory in the Gulf of Mexico; he had rather have the land than so much more water. This Territory of Florida was, by the way, a strange country; sometimes it is very good—no country like it—then, again, it is so worthless it is not worth having, and to be sunk in the sea.

Mr. M. said he did not like to go on in this way—the Government was constantly gaining power by little bits. A wagon road was made under a treaty with an Indian tribe, twenty odd years ago; and now it becomes a great national object, to be kept up by large appropriations. We thus go on by degrees, step by step, until we get almost unlimited power. Little things were often of great importance in their consequences. The Revolution in this country was produced by a trifling tax on tea. There were five or six different ways found out of getting power—by construction, by treaty, by implication, &c. He was not willing to take any of them. He was willing to execute the constitution just as it was understood by those who made it, and no other.

Mr. M. concluded by saying, there were constant applications before Congress for these objects; yet nothing was more clear to him than that, if they could be executed with profit, they would be done by private enterprise, and that it was only when the case was different that Congress was appealed to.

Mr. BRANCH, of N. C., did not wish to detain the Senate any further than to assign the reason for giving the vote which he should give. He considered the Territory of Florida as the property of the United States; it was an infant State, and he considered it as the bounden duty of Congress to foster and cherish this property, and to lead it to a state of maturity as speedily as possible. They must nurse the Territories; they were constrained to do this as regarded their natural offspring, and they were under the same necessity as regarded the Territories, which would hereafter become States. The unappropriated lands in the Territory of Florida belong to the United States, and whatever was bestowed for the work in contemplation would be amply repaid, at a period not very remote, by the enhanced value of the lands which would there be brought into market. Mr. B. perfectly coincided with the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. WHITE,)—doubting of the constitutional right of the United States to cut roads and canals through the States, he had hitherto abstained from exercising it; but as regarded the Territory, the objection did not seem to exist. Mr. B. said he should, on all grand questions, feel himself at liberty to vote for every measure that had a tendency to advance the general weal, and should feel himself bound to support the interest of the State he represented, so far as he could do it consistently with a conscientious discharge of his duties. This was the course he should pursue, and he knew the people at home too well to believe that they would not sustain him in it.

Mr. HENDRICKS offered some further remarks in support of the amendment. It only proposed to do that which was doing every day, and which the Engineers were even now employed in doing, between this place and New Orleans. It had been suggested to him, since this discussion had commenced, to withdraw the amendment, and that the Secretary of War would have power to order this survey. This, Mr. H. contended, was a strange circumstance; that the Secretary of War should have the power to do that which this House doubted its constitutional power to authorize. Amongst the several maps and charts with which the committee had been furnished, there was one which tended to show that, of the survey alluded to, the greater part had already been made, under the authority of the War Department, probably for ascertaining suitable sites for fortifications. He thought that they had so far progressed, and had so often adopted this principle, that he could not have expected that any objection would have been made on constitutional grounds, to the section before them; but these objections having been made, if they were to meet them on every proposition that was made, they might as well meet them on this question as on any other. He should, therefore, be disinclined to accede to the wish of those who wished the amendment to be withdrawn, even if he had the power.

Mr. MACON said that, whether he voted liberally or not liberally, he would willingly leave it to his constituents to decide on his votes. The fact was, in regard to the anticipated augmentation of the value of lands, in consequence of making the canal in the Territory, that the highest lands ever sold by the Government were sold where there was no improvement, not even a road—he meant (so he was understood) Madison county, in Alabama. As to voting the public money liberally, Mr. M. said he wished to see every thing saved that could be saved, to meet those sixteen millions of the public debt which fell due this year. The Secretary of the Treasury had said we must borrow to meet it. Mr. M. thought it best to husband our resources, and pay off as much as we could, and satisfy everybody that there is a prospect of paying the debt off. He repeated, he did not think it was necessary to expend money in the Territory in this way, to advance the value of the lands. He had no doubt the land would sell as fast as the Indian title was extinguished. It was the country where sugar and other valuable articles would be produced, and the bounty on sugar would make the lands sell fast enough.

Mr. BRANCH said he had ever yielded to the force of the arguments of his worthy colleague, and to his long-tryed experience, and he should examine well the ground on which he stood, before he ventured to differ from him. He took it a little unkind in his colleague to put the construction he had done on the remarks he had made to the Senate. He should have considered the different grounds on which they stood; a patriotic devotion of thirty years to his country had placed him (Mr. M.) firmly in the confidence of his friends at home. Mr. B. said, no man ever paid more respect to his talents and real worth than he did, and he did not wish to contrast any course he should deem it his duty to pursue, with the course of his honorable colleague. He appreciated his motives; he venerated the man; but his conscience told him he must pursue a course, on this occasion, which differed from that of his honorable colleague. His friend, in the course of the remarks he had made to the Senate, had alluded to the vote given yesterday in relation to authorizing the opening a road from Tennessee to Mississippi; and he did vote for that appropriation: for, not only had Congress the right to make this appropriation for a road through the Indian country, acquired by treaty, before it came into the Union, but it was an obligation on the General Government to complete the work it had commenced, and he had therefore voted for it.

Mr. MACON protested that he meant no improper reference to his colleague, in the few remarks he had made. He never entertained a thought that any one was to be influenced by the opinions of another. He was very sorry that his colleague had misunderstood him.

Mr. ROWAN, of Kentucky, said, that, so far as related to the disbursement of money, he was one of the liberals. He was not one of those who thought it a blessing to have an overflowing Treasury. Whenever there was more money in the Treasury than sufficed to meet the current expenses of the Government, it belonged to the people, and it ought to be distributed amongst them to swell the tide of industry. The survey proposed by the bill, as related to the Territory, he conceived to be a very important measure; and he had no doubt as to the powers of the United States to expend the money within the Territory; but, so far as he was at present informed, he was of opinion, with those who contend that the Government has not the power, without the consent of the States, to expend their money on the soil of the State. The territory of the State belongs to the State as a sovereign State; and was a sovereign State to talk about being the object of a favor? Was a sovereign State to demand a favor, and receive it in the shape of a favor? Was it consistent with the sovereign character so to do? The very term implied component power, wealth, and every thing that was necessary for the existence of a State. The wealth of a State, whether of the United States or of an individual State, in his opinion, did not depend on the surplus millions in the Treasury, but exists always in the muscles, and enterprise, and hardihood of its citizens; and this is a source that could be drawn on for every reasonable purpose, and at all times when the wisdom of the State chose to make the draft. He considered an appeal to the United States, by a State, in the shape of a favor, as a renunciation of its sovereign character. He was one of those who believed not only that things influence terms, but that terms influence things; and when they used the language of dependence, they would prepare the temper of the people for the reception of the thing; and in this discussion, and all such discussions, he wished terms to be excluded that were incompatible with the intrinsic meaning of the substance to which they are applied. In inquiring into the power of the State, he did not look into the constitution to find what powers were conferred; he looked into it to see what powers were denied—what the people have denied to themselves. Every thing is subject to their will, and the constitution is but the delineation of the manner in which this will is to be exercised, in what we call the Government: and what is not fairly denied to the State, exists by the social compact.

In the General Government, they were, Mr. R. said, to look into the constitution for all the powers they possessed—there was no such power given in the constitution; and he believed, with deference to the opinion entertained, that, to convey the exercise of such a power, was incompatible with what was the acknowledged power of the States. There was no power given to expend money in roads and canals in the States; there was no such power specifically given to the United States; and when once it was settled in this House that power could be derived to this Government by construction, you have discovered the means by which the whole power of a State might be frittered down and annihilated. Construction is a thing of inconceivable dilation. But without going into political metaphysics, there was one aspect of the case which should present itself on all such questions. We are apt to say, this Government has power, and that Government has power; and the general phraseology seems to import, that this Government has a double sovereignty—the sovereignty of the United States, and the sovereignty of the State. Mr. R. thought there was but one sovereign in America, and that is the people; the public will is the sovereign power; and there are two sovereign machines—one for external purposes, and one for internal purposes. The people within a State are sovereign, and that State is limited by the restraints imposed in their own constitution, and by the power conceded to the General Government. Imposed by themselves, in their own constitution, or in the constitution of the General Government, their will is the power, where these restrictions are not found. When we hold any communion with foreign powers, we put on this armor—we use the machinery of the United States Government for this purpose; and with that machine is connected the different State agents. The governing power is not inherent in the Legislature of a State or nation; but they are machines through which the real governing power, the will of the people, operates. They are their agents. As to the Territory, then, they must either govern themselves, or they must look to some other quarter for government, or they must have none. They do not govern themselves, and the constitution has provided they shall be governed by the sovereign will of the people, as displayed in the national machinery, by this General Government.

As regarded this improvement in the Territory, Mr. R. said, it must always be a question of expediency; and believing it to be so, he was prepared to vote, and not only prepared, but he was eager to vote, to further the objects of that part of the bill which relates to the Territory of Florida. But he could not, consistently with his present impressions, vote for that part which relates to the States of Mississippi, &c. If the amendment prevailed, he should vote against the bill; and he thought it would have been most expedient, in many points of view, not to have brought forward this question, so far as it relates to the States in connection with the question, so far as it relates to the Territory.

Mr. KANE, of Illinois, said, this was a question he never had an opportunity of hearing discussed in Congress before; and he should not now rise to say one word, but for the intimation that there was no doubt but this question could be carried by a sufficient number of votes, connected with the further intimation, that most of the speaking on this subject had been made by those who expressed doubts on the constitutional question. He did not see that the constitutional question raised here, was essentially connected with the object of the bill. There was nothing in the word road or canal, which, ex vi termini, imported an object of internal improvement. Was a canal, proposed to be cut across the Isthmus of Florida, an object of internal improvement? Did not all the reasoning that had been employed on this subject, go to show, that its object was to protect commerce? And the bill, as proposed to be amended, had in view the further object of the further protection of commerce, by opening a communication to the Mississippi River. The amendment proposed to appropriate a certain sum to make an examination; and when that examination shall have been made, if the report should go to show that the object of this canal was only for the purpose of internal improvement, then would be the time to raise this objection. But, if the report went to show that the further object was to accomplish the protection of the commerce of the United States, then this question could not arise. If it went to show that it would be an immense saving to the Treasury of the Nation, and, moreover, afford protection to a greater degree than would be afforded to the commerce of the United States by cutting a canal, than by building a fort, he would ask why the constitutional question should, in that case, necessarily arise? He merely wished to give his reasons why he should vote for the amendment proposed by the committee. He viewed the object of the bill as no more unconstitutional than those laws which provide for the survey of our own coast. Suppose the engineers had reported, that the best way of protecting the commerce of North Carolina, was by cutting a canal along the coast, would gentlemen say this canal was not to be cut, because canals are used as the means of facilitating internal commerce only? He thought not.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, did not intend to have said a word in the discussion of this subject, if he were not placed in a situation that required him to explain his reasons for the vote he should give. He was as much opposed to the violation of the principles of the constitution, as any man on this floor; and, in regard to those constructive powers, so dangerous to the liberties of the country, and to the rights of the people of the sovereign States, he should be the last man to attempt to exercise the power under such construction. But he thought the constitution had nothing to do with the subject now under discussion. Where was there any violation of State rights in authorizing the Government to make this survey? Did they not do it every day, under an express appropriation, year after year, without any of those fears about the constitution? If the Government of the United States had not the power of employing the Engineer Corps, to examine the state of the coast, with a view to fortify the harbors, rivers, &c., to facilitate the commerce of the country, what, he asked, were the powers of the General Government? He should vote in favor of this amendment, under the impression that it was right and proper that the Government should be informed of the advantages which would result from making this communication, by the examination of enlightened men; and when the proposition was brought forward to make an appropriation to open any canal, within the limits of a State, the assent of that State not being obtained, he should vote against it.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division.

MONDAY, February 27.

Death of Senator Gaillard, President pro tem. of the Senate.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock, and, after the Journal had been read—

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, rose, and said: It becomes, Mr. President, my melancholy duty to announce to this House, that my respected colleague, the FATHER OF THE SENATE, is no more. After a faithful and uninterrupted service in this body, of more than twenty-one years, he has fallen, in the fulness of his honors, and in the midst of his usefulness. Though he had lived to see almost every friend who had entered with him into public life (and all with whom he served were his friends) successively retiring from the busy scene, or swept from the stage of existence—though he had for many years found himself the oldest Member of the Senate, yet he had not much passed the meridian of life, and we might have flattered ourselves with the hope that a long course of honor and usefulness was still before him. Mr. GAILLARD took his seat in the Senate on the 31st of January, 1805, and it is perhaps the highest tribute we could possibly pay to his memory to state, that he was four times successively re-elected to his high trust, and retained to his last hour the confidence of his fellow-citizens. In 1810, (when he had been but five years a Member,) Mr. GAILLARD was elected PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE of the Senate, to which office he was nine times most honorably chosen, having for a period of fourteen years, presided over the deliberations of this Assembly. I am sensible that it is not admissible, on an occasion like the present, to indulge myself in a studied eulogium on the virtues of our departed friend; and I deeply regret that the office of touching briefly on his character, had not fallen to the lot of one who could have spoken from long experience, and in the eloquent language of an early and well-tried friendship. My personal acquaintance with my late colleague was comparatively of recent date. Since I have served with him, however, in this House, the mutual exchange of kind offices has never been, for a moment, interrupted, even by those unhappy differences of opinion which plant thorns in the path of the politician, and often estrange the dearest friends. Judging of his past course by what I have myself witnessed, and by the concurring testimony of his associates, I will not be accused of doing more than simple justice to the memory of our friend, when I say, that, during a term of service altogether unexampled in this body, he conciliated universal esteem and confidence. In his private intercourse with the Members, his mildness and urbanity won all hearts. In fulfilling his duties as a Senator, the solidity of his judgment and his dignified and unostentatious deportment, elicited the esteem and commanded the respect of his associates. But it was in the performance of the high duties of the PRESIDING OFFICER of the Senate, (which he discharged for a longer period than has fallen to the lot of any other man,) that the conspicuous traits of his character were most fully developed. The ease and fidelity with which he fulfilled these duties,—always arduous, and often of the most difficult and delicate nature—his perfect command of temper—exemplary patience—strict impartiality, and clear discernment—have never been surpassed, and seldom equalled. Whatever might be the state of his health, no labor was too great for his industry, no privation too severe for his patience. So thorough was his acquaintance with Parliamentary forms, and especially with the practice of this House, and such was the confidence reposed in his justice, that his opinion on all questions of order was considered as a binding authority. Though Mr. GAILLARD was not in the habit of engaging in debate, yet, when it became necessary for him to explain the grounds of his decision, or to shed the lights of his experience on questions before the Senate, no man could express himself with more simplicity, perspicuity, or force. I know not how better to sum up the merits of the deceased, than in the words of my venerable friend, (Mr. MAON, whose eulogy is no common praise,) and who lately declared "that Mr. GAILLARD was designed by nature to preside over such an assembly as this"—thus assigning to him, as his appropriate sphere, a station of no common dignity, and duties of a most exalted nature. Such was the man whose loss we are this day called upon to deplore. On this occasion it becomes us to mourn; and I know that, in paying the highest honors to his memory, we are giving utterance to the feelings of every Member of the Senate, by whom the recollection of the virtues of our deceased brother will be long and fondly cherished.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, then rose, and said: the honorable gentleman from South Carolina has spoken of the character and services of his late distinguished colleague, in a manner highly creditable to the feelings of his heart. The facts he has stated have already become a portion of the history of this country. The services of his late colleague are to be found in almost every page of our statute books and our records, for the last twenty years. There are other facts, however, connected with his character, for which his memory will be more cherished by his intimate friends, than even for his public services. His urbanity, his uniform mildness of deportment in his intercourse with his associates in this body, and while presiding over our councils, we have all witnessed; but the innate goodness of his heart could only be known to those with whom he lived on terms of intimacy. It has been my good fortune, said Mr. D., to be associated with him, as an inmate in the same families, for the last seven sessions of Congress—in which time, I have never observed the least approach to harshness or severity towards those with whom he associated, or the slightest departure from those rules, by which gentlemen ought to be governed, in their intercourse with each other; but, on the contrary, the most undeviating observance of the forms and customs of politeness, which give to social intercourse its greatest charm. For such a character, I could not but be inspired with sentiments of the most unfeigned attachment and respect. His society I have courted when he was in health—when in sickness, I have endeavored to soothe his moments of languor and distress; and I watched, with the most painful solicitude, the last ebbs of a life thus endeared to me. In the death of this distinguished individual, the country has lost an able and faithful servant—and I have lost a most valued friend—and I trust, that, while mourning over the loss of the public, I have the indulgence of the Senate in thus deploring my own.

Mr. DICKERSON then offered the following resolutions, which were successively and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the honorable JOHN GAILLARD, deceased, which will take place at eleven o'clock, to-morrow morning; that the Senate will attend the same, and that notice of this event be given to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable JOHN GAILLARD, deceased, their late associate, will go into mourning for him for one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape round the left arm.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the honorable JOHN GAILLARD, the Senate do now adjourn.

The committee of arrangements, appointed in pursuance of the first resolution, were Messrs. HOLMES, BERRIEN, RUGGLES, VAN DYKE, and FINDLAY.

TUESDAY, February 28.

This being the day appointed for the funeral of the Honorable JOHN GAILLARD, a member of this body, no legislative business was transacted.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Negro Slavery in South America.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Va. rose, and said he wished to do what was with him a very unusual thing—not only to make a motion, but to make one asking information from the Executive branch of this Government. He had seen a proclamation purporting to have been issued by the celebrated General BOLIVAR. He had learned—and he had learned with satisfaction, as far as regarded the fame and reputation of that distinguished individual—that that proclamation had been disclaimed by the consular authority here as a fabrication; at least a fabrication so far as it related to that particular part of the proclamation which had attracted his attention. Mr. R. said he was glad of it; but although, said he, that proclamation may be a fabrication—and no doubt it is so—it is as unquestionably true as that proclamation is false, that the principles contained in that proclamation are the avowed principles of the renowned individual to whom I refer; they are the avowed principles of the Governments over which he exercises almost unbounded sway; they are the avowed principles of the people composing those States—if States they may be called which States are none—and therefore it is, said Mr. R., that I wish for some official information,—not to satisfy myself—not to delay any business that is, or may be, before the Senate; I do not wish to wait for it; but official information that may satisfy the American people as to the true character of those States.

It is well known, said Mr. R., that in his public message to Congress, the President of the United States has intimated to us, and to the world, through us, that an invitation of a certain character has been given to him, and that in consequence, ministers will be sent to the Congress about to be assembled at Panama. He hoped that the Ministers, whoever they might be, would be of that character and description who would labor under none of the odious and exploded prejudices, which revolted and repelled the fastidious Southern man from Africans—from associating as equals with them, or with people of African descent—that they may take their seat in Congress at Panama, beside the native African, their American descendants, the mixed breeds, the Indians, and the half breeds, without any offence or scandal at so motley a mixture. Mr. R. believed it was well understood as to the State—not the State in which the Congress is to be held, but in the immediate vicinity of the province where this Congress is to assemble—Guatemala—he believed it was considered as much a black Republic at this time as Hayti itself. There is, said Mr. R., a great deal of African blood in old Spain—in the south of Spain—though not all negro blood—from the opposite coast of Barbary. There is a further deterioration—if a deterioration it be—in the Creole Spaniards, in all the Spanish and Portuguese possessions, but above all in Guatemala, the immediate adjacent province to Panama, and in Brazil. Now these things, said Mr. R., which are of no sort of importance to some people, are of vital importance to that district and description of country, and not altogether contemptible, whether in point of extent or numbers, not quite unworthy of being taken into consideration in the deliberations and decisions of this body, and of the Federal Government. He would not detain the Senate farther than to suggest, that he had heard that this great man—he had no doubt he was a great man—a good man—there were a great many such great and good men—LAFAYETTE was one of them—at the commencement of the French Revolution—would not hear of any parley at all with what they called the imprescriptible rights of man; they played the whole game, they would not hear of qualification, and we see what this desperate game has eventuated in—extremes always beget one another. This General Bolivar, called the South American Washington—as every man, said Mr. R., nowadays, who has commanded a platoon, is a Caesar or a Hannibal, a Eumenes or Sertorius at least—so he is the South American Washington. I remember, sir, that when the old Earl of Bedford, when he was consoled with by a hypocrite, who wished in fact to wound his feelings, on the murder of his son Lord Russel, indignantly replied that he would not exchange his dead son for the living son of any man on earth. So I, Mr. President, would not give our dead Washington for any living Washington, or any Washington that is likely to live in your time, Mr. President, or mine; whatever may be the blessings reserved for mankind in the womb of time. I do know—the world knows—that the principle of the American Revolution, and the principle that is now at work in the peninsula of South America and in Guatemala and New Spain, are principles as opposite as light and darkness—principles as opposite as a manly and rational liberty is opposed to the frantic orgies of the French Bacchanals of the Revolution, as opposite as a manly and rational piety is opposed to that politico-religious fanaticism, which, I am sorry to see, is not at work only in the peninsula of South America and New Spain, but has pervaded, or is pervading, all this country, and has insinuated itself wherever it can, to the disturbance of the public peace, the loosening of the keystone of this constitution, and the undermining the foundation on which the arch of our Union rests. No, sir; they are as different as light and darkness—as common sense and practice differ from the visionary theories of moonstruck lunatics.

Negro Slavery in South America.

The Message of the President is before the world. The President of the United States has told us that he will act, and that he has the power. Let him—let him act—let him act on his own responsibility; but let the American people—and especially that part of the American people—that portion of them who reside south of the Ohio, and south of Mason and Dixon's line—know what are the deputies whom hereafter we are likely to receive in return from them, in character and color to our Congress—that is what I want to see. I want this to open their eyes—I want, instead of public opinion reacting on us from uninformed public bodies, however respectable; from toasts given at public dinners, however respectable the guests; a Holy Alliance of liberty in opposition to a Holy Alliance of tyrants—I want the good sense of the people of the United States to be informed as to the fact; having the most perfect reliance on their decision when they shall have the facts, and having a disposition to submit most implicitly to that decision, whether it shall agree with my opinions or not: From these causes, I move that the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the Executive, touching the principles and practice of the Spanish American States, or any of them, late colonies of old Spain, in regard to negro slavery—I will submit the motion in writing.

Mr. RANDOLPH again rose, and said he wished to supply an omission in the remarks he had made. It is, said he, generally of public notoriety, that the island of Cuba has been in a state of alarm from a threatened invasion from these Spanish American States; and that the chief cause of that alarm arises from the principles of those States in reference to this very question. Cuba, possessing an immense negro population, which has been increased since the destruction of St. Domingo, incalculably, by importation, as well as by natural means—Cuba lies in such a position, in reference to the United States, and especially to the whole country on the Gulf of Mexico, as that the country may be invaded from Cuba in row-boats; and, in case those States should invade Cuba at all, it is unquestionable that this invasion will be made with this principle—this genius of universal emancipation—this sweeping anathema against the white population, in front; and then, sir, what is the situation of the Southern States? I throw out these only by way of hints; it would not be decorous, in a preface to a resolution, to enter into an elaborate argument, which I could do. This is one of those cases in which the suggestions of instinct are worth all the logic in the world—the instinct of self-preservation. It is one of those cases in which our passions instruct our reason. I shall not consider whether the President of the United States will send these Ministers or not—he says he will do it, and he is generally understood to be a man of his word—at least, as much so as to do what he has officially said he will do. But I must consider how far I feel disposed, by my vote, to pledge Virginia in the common cause of States possessing these principles—and to place our neutrality at the disposal of a belligerent Congress.

Mr. R. then gave notice that he should respectfully ask for the consideration of the resolution to-morrow morning.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, from the Select Committee, to which was referred the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, with respect to the appointment of Senators and Representatives to offices under the Federal Government, made an argumentative report on the subject, of considerable length, and, it may be added, of much ability, concluding with proposing the passage of the following joint resolution, on the principle of which, the report states, the committee was unanimous :

Resolved, &c., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of said constitution :

"No Senator or Representative shall be appointed to any civil office, place, or emolument, under the authority of the United States, until the expiration of the Presidential term in which such person shall have served as a Senator or Representative."

The report and resolution having been read—

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, inquired whether the committee had not agreed to recommend that the exclusion from office should apply not only to the time for which each Senator and Representative should be elected, but to one year thereafter?

Mr. BENTON replied, that the committee had not agreed on the precise terms of the resolution, but only on points—on the substance, not on the form. On the principle reported, the committee were unanimous.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he liked the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey, and not the less, said he, because it agrees with one of high authority, Horace, who says, "Nemo prematur in anno."

The resolution was then, on the motion of Mr. BENTON, read the second time, and made the special order of the day for next Monday week; and, on the motion of Mr. HOLMES, 1,500 copies of the report and resolution were ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, March 2.

Negro Slavery in South America.

The Senate took up for consideration the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. RANDOLPH :

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the Senate such information as may be in the possession of the Executive, touching the principles and practice of the Spanish American States, or any of them, late colonies of old Spain, in regard to Negro slavery."

The resolution having been read, and the question being on its adoption—

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, said he had listened with great attention, and certainly with much interest, to the eloquent remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) yesterday, on the principles and policy of the new States of South America, in relation to the slave question. It was a subject on which no one, coming from the part of the country which he represented, could possibly be indifferent. The gentleman from Virginia had given us a clear, and, doubtless, a very accurate statement of the principles of these new States. Mr. H. believed, that the facts connected with this subject were notorious, and were as well known to the Senate now, as they could be from any communication the Executive could make in answer to the call proposed in the gentleman's resolution. Whether the Proclamation, attributed to the LIBERATOR, was genuine or not, this House and this nation are not now to be informed that the new Republics were marching under the banner of universal emancipation. Mr. H. was, therefore, induced to doubt the necessity of calling on the President for information which was already in their possession. Certainly such a call ought not to be made, unless there was some reason to believe that it would furnish us with some facts with which we are not already acquainted. Mr. H. said he did not rise to oppose the resolution, but merely to suggest the propriety of postponing the consideration of it for a few days, in order to give time for further deliberation as to the necessity of acting upon it. Having some doubts on that point, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would not object to the postponement of the resolution to Monday next, which Mr. H. moved accordingly.

Mr. RANDOLPH then rose, and said, I had certainly not intended to have said one word more on the subject of this resolution, in case it should not meet with opposition; and, as a matter of courtesy, certainly should acquiesce in the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, if there was any probability of getting the motion taken up on a day fixed for the proposed amendment of the constitution. But, at the same time, I hope that gentleman will pardon me for saying that the fate of my resolution reminds me of a very favorite old Spanish proverb of mine—for, although I am not very much smitten, or inoculated with the Spanish American fever, yet, the old Spanish proverbs are great and deserved favorites of mine, being perhaps the most pithy and pungent in the world; it is this—save me from my friends, and I will take care of my enemies.

I did not apprehend, said Mr. R., that any gentleman here would have raised any opposition to this resolution. Sir, this session is drawing to a close, I hope: for it will very soon be time to plant corn. Under existing circumstances, I wish this resolution to be acted on now: therefore, though it is no very great time from this to Monday, yet, as that day is assigned to a special order on the amendment of the constitution, I cannot consent—and I hope the gentleman will pardon me in saying so—I cannot consent, by my vote, to the postponement—deeming it equivalent to a rejection of the motion—though, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to decide against me, I shall submit to it, as I always do to the majority, I hope with decency—but without the slightest change in my opinion—as to the expediency of the course proposed.

Sir, said Mr. R., I can say with a sincerity of heart that no man can question the truth of, that it is a matter to me of mortification and distress, that I have had so often, of late, imposed upon me, as I conceive, (whether truly or falsely,) the duty of throwing myself on the attention of this body. It has not been my habit elsewhere; it has not been my habit of late years more especially—indeed, I have understood, since I took my seat in this body, that an imputation of a contrary nature—that I should be here an inactive member, a slothful public servant—was feared by some, even of my friends, and was the strongest amongst the objections of those candid adversaries, who damn with faint praise—to my being here at all; and while I disclaim that motive, it is possible that I may be unconsciously actuated by it. But, sir, under the circumstances in which I stand—in the place in which I stand—[Mr. R. was standing in Mr. TAZEWELL's place, who is absent on account of family sickness]—in the situation in which the State of Virginia is placed by the absence of my associate—and in which I am happy to say she is placing and has placed herself in array—in array against this Government—no, sir, not this Government, but the mal-administration of it—it is under these circumstances that I have been, as I conceive, bound in duty to offer my, perhaps, crude conceptions—but which have been as well concocted as long and patient thought could digest them—to the attention of this body. I know, sir, that the habit of frequently addressing this, or any other legislative body, but this body more especially—has a tendency to cheapen far greater talents than any that I possess, or ever laid claim to, and to impair the value even of the greatest abilities. I know, sir, that, in this body, which is in itself a Congress, consisting of deputies from sovereign and independent States, co-ordinate and co-equal; where the least is equally on a footing with the greatest—where a State, which sends but one member to the other House, is on a footing with one that sends forty, and on a footing there, too, under certain contingencies foreseen and provided for by the constitution, that, for any individual member too frequently to obtrude himself on its attention, is fatal not only to any little reputation that he may have happened to acquire in the course of his public life, but—what is of far more consequence—to his capacity to be useful to the power that sent him here. It is a wise and salutary jealousy on the part of the Senate. I know, sir, that this is a body, above all others, in which they “shall not be heard for their much speaking;” in which “vain repetitions” do as little good as we know they will do in another place; and yet, sir, circumstanced as I am, I am compelled not only to break through that rule of propriety, which otherwise would restrain me, but to be guilty sometimes of those very “vain repetitions” also. May I hope to be pardoned for this, not only in consideration of the peculiarity of my situation—of my condition—but in consideration of a defect—whether of nature or of education, it is perfectly immaterial—perhaps proceeding from both—a defect which has disabled me, from my first entrance into public life, to the present day, to make what is called a regular speech—which, sir, like some other regular things, although constructed according to every rule of criticism, is sometimes extremely dull—not always convincing. There is no positive fault in the speech, or composition; the unities are all preserved—there is no fault to be found with it, but as to its general effect, which is a want of effect altogether. Sir, although I give to the subjects submitted to the Senate the most patient consideration; though I turn them, and re-turn them, over and over again, in my mind, yet when I come to utter the results of that rumination, I am compelled to do so as an irregular—rather as a partisan officer, than according to the regular art military; as an improvisatore—that I believe is the name which the Italians give to those who speak, not without much previous thinking, indeed, but without the book, or even without notes. Sir, in respect to these regular arguments, it has often struck me that they resemble, in more regards than one, the modern invention of a chain bridge—which, provided the abutments and fixtures are perfectly strong, and provided there is no defective link in the whole chain—are amongst the finest and most useful specimens of human ingenuity: but, sir, when we reverse the proposition—when the abutments are not sufficient—and there is one single link which is defective—one is as good—as bad, rather, as a thousand—that one is fatal to the whole structure, and souse down into the water comes the unwary passenger, who trusts himself to the treacherous edifice. There are artists, indeed—and some of them not far off either—who have the skill to elaborate those technical regular arguments of induction with such exquisite finish as to defy the eye, or even the touch of any man alive; but, while they puzzle and confound the understanding, they can never convince it, because they lead us to such monstrous and frightful conclusions, that no fair exercise of that reasoning faculty which has been given us by our Maker for our guide, can bring a plain man to. Here is a case, in which, if it be not safe to reason to conclusions, which perhaps is too much my habit; it is quite safe to reason from conclusions. Whenever any chain of reasoning, however learned and ingenious it may be, leads to conclusions so monstrous as to offend the common sense of mankind, I say that, although you may not be able to detect in which link of the argument the defect is, yet you know, from the results to which it carries you, that it is radically defective—that there is a something somewhere about it, although neither your eye nor your touch can detect it, that renders it radically defective and unworthy of trust; and if I were called on for an illustration, I could give it, and would give it, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, in the case of Cohens against the State of Virginia.

Sir, I know there are gentlemen, not only from the Northern, but from the Southern States, who think that this unhappy question—for such it is—of negro slavery—which the constitution has vainly attempted to blink, by not using the term—should never be brought into public notice, more especially into that of Congress, and most especially, here. Sir, with every due respect for the gentlemen who think so, I differ from them, toto celo. Sir, it is a thing which cannot be hid—it is not a dry rot that you can cover with the carpet, until the house tumbles about your ears—you might as well try to hide a volcano, in full operation—it cannot be hid—it is a cancer in your face, and must be treated secundum artem; it must not be tampered with by quacks, who never saw the disease or the patient, and prescribe across the Atlantic; it must be, if you will, let alone; but on this very principle of letting it alone, it is that I have brought in my resolution. I am willing to play what is called child's play—let me alone, and I will let you alone; let my resolution alone, and I will say nothing in support of it: for there is a want of sense in saying any thing in support of a resolution that nobody opposes. Sir, will the Senate pardon my repeating the words of a great man, which cannot be too often repeated? A small danger menacing an inestimable object, is of more importance, in the eyes of a wise man, than the greatest danger which can possibly threaten an object of minor consequence. The question before us is, is this an object of inestimable consequence? I do not put the question to you, sir. I know what your answer will be. I know what will be the answer of every husband, father, son, and brother, throughout the Southern States; I know that on this depends the honor of every matron and maiden—of every matron (wife, or widow) between the Ohio and the Gulf of Mexico: I know that upon it depends the life's blood of the little ones, which are lying in their cradles, in happy ignorance of what is passing around them; and not the white ones only: for shall not we too kill—shall we not re-act the scenes which were acted in Guatemala, and elsewhere, except, I hope, with far different success; for if, with a superiority, in point of numbers, as well as of intelligence and courage, we should suffer ourselves to be, as there, vanquished—we should deserve to have negroes for our taskmasters, and for the husbands of our wives. This, then, is the inestimable object which the gentleman from Carolina views in the same light that I do, and that you do too, sir, and to which every Southern bosom responds: a chord, which, when touched, even by the most delicate hand, vibrates to the heart of every man in our country. I wish I could maintain, with truth, that it came within the other predicament—that it was a small danger—but it is a great danger—it is a danger that has increased, is increasing, and must be diminished, or it must come to its regular catastrophe.

Mr. President, within the last thirty years, or thereabouts—for I have been contemporary with the facts—a total change has taken place in public opinion, in Great Britain—which always acts as possessing a common language and almost a literature and laws in common, she must and she ought to act with great force on us—and in certain other parts of other countries, which I shall not now designate, in reference to this question. There was a time, sir, when the advocates for the abolition of the slave trade found, in almost every bosom possessing common humanity, and common sense, a friend. There were some few, to be sure, old veteran Swiss of State, who, upholding all administrations, and all abuses and corruptions, had gone more than knee-deep in corruption—followers perhaps of Dundas, fellows of old George Rose, pledged five fathom deep in corruption—who still upheld that abomination. There were some few, indeed, of a very different description. From my early childhood, all my feelings and instincts were in opposition to slavery in every shape; to the subjugation of one man's will to that of another; and from the time that I read Clarkson's celebrated pamphlet, I was, I am afraid, as mad—as Clarkson himself. I read myself into this madness, as I have read myself into some agricultural improvements; but, as with these last I worked myself out of them, so also I worked myself out of it. At the time, sir, that the abolition of the slave trade was made piracy, and we had as good a right to make it treason, if the constitution had not already defined treason—for it is as much treason as it is piracy—did I say as good a right?—I say you have the right—it has been settled by practice here at least already—you can define treason by law—for what is the constitution, opposed to the established practice under it? what is the old version to this, which is only one of the new readings longe emendatior, of the old edition of the constitution? You have, in a time of profound peace, suspended the privilege of the writ habeas corpus—the personal-security-act—so far as a bill passed by the Senate could do it. I do not often agree with William Cobbett, but I wish it had this name of personal-security-act, that the people might understand its real meaning and importance better than they seemed to do, when they gave their confidence to them that proposed and supported that suspension, in the teeth of an express constitutional prohibition. Then, the society was got up, of which I was a most unworthy member; but, so far from keeping the faith, I have become a backslider; and whether I have left the society, or the society has left me, I cannot tell, and do not care. I had not much faith in it from the beginning; but I thought it a very desirable thing, and still think it to be a very desirable thing, to get rid of the free negroes and colored people of this country, on the principle, and with the view of promoting the quiet, safety, and happiness, of the slaves themselves, as well as of their masters at home. "It is a vile bird"—and I shall not do any thing to disparage the nest, although it be no longer mine. Without meaning to say a word, at this time, against this society; as an experiment, I must say it has failed; and, so far as it has done any thing, it has done mischief instead of good.

Negro Slavery in South America.

As regards the principles of those who were the first promoters of the abolition of the slave trade—I don't say it of this society—I am borne out by the facts when I assert that they have held, and yet hold, perhaps I ought to say, endeavor to hold, a language esoteric, and a language exoteric—one language for the novice, and a language for the initiated: or, to speak in terms more familiar to us, a language official, and a language confidential. They affected to have nothing in view but the abolition of the slave trade. Sir, they had another object—they had an object in view, which now they have the courage to declare, for which they have very lately united themselves into an anti-slavery society—they have given no small impulse, if not the first impulse, to this black "ball of Spanish American Revolution." It is they who have done it—it is they who have been the fosterers of Hayti: for I could name illustrious names that are laboring under delusion as strong as that which led away the French Convention, when they thought they were establishing liberty, equality, and fraternity, on a foundation slippery and red with human blood and judicial murder. I will name, I must name Wilberforce—I will name master Stephen, the celebrated author of "War in Disguise," and "The Dangers of the Country"—Macaulay, the principal conductor of the "Christian Observer." I do not mean to include all of that numerous and respectable body of men, who generally think and act with them, as equally intemperate; because I know that some, and believe that others, of those who associated with them, in religious opinions, who do not see, or seeing do not approve, the rash ulterior measures of these well-meaning, but misled men; amongst them I would name, if I dared to do it, the venerable President of the English Bible Society.

Sir, the same great authority whom I before quoted, lays it down as a principle, that, when men are furiously and fanatically fond of any object, of any set of opinions whatever, they will sacrifice to that fanatical attachment, their own property, their own peace, their own lives, and (he adds) can there be a doubt that they would prefer it to the peace of their country? Will the love, then, of another country, of Jamaica, or the Southern States, be a consideration strong enough to induce them to halt—to pause? Fanaticism, political or religious, has no stopping-place short of Heaven—or of Hell. All history upholds me in this. What were the crusades? I speak it in sober sadness—they were, in my opinion, as regarded their object, incomparably more worthy, more desirable, in the object, more wise in the means taken to attain it, than this modern black crusade. What did they fight for? For the sepulchre of the Redeemer of an otherwise undone world. It was a noble object, however mistaken the principle. But what were they fighting for? For a hewn stone, if it yet existed, which had belonged to a rich and pious Jew of Arimathea—for they knew—they believed—they said they did, and no doubt they were sincere—but they did not recollect that it was not a place of human sepulture—that the body, never subjected to the animal law, was gone—that the incarnate part also had ascended to its Father that is in Heaven. They might as well have got up a crusade for the manger in which the lowly infant had lain in its swaddling clothes; still here was a sentiment, something elevating and ennobling, that the heart is better for having felt; and whose blood did they seek to shed when they poured out their own like water in this cause? That of the Saracens—of infidels—of Mahounds and Termagants—who were painted in the same colors by the priesthood and fanatics of that day, that the Pharisees and fanatics of this day, paint every man in, whose misfortune, or whose good fortune it is, to be master of slaves. Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, that the affections of these men whom I have named, are more strongly riveted upon the French African descendants of Hayti—on the negroes of Jamaica and Sierra Leone—than they are not only on us unfortunate Southrons—than they are on their own fellow-subjects of Jamaica—and I verily believe of Old England also, of Lancashire or Yorkshire. There was once a time, sir, when a ministerial member had the indiscretion—no minister can always stop the mouth of an indiscreet friend—to say—it was during the Prussian war, which consisted of the battle of Jena—that Hanover ought to be as dear to England as Hampshire; I suppose for the sake of the alliteration. I do believe that I should not be far wrong in saying—I know that to a great portion of these misled men, the black population of the West Indies and the Africans of this country, are dearer than their English fellow-subjects: and why so? I judge them partly by their language which I have heard—not in private—but in Freemason's Hall—in London—with an applauding auditory of thousands—but chiefly by their acts, which never lie. I have heard as pious, as good a man, apparently, as ever lived—I believe—I don't know it—he had every characteristic of a good man and pious Christian, except this mania—setting this aside, he was all that could be wished, and in this he manifested that there was no guile in him—he is an officer in the British army—I could have had him cashiered—say that, in case of a revolt in the island of Jamaica, he should feel himself compelled to take part with the blacks, as the oppressed party. I say that is a general sentiment throughout Old England—I say Old England—I wish it may not extend anywhere else—I hope it does not. One thing it behooves me to say—one act of justice it behooves me to do—and I trust I shall never refuse justice to any man—up to this time, the conduct of the President of the United States—I mean prior to his becoming President of the United States—has been such as no Southern man could take exception to, in this behalf, at least—I restrict my admission to that. I will go farther in saying, that this body has already shown, that it possesses the will, as well as the power—which I trust it will exercise on more than that occasion—of resisting influence within, and clamor from without—I speak in reference to the Treaty on the subject of the Slave Trade and the Right of Search. Sir, the Senate have acquitted themselves like men, like Senators, like conscript fathers; I hope, as I believe, that they will never acquit themselves otherwise—“Be just, and fear not.”

And now, sir, one word. I will readily agree that, if the gentleman from South Carolina had made the motion to amend, I would have accepted his modification with great pleasure, if it had been to this effect—to inquire officially what proportion the black, the sambo, the mulatto, and the mestizo population, and the proportion that the Indians, the mixed, and the half-breeds, of that race, bear, respectively, in those States, to what is called the white population—for a great deal of it, although not the major part, is white population, whether Creoles or natives of Old Spain. This is an important thing to be taken into consideration. If, therefore, the Senate will indulge me in not postponing my resolution, I will so modify it as to obtain the thing by the best authority accessible to us.

Sir, I said yesterday, that I was very glad to find that this Proclamation of General Bolivar was denied by the consular authority here. I said so on the information of a gentleman, whose information on such subjects I very much respect, and of whose accuracy, in this instance, I entertain no doubt; but when I said so, I did not mean to say, that the disavowal by the consular authority would satisfy me, when there was a regular diplomatic envoy from that court at our court. I would follow the good rule of courts that I am more conversant with—not to take a worse proof when a better was within my reach; therefore I shall wait with patience, and trust (whether this resolution shall pass or be rejected) that the President will be enabled to inform this body that the proper Spanish American Minister—I don't know his name or designation; I never saw one of them in my life—has disavowed this Proclamation. That he can disavow the principles, which, I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, are of general notoriety, is impossible. But, sir, there is a wide difference between invading another country, with this proclamation of negro emancipation in the van, and setting the slaves of that country to cutting their masters' throats—by way of making allies of them—by way of effectually invading and conquering the country—and doing with them in your own country whatever you please, however wild and mischievous—and, indeed, wicked—it may be. If the State of Virginia was, in a moment of frenzy, to pass an act of general and immediate emancipation—that would be one thing. If the State of Virginia—supposing the control of this Government to be out of the way—should go on a crusade into the Carolinas with these principles before them, and the negroes behind them, it would be doing a very different thing. It is, therefore, of importance to us to know, officially, if we can, whether these provinces mean to make use of this instrument of revolution and conquest, as the French Convention made use of their weapons, their liberté, égalité, fraternité, against the rest of the world. It is of the utmost importance that we should know it officially, although it be a matter of notorious alarm to Cuba, as I said yesterday. Cuba has labored under this apprehension, not without cause, and has taken means to guard against it.

There is another circumstance to be taken into our estimate of danger, whether on this quarter or on that of our neutrality, and that is, the present condition of these former colonies of Spain—these South American States—whether it be specific and neutral, like our own, or, as it notoriously is, belligerent. Have they not armies on foot, and navies afloat, and does this count for nothing in the calculation of wise men and statesmen, as to what they may do, or we may suffer from powers so circumstanced? Are we to consider and treat with a country as if in time of peace, and with its armor thrown off? Are we to consider what she even says, then, in the same light that we would consider it in, when she is bristled with steel, armed cap-a-pie for war? The two cases are very different—whereas they are belligerent, the United States are pacific—every thing is on the peace establishment—our armor thrown aside, and our attitude that of the most amiable and enviable repose. The United States are, moreover, not only what every peaceable people ought to be—neutral; but they have a treaty of amity with Spain; they have a positive stipulation with Spain to do no un-neutral act. Does this, or does it not, affect the question? It does. It affects the question vitally, as affecting the capacity, as well as the disposition, to act without breach of neutral duty and of faith, express as well as implied. How long is it since our neutral rights ceased to be dear to us? Do they not imply neutral duties? How long since the faith of the United States has become so cheap? The warlike attitude and armor of these beligerents will, with every man of sober sense, enter into the calculation of their means of enforcing their principles of universal emancipation upon us, through the instrumentality of an invasion and servile war of insurrection in Cuba—for, sir, a wise man will disregard threats coming from a quarter which has no capacity to enforce them; they indicate only a silly malignity, that is best treated with contempt. Any man who should be blockhead enough now to say, that he would take the President of the United States out of his palace in the dead of night, and put him into a boat, and take him down the Potomac, and ship him off to a foreign country, would be taken for a moon-struck madman. Yet he who is said to have once uttered that threat, passed for a man of very uncommon abilities. But this, sir, is a threat which the parties have not only the capacity, as well as the disposition, but the peculiar capacity to carry into execution; and shall we stand idle? Shall we sit still, like those Roman Senators who had no other resource, Mr. President, until the Gauls shall come into this room, and after offering indignity to our persons, finish the tragedy with our blood? No, sir; we are not brought to that point—the capitol is untouched; the sentinels, it is to be hoped, are vigilant; the God Terminus has not gone back—yes, sir, he has gone back—he has given way, and, at the very point, too, of weakness; and he who is now considered to be the right arm of this administration, was the loudest and fiercest denouncer of that retrograde movement, and of the councils under which it was made. I speak of the cession on the south-west; I speak of Texas, of the cession adjacent to the country known to us as New Mexico; of the cession of the Upper Red River; of the cession of the Gates, of the Keys of New Orleans; and shall Louisiana support this, whether it be the man or the measure? I hope not. Yes, sir; they have the capacity and they have the will; and, unless we take some steps to arrest it, the evil must come home to your bosom, to mine; and we must then do what all other people do under like circumstances, never fail to do, or perish: for, sir, when things get to extremes, the ink and parchment fail. It will signify very little what my notions, or yours, or any other man's notions may be, of the powers of the Federal Government or the rights of the States, because, according to the exigence of the case, we shall act for our self-preservation: “for, as self-preservation is in individuals the first law of nature, so it is with societies.” The Southern States will look to their safety as States and as individuals, whatever the ink and sheepskin may say, or be made to say; whatever Congress may decree.

Negro Slavery in South America.

[SENATE.]

If, said Mr. R., I were, what I am not—an acute philologist—I should sometimes amuse myself with the manner in which words slip from their original meanings, and come to purport something very different from what anybody ever attached to them when they first came into use: the word sophist (a wise man) got so much into disrepute, that philosopher (a lover of wisdom) had to supply its place; the word libertine meant what a liberal means now; that is, a man attached to enlarged and free principles—a votary of liberty; but the libertines made so ill a use of their principles, that the word has come (even since the days of Shakspeare) to be taken in a bad sense; and liberal will share the same fate, I fear, if it contracts this black alliance. There are some other words, such as principle, “conscience,” which are also in great danger. But I am coming to a word which is in the mouth of every man in this country every day, and all day long—it is Congress. Why, sir, although this body, this Senate, be indeed, in some sense, a Congress of deputies from sovereign States, yet—the constitution to the contrary notwithstanding—for if there is any thing that I find in the constitution itself which I deem not to be true, I shall not scruple to deny it—or in any bill of rights, or declaratory act, or anywhere else—always excepting the Bible—because I do not believe that there is any thing in that book that is not true—not meaning, however, to make a confession of my faith—this word Congress was properly applied to the deputies first assembled at Albany, to bring about a closer colonial union, and afterwards at Philadelphia, to create a Confederacy that might enable us to carry on the war with more effect against the common enemy. At first, she was not the common enemy—we did not so consider her, or call her—we did, indeed, call her our unkind mother, but we professed the most dutiful love for her, and only asked to be treated on the footing of her other children. We distinguished between her and the unworthy hands to which she had committed her authority—but avowed that, if she would deny us the rights which we claimed as British subjects, as her legitimate children, of voting away our own money; would insist and persist to do what we suffer every day to be done here—plunge her hands into our pockets ad libitum con amore, da capo, for purposes utterly foreign to our interests—we should be driven, however reluctantly, to resist her injustice.

This was a Congress—its object was the formation of a new Confederacy, and the name is endeared to every man of the good old thirteen States of America, and is deservedly dear to them and to the shoots, the scions that have sprung from them—the other States; and what are the other States? They are bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. This word Congress, sir, was deservedly dear to the American people: for out of it grew their Confederation and their Independence; and when the new constitution was made, the framers of it were men well enough versed in human nature to know that words were things, and they called the new project the Congress of the United States of America. It is a Congress by force of the constitution, but, to all intents and purposes, it is not a Congress according to the meaning of the word in the English language. What, then, is it? It is a convention, or legislature, like another proposed Congress for a confederacy. Suppose that, during the late war, every State in the Union had sent a deputation, as Mr. Jefferson had said—to "the Hartford Nation"—it would have been a Congress, such as we are now invited to. Suppose, now, under the constitution, a convention, to be got up to amend the constitution, according to its provisions in article five, will it not be what the constitution declares it to be—a convention—a coming together of States for particular purposes? Now, sir, in reference to that on which my resolution bears: suppose that, during the last war, France, or any other neutral power—France was not a neutral power—any neutral power, if such could have been found—had sent deputies to our Congress at Hartford, for purposes certainly not of embarrassing, much less endangering, the Union, but of giving force and effect—such I understood to have been the avowed motive of that meeting—to the war—could they have shown authority from their Governments for so doing? would they not have partaken of your belligerent nature and character? I go further, and say, that, in a Congress of States, it is a very strange sort of bargain that the Congress should be constituted by deputies from each of its States, and that we twenty-four States should be represented by deputies only from the aggregate body of States. If we are to go, let us go, the Representatives of all the States; let each of our States be represented as well as their States; and why not? This is the fact—they, as a Spanish American Confederation, are one body politic; we, as a North American Confederacy, are another. Who ever heard of a Congress of Ministers from two Governments? No, sir, I should as soon expect to hear of a concert of two instruments; we might have a duet; but who ever heard of a Congress where there were only two parties? We have a treaty with Great Britain that makes special provision for an umpire to decide in certain cases of difference. Our umpire is dead—he does not sleep, he is dead—and his death will constitute to any man who can and will look before as well as after—who is not engrossed with the present—and that with his own advancement—a consideration that will make him pause before he does any thing that might influence, directly or indirectly, the peace, the safety, the neutrality, of these United States, which, under the new circumstances in which the world is about to be placed, we shall find it no easy matter to preserve without any foreign entanglements.

Mr. Fox was a statesman; he was not only an orator, confessedly the first debater that the world ever saw, but a statesman. I am one of those who think that this world has been much injured by Parliamentary eloquence; by a false notion, that ability of this sort is a necessary qualification for Government; and England to her dying day—if she ever does die—will repent her of the dialectics of Mr. Pitt. He was admirably qualified for a Professor of Rhetoric; he would have filled that chair well at Cambridge—I do not mean Cantabrigiæ Nov-Anglorum, but Cambridge in Old England—but as a Minister, his great measures all failed. He was, indeed, a most expert gladiator on the floor of Parliament—a good Palinurus in smooth water—but he, too, must be a soldier, and from that day, as to his measures, they every one failed; and his friend and admirer, Mr. Windham, assigns their failure in justification of his vote of a refusal to grant him the honor of a public funeral—for there, and everywhere but here, a public funeral counts for something as it ought to do—on the ground that public funerals and monuments should never be erected except to eminently successful statesmen, generals, or admirals, not to the defeated—and the public funeral and the monument of Pitt, Mr. Windham, with his manly independence and sagacity of character, was unwilling to pay for—(he did not grudge the money—that was another consideration—he voted to pay the debts of Pitt)—and that funeral and monument voted to the defeated statesman—the monument to the pilot that did not weather the storm—was the forerunner of the monument voted to General Pakenham for his glorious attack on New Orleans. This is the way to render that cheap and worthless, which is above all price; that which indeed may well be called the cheap defence of nations.

Mr. Fox said, speaking of the history of James the Second and Charles the Second, that of all Governments in the world, restorations were the worst: he applied it to the restoration of the House of Stuart, not against the consent of the people—but by general acclamation, which soon led to as general a vote of expulsion, of that misguided, unteachable, bigot race. The House of Bourbon, restored by foreign bayonets, forced upon France against the wishes of a large majority of her people, was not then an example to which the illustrious historian could have referred—a yet stronger proof of the truth and sagacity of that wonderful man. There is, said Mr. R., another restoration of another illustrious house—I push the parallel no further—by what means it has been brought back upon us, I shall not now stop to inquire, though in my heart and conscience I believe the sceptre having been clutched, this is the last four years of the Administration of the father, renewed in the person of the son. I am not afraid of the re-enactment of the sedition law—no, not at all. One of our diplomatists said, in Paris, I think, speaking of their Protean vexations of our commerce, that the mode only, not the measure, was changed—so it is here—for old federalism, we have ultra federalism—I do not speak in the future, but in the plus quam perfectum, in the preterpluperfect tense.

But, sir, I shall be told, perhaps, that there is only a nominal war between Spain and these belligerents—that there is nothing else—a war of name—and that Spain is unable any longer to wag a finger—to use a familiar phrase—or any thing but her tongue in the contest. If that be the condition of Spain, by what arguments can kingcraft and priestcraft be prevailed on to renounce this nominal claim, which will, like some others, keep cold until the chapter of accidents may realize it. Did Philip the Second ever recognize the independence of the Dutch, the illustrious ancestors of my friend [Mr. VAN BUREN] on my left, when that independence was more firmly established than his own? No, sir—Spain is made of sterner stuff. Truce after truce was patched up without any such recognition—and they were the united Provinces, and so remained till the French gave the coup de grace by the true fraternal hug. What, sir, was the condition of the war between England and France a little while ago—one not having a ship at sea, except a few frigates, which she employed in burning our ships in a friendly way, so as to induce us to join in making a diversion in aid of her crusade against Moscow—from which I hope we shall take warning: for that attempt was not only plausible, but promised success—was quite practicable, compared with the crusade to which I have alluded—and England had not a man, at the time I speak of, after the battle of Jena, in arms on her side, on the continent of Europe—not one man; and there they stood, a complete non-conductor interposed between them, except the United States, who received the blows of both!

But, though that war was for a long time little else but a suspension of arms, from the inability of each to attack on the other's element—was it nominal—was it war like a peace, or even a peace like a war, as was said of Amiens? Oh, no—old England had nailed the colors to the mast; she had determined to go down rather than give up the ship. She wisely saw no safety for her in what might be called a peace; and it was a glorious determination: and it is that spirit—it is not thews, muscle—though I have the greatest respect for the authority of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROWAN)—it is not brawn, it is that spirit which gives life to every nation—that spirit which carries a man, however feeble, through conflicts with giants, compared to him in point of strength, honorably, triumphantly. Sir, I consider the late conflict between England and France—England against the congregated continent of Europe—to say nothing of any other make-weights in the scale—confident against a world in arms—as far surpassing, in sublimity of example, the tenaciousness of purpose of Rome during the second Punic war, as that surpasses any of our famous Indian wars and expeditions. It is a lesson of the constancy of the human mind, which ought never to be thrown away; and I have sometimes been inclined to believe that it has done that nation more good than—I know I make a dangerous admission—than the debt accumulated by the war has done her harm. But when we look at her present condition under the operation of that system, I think we shall pause, as she might have done, before we take any measures that may lead to a suspension of specie payments, to the dissolution of all law, and of all morals; to that state of things which places the honest man not merely on a footing with the dishonest, but far below him.

But, sir, perhaps I may be told, that in case I do not accede to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, the answer is very plain and triumphant to my resolution. That the principles of these South American States are the principles that were of high authority on another great question—the Missouri question—are the principles of the Declaration of Independence. What more will you have, what more can you ask? What resource have you now left? Sir, my only objection is, that these principles, pushed to their extreme consequences—that all men are born free and equal—I can never assent to, for the best of all reasons, because it is not true; and as I cannot agree to the intrinsic meaning of the word Congress, though sanctioned by the Constitution of the United States, so neither can I agree to a falsehood, and a most pernicious falsehood, even though I find it in the Declaration of Independence, which has been set up, on the Missouri and other questions, as paramount to the constitution. I say pernicious falsehood—it must be, if true, self-evident: for it is incapable of demonstration; and there are thousands and tens of thousands of them that mislead the great vulgar as well as the small. There are some in bald Latin, such as principia non homines—principles not men—that sounds quite antithetical and quaint, and is quite taking with some folks—but what are principles without men, any more than men without principles? and how can you tell the principles of the man until you are shown the man of the principles? But this and such like conceits are given over and again in toasts and sentiments, until the people at last come to believe that there is something in them besides a clinch of words. What would be said to a proposition just about as true and sensible as this principia non homines, announced in these words: “Love, not women”—worth just as much as your principles, not men. There is another, which, taken from a different source, I shall speak of as I trust I shall always feel, with reverence—I mean faith without works, as the means of salvation. All these great positions, that all men are born equally free, and faith without works, are in a certain sense, in which they are hardly ever received by the multitude, true; but in another sense, in which they are almost invariably received by nineteen out of twenty, they are false and pernicious. I hope I am understood, sir. The principles, to be sure, are what make the man; but you must see the man, to be a judge of his principles; you must know the man; it is not his making a profession of faith, political or religious—you must know his conduct—thistles do not produce figs; so, sir, it is impossible that weak, wicked, or bad public counsels can proceed from a man of good public principles: So is it as it regards works and faith: there is no question in the minds of nineteen out of twenty Christians, that it is the faith and not the works that they are to be indebted to—and they are in fact so far right; but then they forget that the works constitute the only competent evidence of faith; and that with a bad life there is no true faith; yet Christians go on tearing one another to pieces about these things, and yet may find, if they will but take the trouble to consider, that they have been all along beating the air and disputing about terms, except such as are strict predestinarians and such as believe in works of supererogation—that they can buy a place in heaven, and spare a little to a friend to help him in his purchase. In regard to this principle, that all are born free and equal, if there is an animal on earth to which it does not apply—that is not born free, it is man—he is born in a state of the most abject want, and a state of perfect helplessness and ignorance, which is the foundation of the connubial tie. I have heard it lamented elsewhere, that the complainant was born to infancy; but that is only the common lot of all men, except the first man; and I believe the schoolmen were as well employed in disputing, as Hudibras tells us they were in his day, whether any signs of the Umbilicus were found about Adam, as they have been in disputing this nice distinction, without a difference in practice, of faith without works. I have heard it lamented by the same person that he was born to indigence, but none of us bring any thing more into the world (not even the breath of our nostrils) than we carry out of it—and as to ignorance, Locke says that we bring no innate ideas with us into the world; it is true, but man is born with certain capacities—which assume the impression, that may be given by education and circumstances; but the mathematician and the astronomer, who of all men on earth are the most unsafe in affairs of government and common life—who should say that all the soil in the world is equally rich, the first-rate land in Kentucky and the Highlands of Scotland, because the superficial content of the acre is the same, would be just as right, as he who should maintain the absolute equality of man in virtue of his birth. The rickety and scrofulous little wretch that first sees the light in a work-house, or in a brothel, and who feels the effects of alcohol before the effects of vital air, is not equal in any respect to the ruddy offspring of the honest yeoman; nay, I will go further, and say that a prince, provided he is no better born than blood royal will make him, is not equal to the healthy son of a peasant.

We know that this constitution is a constitution of compromise, of compact, between States. It is a compact between States, which acknowledges the rights of the master over his negro slave, in terms, to be sure, somewhat squeamish as to words. I may be told that the word is not in the constitution. I care not a farthing whether the word is in the constitution or not; not only the existence of negro slavery, but the slave trade itself, for a limited time, was secured under the panoply of the constitution—and thousands were brought, under that guarantee, into the ports of Charleston and Savannah, and sold as slaves, and their progeny will be slaves ad indefinitum, unless the States of Georgia and South Carolina shall, in their sovereign capacities, choose to decree the contrary. Did South Carolina stickle for the trade in slaves, as she had a right to do, and with the aid of Connecticut especially, carry her point until 1808; and were the Southern men so ineffably stupid as to take no security for their slaves already here, or that might be brought in under the "first clause of the 9th section of the 1st article" of the constitution, which was unalterable, even by the mode prescribed by the constitution in other cases, until that time? And even if they had been so unguarded, what would the casus omnis prove but that, the constitution being silent, Congress have no power over the subject? If these things are not recognized by the book, let me put a case, and it is a question for the court below.* Nothing too hard for them. Supposing that an African should sue for his liberty—where? in the federal court; why—is he a citizen? No. Is he an alien? No. Is he of a different State from his master? No; nothing of all this; but is it not "a case arising under the constitution?" Will not the Supreme Court clutch it—can they refuse jurisdiction? Is there a man on that bench who for one instant—I am putting a supposititious case—a case being brought in the last resort to that tribunal—is there a judge there or anywhere else, who would, for one instant, listen to counsel, who should rely upon the Declaration of Independence, or any other fanfaronade of abstractions, as paramount law—paramount to the constitution itself? The language I have applied to it is strong, but who can be cold in such a cause?

If, said Mr. R., I make use, in the heat of debate, of any improper expression, I beg pardon of the Senate. I have long thought that I could discern, even in that paper [the Declaration of Independence] rather more of the professor of a university than the language of an old statesman; what I have discerned in other State papers I shall not now say. But I will now, with the liberty of the Senate, relieve them from my tedious talk, by reading an authority from this book [taking up a volume of Burke's works] which is pat to my purpose. It is on the subject of any man of sense suffering himself to be led away from the case before him, to travel out of the record of common sense, into the mazes of abstraction.

"I never govern myself—no rational man ever did govern himself by abstractions and universals. I do not put abstract ideas wholly out of any question, because I well know that, under that name, I should dismiss principles; and that, without the guide and light of sound, well-understood principles, all reasoning in politics, as in every thing else, would be only a confused jumble of particular facts and details, without the means of drawing out any sort of theoretical or practical conclusion. The statesman differs from the professor of a university—the latter has only the general view of society, the former (the statesman) has a number of circumstances to combine with those general ideas, and to take into his consideration. Circumstances are infinite, are infinitely combined—are variable and transient; he who does not take them into consideration, is not erroneous, but stark mad—dat operam ut cum rationes insaniat—he is metaphysically mad. A statesman, never losing sight of principles, is to be guided by circumstances; and, judging contrary to the exigencies of the moment, he may ruin his country forever." But, said Mr. R., how is it with the professor? In the next edition of his book, or in the refutation of his adversary, all the mischief that he has done may be undone and corrected. But when this same professor becomes a statesman? If you want to know the effect of his metaphysical madness, look to the history of the French Revolution, and the undoing of the country—look to the history of such men as Condorcet and Brissot, and Mirabeau—men of good intentions, of learning, and genius—not that I count Mirabeau among the good men of that Revolution: but Lafayette was one of them. What was the consequence of this not stopping to parley with the imprescriptible rights of man, in the abstract? It is that they have now full leisure to meditate on the imprescriptible rights of their king in the concrete; that is the result of devotedness to abstract politics—of their management—look at it in Hayti and everywhere—I would say, if I was not afraid of being considered as treating this subject too lightly, which lies heavy on my heart—look at the famous academy of Lagado, and you will have a pretty fair specimen of a country governed by mathematicians and star-gazers, from light-houses in the sky. It is mournful while it is ludicrous. I have seen men who could not write a book, or even make a speech—men who could not even spell this famous word Congress—(they spelled it with a K)—who had more practical sense and were more trustworthy, as statesmen, or generals, than any mathematician, any naturalist, or any literati, under the sun.

Sir, as a natural death is preferable to a death superinduced by the lavish use of chemical and mineral poisons—so, in my humble judgment, at least, a natural fool is preferable to a fool secundum artem—he is the least dangerous animal of the two—at least, not having been deeply cultivated, like other shallow soils, what little mother-wit is in him is not turned up by some new patent plough, and buried beneath the sand, never to give birth to vegetation more; whereas, the over-educated fool never dreams that, with all his learning and acquirements, he is but a greater fool than ever. We, of the cotton country, sir, know that deep cultivation is fatal to shallow soils. Some of these wise men have discovered that a whale is not a fish, but we have not, therefore, altered the phraseology of the laws relating to the whale fishery, because one of our cognocenti has found out that a whale is no fish at all, and has not, as far as I know, told us what to call it; and the hardy seamen of Marblehead and Cape Ann, who have stood by us, and by whom I will stand, no wiser than the Congress, for all their schooling, will persist in talking of their good or bad fishing, and of their having taken so many fish.

Sir, we have a military school, and we are to have a naval school—I should not like to see the experiment tried—but, sir, it would be a good subject for a bet, (not that a bet is a proper subject to be named here,) but it would be a good thing—I would take some rough Massachusetts or Nantucket, or Maine and Sagadahock, or a New Hampshire seaman—such a man as Isaac Hull, and pit him against any man coming from a naval academy. If we had an army of cadets, if they came across such a man as Jackson, or Morgan, or such self-taught men, their diagrams at West Point would stand them in little stead in time of action. We must at last come down from our stilts—we must agree to be what the fathers of the constitution, the pater patriæ, made us to be, the good old United States, courting the arts of peace, minding our own business, and not interfering with that of others, or with alliances, holy or unholy, Greek or barbarian; above all, not departing, under the idea of a foreign mission, of sending to England or France, or to the Congress of Verona, ministers to change our whole policy, and perhaps our very form of government—departing, fundamentally, from the principles of the constitution. The manner in which any change is to be made in our articles of union and confederation, is already provided for in the constitution itself—in article fifth. The constitution has provided that, whenever these confederated States shall see cause to use them—means by which this instrument shall be changed, always saving, until 1808, the clause securing the slave trade and capitation tax from any alteration until that time. If we choose to go into common alliance with the South American States, or with the State of Hayti, or the States of Barbary—(Algiers, too, is a Republic)—we have a right to do it—the States, and the people of the States, are not in pupillage—they are sui juris—they have a right to become parties to the Holy Alliance to-morrow; but how? agreeably to the provisions of this little book, if they please—but they do not please; and, above all, they will not please—they will not please to have that change made, not according to the rules established by themselves, but by the sic volo, the sic jubeo, the stat pro ratione voluntas, of any man, however high in office, by the instrumentality, and under the color of fitting out a foreign mission for any Congress or Confederacy on the face of the earth. There is a regular constitutional mode in which these things are properly to be done; there is a regular constitutional mode by which, if you please, every negro in the United States may be set free; because the Southern States have, each for herself, the right if they please; but they don't please; and they as little please to do it by a law of their own making, as to have it done by measures that tend to a fundamental change in the original compact between them as States; by going into joint stock companies with any other States whatever, except such as we may choose to create out of our own territory—out of that which was part of the good old United States, or out of the territory which the United States have acquired by treaty with foreign powers.

Sir, said Mr. R., if, in the course of the very tedious and desultory remarks—more tedious even to me than they appear to have been to the Senate—which I have submitted, I may have let drop any unwary or unfounded expression in reference to any individual, particularly any trans-Atlantic individual, I hope to be permitted to take the full benefit of all the qualifications which a man of honor never fails voluntarily to give to any rash or harsh expression, dropped in heat of blood, however founded in fact, and which he is particularly anxious always to give to men who are emphatically men of peace. I must be permitted to say, that there exists, in the nature of man, ab ovo, ab origine, of degraded and fallen man—for the first-born was a murderer—a disposition to escape from our own proper duties, to undertake the duties of somebody, or anybody else. There exists a disposition, not to do as our good old Catechism teaches us to do—to fulfil our duty in that station to which it has pleased God to call us. No, sir; it is obsolete and worm-eaten—we must insist upon going to take upon ourselves the situation and office of some one else, to which it has not pleased God to call us—of the Hindoos and the Otahaitan; of anybody or any thing but our own proper business and families; and these very amiable—for such they are—these very pious men—for such I believe them to be—I don't mean all of that connection—but I mean the men whom I particularly have named or indicated—are led away by this self-delusion, aided by the influence of the moral atmosphere of London, which no man can breathe with impunity—men of abstraction and visionary character more especially. Let me be understood—the physical atmosphere of London is of such a nature—the physical excitement is so great—the wonders, the stir, the bustle, the objects continually changing before the eyes—the pulse of life is so habitually stimulated—that the best-bred physicians have agreed that the diseases which imperiously require depletion in the country, will not bear that practice in town—that it cannot be safely followed in London. You might as well attempt to deplete a habitual sot, whose pulse, once got down, not even brandy will get up again; a man accustomed to the preternatural stimulus—I have stated, as to deplete a Londoner, who is accustomed to the stimulus of the excitement of the atmosphere. But there is a moral atmosphere too in London—there is not a place on the face of the earth, where there is so much public spirit—so much active benevolence—where there is so much munificence, and so much is given away in charity. I speak not of the gross amount, but in proportion to her wealth, overgrown and enormous as it is. I believe, with the author of this book [Burke], that the spires of her charities avert from her the lightning of Heaven, which her depravity would otherwise call down. There is a moral atmosphere—there is hardly a man of note, who does not belong to some society—like our Colonization Society, and like that, it is a theatre for display, like other theatres. They go there to praise one another to their faces, in a manner that I had no conception of then. But the example has not been lost upon us. They are all of one opinion; a set of resolutions are drawn up which nobody is expected to oppose. It would be unheard-of to do so, and reckoned indecent to do so. All is out and dried—like what is called here a caveau, why, I could never tell.

No one thinks it worth while to oppose them, for it would be labor lost—speeches are made, cheerings follow, and clapping and thundering applause—such as is seen in our theatres, and might well shake the nerves of such as are not used to it—such overweening praises are given. And these men are in the habit of imbibing so much and such refined as well as gross adulation, that they cannot live out of the atmosphere of London. The fine ladies, of course, have the vapors upon the abstraction of this stimulus—this moral stimulus of the atmosphere of London is necessary to their existence. I can only suppose them—these good men—subject to the infirmities of our nature, and falling under the temptation to which they are peculiarly exposed. The theatre of their glory was the slave trade—now it is the abolition of slavery everywhere; at every risk of consequences, to which they are stone-blind. If they would only be content to let the man alone—if they would not insist upon plastering him an inch thick with mercurial ointment, and I know not what active poisons without, and filling him to the throat with calomel and jalap, within, he will, may be, get well; or at best, he can but die a natural death—probably an easy one. But, no, sir, the politico-religious quack, like the quack in medicine, and in every thing else, will hear of nothing but his nostrum—all is to be forced—nothing can be trusted to time, or to nature. The disease will run its course—it has run its course in the Northern States; it is beginning to run its course in Maryland. The natural death of slavery is the unprofitableness of its most expensive labor—it is also beginning in the meadow and grain country of Virginia—among those people there—who have no staple that can pay for slave labor—especially amongst those who have none or very few slaves—these are the strenuous advocates of all these principles—in Virginia—most of them of the best intentions—all of them mistaken. The moment the labor of the slave ceases to be profitable to the master, or very soon after it has reached that stage—if the slave will not run away from the master, the master will run away from the slave; and this is the history of the passage from slavery to freedom of the villanage of England. The freeborn Englishmen were once adscripti glebae, like the serfs in Poland. Are not those of Russia and Poland going through this very operation at this very time, and from this very cause? And shall we be made to suffer shipwreck, we of the South, I mean, in steering our bark through this Eurypus, by the madness of our pilot and our own folly—steering between this Scylla and Charybdis, (not of the Bahama passage,) but of the imprescriptible rights of Kings (jure divino) on the one hand, and the imprescriptible rights of negro slaves on the other? Is there no medium? No medie tutissimus ibis? No parental injunction,

No—nothing of this. Thus fools rush in where angels fear to tread—whether ill-meaning or well-meaning fools is of no importance to me, if my ruin is to be accomplished by their interference. What matters it whether the fire-brands scattered were scattered by a fool, in sport, or by a madman, in earnest, if the city is reduced to ashes; or whether the fire-brands were scattered by the hand of a Guy Fawkes, with religion in his mouth, a firebrand in his hand, and hell in his heart? Nothing at all. It is important to the agent, as it regards his guilt in the sight of God, but both of them would be apt to meet their doom from the hand of man.

I have said, sir, a great deal that I did not mean to say, and have left unsaid a great deal that I did intend to say—and have said nothing as I wished to say it: this is one of the inseparable and insuperable difficulties of a man who speaks without a note, as I have done, aggravated by circumstances that I shall not intrude upon the Senate. Sir, I never could speak or quarrel by the book—by the card, as Touchstone tells us, was the fashion in his day. I have no gift at this special pleading—at the retort courteous and the countercheck quarrelsome, till things get to the point, where nothing is left for it but to back out or fight. We are asked, sir, by this new Executive Government of ours—not in the very words, but it is a great deal like it—of the son of Climene—to give some token, some proof, that they possess legitimate claims to the confidence of the people—which they have modestly confessed they do not possess in the same degree as their predecessors. I will answer them in the words of the father of that son. Pignora certa petis—Do pignora certa timendo. But, sir, the Phæton is at the door, ambition burns to mount. Whether the Mississippi, like the Po, is to suffer a metamorphosis, not in its poplars—whether the blacks shall be turned into whites, or the whites into blacks, the slaves into masters, or the masters into slaves, or the murdered and their murderers to change their color, like the mulberry trees, belongs to men of greater sagacity than I am to foretell. I am content to act the part of Cassandra, to lift up my voice, whether it be heeded, or heard only to be disregarded, until too late—I will cry out, obsta principis—yes, sir, in this case, as in so many others—c'est ne que le premier pas qui coûte—the first step is all the difficulty—that taken, then they may take for their motto—vestigia nulla retrorum—there is no retreat—I tell these gentlemen there is no retreat—it is cut off—there is no retreat, even as tedious and painful as that conducted by Xenophon—there is no Anabasis for us—and if there was, where is our Xenophon? I do not feel lightly on this occasion—far otherwise—but the heaviest heart often vents itself in light expressions. There is a mirth of sadness, as well as tears of joy. If I could talk lightly on this sad subject, I would remind gentlemen of the reply given by a wisacre, who was sent to search the vaults of the Parliament House at the time of the gunpowder plot, and who had searched and reported that he had found fifty barrels of powder concealed under the fagots and other fuel—that he had removed twenty-five, and hoped that the other twenty-five would do no harm. The step you are about to take is the match of that powder—whether it be twenty-five or fifty barrels is quite immaterial—it is enough to blow—not the first of the Stuarts—but the last of another dynasty—sky high—sky high.

Mr. HAYNE again rose, in reply to Mr. RANDOLPH, and said, there certainly could be no difference of opinion between that gentleman and himself, on any question which should involve the peculiar interests of the Southern States. Should any crisis unhappily arise, in which the policy of that portion of the Union should be called in question, or their safety endangered, that gentleman well knows, not only that we, said Mr. H., will be found acting cordially and zealously together, but that the whole South will be as one man. On this subject, however, Mr. H. said, he was at all times most reluctant to touch, and he certainly would not enter upon it on the present occasion. Nor would he at this time say a word in respect to another question to which the gentleman from Virginia had alluded, the relations which ought to exist between the new Republics and ourselves. The question now before the Senate was, whether we should postpone, for a few days, a resolution calling on the Executive for information relative to the principles and practice of these Republics. The simple and only object of the postponement was to ascertain whether the application would probably add any thing to the information we already possess on this subject. If, on further reflection and inquiry, the gentleman from Virginia, or any other gentleman, should have good reason to believe that the Executive was in the possession of more information than the Senate possessed in this particular, he would not object to any call calculated to elicit that information. But in that case he would suggest the propriety of such a modification of the resolution as would point more specifically to its objects. The gentleman from Virginia had, in acknowledging the friendly relations which existed between them, asked to be "saved from his friends." He would say to that gentleman, that while he was proud of the relation in which he stood towards him, he trusted that on this, as on all future occasions, he would prove himself a friend by the part he should act towards that gentleman.

Mr. H. concluded by moving that the resolution be laid upon the table, which (Mr. RANDOLPH assenting) was ordered accordingly.

MONDAY, March 6.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill "making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1826."

The following amendments, proposed by the Committee of Finance, were agreed to, viz: seven thousand dollars for the contingent expenses of the Senate, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated; six thousand dollars instead of twelve, for the discharge of miscellaneous claims against the United States, not otherwise provided for; and for compensation to Thomas H. Gillis, Chief Clerk in the Office of the Fourth Auditor, (for extra services, rendered between the demise of the late Auditor, and the appointment of his successor,) $950; and one or two slight amendments were added, on the motion of Mr. SMITH.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said there was an appropriation made in this bill which he should wish to strike out; it was for the salaries of the Commissioner and Arbitrators under the first article of the Treaty of Ghent. He should be very glad if the Chairman of the Committee on Finance was able to give some information how it was that the business of this commission was so much delayed; what is the commission doing, or how is it proceeding to act, on the business for which it was instituted; or is it at a stand? What is the cause of this? At least, said Mr. C., let us have something official on the subject. He began to be a little tired of seeing that and the next appropriation in the bill, (for carrying the 6th and 7th articles, respecting the boundary of the treaty, into effect,) year after year. Considering how long it was since this treaty was made, Mr. C. said it was a wonderful circumstance to him, that, year after year, appropriations on the subject should still have to be made. He hoped that, if the commission first alluded to could not proceed in the business, that their salary, at least, would be suspended until they could. He understood that the commission was totally at a stand. It was, he thought, high time for the Senate to have some information on the subject, and if they could not withhold the money, let them know the reason why; and whether there was any prospect of bringing the labors of this commission to an end.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said the Committee of Finance did not deem it their duty to go into an inquiry, whether any of the officers provided for by law had done their duty or not; they had not inquired how far those gentlemen had proceeded; or whether they had proceeded at all. The committee had ascertained that they were the commission—that they were duly appointed—that their compensation was agreed on, and was established either by treaty or by law: till that commission was ended, it was a question with the Executive whether they were proceeding correctly or not. It was not a question with the Committee of Finance, whether they should withhold the salary from any officer for not having performed his duty.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said from the character of the gentleman referred to, he believed there was no man who was more disposed to do his duty promptly. Yet, it seemed to him that some information ought to be laid before Congress on this subject, as to the progress made by the commission in the discharge of its trust, before they continued to make appropriations for it. What was the progress made? If their operations had been suspended, they ought, he said, to know why it was so; what were the difficulties thrown in the way; and, till they obtained information on this subject, Mr. C. was not disposed to vote a salary, year after year, for literally doing nothing. He said, if he knew how to get hold of this part of the bill, he should be willing to suspend the item, till he could get some information of the nature he had intimated. He believed a call had been made in the other branch of Congress, and when this was answered, they could then judge with more propriety whether it would be proper to continue the appropriation. There must, he thought, be some way by which Congress could get hold of this subject. He did not conceive they were bound down by any condition or bond to make appropriations, year after year, forever, for aught he knew, to maintain this commission; and he knew of no other way by which Congress could get hold of the subject than through the appropriation bill; and he repeated, if he knew how to get hold of this specific part of the bill, without suspending the whole in its passage, he would make the motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, it never had been the duty of any committee to examine further, on a subject of this kind, than to ascertain whether the law authorized the appropriation. Unless they received information from the President to the contrary, they supposed that the officers were doing their duty. It would be very injudicious to stop the appropriation bill at this time; injudicious, perhaps, in relation to the quarter of the country from which the gentleman from Georgia came. When this subject was under discussion in Russia, Mr. S. said, the British Minister proposed the proper course, which was not acceded to on the part of our Minister. The British Minister said, you will appoint a commission, and you do not know when it will be determined, and it will probably cost you more than the thing itself is worth; we will give you a specific sum of money, which you may divide among the claimants as you please, yourselves. That, Mr. S. said, would have been the better course, but it was not adopted. We have adopted another, and have employed our agents, and pay them the salary established by law. The committee did not inquire into their conduct.

Mr. COBB then inquired of the Chairman of the Committee of Finance, for information in regard to the next article, for carrying into effect the sixth and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, (for ascertaining the northern boundary.) He recollected that, four years ago, there was some difficulty on this subject, and it was then thought that the Commissioner, and the other persons employed in that business, were slow about it; and he should like to know if there was any prospect of its ever terminating.

Mr. HOLMES replied, that this was not the course usually adopted for going into an inquiry. The course to be adopted was, to lay a resolution on the table, calling on the President for evidence on the subject, and what progress the business was in. There was so much feeling on this subject five years ago, Mr. H. said, that a bill was brought into the Senate, and passed both Houses of Congress, diminishing the compensation of the Commissioner: it was apprehended that the delay might, in some sort, be occasioned by the magnitude of the salary. Experience proved, he said, that business does not go along quite so quick with a heavy salary, as it does with a light one. That bill experienced great opposition. It was said the salary was fixed by treaty, and we had no right to lower it. It was, however, reduced from a thousand pounds sterling, to twenty-five hundred dollars a year; and it seemed, Mr. H. said, that that was not low enough to hurry the Commissioners, so as to finish their business. It was probable that the gentleman from Georgia, and the rest of the Senate, know as much as the Committee of Finance on the subject. A communication had formerly been received from the President on the subject, in which he told them that they were making progress, and would probably finish soon; but when that soon was, Mr. H. said he did not know. This business was begun in 1816, and it is now 1826, and we have been paying the Commissioner, &c., all this time. They had a long journey to perform, to be sure, but they had not finished it. These commissions under treaty, Mr. H. said, had not been very successful. Out of the four under the Treaty of Ghent, only one was finished, in which he himself was concerned, and if he were engaged in such a one again, he doubted whether he should finish quite so quick; and whether he should not have learned from some other, the way to procrastinate. That commission was completed in eighteen months. The second, under the fifth article, still continues, and there it stands. Whether this one will end so or not, he could not say. We never ought again, Mr. H. said, to establish a commission under treaty, without limiting the time; and he doubted very much whether the Florida treaty commission would ever have been ended, to this day, had not the Commissioners been tied to three years.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole having been concurred in, it was passed to a third reading.

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

Mr. RANDOLPH, of Virginia, rose to make a motion, which, said he, I hope and believe no one member of this body will dissent from. It is, sir, for printing a most important document of old times, which is not on our files, and which, if not found on the files of the other House, is not in existence, officially, anywhere. The document I allude to is one, the history of which I gave the other day, in conclave—and which I certainly do not mean now to trouble the Senate with the repetition of—I believe the day, the 9th perhaps of last month, when I anticipated what has come to pass in Russia. Sir, I then said that I spoke from memory, but I have since done what I am not in the habit of doing—I have hunted the Journal; I have applied to the Secretary for a copy of the document, and he has it not. I at first thought it might have been burnt by the British: for they served us as the Irish insurgents did a banker, against whom they had a special spite, when they burnt all his notes in order to break him—in like manner they did some of us a very great service. Whenever any thing is wanted, we now can have the answer of old Caleb Balderstone, referring its absence to the fire at Wolf's Crag. I find, in the Journal of the Senate to which I have had recourse, this entry:

"Friday, January 23, 1807.

"On motion, by Mr. GILES,
"Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, ADAMS, and SMITH, of Maryland, be a committee to inquire whether it is expedient, in the present state of public affairs, to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

"On motion,

"Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, of the 22d instant, together with the documents therein mentioned, be referred to the same committee.

"Whereupon,

"Mr. GILES, from the committee, reported a bill to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus for a limited time, in certain cases; and the rule was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with, and the bill had three readings, and was amended.

"Resolved, That this bill pass as amended; that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be, 'An act to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus for a limited time, in certain cases.'

[In certain cases, said Mr. R.—not the cases which the constitution has declared shall be the cases in which it shall be suspended—I said certain cases—I should have spoken more properly to say in uncertain cases—for the certain cases are the cases of the constitution.]

"The committee also reported the following message to the House of Representatives; which was read and agreed to, to wit:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"The Senate have passed a bill suspending, for three months, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases, which they think expedient to communicate to you in confidence, and to request your concurrence therein as speedily as the emergency of the case shall, in your judgment, require.

"On motion,

"Ordered, That Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, be the committee to deliver the message to the House of Representatives."

"Monday, January 26, 1807.

"Mr. ADAMS, from the committee, reported that the bill entitled, 'An act to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, for a limited time, in certain cases,' was correctly engrossed.

"Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, reported that he had carried the bill last mentioned, to the House of Representatives for concurrence."

And now, sir, let us turn to the House of Representatives—because the bill was never printed; there is not an office copy of it to be found here; it was carried to the House of Representatives—and if not found there, there is no office copy of it in the world; though there are copies equally entitled to credit with any office copy whatever.

"House of Representatives, Monday, January 26, 1807.

"A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, as follows:

"Mr. Speaker: I am directed by the Senate of the United States to deliver to this House a confidential message in writing. Whereupon,

"The House being cleared of all persons except the members and Clerk, Mr. SMITH delivered to the Speaker the following communication, in writing:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"The Senate have passed a bill suspending, for three months, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases, which they think expedient to communicate to you in confidence, and to request your concurrence therein, as speedily as the emergency of the case shall, in your judgment, require.

"Mr. SMITH also delivered in the bill referred to in the said communication, and then withdrew.

"The bill sent from the Senate, entitled, 'An act suspending, for three months, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases,' was read the first time.

"A motion was made by Mr. PHILIP R. THOMPSON, [an old coadjutor of mine, said Mr. R., and I have no hesitation in saying, at my instance,] and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the message and bill communicated to this House, from the Senate of the United States, and the proceedings of the House thereon, ought not to be kept secret, and that the doors of the House be now opened.

"And on the question thereupon,

"It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 3.

The nays were Josiah Masters, David Thomas, and Nathan Williams, (two of them I know, and all three of them, I believe, from New York.)

"The doors of the House were accordingly opened, and the Speaker stated to the House, that the bill sent from the Senate having been read the first time, the question would be, Shall the bill be read the second time? Whereupon,

"Opposition being made by a gentleman from Virginia, to the said bill, and debate arising thereon, the question (in conformity to the rules of the House) was stated by Mr. Speaker, to wit:

"Shall this bill be rejected?

"And on the question to reject,

"It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 113, nays 19."

What is the most remarkable thing, said Mr. R., is, that of these nineteen nays, there is not one man from the Old Dominion—not one man. There were but four south of the River Ohio and south of the River Potomac—let me count them—Evan Alexander, of North Carolina, Elias Earle, of South Carolina, Thomas Sandford, of Kentucky, and Matthew Walton, of Georgia—I beg pardon, of Kentucky—the Yazoo led me into the error; I find, also, amongst the nays, on this occasion, the name of a certain Mr. Barnabas Bidwell, who commenced the lead in that House, in that very session! I find, too, the names of Josiah Masters, Gordon S. Mumford, Henry Southard. And then, sir, in turning back to the Senate journal, there is not one trace, neither yea nor nay. The only entry to be found on the Senate journal afterwards, was the following:

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus.

"The following message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. Beckley their Clerk: Mr. President—the House of Representatives do not concur in the bill entitled, 'An act to suspend, for three months, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in certain cases;' and he withdrew."

But as the rule was unanimously dispensed with, and the bill had three readings in one day, unanimously, it is to be inferred from that fact—for reasons which I gave to the Senate when the doors were shut, and which I don't choose to give now that they are open—there was no opposition here. Now, sir, not being able to find any trace of this bill here, it never having been printed—it never having been on file—the question is, where is to be found? In the other House, if anywhere—if anywhere I say again—if anywhere!

That suspension of the writ of habeas corpus was the first oblation which the present Executive Magistrate made at the shrine of power, when he gave in his adhesion on the desertion of his federal friends! Up to that session, he had been as staunch an adherent of the federal opposition to Jefferson's administration as any man in this country! We know by a voice—not from St. Helena, but from the south side of James' River—who was the sponsor who introduced him into the political church, who promised and vowed certain things in his name, which he has not yet disclosed; we hear that voice proclaiming from the Wigwam, and loudly calling upon him to come forward—now that he is an adult, 16 years having passed since his baptism at the new political font—and receive confirmation, and exonerate his Godfather—he who stood for him at the baptismal font—from all further responsibility on his account for his political sins. He calls on him to come forward, to get another endorser, for that he must take his name off his paper—that is a phrase which nowadays is much better understood!

Under these circumstances, said Mr. R., it has been to me a matter of wonder, that, during the late electioneering campaign—I have expressed myself to that effect to my good friend on my left, (Mr. MAON)—as I had but a shadow of preference amongst the contending parties, I did not mix myself with one side or the other in the election—I often expressed my wonder to him, for two years that preceded, that this fact had never been brought forward and used, as please God I would have used it, if I had had any interest in doing so; and I now discover the cause; it was not known—and permit me to say, it would never have been known to me by any industry of research or labor, if I had not been—whether fortunately or unfortunately—contemporary with this Government, first as a spectator in the lobby, from its origin—from the dissolution of the old Congress, which I saw expire, and a new butterfly come out of the chrysalis state—up to 1799, when I first took my seat in the Congress of the United States, with the gentleman who presides in the court below—(I do not speak as to jurisdiction—(the term is technical)—but in reference to the place where it holds its sittings,) with so much honor to himself and benefit to this country; from whom, though I may have differed in the course of a long political life, I have never withheld that respect, not even in conflict on the floor of the other branch of the Legislature, where he sat, during one session, in times when party spirit was at its height—I never, for a moment, lost sight of the immeasurable distance that separated me from that man, in every respect that could be mentioned, except age—and he was nearly old enough to be my father—for, where I meet with real worth—where I meet with a man of real talent—whether associated with him or not—whether placed in a situation where I was to appear only as a foil to his superior merits and ability, [pointing to the seat of Mr. TAKEWELL,] I can yield him that precedence which I shall never give to the assumption of superior merit, where I know and feel that it does not exist.

Sir, I consider that of all the stretches of power—talk about internal improvements!—of the expediency of suspending the privilege of the habeas corpus, in certain cases, in the teeth of the constitution! What says the constitution? That the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in two cases. What are they, sir; what are they? You would not have had that privilege, even if there had been no restriction, in your power; because you have nowhere had the grant of power to suspend the grant of power—the restriction is ex abundanti cautela—out of abundant caution, overweening care—like the restriction on the liberty of the press, in the teeth of which the sedition law was passed—like the restriction on an established church, in the teeth of which, for aught I know, an established church for the Catholics may be passed by this Congress, or by that of Panama.

These are in the amendments—take notice, there is no grant in the body of the constitution. Article 1, section 9. "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

Well, sir, here was a bill to suspend it—not in a case of rebellion or invasion; because all that was necessary would have been for the President to have sent a message, that there was rebellion or invasion, and to call for the suspension. There was no message from the President to that effect. I have no hesitation in saying that it was well understood that the channel through which the communication was made—not at all—I make no such allegation against Mr. Jefferson—but alleged to have been made by him—was the channel of that gentleman who reported the bill to have been duly engrossed—the middle member of this committee—I speak without irreverence—I have my principles on that point—the second person of this trinity in unity. It was well understood at that time—I never doubted it—I had my information from a member of this body, at that time, who was as honest a man as ever breathed—there is no message on the Journal recommending it—there is no official document—the bill is not now to be found—but it did pass this House—to suspend the habeas corpus, in certain cases.

Will the Senate pardon me for saying, that, to that suspension, was I indebted for my seat in the other House. At the preceding session of Congress, it was my misfortune not to see exactly with the eyes of people in power. I wanted some of that very laudable modesty which Chatham said that he admired whilst he despaired of imitating it—the modesty of the retainers of the Treasury bench—whose humility never allowed them to put their opinions in opposition to that of the minister for the time being. The next election came on in the April following this January, 1807. That bill—it was the panoply under which I sheltered myself—the text from which I preached; and, as on the issue of the first battle greatly depends the fate of the succeeding campaigns—no opposition dared to show itself; from that day, Sertorius like, or like Eumenes, I carried on the war upon my own resources, or as the King of Prussia carried on the war against the combined continent of Europe—for seven long years—relying on my own resources, and on them alone, against the General Government, the State Governments, and, I believe, every press in the United States, and maintained myself—not in the Peninsula, but in that district, where, in case of the worst that can happen, I look for refuge under any change of fortune, political or otherwise. My enemies never dared to face me and uphold this outrage upon the constitution; and do you think if I had been engaged heart and hand in this late election, I would have let this thing sleep? No, it should have rung like a funeral knell in the ears of the incumbent and the expectant. Let that pass—I did not disturb its sleep—I did not meddle with it; it was not for me to wake the adder—the rattlesnake—the good old rattlesnake—the emblem of liberty. “Don’t tread on me!” I did not care one button which of the contending parties he bit—not one farthing.

Sir, I must take leave to express myself here, as everywhere else, in my plain fireside, plantation way. The little advancement—and I cannot say that I feel it very highly, sir—from a majority to a colonelcy, has never altered my manners, and never shall, either in this Legislature or out of it; and I shall continue to be the same man, I trust, both at home and abroad, that I was before. I would, therefore, respectfully move, that a message be sent to the House of Representatives, requesting of that House an office copy of the bill sent to them by this House on Monday the 26th day of January, 1807, suspending for three months the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in certain cases. If it does not come from that House—and I am rather afraid it will not—I do not believe it has been burnt either—for I have some very obscure recollection in my mind of its disappearing off the file of that House long before the war was declared, or there was any fire in the Capitol—I don’t mean the library fire, but Roes’s fire—John Bull, on that occasion, made himself an Irish bull: he tried to break his enemy the banker by burning all his notes that he could lay his hands on. I make you that motion, sir.

The PRESIDENT being about to put the question on agreeing to the motion—

Mr. BELL, of New Hampshire, rose, merely to suggest that this motion was somewhat of an extraordinary nature, and he should be glad to take a little time to consider it. He did not see the motive which had induced the gentleman to make the motion, and at present he must acknowledge he should be very unwilling to send a proposition of this sort to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, asked whether it was not required by the Rules of the Senate, for a resolution of this kind to lie one day.

The CHAIR declared such was the rule, unless its immediate consideration was asked for by the mover; and Mr. RANDOLPH not pressing its immediate consideration, it was laid on the table until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 14.

The Journal of yesterday having been read—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and addressed the Senate nearly four hours, on the subject of the resolution which he submitted yesterday, and on various topics connected with that and other political incidents in the history of the country, particularly on the report made (by Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS) from the Select Committee of the Senate, in 1807, in the case of John Smith, a Senator from Ohio, charged with being an associate in Burr’s conspiracy—which report Mr. R. concluded by moving to have printed for the use of the Senate, (and withdrawing the motion that he made yesterday, in regard to the bill suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, that bill having been since found.)

The motion to print the report was negatived, without a count, and then, about 4 o’clock, The Senate, on motion of Mr. SKYMOUR, went into the consideration of Executive business.

[This day the final question on the celebrated Panama Mission was decided: and here is the place to insert the record of confidential proceedings thereon, ordered by the Senate, by a vote on this day, to be made public. Those proceedings are as follows, viz:]

Secret Executive Proceedings.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Mr. VAN BUREN, of New York, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors; unless it shall appear that the publication of documents, necessary to be referred to in debate, will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts, the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable.

On the question to agree thereto—

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 20.

WEDNESDAY, February 22.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. ROWAN on the 20th instant; and the same having been modified at the instance of Mr. WOODBURY, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the unquestionable right of the Senate to call, in respectful terms, upon the President of the United States, for such information as may be in his possession, and which the Senate deem necessary to the faithful discharge of the duties imposed upon it by the constitution; and, more especially, the duties resulting from matters which the constitution makes it the duty of the President to submit to the Senate, for its advice and consent.

Resolved, That the two following resolutions, of the 15th instant, viz: "Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors; unless it shall appear that the publication of documents, necessary to be referred to in debate, will be prejudicial to existing negotiations. Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate, whether such objections exist to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive, or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts, the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable:"—requested information in the possession of the Executive, and in his possession only, which the Senate deemed important to guide its decision on a subject within the scope of its advising powers, and deeply interesting to the States and to the people of this Union.

Resolved, That the message of the President, in the following words, viz: "In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked (Executive,) and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all the communications from me to the Senate, relating to the Congress at Panama, have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications, between the Executive and the Senate, ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question, involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide"—does not give to the Senate the information requested, "whether the publication of the documents," or "any portion of them," communicated by the Executive, as to the mission to Panama, "would be prejudicial to existing negotiations."

Resolved, That the Senate has the sole right in all cases to determine what shall be the "rules of its proceedings;" and that the President cannot interfere with the same, without violating the constitutional privileges of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Senate has the sole right to determine, what are its existing "rules of proceedings," whether founded on "usage" or positive written regulations—and that the President cannot officially decide what those rules are, or whether any proposed mode of acting, is a "departure" from them "without example," or whether it be essential to the "public interest," that some supposed "usage" of the Senate should "be preserved unimpaired."

Resolved, That it is not competent for the President, on a call from the Senate, to decline giving information, whether "the publication of documents necessary to be referred to in debate, will be prejudicial to existing negotiations," on the ground that he disapproves of the mode of proceeding which the Senate proposes to follow on the subject to which those documents relate.

On motion of Mr. BARTON, of Missouri, to postpone the same indefinitely, a division of the question was called for.

On the question to postpone indefinitely, the first resolution—

It was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 20.

On motion by Mr. COBB, of Georgia,

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulogny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Willey—24.

Those who voted in the negative, are,

NAYS.—Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Ellis, Findlay, Hayne, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, and Woodbury—20.

On the question to postpone, indefinitely, the second resolution,

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Senate having, on the 15th day of February, passed the following resolutions:

“Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents, necessary to be referred to in debate, will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

“Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate, whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts, the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable.”

To which the President returned the following message in answer, viz:

“WASHINGTON, February 16, 1826.

“To the Senate of the United States;

“In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate, of the 15th instant, marked (Executive,) and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all the communications from me to the Senate, relating to the Congress at Panama, have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications, between the Executive and the Senate, ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question, involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide.

Resolved, That, as the Senate have not been informed by the President, whether the publication of the documents, in relation to the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama, would affect any pending negotiations, it is expedient to proceed to the discussion of the subject of that mission with closed doors.

On motion by Mr. KING, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 23.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted yesterday, by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, in relation to the proposed mission to the Congress at Panama.

On motion, by Mr. DICKERSON, of N. J., to amend the same, by striking out all after the word “Resolved,” where it first occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That although the Senate cannot find, in the answer of the President of the United States to their resolutions of the 15th instant, relative to the proposed mission to Panama, any distinct information that the publication of the communications, alluded to in said resolutions, would or would not be prejudicial to existing negotiations, they find a strong objection on the part of the President, to the publication of those communications, inasmuch as they were made “in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, requesting them confidentially.” And although the Senate have the right to publish communications so made, and to discuss the same, with open doors, without the assent of the President, when, in their opinion, the public interest may require such publication and such discussion, they do not think that present circumstances require the exercise of this right, so far as respects a discussion of those confidential communications with open doors. Therefore,

Resolved, That the discussion upon the proposed mission to Panama, and the confidential communications upon the same, be held with closed doors.

On motion, by Mr. WHITE, of Tenn.

To amend the proposed amendment, by striking out the following words: “Resolved, That the discussion upon the proposed mission to Panama, and the confidential communications upon the same, be held with closed doors,” and inserting “Resolved, That the Senate cannot, consistently with the duty which it owes to the United States, and to itself, proceed to consider the expediency of appointing Ministers to attend the Congress at Panama, until it can receive the information necessary to enable it to determine whether the consideration of that question ought to be with open or with closed doors.”

On the question, “Will the Senate agree to this amendment?” a division of the question was called for; and it was taken on striking out, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 17.

On the question to insert the amendment last proposed, it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 31.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment first proposed to the original motion, amended by striking out the last clause:

On the question, “Will the Senate agree to this amendment?” a division of the question was called for; and,

On the question to strike out all the original motion, after the word “Resolved,” where it first occurs, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 31, nays 18.

On the question to insert the proposed amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 16.

So it was the proposed mission to Panama, any distinct information that the publication of the communications, alluded to in said resolutions, would or would not be prejudicial to existing negotiations, they find a strong objection, on the part of the President, to the publication of those communications, inasmuch as they were made "in confidence, and the most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially." And, although the Senate have the right to publish communications so made, and to discuss the same with open doors, without the assent of the President, when, in their opinion, the public interest may require such publication and such discussion, they do not think that present circumstances require the exercise of this right, so far as respects a discussion of those confidential communications with open doors.

FRIDAY, February 24.

On motion, by Mr. LLOYD, of Mass., that the Senate proceed to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the expediency of sending Ministers to the Congress of Panama; it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 12.

On motion, by Mr. HAYNE, of S. C., it was ordered that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

MONDAY, March 18.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the expediency of sending Ministers to the Congress at Panama.

A motion was made by Mr. BENTON, of Mo., to amend the said resolution, by striking out all after "Resolved," and inserting "That the Senate cannot advise that it is expedient for the Government of the United States to send Ministers to the Congress of American nations at Panama, before it shall have received satisfactory information upon the following points: First, the subjects to which the attention of that Congress will be directed; secondly, the substance and form of the powers to be given to the respective Representatives; thirdly, the mode of organizing the Congress; fourthly, the mode of action in deciding the questions which may be submitted to it."

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 14.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations, relative to the expediency of sending Ministers to the Congress of Panama, together with the amendment proposed thereto by Mr. BENTON.

On motion, by Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, the said amendment was modified as follows: Strike out all after "Resolved," and insert, "That it is not expedient for the United States to send any Ministers to the Congress of American nations assembled at Panama, before it shall have received satisfactory information upon the following points: 1st. The subjects to which the attention of the Congress will be directed: 2dly. The substance and form of the powers to be given to the respective Representatives: 3dly. The mode of organizing the Congress: 4thly. The mode of action in deciding the questions which may be submitted to it."

On motion, by Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, that the further consideration of the resolution, with the proposed amendment, be postponed to Friday next; it was determined in the negative—yeas 20, nays 25.

On motion by Mr. REED, of Mississippi, that he be excused from voting on the proposed amendment, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 12.

On the question to agree to the proposed amendment to the resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 24.

A motion, was made by Mr. VAN BUREN, of New York, to amend the resolution, by adding thereto the following:

Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States, in authorizing the President of the United States to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint "Ambassadors, and other public Ministers," authorizes the nomination and appointment to offices of a diplomatic character only, existing by virtue of international laws; and does not authorize the nomination and appointment (under the name of Ministers) of Representatives to an Assembly of Nations, like the proposed Congress of Panama, who, from the nature of their appointment, must be mere deputies, unknown to the law of nations, and without diplomatic character or privilege.

Resolved, That the power of forming or entering (in any manner whatever) into new political associations, or confederacies, belongs to the people of the United States, in their sovereign character, being one of the powers which, not having been delegated to the Government, is reserved to the States or people; and that it is not within the constitutional power of the Federal Government to appoint Deputies or Representatives of any description, to represent the United States in the Congress of Panama, or to participate in the deliberation, or discussion, or recommendation, of acts of that Congress.

Resolved, As the opinion of the Senate, that (waiving the question of constitutional power) the appointment of Deputies to the Congress of Panama, by the United States, according to the invitation given, and its conditional acceptance, would be a departure from that wise and settled policy by which the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations has hitherto been regulated, and may endanger the friendly relations which now happily exist between us and the Spanish American States, by creating expectations that engagements will be entered into by us, at that Congress, which the Senate could not ratify, and of which the people of the United States would not approve.

Resolved, That the advantages of the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama, (if attainable,) would, in the opinion of the Senate, be better obtained, without such hazard, by the attendance of one of our present Ministers near either of the Spanish Governments, authorized to express the deep interest we feel in their prosperity, and instructed fully to explain (when requested) the great principles of our policy, but without being a member of that Congress, and without power to commit the United States to any stipulated mode of enforcing those principles, in any supposed or possible state of the world.

And, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 24.

On the question to agree to the resolution reported by the committee, in the following words:

Resolved, That it is not expedient, at this time, for the United States to send any Ministers to the Congress of American nations assembled at Panama:

[These proceedings being published, here is the place to insert that part of the debate, in the secret session, above sketched out, which it is in our power to publish from authentic sources. It is therefore here introduced.]*

The following resolution, submitted by the Committee of Foreign Relations, being under consideration—

Mr. HAYNE, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate, in substance, as follows:

In order to decide on the expediency of the proposed mission to the Congress of Panama, and to ascertain how it may affect our neutrality, it is necessary to determine, in the first place, the character of that Congress. And here I shall take it for granted, that the character of the Congress will, in no degree, be affected by the instructions which may be given to our Ministers, but can only be ascertained from its declared and acknowledged objects. It is from the documents, published to the world, and from these alone, that the public can know the purposes for which this Congress is to be assembled. These must stamp its character as peaceful or belligerent, in the estimation of mankind. Now, on this branch of the subject, we are most fortunately furnished with information, authentic, full, and perfectly satisfactory

* This debate took place with closed doors, but with the understanding that each Senator might (after it was over) publish his speech—of which he, of course, would be the reporter, and of which privilege several Senators availed themselves. It was the principal debate of the session, and entered largely into the contest, then hot, for party supremacy—the administration staking itself upon the mission, as the opposition did against it. It was carried through both Houses of Congress, but deprived of its prestige under the heavy blows which it received; and became abortive from the failure of the Congress ever to meet. Losing, as it has, the hot interest derived from party contention, the debate (stripped of temporary topics) retains a permanent value from the ability which it developed, and the views of national policy which it opened. Amongst the ablest emanations of the mind which it presented, was the report from the Senate's Committee of Foreign Relations, drawn by Mr. Taswell, one of the committee, and presented by Mr. Macon, its chairman—who, when complimented upon the ability of his report, was accustomed to answer, with the integrity of his character—“Yes! It is a very able report: Taswell wrote it.”

information, not possessed by us alone, but which has been published to all the world. The following are the sources from whence we derive our knowledge as to the character and objects of the Congress of Panama—sources equally open to every nation in Europe:

1st. A work on the necessity of a general federation of the South American States, published at Lima in 1825, by Bernardo Montecagudo, Minister of State and Foreign Affairs of Peru, &c.

2d. Bolivar's circular and proclamation.

3d. The conventions between five of the Spanish American Republics, under which the Congress is about to assemble.

4th. The communication in the official Gazette of Colombia, in February last, of some of the specific points which are to form the subjects of the deliberations of the Congress.

From these combined sources, we will be enabled to derive the most satisfactory and conclusive information, as to the true character of the Congress; and when that shall be ascertained, the task will be easy to show what effect must be produced on our relations towards Spain by our taking any part in the deliberations of that assembly.

From the work of Montecagudo, (an abstract of which will be found in the last number of the North American Review,) it appears that the project of a Confederacy of the South American States was conceived as early as 1821; that, in 1823, Bolivar, as President of Colombia, invited Mexico, Peru, Chili, and Buenos Ayres, “to send delegates to Panama, with the express design of establishing a CONFEDERACY.” In December, 1824, conceiving that the period had now arrived for carrying this great object into effect, he issued a circular, proposing to the new States that delegates should “immediately be sent to Panama by those Governments which had agreed to JOIN in the CONFEDERACY;” and he there characterizes the meeting as one “which was to serve as a COUNSEL to us in our distresses,” (which can only mean, to advise them how to carry on the war, so as to bring it to a successful issue,) “and to be a RALLYING POINT in our common dangers;” (in other words, to furnish the means of making a successful stand against the common enemy, old Spain, by equipping fleets and raising armies, and by furnishing respectively their contingent of men, arms, and money.) The author of this work was a man of uncommon talent and great influence, who not only filled the station of Minister of State in Peru, but, in behalf of that State, negotiated and signed the Convention with Colombia, in relation to this very business. His authority, therefore, is entitled to great weight, on a question with which he was so intimately acquainted. He sums up in two lines, the duties of the Congress, and informs us it is designed to give “INDEPENDENCE, PEACE, AND SECURITY, TO THE NEW STATES.” Independence to colonies engaged in a contest with the mother country for its establishment—Peace, to nations actually involved in war—Security, to those who are exposed to all the casualties of invasion from abroad and convulsions within. And how are those objects to be attained? The answer is obvious, and is given by all the documents before us: By ALLIANCES, offensive and defensive; by which each State stipulates to make a common cause, and to furnish their respective quotas of men, of money, and of arms.

On this point, nothing shall be left to conjecture or inference. I will produce the highest possible evidence—evidence which must satisfy the most sceptical as to the true character of the Panama Congress. The States represented there have entered into formal TREATIES—and it is under these solemn Conventions that this Congress is assembled. Under the call made upon the President by the Senate on the 3d of January last, he has submitted to us Conventions between

The Republic of Colombia and that of Chili,
The Republic of Colombia and Peru,
The Republic of Colombia and the Federation of the Centre of America, and The Republic of Colombia and the U. Mexican States.

On looking into these Conventions, (some of which were entered into as early as 1822, and one as late as September, 1825,) we discover that, in the execution of the plan of the Liberator, of uniting all the Spanish American States into "ONE GREAT CONFEDERACY," he has succeeded in forming among them treaties of alliance offensive and defensive, in peace, and in war, and the Congress of Panama grows out of, and is the first fruit of, that alliance. It is, in fact, a Congress of confederated belligerent States, convened for the great purpose of bringing the war, by their combined efforts, to a speedy and successful termination, and, at the same time, of establishing a plan of general co-operation, in all cases whatsoever. These assertions I shall establish beyond the possibility of a doubt, by a brief reference to those Conventions.

In the Convention between Colombia and Chili, we find the following provisions:

By the first article, it is declared that "the Republic of Colombia and the State of Chili, are united, bound, and confederated, in peace and war, to maintain by their influence and forces, by sea and land—as far as circumstances permit—their Independence of the Spanish nation, and of any other foreign domination whatsoever."

By the second article, these two States "contract a league of close alliance for the common defence—for the security of their independence and liberty, for their reciprocal and general good, and for their internal tranquillity, obliging themselves to succor each other, and to repel in common every attack or invasion, which may in any manner threaten their political existence."

By the third article it is declared, "the Republic of Colombia binds itself to assist, with the disposable sea and land forces; of which the number, or its equivalent, shall be fixed at a meeting of Plenipotentiaries."

Then follow the thirteenth and fourteenth articles, under which the Congress at Panama is about to assemble. Thirteenth, "Both parties oblige themselves to interpose their good offices with the Governments of the other States of America, formerly Spanish, to enter into this COMPACT OF UNION, LEAGUE, and CONFEDERATION;" and, fourteenth, "As soon as this great and important object has been attained, a GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF AMERICAN STATES shall be convened, [at Panama as subsequently stated,] composed of their Plenipotentiaries, with the charge of cementing, in the most solid and stable manner, the intimate relations which ought to exist between all and every one of them, and which may serve as a COUNCIL IN THE GREAT CONFLICT, as a RALLYING POINT in the COMMON DANGERS, as a faithful interpreter of the public treaties, when difficulties occur, and as an umpire and conciliator in their disputes and differences."

Now, sir, in all the other Conventions, similar, and, in some of them, even stronger, language is held. They all provide for alliances, offensive and defensive, for the purpose of bringing the present war against Spain to a conclusion, by furnishing their quotas of men, money, and ships; and they all stipulate that, as soon as the ALLIANCE shall become general, this Panama Congress is to be convened, as the first step to be taken under it. It is the "GREAT COUNCIL" of these belligerent States, and will of course be perpetual, or, at all events, will have a duration equal to that of the Confederacy itself. [Mr. H. here referred minutely to all the Conventions, and argued from them in support of his position.] The last document to which I shall refer, is the Official Gazette of Colombia, of February last, in which the objects of the Congress are thus stated:

"1. To form a solemn compact, or league, by which the States, whose Representatives are present, will be bound to unite in prosecuting the war against their common enemy, old Spain, or against any other power, which shall assist Spain in her hostile designs, or any otherwise assume the attitude of an enemy.

"2. To draw up and publish a manifesto, setting forth to the world the justice of their cause, and the relations they desire to hold with other Christian powers.

"3. To form a Convention of Navigation and Commerce, applicable both to the Confederated States, and to their allies.

"4. To consider the expediency of combining the forces of the Republics, to free the Islands of Puerto Rico and Cuba from the yoke of Spain, and, in such case, what contingent each ought to contribute for this end.

"5. To take measures for joining in a prosecution of the war at sea, and on the coasts of Spain.

"6. To determine whether these measures shall also be extended to the Canary and Philippine islands.

"7. To take into consideration the means of making effectual the declaration of the President of the United States, respecting any ulterior design of a foreign power to colonize any portion of this continent, and, also, the means of resisting all interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments.

"8. To settle, by common consent, the principles of those rights of nations, which are in their nature controvertible.

"9. To determine on what footing shall be placed the political and commercial relations of those portions of our hemisphere which have obtained, or shall obtain, their independence but whose independence has not been recognized by any American or European power, as was for many years the case with Hayti."

From these documents no man can deny that the Congress of Panama is to be composed of deputies from belligerent States, and that its objects are essentially belligerent. These objects are not concealed, but are publicly avowed, and known to the world. It is to be an assembly of confederates, differing very little from the old Congress under our Articles of Confederation, to which, indeed, it bears a striking resemblance.

The question now arises, whether a neutral State can join in such a council without violating its neutrality? Can the United States lawfully send deputies to a Congress of the confederated Spanish American States?—a Congress which not only has objects confessedly connected with the prosecution of the war, but when it is notorious that these belligerent objects create the very occasion of its assembling? Can we do so without departing from our neutral relations towards Spain? Is it possible, Mr. President, that this can be seriously questioned? It will not bear an argument. There can be no difference under the law of nations—for there is none in reason or justice—between aiding a belligerent in council or in action—between consulting with him in respect to belligerent measures, or furnishing the men and money to accomplish them. To afford to such a Congress as I have shown this at Panama to be, even the lights of our wisdom and experience—to enter into consultations with them as to the means of bringing the contest to a speedy and successful issue—to advise with them how to proceed, and when to proceed—(and it appears from the documents that we are quite ready with our advice in these respects,) unquestionably must be a total departure from our neutrality. It is no answer to this argument to say, that our Ministers, when they take their seats, and become members of the Congress, will not interfere in the discussion of belligerent questions, and will confine themselves exclusively to those which are in their nature peaceful. If the character of the Congress is belligerent—no neutral can lawfully be there. If, for any purpose whatever, questions connected with the further prosecution of the war, are to be there discus-ed and decided, our Ministers cannot take their seats in the assembly without involving us, by that very act, in the contest. A strict and honorable neutrality must keep us out of any meeting not having peaceful objects exclusively. The law of nations, in this respect, cannot differ from those rules of municipal law, founded in the common sense of mankind—which involve, in a common guilt, all who associate with those engaged in any unlawful enterprise. It is not permitted to individuals, nor can it be permitted to nations, to excuse themselves for acting with those engaged in belligerent enterprises, by alleging that their own purposes are peaceful. Sir, I hold that if you go into council at all with such powers, you become answerable for all their acts. At this moment a case occurs to me that took place many years ago, in England, and which affords an apt illustration of this principle. Lord Dacres, a young nobleman of wild and irregular habits, associated himself with a party who were engaged in robbing a Park—one of that party, without the knowledge or consent of Lord Dacres, killed the game-keeper. His lordship was taken up, and tried for the murder; and though probably as innocent of that offence as either of us, he was, according to the laws of England, found guilty. No rank or influence could save him—he perished on the gallows—a victim to the strict, though necessary rule, which involves in a common fate all who associate and act with others engaged in any unlawful pursuit.

But an attempt is made to remove all our apprehensions on this subject, (and it comes from a high quarter too,) by the assurance that Spain is just about to acknowledge the independence of her former Colonies, under our mediation. The Secretary of State, in his report which accompanies the President's Message of the 9th January, in answer to our call for information, transmits a mass of documents to show that our Government has invoked the aid of Russia; that the Emperor has interfered at our request; and that there is a flattering prospect of speedy and entire success. So says Mr. Middleton—so says Mr. Clay. But, Mr. President, it fortunately happens that the Senate, on the 80th January, made another call for information on this point, and the answer of the President, of the 1st of February, dispels the illusion entirely. The three letters of Mr. Everett, there disclosed, demonstrate that there is no hope, whatever, of a peace. The Minister of the Spanish Government, (Mr. Zea,) declares that the determination of the king, on that subject, is unalterable—he will stand upon his naked right, and look to Providence, should all other means fail. But this is not all. The Russian Minister concurs in the views of Mr. Zea, and the British Minister will not interfere. In short, it is proved by these documents that all hope of a peace is entirely at an end. The hopes raised by the message of the 9th of January are thus totally crushed by that of the 1st of February. This no gentleman will now question.

It has been well remarked by the Committee, in their Report, that no nation (unless restrained by their weakness) ever permitted such an interference as we are about to attempt, without redressing the wrong by war. And surely, sir, we are not to be called upon to violate our neutral obligations towards Spain — because Spain is weak. If a sense of justice, and a due regard to our own character and our interests, should not restrain us from a measure of that kind, perhaps we may be influenced by the consideration, that a violation of neutrality on our part may lead to similar violations on the part of the powers of Europe, and that we may thus be the means of destroying those whom we mean to serve and hope to save.

It is to be a CONGRESS, a deliberative Assembly, composed of DEPUTIES, with undefined powers; it is called in the conventions "a great Council;" and though the members in some places are called "Plenipotentiaries," yet, in others, they receive different appellations; and Mr Clay himself, in one place, considers them as "REPRESENTATIVES," and elsewhere describes them as "Commissioners." They cannot be "Ambassadors:" for they are not to go accredited to any sovereign State. They will not be Ministers to Colombia, within whose territory the Congress is to be convened; they must present their credentials to the Congress itself, by whom their validity must be decided on, and the members admitted to their seats. It is only by the special provisions of the "Conventions," that the Deputies could claim the privileges and immunities of Ambassadors, and as no such stipulations have been made in our favor, it follows, that our Deputies will be indebted even for protection to the Congress of which they are to be members. In what form the deliberations are to be conducted, we know not, but we are expressly told that their deliberations may be "confidential;" and I infer from a provision which authorizes a change in the place of meeting "with the consent of a majority of the States," that they will vote by States, and that a majority will govern. Mr. Salazar tells us expressly, that "we may form an EVENTUAL ALLIANCE, for certain purposes, to remain secret"—and adds, "that the conferences held on this subject, being confidential, would increase mutual friendship, and promote the respective interests of the parties."

And here, Mr. President, I will insist, that, if this mission were liable to none of these objections, there is not a single object specified in the invitations and answers, or in the message of the President, which would justify the measure proposed. They are all either dangerous, or inexpedient, or unnecessary; and this I will attempt to prove, by a brief examination of each of them.

The first great subject to which our attention at this Congress is to be called, arises out of the pledge * which Mr. Monroe is supposed to have given, "not to permit any foreign power to interfere in the war between Spain and her colonies;" and it appears, from the correspondence, to be the special object of the new States to get us to enter into treaties to redeem that pledge, according to the construction they have chosen to put upon it, and in which, I am sorry to add, the Executive seems to have acquiesced. Mr. Obregon tells us, that the United States are only expected to take part in those matters which the "late administration pointed out as being of general interest, for which reason," says he, "one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress, will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain;" and "that, as the POWERS OF AMERICA ARE OF ACCORD as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force, that the evil may be met, if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is, by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation: for, otherwise, resistance would operate partially, and in a manner much less certain and effective.

"The opposition to Colonization in America, by the European powers, will be another of the questions which may be discussed, and which is in like predicament with the foregoing."

Mr. Salazar holds language on this subject still more explicit.

Now I do positively deny that Mr. Monroe ever pledged this nation to go to war, or make treaties, to prevent the interference of any European nation in the present contest. I deny that he had a right to make any such pledge; and most of all do I deny that any sanction has been given to such an idea by the Senate, the House of Representatives, by the States, or by the people of the United States. The language of Mr. Monroe is extremely vague and indefinite. That great and good man well knew that he had no power to use any but a moral force on that question; and beyond this moral influence over the councils of the nations of Europe, he neither attempted nor desired to go. He well knew—every intelligent man in the United States knows—that this nation is not now, and never has been, prepared to go to war for the independence of South America. The new States have always carried with them our warmest wishes for their success—but beyond the indulgence of a sincere and friendly sympathy, we have never been willing to proceed. Mr. Monroe's declaration, I repeat, was

States to prevent colonization in America, and also to prevent the interference of any European nation in the present contest, there are two important documents before the House of Representatives which were not before the Senate, viz: 1. The letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Anderson, dated 27th May, 1823, in which the policy of this Government is fully explained on that subject. 2. The Message of the President to the House of Representatives, in which he goes into an explanation of his present views.—Notes by Mr. H.

* In relation to the supposed PLEDGE made by the United

intended to produce a moral effect abroad; he designed it for the atmosphere of Europe, and therefore it was couched in such terms that, while it did not commit us to any overt acts, it left foreign nations under a vague impression of what we might do, if the event alluded to should ever happen. The substance of Mr. Monroe's statement was, "that he should consider any attempt on their part (the powers of Europe) to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety," and as "the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States." It is obvious that we are left by this pledge altogether free to act in any emergency according to circumstances and a sense of our own interests. We have incurred no obligations to others by the declaration; and it is our policy to incur none. But it now appears that the new States have conceived themselves entitled to our aid whenever foreign interference shall be threatened, and (what is truly unfortunate) it further appears, that the new Administration have acknowledged their claims, and admitted our obligations; they have acted, and are now about to act, on the presumption that the Spanish American States may rightfully claim, and that we are bound to grant, our assistance against all nations who may "hereafter interfere in any way whatever in the question and war of independence." Nay, so far have our Government gone in this respect, that they have actually claimed commercial privileges from these States on the ground that we are to be considered as "one of the American Nations," and "within the pale of the great AMERICAN SYSTEM;" that we are "prepared to bear the brunt of the contest which will arise, should any foreign power attempt to interfere." To show how far our Government have proceeded in this course, I must be permitted to read a few pages from the documents before us. In the letter of our Minister to Mexico to the Secretary of State, dated 28th September, 1825, after giving an account of the difficulties which had arisen in making a treaty with Mexico, in consequence of the desire of that Government to introduce an article putting it in their power to grant special commercial privileges to the other Spanish American States, he informs us that he insisted that we should be entitled to similar privileges, because "we were bound to them by similar fraternal ties." To some objections urged against our claims on the ground that we had not yet taken part in the war, our Minister replied in the following words, viz: "To these observations I replied, that, against the power of Spain, they had given sufficient proof that they required no assistance, and the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere either with their independence or form of Government; and that, as in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we would be compelled to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest, it was not just that we should be placed on a less favorable footing than the other Republics of America, whose existence we were ready to support at such hazards." The Minister then goes on to state, that, after explaining what we had already done, he declared "what further we were ready to do, in order to defend their rights and liberties; but that this could only be expected from us, and could only be accomplished, by a strict union of all the American Republics, on terms of perfect equality and reciprocity; and repeated, that, it was the obvious policy of Europe to divide us into small Confederacies, with separate and distinct interests, and as manifestly ours to form a SINGLE GREAT CONFEDERACY, which might oppose one united front to the attacks of our enemies."

And now, sir, I must put the question directly and seriously to the Senate, whether they are prepared to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama, for the purpose of making effectual this pledge of the President of the United States, as construed by the present administration, and understood by the Spanish American States? Whatever may be the opinion of others, I, for one, have no hesitation in declaring that I am not prepared for any such proceeding; I am not ready now to declare that I will involve my country in all the horrors of war for the establishment of South American independence; and, even if I were prepared to say, that, rather than permit the interference of any foreign nation in the contest, "we must fight," still I should think it wise and prudent not to commit ourselves by treaties or compacts, but to reserve the right to act when the contingency shall happen, as our feelings or interests may then dictate. It is of the last importance that we should reserve this privilege to ourselves; that we should enter into no stipulations whatever with other nations on such a subject. But, should we send Ministers to Panama for these objects, we will not be free to pursue this course. If our Ministers go there with our sanction, committed as we know the President to be, we must either sanction the compacts which may be entered into, or disappoint the just expectations which we will have raised. In the one case, our interests will be sacrificed, and, in the other, our friendly relations with the new States will be interrupted. Let us, then, avoid this dilemma, by not placing ourselves voluntarily in a situation which will leave us only a choice of difficulties, and impose upon us the hard necessity of offending our friends or injuring ourselves.

Connected with this object, is another, bearing a close resemblance to it: "the opposition to COLONIZATION in America" by any European power. If, by this, it is to be understood that we are to interfere to obstruct the settlement of the territories in America owned by Russia or England, it must speedily involve us in an unjust and unnecessary war. But, if the design is to enter into compacts with the South American States, not to permit any colonization within our respective limits, or if we are to make common cause in resisting all such attempts, then I must boldly declare that the scheme is, in the one case, derogatory to our honor, and, in the other, dangerous to our safety. What! is it come to this, that the United States of America are to come under obligations to others; to bind themselves to nations of yesterday, to preserve their own Territories from invasion, and their homes and their altars from pollution? Nay, are we, at this period of our history, to enter into solemn vows, that we will neither permit ourselves to be conquered, nor to be sold? Sir, the idea of treaty stipulations against colonization is degrading and unmeaning, unless it is intended that we shall guarantee to the new States the possession of their Territories; and, if that is the plan, it is as unwise as it is dangerous.

The next subjects to be considered by the Congress of Panama, are the suppression of the AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE and the INDEPENDENCE OF HAYTI; and I admit that these involve questions of deep interest to us all. The United States were the first to set its face against the slave trade, and the first to suppress it among their own citizens. We are entitled to the honor of having effectually accomplished this great object, not more by the force of our laws, than by the omnipotent power of public opinion—a power, in this country, paramount to the laws themselves. In all measures of this character, every portion of our fellow-citizens have cordially co-operated; and, even in those States where slavery still exists, the people have gone heart and hand with their Government in every measure calculated to cut up this nefarious trade by the roots. In the State which I have the honor to represent, any man concerned, directly or indirectly, in this traffic, would be indignantly driven out of society. Having done so much, we may well call upon other nations “to go and do likewise,” before they can be permitted to taunt us on this subject; as one of these South American Ministers has done.

The question of slavery is one, in all its bearings, of extreme delicacy, and concerning which I know of but a single wise and safe rule, either for the States in which it exists, or for the Union. It must be considered and treated entirely as a DOMESTIC QUESTION. With respect to foreign nations, the language of the United States ought to be, that it concerns the peace of our own political family, and therefore we cannot permit it to be touched; and in respect to the slaveholding States, the only safe and constitutional ground on which they can stand, is, that they will not permit it to be brought into question, either by their sister States, or by the Federal Government. It is a matter, Mr. President, for ourselves. To touch it at all, is to violate our most sacred rights—to put in jeopardy our dearest interests—the peace of our country—the safety of our families, our altars, and our firesides. Sir! on the question of our slave institutions, so often incidentally mentioned, I will take this opportunity, once for all, to declare, in a few words, my own feelings and opinions. It is a subject to which I always advert with extreme reluctance, and never, except when it is forced upon me. On the present occasion the subject has been forced upon our consideration, and when called upon to give my sanction to the discussion by our Ministers, (in connection with a foreign Congress,) of questions so intimately connected with the welfare of those whom I represent, I cannot consent to be silent. On the slave question, my opinion is this: I consider our rights in that species of property as not even open to discussion, either here or elsewhere; and in respect to our duties, (imposed by our situation,) we are not to be taught them by fanatics, religious or political. To call into question our rights, is grossly to violate them—to attempt to instruct us on this subject, is to insult us—to dare to assail our institutions, is wantonly to invade our peace. Let me solemnly declare, once for all, that the Southern States never will permit, and never can permit, any interference whatever, in their domestic concerns, and that the very day on which the unhallowed attempt shall be made by the authorities of the Federal Government, we will consider ourselves as driven from the Union. Let the consequences be what they may, they never can be worse than such as must inevitably result from suffering a rash and ignorant interference with our domestic peace and tranquillity. But, while I make these declarations, I must be permitted to add, that I apprehend no such violation of our constitutional rights. I believe that this House is not disposed, and that the great body of our intelligent and patriotic fellow-citizens in the other States have no inclination, whatever, to interfere with us. There are parties, indeed, composed, some of them, of fanatics, and others of political aspirants, who are attempting, vainly I hope, to turn the current of popular opinion against us. These men have done us much harm already, and seem still fatally bent upon mischief. But, if we are true to ourselves, we will have nothing to fear. Now, sir, if it is the policy of the States not to suffer this great question to be touched by the Federal Government, surely it must be the policy of this Government, exercising a paternal care over every member of the political family, not to suffer foreign nations to interfere with it. It is their imperative duty to shun discussion with them—and to avoid all treaty stipulations, whatever, on any point connected directly or remotely with this great question. It is a subject of too delicate a nature—too vitally interesting to us, to be discussed abroad. On this subject we committed an error when we entered into treaties with Great Britain and Colombia for the suppression of the slave trade. That error has been happily corrected. The first treaty has failed, and the second was nearly unanimously rejected by this body. Our policy, then, is now firmly fixed—our course is marked out. With nothing connected with slavery can we consent to treat with other nations, and, least of all, ought we to touch the question of the independence of Hayti in conjunction with Revolutionary Governments, whose own history affords an example scarcely less fatal to our repose. Those Governments have proclaimed the principles of “liberty and equality,” and have marched to victory under the banner of “universal emancipation.” You find men of color at the head of their armies, in their Legislative Halls, and in their Executive Departments. They are looking to Hayti, even now, with feelings of the strongest confraternity, and show, by the very documents before us, that they acknowledge her to be independent, at the very moment when it is manifest to all the world beside, that she has resumed her colonial subjection to France. Sir, it is altogether hopeless that we could, if we would, prevent the acknowledgment of Haytian independence by the Spanish American States; and I am constrained to add that I must doubt, from the instruments to be employed by our Government, whether they mean to attempt to do so. We are to send, it seems, an honest and respectable man, but a distinguished advocate of the Missouri restriction—an acknowledged abolitionist—to plead the cause of the South, at the Congress of Panama. Our policy, with regard to Hayti, is plain. We never can acknowledge her independence. Other States will do as they please—but let us take the high ground, that these questions belong to a class, which the peace and safety of a large portion of our Union forbids us even to discuss. Let our Government direct all our Ministers in South America and Mexico to protest against the independence of Hayti.* But let us not go into council on the slave trade and Hayti. These are subjects not to be discussed anywhere. There is not a nation on the globe with whom I would consult on that subject, and, least of all, the new Republics.

I proceed next to consider the great object (which seems to lie so near to the hearts of some of our statesmen), of building up what they are pleased to call “AN AMERICAN SYSTEM”—terms which, when applied to our domestic policy, mean restriction and monopoly, and when applied to our foreign policy, mean “entangling alliances,” both of them the fruit of that prurient spirit which will not suffer the nation to advance gradually in the development of its great resources, and the fulfilment of its high destinies, but would accelerate its march by the most unnatural and destructive stimulants. “As Europe (says Mr. Caneas) has formed a continental system, America should form a system for herself.” “The mere assembling (says Mr. Salazar) of the Congress, by showing the ease with which America can combine, will increase our political importance.” In plain terms, Mr. President, we are called upon to form a HOLY ALLIANCE on this side of the water, as a counterpoise to the Holy Alliance on the other side of it. Are the people of this country prepared for that? What is there in the history or character of the Holy Alliance that makes it a fit subject for our imitation? This combination of nations at peace, to maintain certain principles and institutions, contains the most atrocious violation of the natural and social rights of man that the world has ever seen. It is wrong—most fatally wrong—and it makes no difference, in reason or justice, what the principles to be maintained are. It is of the essence of national independence, that every country should be left free to adopt and to change its principles and its policy according to its own views of its own interests; and from the very bottom of my soul I abhor the idea of combinations among sovereign States, for any purpose whatever. Great Britain, the only nation in Europe that possesses the shadow of freedom, has refused to join the Holy Alliance. I hope we shall follow her example in having nothing to do with this “great American Confederacy”—Mr. Canning declared that such an alliance was unconstitutional—and surely, if it was so in Great Britain, it must be so here.

I come now, Mr. President, to the last subject specified by the South American Ministers, in which we are expected to take a part, and which is strongly relied upon here as constituting in itself a decisive inducement for our sending Ministers to the Congress of Panama—I mean the fate of CUBA. Now, sir, I have on this point the authority of the President himself, that neither he nor his Cabinet considered this question as furnishing any reason in favor of this mission. If the President or his Cabinet had supposed it material, he would have stated it to us as one of the reasons which rendered the mission desirable. But neither in his message, nor in the documents which accompanied it, did he say one word about Cuba; and all our information on the subject has been extracted by the call for information made by the Senate on the 3d January last. And yet no man can deny that this is one of the most interesting and important topics connected with the subject. But, sir, the fact is, that the Executive is unfortunately so committed, in relation to Cuba, as to leave themselves bound hand and foot, deprived of the power of taking a single step that could be productive of any beneficial results; and therefore, no doubt, it was, that the President did not deem it important to mention the subject to us at all. On examining the documents now before us, it will appear, that while our Government has taken the bold ground in relation to Russia, France, and Great Britain, that "they will not permit any nation except Spain, to take Cuba, under any circumstances whatever," they have, in relation to the South American States, declared expressly that we cannot interfere. Though the interests of the United States would be much more deeply affected by the possession of Cuba, by any of the new States than by France, or even by Russia, yet, while, in relation to the latter, we throw ourselves fearlessly into the breach, and have declared "we will not permit them to act"—with respect to the former, "we can see no ground on which we can forcibly interfere." Mr. Clay, in his letter to Mr. Middleton, 26th December, 1825, says—"On this subject it is proper we should be perfectly understood by Russia. For ourselves, we desire no change in the possession of Cuba, as has been heretofore stated. We cannot allow a transfer of the island to any European power. But if Spain should refuse to conclude a peace, and obstinately resolve on continuing the war, although we do not desire that either Colombia or Mexico should acquire the island of Cuba, the President cannot see any justifiable ground on which we can forcibly interfere. Upon the hypothesis of an unnecessary protraction of the war, imputable to Spain, it is evident that Cuba will be her only point d'appui, in this hemisphere. How CAN WE INTERPOSE on that supposition, against the party clearly having right on his side, in order to restrain or DEFEAT A LAWFUL OPERATION OF WAR? If the war against the islands should be conducted by those Republics in a desolating manner; if, contrary to all expectation, they should put arms into the hands of one race of the inhabitants to destroy the lives of another; if, in short, they should countenance and encourage excesses and examples, the contagion of which, from our neighborhood, would be dangerous to our quiet and safety; the Government of the United States might feel itself called upon to interpose its power. But it is not apprehended that any of those contingencies will arise, and, consequently, it is most probable that the United States, should the war continue, will remain hereafter, as they have been heretofore, neutral observers of the progress of its events.

"You will be pleased to communicate the contents of this despatch to the Russian Government. And as, from the very nature of the object which has induced the President to recommend to the Governments of Colombia and Mexico, a suspension of their expeditions against the Spanish islands, no definite time could be suggested for the duration of that suspension, if it should be acceded to, it must be allowed, on all hands, that it ought not to be unnecessarily protracted." *

* In relation to Cuba and Porto Rico, the President's Message to the Senate, and the documents which accompanied it, did not mention them at all. In answer to the call

In accordance with these views, Mr. Clay writes to Mr. Salazar, 20th December, 1825—"The President believes that a suspension for a limited time of the sailing of the expedition which is understood to be fitting out at Carthagena, or of any other expedition which may be contemplated against either of those islands (Cuba and Porto Rico) by Colombia or Mexico, would have a salutary influence on the great work of peace." And again—"he expresses the hope that the Republic of Colombia will see the expediency in the actual posture of affairs of forbearing to attack those islands, until a sufficient time has elapsed to ascertain the result of the pacific efforts which the great powers are believed to be now making on Spain." Well, that time has elapsed—the result is ascertained. The mediation has failed—and the Executive stands fatally pledged—not to "interpose" to defeat "a lawful operation of war" on the part of those "who have right on their side," unless, indeed, the "manner" of conducting that operation should induce us to change our position; and this, says the Secretary, "is not apprehended."

Thus, then, it manifestly appears that our faith is plighted, and that we have acknowledged the high obligations of duty not to interfere, unless, indeed, the slaves should be excited to murder their masters; and then, says Mr. Clay, perhaps we might; and as to the invasion, all we have felt ourselves authorized to ask is, a small delay in the sailing of the expedition, only until the effect of our interposition with Russia shall be ascertained—of the total failure of which we are now officially informed. I repeat, therefore, our Executive has forever closed the lips of their Ministers on this subject, and there is no pretence for supposing that we can now interfere to prevent the invasion of Cuba and Porto Rico.

Nothing remains for us now, if, indeed, any thing can be done, but for Congress to interpose their authority in preventing the Executive from carrying their views into effect, and that interposition will not take place by confirming this mission. The true constitutional ground is, that the President has no right to pledge this nation, either as to our not permitting any foreign nation to take Cuba, or as to there being no ground to interfere to prevent its capture by the new Republics. I would change our position, at least so far as to declare, that the South for information, made by the Senate on the 2d January, the President communicated a number of documents, some of which touched this subject. Among them, a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Middleton, dated 26th December, 1825, and which has not been communicated to the House of Representatives. That letter, among other important matters, contains the very remarkable passage above quoted, showing that our Government had taken the ground that we could not interfere to prevent the invasion of these islands by the Spanish American States, while on the other hand we had determined "not to permit any European nation, except Spain, to take them, under any circumstances whatever."

This passage, connected with the two others above quoted, from Mr. Clay's letter to Mr. Salazar, dated 20th December, 1825, was the foundation of the argument in the Senate, on this point.—Note by Mr. H.

[SENATE.]

American States should not be permitted to take it, or to revolutionize it. But, as the question now presents itself as connected with this mission, we can accomplish no good, and may involve ourselves in difficulties, by counselling with those who are merely to settle the mode of co-operation in the invasion of Cuba and Porto Rico—a measure already decided on, and against which our Government have bound themselves not to interfere. It is in vain to say that the Executive has only disclaimed forcible interference. No other could be effectual. For a nation to disclaim the ultima ratio, is to surrender the point in dispute. There is no such disclaimer as to Europe. There, “we will not permit,” here, “we cannot forcibly interfere.” But we have gone further. We have stated expressly to the new States, that we only ask delay, and nothing but delay; and that to “a day certain,” and now past.

As to the other objects of this Congress, specified in the invitations, there is one answer to them all—they belong to ordinary diplomacy, and will be better and more speedily accomplished by our Ministers to these new States, than by going into a Congress of their deputies, whose attention must be chiefly engrossed by belligerent operations and local objects.

It only remains for me to notice the additional subjects specified by the President. He considers this mission necessary to prevent the new States from granting special favors to Spain and to each other. The treaties now submitted to us show, that these States have determined not to grant any privileges to Spain; and with respect to each other, we have already formed treaties with some of them in terms of the most perfect reciprocity, and with the only State with which we have had the least difficulty (Mexico) our latest accounts leave no doubt of their being speedily removed.

The President next tells us that it is important to establish the principles and restrictions of reason on the extent of blockade—but surely, sir, these and similar objects are to be attained by treaties negotiated in the ordinary way. They require no such extraordinary and questionable proceeding as a mission to this Congress.

We are next informed by the President, that it will be one of our objects to inculcate on the new States the principles of religious liberty.*

* On the subject of RELIGION, the President was understood, in the Senate, to recommend an attempt to alter the constitution of the new States on that point; but in his Message to the House of Representatives, he limits the object to the obtaining for our citizens the right of worshipping according to their own consciences—a right which is secured to them in all the treaties already made with those States, and which it is presumed can, in the ordinary course of negotiations, be obtained from all of them. The following are the passages in the messages of the President to the two Houses, on this subject:

To the Senate, the President said:

“There is yet another subject upon which, without entering into any treaty, the moral influence of the United and some hints are thrown out of an indirect influence that may be exerted over their councils. If, Mr. President, it is against the spirit of our constitution to interfere in any way with the religion of our own people, I should conclude it must be altogether foreign to our policy to interfere with the religion of other nations. We both believe ourselves to be right, and I know of no power but that of the Almighty which can decide between us. Besides, sir, is it not obvious that any attempt to acquire influence over the councils, or to regulate the religious policy of the new States, must have a tendency to interrupt the friendly relations now existing between us, in the cultivation of which, the President assures us, he found the last and decisive inducement for accepting the invitation? Nothing to my mind can be clearer than that this mission must either terminate in an idle ceremony, or our Ministers will deeply wound the sensibilities of the new States; unless, indeed, they shall be authorized to enter into stipulations inconsistent with our neutrality and fatal to our interests. Look at the questions to be submitted to their consideration. On every one of them our deputies must refuse to act, or, by acting, commit the country.

I have given to this subject, Mr. President, the most dispassionate consideration, and I am free to confess, that, whether I consider the measure itself, the form of the invitation, or the course which has been pursued in relation to it, my mind is filled with the most unqualified astonishment. That the President should have committed himself, committed us, and committed the nation; and that the question should have been brought before us, will form, it appears to me, a curious page in the history of this country, which will, hereafter, be referred to with peculiar interest.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Rhode Island, said the hon-

States may, perhaps, be exerted with beneficial consequences at such a meeting—the advancement of religious liberty. Some of the Southern nations are, even yet, so far under the dominion of prejudice, that they have incorporated, with their political constitutions, an exclusive church, without toleration of any other than the dominant sect. The abandonment of this last badge of religious bigotry and oppression, may be pressed more effectually by the united exertions of those who concur in the principles of freedom of conscience, upon those who are yet to be convinced of their justice and wisdom, than by the solitary efforts of a Minister to any one of the separate Governments.”

To the House of Representatives, he says:

“And lastly, the Congress of Panama is believed to present a fair occasion for urging upon all the new nations of the South, the just and liberal principles of religious liberty. Not by any interference whatever in their internal concerns, but by claiming for our citizens, whose occupations or interests may call them to occasional residence in their territories, the inestimable privilege of worshipping their Creator according to the dictates of their own consciences. This privilege, sanctioned by the customary law of nations, and secured by treaty stipulations in numerous national compacts—secured even to our own citizens in the treaties with Colombia, and with the Federation of Central America—is yet to be obtained in the other South American States and Mexico. Existing prejudices are still struggling against it, which may, perhaps, be more successfully combated at this general meeting, than at the separate seats of Government of each Republic.”—Notes by Mr. H.

orable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. WHITE) called upon us (by us, I mean those who have not adopted the reasoning of the report) to show wherein the reasoning of the report was not conclusive; implying that we were either to do this, or to adopt the resolution; as the resolution was the necessary result of the reasoning, if that was conclusive. I do not agree that this is the necessary alternative: for, an argument may fail of convincing the mind, may be felt as very fallacious, and yet the mind be unable to detect its fallacy, and unable to expose that fallacy, either to itself or to others.

The report would persuade us that the destinies of Cuba and Porto Rico are somehow connected with this mission, or with this Congress: that their conquest is to be attempted by force; or their independence produced by their blacks being excited to revolt. This supposes—first, that these plans of conquest or revolution are contingent—depending upon the event of a conquest: if no Congress—then, not to be undertaken: if a Congress—then, to be undertaken. And stranger still is the further contingent depending on the event of a mission, or no mission; that the Congress, without this mission, will not undertake them: but, with this mission, will undertake them. It supposes these strange things: for if those plans—Congress or no Congress—mission or no mission—are resolved on, it is idle to urge that as an objection, which has no connection with either fact. Whether these plans of conquest or revolution are resolved on, or will be resolved on, or resolved against, we know not: but this we know—it is a question with which that Congress can have nothing to do. It is not within their commission: nor has their commission any reference to it. The powers of war and peace, and all other prerogatives of sovereignty, are expressly retained by the States. This Congress has no participation in them whatever. All their military—all their naval operations, whether for offence or defence, whether separate or confederate, are concerted and directed by the States themselves, independently of this Congress. This Congress has not the least particle of authority with regard to them. But if this body had delegated to it the military and naval concerns of the Confederacy, and the direction of their military and naval operations, as the report erroneously supposes, would not our remonstrances, made upon the spot, in that body and to that body, be likely to have some effect? Would not that be the very place where to exert our influence to prevent those attempts? And would it be prudent to forego the chances, and them the only favorable chances, of effecting so important an object to our country, as would be afforded by this mission? I think not. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina supposes, even then, our Minister, by going to the Congress, would compromise our neutrality with Spain. What, if he went there, among other things, for the express purpose of preventing an attempt against the possessions of Spain? Would an office of friendship to her, be a breach of neutrality towards her? Would an effort to protect her islands from invasion, be an act of hostility towards her? Will the learned gentleman say, that such is the doctrine of the law of nations on the subject of neutrality? Upon re-examination and reflection, I am confident he will not.

It is evident, that our Government has labored with much anxiety to prevent these or any enterprises against the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico; has still that object much at heart, and is bent on preventing them, if possible. Yet the very measure which the Executive has proposed, among other things, to augment his influence with those nations, to be exerted if occasion should require, the report represents as a measure that may become the means of promoting the very evil he is striving to prevent. How can it be, unless the Executive shall change his views? Or, unless his Ministers counteract his views, and favor those enterprises? The honorable gentleman from Virginia, who portrayed to us the calamities which might follow on in the train of these events, to affect our fellow-citizens in the South—who exhibited those calamities in a manner so affecting to every heart—who transported us to that scene of horrors which he described, and made us even seem to hear the cries of death from the cradle of reposing infancy; even he is not more anxious than our Executive to prevent these enterprises against Cuba and Porto Rico. It is strange, that, agreeing with the Executive in object, you should so differ in your opinion of the means! It is strange, that you should judge the means, which he deems useful, not only not useful, but detrimental to your common object! The President proposes means. How can that gentleman think them useless? Were he himself in that Congress, and that Congress were to agitate the project of exciting the blacks of Cuba to revolt; and that gentleman were to represent the calamities of the measure to arise to his friends and their friends in North America; to renew the picture of those calamities, as he had represented them to us, would it have no effect? My life upon it, I was going to say, the project would be abandoned. I do not know the gentlemen proposed for this mission; but this I know, that if they possess his powers of statement, and his energy of description, or powers any way resembling them, that their mission cannot be useless to the true interests of this country.

The gentleman has represented us of the North as coldly insensible to the possible perils of those of the South; as looking with stoical indifference to those perils: and as not unfavorable to the projects that would increase them. I should be sorry to believe that there was any foundation for this opinion. They mistake, I think, a spirit which is very partial and limited, for the general spirit of the North.

Debate on the Panama Mission in Secret Session.

[SENATE.]

I know that there is a wild spirit of fanaticism existing in that country, but not peculiar to it; the offspring of a virtuous sensibility, but unenlightened and unregulated by reason: bigoted to its abstractions, and disposed to push them universally, regardless of those considerations which ought to modify and to limit them; that sees nothing in circumstances that ought to check or control them, circumstances that control every thing; and are not to be controlled; that, to realize these abstractions, would risk the overthrow of the order, together with the happiness of a whole society—including that of those who are the objects of its visionary benevolence. I know that this spirit is formidable, and to be feared; but this is not the spirit of the North; all reasonable and reflecting men there (as the gentleman from South Carolina did us the justice to admit) abjure this spirit. They are not to learn, that even the virtues themselves, when pushed to their ultimate extremes, cease to be virtues, and operate as vices; that every society must conform to its circumstances; that this is its law; and not the abstract rights of humanity in any imaginary state of nature. They know, that if two distinct people exist in the same society, equally numerous, or nearly so, that one must be subordinate to the other; that not only the well-being, but the very being of that society depends upon it; that, if they forcibly and suddenly were put into a state of equality, a struggle would instantly ensue to re-establish the former condition; that it must be re-established, or that the one or the other people must be extinguished. The supremacy of the one people and the subjection of the other, is the necessary condition of such a society; and any attempt forcibly and suddenly to change it, is to attempt to change the nature of things; and however benevolent in intention, is criminal in fact. The gentleman, then, is mistaken, if he supposes that we see with indifference any events that would threaten them with this danger; such, for instance, as those revolutions in the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, which he has imagined, and which he deprecates so much and so justly. And if we do not sympathize in his fears, it is because we are persuaded that this measure, instead of leading to those revolutions, will have a contrary tendency; and is the best of all possible precautionary measures in our power to prevent them.

So much for this report. Let the honorable gentleman from Tennessee still say, if he will, that its reasoning is conclusive. The report says, that this mission will link our destinies with those of the Spanish American nations, and that the Congress at Panama will control both; I ask, is this proved? Is not the contrary made evident? The report says, that this mission will or may compromit our neutral relations; I ask, is this proved? Is not the contrary made evident? The report says, the mission may be unfavorable to our policy, of preventing the conquest or the revolutions of the Islands of Cuba and Porto Rico; I ask, is this proved? Is not the contrary made evident?

The theory of our constitution charges the Executive with the care of our foreign relations, and of the public interests connected therewith; it supposes him intimately acquainted with all those interests, and therefore possessed of the means of forming a correct opinion of the measures conducive to their advancement. This opinion, though not binding as authority, is yet, I think, entitled to much weight, as well as to much respect, in our deliberations. We have the Executive opinion in this case, under circumstances that entitle it to peculiar consideration. The credit of the Government, in the estimation of all those nations, is in a degree connected with the adoption of this measure; and that estimation ought not, in my opinion, lightly to be forfeited, nor unnecessarily impaired. I hope, therefore, that the resolution reported by the committee will not be adopted.

Mr. WOODBURY, of New Hampshire, in addressing the Senate observed, that he owed some apology for the violation of an injunction of silence, which circumstances had imposed upon him, in respect to the merits of the proposed mission to Panama. He had, from the first perusal of the documents, entertained but one opinion concerning its probable danger and impolicy. The able report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, against its expediency, remained unanswered. An early decision of the question seemed a favorite object with almost every member; and, therefore, he had supposed that little benefit would result from debate, until some gentleman of a different opinion about the mission should attempt to shake the premises or conclusions of that report. Nobody had made this attempt till the worthy member from Rhode Island, yesterday entered the field of argument. Such a version of the documents was then given and some such principles of action avowed, as tended to alarm my mind (said Mr. W.) about the accuracy of its previous convictions. Last evening, therefore, I devoted a few hours to the re-perusal of the President's confidential communications, under a fixed determination to renounce, as far as possible, every prepossession, and follow in my vote, whithersoever their facts and principles should direct. For, I must confess, that I never could acquiesce in the doctrine avowed by the ingenious gentleman before mentioned, that he was not obliged to vote for the resolution on your table, although unable to designate any error in the statements or reasonings of the report on which the resolution rests. Will he inform us why we are endowed with reason unless it is to be our guide in action? I must know him too well to believe, for a moment, he could intend to countenance the slavish position that we, of course, should vote against any resolution not conformable to Executive recommendation. But his mistake, probably, consisted in this: Conclusions which affirm facts contrary to all our experience, as that no external matter exists, though we are hourly striking our feet and hands against external substances, may well be doubted, however ingenious the reasoning; because, the facts themselves being contradicted by indubitable testimony, there must be some error in the data or inferences leading to such conclusions. But the resolution, that it is not now expedient to send Ministers to Panama, is not pretended to affirm any fact thus contradicted. So, conclusions which prostrate all distinctions between virtue and vice, may well justify us in doubting some of the statements or reasoning which produce them; because they embody what is palpably contrary to the moral law written on the hearts of all. But no one pretends that the resolution now under consideration possesses such a character; and, consequently, like most propositions in legislation and politics, it must be assented to, unless some one can discover and describe a fallacy in the grounds upon which it has been vindicated.

But the origin, object, actual power, and essential character, of the Assembly at Panama—called by whatever name, or its members by whatever title—appear, in some degree, in the documents before us; and, far as may be, I admit, must be settled by the treaties which created it, by the correspondence of the States interested, and by the official declarations of our own Cabinet. And when my friend from South Carolina adverted to pamphlets, manifestoes, and reviews, upon this point, it was only to exhibit more in detail what is essentially disclosed in the confidential communications now before us.

In a consideration of this question, I have not been surprised to find, that different gentlemen should fall into the ancient mistake of the two Dervises, about the true color of a column painted, and seen differently on different sides of the column. Because an inquiry into the papers will show that, probably, this Congress will possess some powers only temporary, and some perpetual—some peaceful and some belligerent—some limited and some sovereign—and, viewed in this double capacity, amphibious, hermaphrodite, and not designed for either of the above purposes exclusively, many discrepancies of opinion may be reconciled, and the nature and consequences of the mission may be better understood.

I have been utterly astonished, that any gentleman could read these documents, and still contend that this was not a belligerent Congress. What! a Congress, originating with those engaged in war; confined for years, in its incipient stages, to those only who are engaged in war; to be convened within the territories of those engaged in war; and having for its main objects, as again and again repeated, the triumphant prosecution of that very war; and yet a Congress, in no degree belligerent, and perfectly safe for neutrals to unite in? To remove all questions on this point, I will furnish gentlemen with evidence, till the most sceptical ought, I think, to be satisfied. Thus, in the treaty with Ohili, (Art. 894, p. 28,) it is stipulated, that this Congress of Panama shall fix their respective contingents or quotas of "sea and land forces" during the present war with Spain; and shall form "a rallying point in common dangers." By the treaty with Peru, (Preamble and third Article, page 38,) the cardinal object of the league is said to be to "maintain in common the cause of their independence," and this Congress is agreed to be, as before, "a rallying point in their common dangers." The treaty with Mexico is similar, they being "confederate forever in peace and war," and this Congress their "point of union in common danger." By the treaty with Guatemala, their design is avowed to be "to identify their principles and interests in peace and war," (preamble, page 80,) "to repel any attack or invasion from the enemies of either," (2d Art.) and, further, "that the objects contemplated by the preceding articles may be carried into effect, the Republic of Colombia engages to aid the United Provinces of Central America with that amount of its disposable naval and land forces, which shall be determined by the Congress of Plenipotentiaries to be mentioned hereafter," &c., (Art. 3 and 4,) and which is afterwards mentioned as the Congress "at the Isthmus of Panama," (Art. 19.) I would respectfully inquire, if gentlemen can point me to a parallel in the records of history of a neutral joining with "confederate belligerents," in a Congress like this? As this point has been principally combated, I may be indulged in a little farther examination of the opinion which the parties themselves—who best understand their own affairs—have expressed in other documents, concerning the paramount belligerent object and character of this Congress.

The Government of Colombia was the prime mover in this "perpetual league," and in its "common council" in the great conflict; and since our present session commenced, her Vice President has officially announced, that "in Panama the Plenipotentiaries of the new States of America are assembling to ratify, in the most solemn manner, our common determination to maintain and defend our national liberty and independence against the attempts of its enemies." Is it, then, a mere occasional Congress of Ambassadors, with no belligerent views? When our old Congress convened for similar purposes, would any European neutral, if invited, have deemed it safe to form a component part of such a Congress?

But I will not tax your indulgence by pursuing these inquiries further, or I could ask in another view, whether our mere presence at such an assembly, knowing, beforehand, its hostile objects, and uniting with them on a hostile soil, though disclaiming to join beyond certain of their deliberations, and dividing those as you may, would not alone be likely to give a "political importance," (as Mr. Salazar calls it, page 8,) to those Spanish States, in their belligerent attitude, which might be construed into aid and comfort; and which if given by a subject to an enemy, whether amounting to treason or not, would subject him to troublesome scrutinies; and which when given by one State to another, cannot be very far from a violation of the spirit of neutrality. But I hasten to other considerations. All my remarks, thus far, have proceeded on the hypothesis, that our actual intentions, in joining this Congress, were in every respect commendable, were entirely pacific, and in no degree connected with "the prosecution of the present war," or, as Mr. Olaj again expresses it, (28th December, 1825, page 8,) "with councils for deliberating on the means of its further prosecution." Are all our intentions so, in point of fact? I trust we are not to be deceived by any chaff scattered over this subject by the wiles of foreign diplomacy, or to deceive ourselves by any general professions, and loose protestations, not warranted by our acts. Foreign powers cannot be thus blinded; nor can the American people long be hoodwinked in this way into any "pledges" or "secret" alliances of co-operation with other nations, in support of any newborn theories, or any experimental principles, not conformable to our ancient policy and our true interests.

I aver, then, that, by the documents before us, whatever may be the verbiage on either side as to neutrality, the real objects, as disclosed on the side of Spanish America, in alluring us to this Congress at Panama, is to involve us in the end in the prosecution of the present war. I will attempt to show that she either believes, or pretends, that we have already given a pledge to join her in its prosecution in a certain contingency; that she invited us to unite in the Congress till about the time when she professed to believe that contingency would soon happen; and that, in all her correspondence as to the objects of our attendance, she thrusts forward into the first rank the discussions as to the mode of redeeming that pledge, and of rendering effectual our "co-operation" with her upon that ground. I will attempt to show also, that a part of our Cabinet must thus understand her, and that if we now confirm this mission for such an object, we do, by the very mission itself, bind ourselves, in a certain contingency, to future hostilities, unless we are willing to be branded as mere boasters and brawlers, who do not intend, in the end, to redeem our plighted faith.

In support of these positions, Mr. Obregon, in his letter of November 8d, 1825, (page 4,) states as the reason for inviting us to the Congress of Panama, that, "in the meeting of it, it was thought proper, by the Government of the subscriber, that the United States of America, by means of their commissioners, should constitute and take part, as being so much interested in the first and principal object upon which the Congress would be engaged." What is that object? Let the same gentleman answer.

"The resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain." He adds, that this subject "the late administration pointed out and characterized as being of general interest to the continent." He proceeds upon this point in language too explicit for misunderstanding: "The Government of the undersigned apprehends that, as the powers of America are of accord as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible forces that the evil may be met, if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation," &c. The opposition to colonization in America by the European powers, will be another of the questions which may be discussed, and which is in a like predicament with the foregoing. The two principal objects, therefore, which we are invited to discuss there, is the peaceful question of "resistance" to the interference of any other neutral nation in their present war; and of "resistance" "to colonization in America" by any European power; and there to settle "the means of giving to that resistance all possible forces,"—or, in other words, there to agree, by "a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation." Co-operation! how, or when! Of course, by money, troops, or vessels of war, whenever Naples, for example, may choose to aid Spain in her present contest; or whenever Sweden, for instance, may choose to purchase from her Cuba or Porto Rico.

There is no mistake on this point, as to the gist or essence of the mission. I care not for any formal flourishes concerning neutrality. Nations look to deeds, not words. What are the deeds to be done there, and in pursuance of what is done there? Mr. Salazar, like Mr. Obregon, November 2d, 1825, (page 7,) says, "the manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American continent shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest" to be discussed by us at Panama. "Were it proper, an eventual alliance, in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use should be made until the casus foderis should happen to remain secret," &c., would be different means "to secure the same ends," &c. "The conferences held on this subject being confidential," &c. Are we then so readily to slide into the snares of artful diplomacy? And are we, by this mission, to form "an eventual alliance" to maintain principles which have never yet been avowed but by one department of our Government, and which alliance is to be kept "secret" from the people and States whom we represent? Is it to be locked up here as "confidential," till the casus foderis happens, and then our Government branded as perfidious, unless they join in the war? What is a mere adoption of the mission, but an assent to this dangerous doctrine, that we are now pledged, and are willing to remain pledged, in certain events to take part in this foreign war—a war on the despotic principle of maintaining countries more remote from us than Europe itself, in a balance of power; a war on the reprobate principle—the principle contradicted by all the practice and professions of our early administrations—of interference in the internal concerns, transfers, colonizations, and controversies of other nations.

Nor is this view of the nature and tendency of these principles confined to the Spanish States. The Executive department of this Government must entertain similar notions, and are now virtually calling upon the other departments to oppose or reject them. The President himself merely speaks of "an agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting" at Panama on these points, (message, December 26, 1825.) But the Secretary of State to Mr. Poinsett, October 25, 1825, (page 57,) says, no longer than about three months ago, when an invasion by France, of the Island of Cuba, was believed at Mexico, the United Mexican Government promptly called on the Government of the United States, through you, to fulfill the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, of December, A. D. 1823; what they would have done, had the contingency happened, may be inferred from a despatch to the American Minister at Paris" &c. Then follows that despatch, dated October 25, 1825, in which he deliberately avows, that "we could not consent to the occupation of those islands by any other European power than Spain, under any contingency whatever." The same sentiment is repeated to Mr. Middleton, December 26, 1825, (page 47,) "we cannot allow a transfer of the Island (of Cuba) to any European power." Has it indeed come to this? that we are to tell the Autocrat of fifty millions he has not the same right to take a transfer of Porto Rico, as we had to take a transfer of Florida? Is this republicanism, equal rights, and received national law; or is it some marvellous discovery of the present age? And, are we prepared, by this mission, to back up, by a war, the menace to France, that, in no contingency whatever, shall she be allowed to occupy Cuba, although she buy it of Spain by as fair and as honest a treaty as that by which we purchased Louisiana of France herself?

Are these the doctrines of the American Congress, or of the American people? or do they savor of the Holy Alliance? Permit me again to repeat, that there is no mistake on these points. We act with our eyes open, and with the naked principle, exhibited in so many different postures, and in such bold relief, that, if the mission is once sent to enter into measures to enforce it, the die is cast forever, unless we prove perfidious and treasonable when the contingency occurs. Mr. Poinsett, 28th September, 1825, (page 54,) removes all doubt on the other point also; because, he says, "the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere either with their (Spanish American) independence or form of Government; and that, as in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we should be compelled to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest, it was not just that we should be placed on a less favorable footing than the other Republics of America, whose existence we were ready to support at such hazards."

But the United States as a Government, have not yet pledged themselves to any such entangling and despotic principle, in respect to any other nation whatever. They have not yet agreed to "bear the brunt of the contest" in any foreign war; nor support, "at such hazards," "the independence or form of government" of any nation or State, except our own nation and those of the States composing our own confederacy. Any such "agreement" would violate the constitution, and plunge us into a vortex of new coalitions and confederacies, abhorrent to every feeling of our most venerated fathers. Avowals of such principles, whether made by Mr. Monroe or others, are very justly on one occasion, styled by the Secretary, "uncalculating declarations."—(Letter to Mr. Poinsett, page 56.) But, after time to calculate and consider, let me ask, in the name of all which is sacred and holy, will gentlemen still pronounce a mission pacific, and safe, and expedient, whose confessed and leading object is to discuss "the means of giving" "all possible force" to our "co-operation" in such principles? and to settle the mode of that "co-operation" when we are called on "to bear the brunt of the contest"—to settle how many of our gallant sons are to find ignoble graves under the tropical sun of Guatemala, if some petty Hessian Prince should hire a regiment of infantry to Spain? or how many of our fearless seamen are to be sacrificed to prevent other nations from taking possession of Cuba or Porto Rico in the same manner we ourselves took possession of Louisiana and Florida?

Where, also, is the crisis—where the emergency to justify such an extraordinary measure? "Why quit our own, to stand on foreign ground?" Why join our fortunes in any case, much less in a useless war with powers of another origin—another tongue—another faith? Have we become incompetent to our self-defence? Are we in need of foreign "councils," and foreign "deliberations," to manage our own concerns? Or are we so moonstruck, or so little employed at home, as, in the eloquent language of our President on another occasion—when the sentiments expressed found a response in every patriot heart—as to wander abroad in search of foreign monsters to destroy? Speaking of America, and her foreign policy, he observed, "she has abstained from interference in the concerns of others, even when the conflict has been for principles to which she clings as to the last vital drop which visits the heart." "Whenever the standard and freedom of independence has been, or shall be unfurled, there will her heart, her benedictions and her prayers be. But she goes not abroad in search of monsters to destroy. She is the well-wisher to the freedom and independence of all. She is the champion and vindicator only of her own." —(Adams' Oration, 4th July, 1821.) This is the first time that the Legislative Department of our Government has ever been distinctly appealed to for its sanction to the new notions thus ably denounced by him; and if we now approve the Panama Congress, whose chief object is to enforce them, we at once adopt and approve the principle, that Spain has not, by such alliances as national law warrants, and as were formed on both sides in our own Revolution, any right to attempt to reconquer and recolonize South America; and further, that she has not, by such sales as national law warrants, and as we ourselves have partaken, any right to transfer Cuba or Porto Rico to any European power with whom she can agree upon the purchase money; and that these unprecedented and unjust positions we are willing to maintain at any sacrifice of blood and treasure.

Mr. WHITTE, of Tennessee, said, that, were he to be advised by his feelings, he should remain silent; but, when he reflected upon the relation in which he stood to the report now under consideration, a sense of duty compelled him to submit to the Senate, some of the views which his mind had taken of this subject.

The only question is, (said Mr. W.,) the expediency of the mission to Panama. The President has distinctly asked of us an opinion upon this question. (See his Message, page 1.)

Our advice is to be given as freemen not as slaves. In this course we serve the Executive, maintain the dignity and independence of the Senate, and promote the best interests of the United States. If the mission should not be advised, we give no cause of offence to the Spanish American States. The evidences heretofore given of our friendship for them, in acknowledging their independence, and interposing our good offices to effect it, ought to shield us against any suspicion of unfriendly feelings towards them at present. The President will likewise comply with the only promise made to those who have tendered the invitation, his acceptance of it having been conditional, "if the Senate advise," &c. (See document, page 10.)

The subject is then fairly before us, for the exercise of our best judgment, without a fear that any promise of the Executive will be violated, should the Senate disagree with him in opinion: but even if this were not so, we could not, without a shameful dereliction of duty, offer any thing, as our advice, but the result of our best judgment.

Mr. President, I object to sending Ministers for the purpose of discussing and coming to any agreement or convention upon this subject. It is not true, as far as I am advised, that the United States stand pledged to take part in this war, in any event whatever. Nothing can bind us to go to war with any nation, but a declaration made in the proper form, and by the proper department of this Government. The Executive cannot declare war, but I admit he may pursue a course of policy which will justify other nations in making war upon us. Congress has taken no step, has done no act, has passed no law, by which we are bound to unite with these new States in their war of independence, upon any contingency whatever. The Executive had no power to bind the United States by any pledge he could give. But what has he done? The groundwork of this pretended pledge, it seems, is found in President Monroe's Message, of December, 1823. It contains no pledge—it is a general declaration to his own Congress, of the sentiment which would be felt if any neutral should interfere on the side of Spain. Notwithstanding that declaration the United States were still at liberty, consistent with their honor, to take part with the new States, or omit to do so, as the wisdom of Congress might judge best, when any neutral power did take part with Spain. This declaration had a good effect. Not wishing to give offence to the United States, it may have prevented some of the European States from taking part with Spain. The new States have had the full benefit of this declaration. Thus the matter appears to have rested, till the close of Mr. Monroe's administration. Since the new administration came into power, it seems that, upon the appearance of a French fleet in our seas, some of the new States called upon the Executive to redeem the pledge which had been given. Upon this application, in place of correcting the mistake upon this subject, it would appear from the documents with which we are furnished, the Administration admitted that which I do not see was the fact, that a pledge had been given, and directed Mr. Brown, our Minister in France, to ask an explanation, &c. Upon this point, however, I think we are still in the dark; we have no copy of the application from the new States, nor of our answer to them. These documents would have shown how far our new administration have gone towards compelling us to take part in this war. It is very singular that, after all the calls for information which the Senate have been compelled to make, upon this important business, there is still a want of documents that would probably be useful. But, if we are at liberty to judge from the correspondence between Mr. Poinsett and the Mexican Minister, and from Mr. Secretary's letter to Mr. Poinsett, it does really seem that the Executive has admitted to Mexico, that we have given a pledge, which we may be called on to redeem, whenever the contingency shall occur. Of this pledge the people of these States are yet uninformed. I feel persuaded they have no idea we stand pledged upon any contingency to embark in the war with these new States, whether it may compete with our interest or not. This is an inadvertence which cannot be corrected too soon. If we send Ministers, and an agreement is entered into, then, indeed, will the United States be pledged. We now know the object—we see the predicament in which we are placed; and with this knowledge, if Congress can be induced to give its sanction to this measure, and this pledge of the Executive is refined into an agreement, by which the United States shall be bound to furnish men, money, ships, &c., in aid of the new States, whenever any power, now neutral, may choose to take part with Spain, then, indeed, shall I think this nation has given a pledge, one that it may cost us too much to redeem, when the casus fœderis shall happen.

Mr. President, I go one step farther and insist, if you do send Ministers, and they discuss this subject, and enter into the proposed agreement, so far as you have power over the matter, your neutrality is not only broken, but you are in a state of war, and that with any and every power that is now neutral, and may hereafter elect to take a part with Spain. This is a dilemma from which we cannot escape, without disgrace. Send Ministers, make the agreement—and the question of peace, or war, is not with us; and, at any moment afterwards any European, or even American nation can put you at war, whether it may suit your interest or not.

I object to sending Ministers for the discussion of any such subject, or for the accomplishment of any such object. Even if we believed that such a state of things would probably be produced, as to make it proper for us to take a part in this war, I would still be opposed to any agreement by which we will become bound to do so. It is impossible now to foresee what may best comport with the interest of the United States at any subsequent period; and they ought to be left free to act, unfettered by any agreement whatever, as their interest or honor may require, when some other power does actually interfere.

It is vain to say, we are not to take a part in any belligerent question; that our neutrality is not to be violated; that we are not to engage in any thing importing hostility to any other power; while this proposition is presented to us. One of the Ministers who gave the invitation classes the subjects to be discussed into belligerent and peaceful, and states that the United States are not expected to take any part in the first; but, in the last, they are, and, in this class, he specifies this very subject. Does this make it peaceful? Surely not. It is belligerent. I admit it is not an absolute stipulation to take part in the war, and, therefore, some may feel justified in saying it does not import hostility; yet, it is undoubtedly an agreement to take part upon the happening of a certain contingency. It will import hostility upon a certain condition, which contingency or condition is not within the control of the United States.

But after the report of the committee had been made, the gentleman from New York thought it might be well to know in what spirit Spain had received the mediation of the Emperor of Russia, and he submitted a resolution asking information upon this point, from the President, and this resolution produced the information communicated by Mr. Everett to our Government. And how does it correspond with the complexion previously given to the case? It shows that the opinion entertained, that Spain would recognize the independence of the new States, was destitute of any plausible evidence to support it—that Spain is determined to persevere in the war, until these States are reduced to their former condition—that she expects a struggle in her behalf within these States themselves—that she will procure assistance either from France, or from some other European nation; and, finally, that, as these colonies are hers of right, if all other resources fail, the Supreme Being will miraculously interpose, and put her again in possession of those rights, attempted to be wrested from her improperly. To many, I believe I might say to all, it appeared strange that this correspondence should not have been communicated, when that from Mr. Middleton and Count Nesselrode was furnished, because the Secretary, in answer to the resolution which caused the transmission of that, says, it “opens a wide field, and might be made to embrace all the Foreign relations;” and yet, by some oversight, the information most important was entirely omitted. With this evidence before us, it would seem that he who will insist that there is even a probability that the Spanish King will speedily acknowledge the independence of these States, must be as incapable of reasoning correctly, as is that King himself.

So far as we have the means of judging, this war is to be continued, and it becomes a very important question to settle in our own minds the direction it will most probably take. It appears to me that, if we consult the documents before us, we can come to a satisfactory conclusion upon this point, so far, at least, as we are concerned. These new States are now struggling for their independence—infatuated Spain will not acknowledge it—they will very naturally recur to such measures as will be most likely to injure her, and thereby compel her to do that which, if reasonable, she would do without compulsion. They will be sure to strike where it can be done with most effect, where she will feel most sensibly. Look at the correspondence between the Secretary of State and Mr. Middleton, between Mr. Middleton and Count Nesselrode, and between Mr. Clay and the Ministers of Colombia and of Mexico, and say if you are not convinced they will strike Spain through her colonies in Cuba and Porto Rico. These colonies are convenient to the new States: they have expelled the enemy from their own Territory; they will probably stimulate a portion of the inhabitants of those islands to rebel, to declare themselves independent of Spain; and, by uniting their forces with those revolted subjects, endeavor to put down the Spanish authorities in those islands. What consequences are likely to flow from such a measure? Russia, probably, and France almost certainly, would then immediately take part with Spain, in the war. From the documents, we have evidence that they would have strong inducements to interpose immediately. It is their wish that Spain should retain her dominion over those islands, because then that balance would be kept up in the seas where those islands are situate, which those powers think ought to be preserved.

Mr. President: I pass to the next subject specified. It is to discuss and agree upon the means to be employed for the entire abolition of the slave trade. Of all subjects that could be thought of, none would be found more unfortunate than this. It was hoped, that, after rejecting the convention with Colombia upon this subject, the Senate would hear no more of it from foreigners. If slavery is an affliction, all the Southern and Western States have it, and with it, their peculiar modes of thinking upon all subjects connected with it. In these new States, some of them have put it down in their fundamental law, "that whoever owns a slave shall cease to be a citizen." Is it then fit that the United States should disturb the quiet of the Southern and Western States, by a discussion and agreement with the new States, upon any subject connected with slavery? I think not. Can it be the desire of any prominent politician in the United States, to divide us into parties upon the subject of slavery? I hope not. Let us then cease to talk of slavery in this House; let us cease to negotiate upon any subject connected with it. The United States have, by their own laws, put an end to the slave trade, so far as their citizens, or their vessels, are concerned in it—more than this, they ought not to attempt. Let other nations discharge their duty as well, and the slave trade, so called, will be abolished.

One word more upon this point, Mr. President, and I will dismiss it. If there be any gentlemen in the United States who seriously wish to see an end of slavery, let them cease talking and writing, to induce the Federal Government to take up the subject, because, by the course now pursued, by some, they are protracting a measure which they profess a wish to hasten the accomplishment of. Whenever the States, in which slavery exists, feel it as an evil too intolerable, move towards its removal at home, and apply, through their Legislatures, to this Government for aid to abolish it, then, and not sooner, we may discuss it within these walls.

4th. We are invited to attend and settle "the basis of our relations to Hayti, and others, that may be in the like circumstances," &c.

tive from Hayti is invited to attend this Congress? It appears to me that it will be very unfair to settle this question, where that Government is unrepresented. It is, therefore, most probable her Minister is to be there likewise. Reflect, Mr. President, upon the population of that country, and upon that of a portion of our own, as well as upon the peculiar modes of thinking in Spanish America, and then let honorable gentlemen say whether they think this will be a fit subject for discussion. It is a question which the American statesmen must settle for themselves, and by themselves. Our situation, in relation to this subject, is so peculiarly delicate, that I cannot suppose any real friend to the Union would propose that it should be settled at the Congress at Panama. The suggestion of such a project may be readily excused in a foreigner; but in an American citizen it would be highly inexcusable.

Mr. President: I have now made some remarks upon each of the subjects specifically mentioned in the invitations we have received, and have insisted that it is unfit we should take any part in their discussion; and that, if fit, it would be unwise in us to enter into any agreement or convention respecting them, and here the question very naturally presents itself: If we do accept these invitations, and send Ministers, will they not be considered bound to discuss, and decide upon each of these subjects? I respectfully submit that they will. An attention to the facts will, I think, inevitably lead to this conclusion. Last spring, these Ministers asked if the United States would accept an invitation, if formally given? The Secretary of State, by command, answers—"Specify the subjects to be discussed, the mode in which the Congress will be organized, and the manner of its action, and we will then give you an answer."

Under date of the 2d, 8d, and 14th of November last, these Ministers tender formal invitations, and specify these subjects, as a part of those in the discussion of which we are expected to take a part; and on the 30th of the same month, the Secretary of State accepts the invitation, if the Senate will concur, and gives no notice that any one of the subjects is considered, by the President, as unfit for us to discuss and agree upon.

Suppose, then, our Ministers to be appointed—when they arrive at Panama, will not those who gave the invitations consider that the United States have agreed to discuss and decide upon each of these questions in particular, and upon such others as the proceedings of the Congress may give rise to? If we object to the discussion of either of the specific propositions, will we not be told, Your Government asked us to specify the subjects, for the purpose of enabling it to determine whether they could send Ministers to take a part; we did specify them in our invitations, and when those invitations were accepted, you ought to have notified us that, in the discussion of some of these subjects, you could take no part; as you did not do so, we consider you pledged to aid in deliberating upon each of them. What answer could we give to such an argument? None, that I can think of, unless one could be derived from the general statement of our Secretary, that we could not take part in any belligerent question. The reply would be immediately given—"The abolition of the slave trade," "the relations we shall bear to Hayti," &c., are surely peaceful, not belligerent questions; and the questions relating to colonization and to resistance, if any neutral power should take part with Spain, were specified by us as falling within the same class, to which you made no objection whatever; and, therefore, we were not at liberty to suppose your general declaration had any relation to either of them; and, if we had suspected you did not intend to take part with us in considering those subjects, we would, most surely, have given you no invitation whatever.

To this reply I know not what satisfactory answer we could give. I, therefore, consider, if we send Ministers, they will go pledged to discuss and decide upon each of these questions. Thus circumstanced, it would seem to me to be the only safe plan for us to abstain from advising the President that the mission is expedient.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said: We have been invited by the Governments of Colombia, Mexico, and Guatemala, to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama. The President has expressed a willingness to accept the invitation, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and we are now to give that advice. The respect and courtesy which distinguish the intercourse of nations—which ought especially to belong to the existing relations with them—would seem to require that the invitation should be met in the amicable spirit in which it is offered, unless it involves a departure from our duty or our policy. But I do not place the argument on that ground. There are objects of great and pressing concern to this country, and of deep and vital interest to that portion which I represent, which call for the immediate interposition of this Government. I regret to differ with the Representatives of that interest here, with regard to the mode of obtaining our object; while there is no difference of opinion with regard to the extent of the evil or the magnitude of the danger. There are other objects, of a general nature, which recommend this mission to us, to which it will be my duty to advert in the course of my remarks.

It has been assumed in debate, that the acceptance will involve a violation of our neutrality, and that all the objects are either dangerous, inexpedient, or unnecessary. I mean to meet this argument fairly. The question turns upon it. I freely admit that, if, as it has been strongly urged, by both the gentlemen who preceded me, (Mr. WHITE and Mr. HAYNE,) this was a Confederacy of American States, of which we should form a part; if this was a belligerent Congress, and we should sit in council with them, to deliberate on those belligerent questions, vote with them, and be bound by them, there is no doubt of the manner it would affect our neutrality, and the consequences to which it would lead. But, if these facts are not true, but assumed—if they are not warranted by the documents, but inferred—it will as clearly follow, that there is no ground for the argument, and the whole of the superstructure will fall with it; and to this issue I bring the debate.

A Confederacy, for certain specified objects, has been formed by the Spanish American States. It is expressly declared to be composed "of the States of America formerly Spanish"—"of the ci-devant Spanish American States." This Confederacy is already formed by mutual conventions, which are now before us; for objects peculiar to themselves. To this league we are not parties, even in contemplation. The purpose of it is foreign to us; we have no war; we are not threatened with invasion; we want no alliance; we require no rallying point; we have no motive to change our present happy and peaceful relations. Although we have recently formed treaties with each of them, there has been no such convention proposed to us; nor is it anywhere suggested, but in debate, that we are to form a part of the league. As we were not originally a part of the Confederacy, we could not now be admitted without a new compact, and without violating the commercial rights and interests of the parties under it. This compact could not be formed, certainly, without a treaty, which would require the ratification of this body. There is no provision for the admission of new States. The union is limited to those who had a common interest. We have been invited with peculiar caution and delicacy, not as a member of the family, but as a guest; not to a Congress of which we were a party, but as a friend and visitor; to afford them an opportunity of manifesting to us the sentiments of kindness and friendship with which they are animated.

These Spanish American States have been engaged in a war of Revolution. They have achieved their independence; all the force of Spain has been driven from the continent. But, as Spain refuses all terms with them, and may renew the war upon either, the most exposed or the most feeble; as she will concentrate all her power upon a given point; as the occupation of any position on the continent will form a basis of operations on which to act against all the rest; as it will become the rallying point of all her adherents, and enable them to prolong the war—it became necessary to unite for the common defence of all, and mutually to guarantee peace, security, and independence.

In such a compact it was not our duty, our policy, or inclination, to engage; and, accordingly, we find that no proposition was made to us to become a party, and all the communications speak with the most guarded precautions, and the most explicit avowals. To believe that they intended to unite us in their councils, or to draw us into their measures, would be to arrive at this conclusion, not only without evidence, but against all evidence, and in the face of the most solemn assurances. This alliance of Spanish American States is already formed. The parties that compose it, the principles on which it is based, the obligations it imposes, and the means to be employed, are fully set forth in the convention before us; to which I confidently refer.

But suppose we were to take part in the discussion of belligerent measures, what part should we take? It is our interest and our duty to keep Cuba as it is: a movement there would be dangerous to us. The Secretary of State has said, we desire to see Cuba remain as it is. The President has, on a memorable occasion, said: "We cannot view with indifference the interposition of any European nation." We should, therefore, advise them to husband their strength and resources—to secure what they have gained. We should dissuade them from striking at that island—a measure, perhaps, fatal to them, and injurious to us.

How, then, can we participate in any belligerent measure? or any act prejudicial to Spain? or any act inconsistent with our faith, our honor, or our neutrality?

But, if, contrary to all expectation, the character of this assembly, and our motives in sending this mission, should be misconceived, and beget suspicion, the President ought and would remove it, by amicable explanations.

Our conduct has been always distinguished by frankness and good faith. There is nothing in this affair to conceal—nothing doubtful—nothing that we cannot avow—as we have heretofore done every thing connected with these Republics, in the face of the world. Certainly, if we do not take part in this Congress, even in respect to its defensive alliance, and we make these friendly explanations, no nation will believe that we mean to take part, except to produce peace.

But, if the President was disposed to do wrong, and should make a treaty, (which is not even imagined,) it would not be binding. It must receive the sanction of the Senate, and if, in the language of the report, "the power possessed by the Senate, of withholding its assent, ought not to be regarded as a sufficient assurance against the possible and probable effects of the proposed measure," there is another and a double assurance, to wit: that the President and Senate cannot commit this country in a war—it requires "An act of Congress."

There is nothing peculiar in the present case. The President has, at all times, the power to commit the peace of this country, and involve us in hostilities, as far as he has power in this case. To him is confided all intercourse with foreign nations. To his discretion and responsibility is intrusted all our delicate and difficult relations: all negotiations and all treaties are conducted and brought to issue by him. He speaks in the name and with the authority of this Government with all the powers of Europe. That confidence has never been deceived. The character, talent, and public virtue, which placed them in that high station, is the guarantee of their conduct. Their own fame, their love of country, make it their interest and their duty to cultivate peace, commerce, and honest friendship, with all nations: and all the motives of self-love and ambition conspire to ensure from them, as from us, a faithful discharge of the trust confided to them by the constitution and the country. But there must be confidence. No Government can exist without it. And this distrust and jealousy of the Executive will destroy all power to do good, and all power to act efficiently.

The whole of the argument which I have attempted to refute, is founded on the fact, that we are to form an alliance, to confederate with them, to make common cause. The answer is, there is not a fact to warrant the assumption; and not a man in America will believe that this Government had such a measure in view; and yet we hear that this is a measure involving the dignity and neutrality of the United States, the fundamental principles of the Union, and the peace and security of a great subdivision of the Confederacy.

I conclude that this meeting of diplomatic agents is for convenience and facility of action; that they are to act ministerially; and that, therefore, what is done will be done in the usual diplomatic form, by conventions: which, in that case, must be negotiated under instructions from the Executive, and be referred back to the Senate for ratification; and, if it was a legislative assembly, then we are not parties to it, nor members of it; nor has the Executive power to enter such a body—certainly not without a formal act of this Government—and if he did authorize such an intercourse, it would not be obligatory on us. So that all these dangers are imaginary, and conjured up to frighten and alarm.

Mr. President, much has been said about a pledge. It is now the policy to make an impression that some secret understanding has taken place; some unknown and mysterious arrangement, which the Government will now be bound, in honor and good faith, if this mission is sent, to carry into effect.

The gentleman from Tennessee inquires what this pledge is; and the gentleman from South Carolina intimates strongly that this Government has given a pledge. The declaration of the President admonished neutral nations not to interfere with Spain and her colonies. It was a distinct and positive enunciation of the views of this Government. It was supposed, at the time, to mean something. By some, it has been termed a protest; by others a pledge; but more properly designated as the memorable declaration. No other or different assurance has been given to strengthen the connections with these new States. But admit there was: all motive to treat on that subject now has ceased; there is now no danger, or even expectation, that the contingency will ever happen; and if we cannot rely upon the assurance of the President, that no alliance will be formed, we may rely upon the fact that no pledge has been given, by the inference arising from the fact, that Mexico refused to place us on the footing of the most favored nations. If we had given the pledge to protect her independence, there would have existed no reason for the distinction taken between us and the other American States.

Mr. President: I shall draw the attention of the Senate now to the consideration of some of those subjects which I deem of public interest, which have been suggested as proper for discussion, by our Ministers at Panama. I am met here by a sweeping declaration of the committee in their report—"That they have not been able to discover, among the objects particularly designated, a single subject, concerning which the United States ought to enter into any negotiation with the States of America assembled at Panama;" and in the argument, they have been boldly denounced as either dangerous, inexpedient, or unnecessary, or improper. I trust I have shown that many of the dangers which were imagined, are groundless. That arising from being a member of this new Confederacy, which rendered the mission unconstitutional—that arising from the fear of contracting alliances, which would violate our neutrality—that arising from a supposed pledge to make common cause, which might involve us in war—that arising from the interference of neutral or allied powers of Europe in this contest, which might threaten our peaceful condition—these have been fully, I hope satisfactorily, explained.

Among the events of greatest magnitude, and most anxious concern to this country, is the future condition of Cuba. We know that Colombia and Mexico have long contemplated the independence of that island. It has probably been delayed by want of concert, and by our mediation to produce peace. But we now know that the fortune of that island is now to be settled. They have waited for a favorable moment to attack them with a certainty of success, by the greater forces which the alliance of all the sections of the South and Mexico will procure. The final decision is now to be made, and the combination of forces and plan of attack to be formed.

With regard to the effect of that mission upon us, there is no difference of opinion. It is deprecated by all, as equally dangerous to our peace and their safety. What, then, at such a crisis, becomes the duty of this Government? Send your Ministers instantly to this Diplomatic Assembly, where this measure is maturing. Advise with them—remonstrate—menace them, if necessary, against a step so dangerous to us, and perhaps fatal to them. Urge them to be satisfied with what they have achieved—to establish their Governments—consolidate their Union—improve their resources. Guard them against the madness and folly of this enterprise. Warn them of the danger of provoking the allies to take part with Spain. Admonish them of their duty and obligation they owe to themselves, to us, and to all Europe—not to disturb the peace and repose of the world. Our advice will be respected, and the danger averted. The consequences of this event in Cuba have been depicted in lively colors, but not too highly drawn. There is no difference of opinion with regard to the consequences which must ensue.

The establishment of principles of a liberal commercial intercourse, is another subject well entitled to deliberate consultation with the Spanish American States. It is well known that an idea has prevailed among them of giving special favors to each other, and of discriminating between the commerce and navigation of the United States, and American States formerly Spanish. Mexico still adheres to the justice of this principle, and has refused to sign a treaty on the basis of equality and reciprocity, after a full discussion. The other States have adopted the principle of equality. But as treaties are temporary—as this great question is to be again discussed—and as a uniform system for all will be adopted—it seems of great moment to secure to our navigation the benefits of that extensive and increasing commerce. But the reference of this subject is opposed in the report, on a principle as new in diplomacy as it is novel in the practice of nations; and founded on refinements in liberality and disinterestedness, utterly incompatible with the rights and advantages which it is the duty of every Government to secure to its citizens.

With regard to the policy of mitigating the practice and laws of nations in maritime war, and of establishing the same rules that have obtained in other wars—to exempt non-combatants and private property from its operations, there can be but one opinion here. Such a modification of the public law on the ocean, would deprive war of most of its destructive and unhappy consequences; would cause the war now permitted against regular commerce and private rights, producing disorders, violence, and crimes, ruinous to one class by making them a prey to the needy and desperate adventurers, who rob and plunder by commission, and demoralizing in its influence on all—to cease to disgrace the code of civilized nations; and this object is worthy the profound attention of this Government, and of the enlightened age in which we live.

The condition of Hayti is another subject, not alluded to by the President, and only intended to be alluded to by Mr. Salazar.

Debate on the Panama Mission in Secret Session.

[SENATE.]

With regard to the relations with that country, no change is desired—none will take place here. It may be proper to express to the South American States, the unalterable opinion entertained here in regard to intercourse with them. It will have its due weight and influence in their councils, and, I hope, it will be effectual. The unadvised recognition of that island, and the public reception of their Ministers, will nearly sever our diplomatic intercourse, and bring about a separation and alienation, injurious to both. I deem it of the highest concern to the political connection of these countries, to remonstrate against a measure so justly offensive to us, and to make that remonstrance effectual.

I trust I have shown, that, if this mission is not due to courtesy, it is due to a just estimate of our essential interests. It is due to friendship, to peace, to commerce, to our principles; it can do no injury—it may do good—it will do good.

Mr. VAN BUREN, of New York, said: The subject before us presents a question entirely new. It is one, too, of intense interest, involving considerations which, when once fully understood, cannot fail to excite the deep solicitude of our constituents, and ought to fill us with proportionate anxiety. It has grieved me to hear it announced, on different occasions, and in various forms, that gentlemen had so definitively made up their minds as to render discussion unavailing. I venture to affirm, that a similar course has never been pursued in a deliberative assembly. Cases have occurred, where the sinister designs of a factious minority have been defeated by a refusal to reply to speeches made after a subject had been fully discussed, and with the sole view of embarrassing the operations of Government; but to commence the consideration of a great national measure with the declaration, on the part of its advocates, that it ought to be settled by a silent vote, is an occurrence, in the annals of legislation, which, as it now stands without precedent, will remain, I trust, forever, without imitation.

It is not for me to advise those with whom I differ in opinion: nor am I disposed to arrogate a privilege to which I have no claim. I will, however, with permission, and in all kindness, entreat gentlemen to re-consider the propriety of a course which cannot, I am persuaded, receive the sanction of their deliberate judgments. Let each determine for himself whether it will read well in the history of this measure, that its progress through this House has been marked by a circumstance of so extraordinary a character. Entertaining an entire confidence in the motives of gentlemen, I will still encourage the hope, that they will diffuse the light which has brought conviction to their minds; and, as far as practicable, divest themselves of all predetermination. This hope alone induces me to trespass, for a moment, on the time of the Senate.

Nothing can contribute more to a just decision of the question before us, than a correct understanding of what that question is. I will endeavor to state it.

A Congress of Deputies from several of the Spanish American States is to be held at the Isthmus of Panama. The objects, powers, and duties, of the Congress, are set forth in certain treaties, formed by those of whom the Congress will be composed.

The United States were not parties to these treaties; but, subsequently to their formation, it was thought advisable by some of the States, to invite us to join them. Foreseeing the difficulties which might prevent an acceptance of their invitation, and unwilling to impose the necessity of a refusal, these States, with a commendable delicacy, made an informal application to our Government, to know if it would be agreeable to it, that such an invitation should be given. On receiving this intimation, the President had before him the choice of one of several courses. If he believed that the attendance of an authorized agent of the United States at Panama, with suitable instructions, would be beneficial, it was competent for him to have sent a private agent, at the public expense, with proper credentials. If he had thought it more advisable, because more respectful, he might have directed our Ministers at Colombia and Mexico, or either of them, to repair to the proposed seat of the Congress, instructed to express the interest we take in the success and prosperity of the States there assembled; to explain to them the principles of our policy, and the reasons which dissuaded our Government from uniting in the Congress; and to communicate whatever else, in the opinion of the Executive, the interests of the United States required. Or he might have expressed his desire, that the invitation to the United States to be represented in the proposed Congress, should be given; and as far as his constitutional power extended, determined to accept it. He has chosen the latter; and if the Senate approve, and Congress make the necessary appropriation, his decision will of course supersede any other steps which might have been taken. But if the Senate do not approve, or Congress refuse the appropriation, either of the other measures may still be adopted. Their execution is within the constitutional competency of the Executive, and the contingent fund will supply the means. It will be seen, therefore, that the question is not whether measures shall be taken to avail ourselves of all attainable advantages from the Assembly of the Spanish American States, but whether they shall be of the character, and in the form proposed. That form is, to send a representation on the part of the United States, to the Congress of Panama, according to the invitation given to our Government, and its conditional acceptance. I cannot give my advice and consent to this measure; and in assigning the reasons for my dissent, I hope to be excused for omitting to notice some of the topics so largely dwelt on in former debates, on the subject of Spanish American affairs; such as the geographical description and great extent of these States, the character of their inhabitants, moral, physical, and intellectual, the injustice of their first enslavement, the odious tyranny practised upon them for a succession of ages, and the cruelties inflicted by their unnatural mother during the war of independence. Subjects which, although they may at times have produced some of the finest effusions of genuine patriotism, have also not unfrequently been the theme of wild and enthusiastic, not to say frothy and unprofitable declamation. We have had enough of such essays.

I will not say that they have become stale, because I would not so speak of any honest efforts in the cause of public liberty. For the present, at least, they would be misdirected. The condition of things is changed. Affairs have advanced. The colonies, whose distressed condition has occasioned these strong appeals to our sympathies, are now of right, and in fact, free and sovereign States. Their independence has been deliberately recognized by us and other powers, in the face of the world; and, though not yet acknowledged by Spain, (or likely soon to be,) is held by as good a tenure, and stands, I hope, upon as firm a basis, as our own. They have severed the tie which bound them to the mother country; and, unlike ourselves, have achieved their liberation by their own unaided efforts. As they have thus won an honorable station among independent States, it becomes our imperative duty to treat with them as such. In our intercourse with them, as with all, it should be our first and highest concern to guard, with anxious solicitude, the peace and happiness of our own country; and, in the fulfilment of this duty, to reject every measure, however dazzling, which can have a tendency to put these great interests at hazard. Whether the measure now proposed will endanger those interests, or whether there is not reasonable ground to apprehend it, is the question. To this will my observations be directed, alike regardless of all extraneous excitement, and indifferent to the unmerited suspicion of being lukewarm in the cause of South American liberty.

The first points which naturally present themselves for our consideration, are the character of the Congress, and the limitations under which it is proposed that the United States should become a party. In the former are embraced the objects of the Assembly, present and future; the powers of the Deputies; its duration, whether temporary or permanent, and its manner of acting, whether legislative or diplomatic. In the latter are embraced the portion of the concerns of the Congress, in which the United States are invited to participate, and the manner of that participation. Upon some, if not all these points, it must be admitted we are without satisfactory information. But the fault, if fault there be, in this particular, does not lie at our door. There was a time when the Executive required, as a condition precedent to the acceptance of the invitation, an adjustment of several preliminary points, such as "the subject to which the attention of Congress was to be directed;" the nature and form of the powers to be given to the diplomatic agents who were "to compose it, and the mode of its organization and action." But that condition was afterwards, and I cannot but think improvidently, dispensed with. When this subject was first laid before us, we were furnished with no evidence upon some of the points referred to, except the tittle that could be gleaned from the letters of invitation: it was not until the 10th of January, in compliance with the call of the Senate, of the 4th, that the treaties, in virtue of which the Congress is to be held, were sent to us. Sir, the inroads, which the insinuating, not to say, insidious influence of Executive authority has made upon the rights and privileges of this body, from which so much was expected by the framers of the constitution, are great indeed. This remark is not made with particular reference to the present Executive. The history of our Government for many years presents an unbroken series of similar encroachments. The relation in which the President stands to the Senate, when acting under the treaty-making power, is essentially different from the other relations prescribed by the constitution. He has Executive duties to discharge, in which the Legislature have no participation; duties which ordinarily commence, when theirs have terminated. Information in his possession, relating to that branch of his public duties, it is his right to communicate or withhold from Congress, as, in his opinion, may best subserve the public interest. By the constitution, also, the exclusive right of nomination to office is given to him, and the Senate are called on only, to approve, or disapprove. There, too, he acts distinct from us, and possesses a discretion, though perhaps more limited, with regard to the communication of information. But on the subject of treaties the case is evidently different. They are to be made "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Upon that subject every step, preliminary, as well as final, ought, in the spirit of the constitution, to be submitted to the Senate. The practice of conceding to the Executive the preliminary steps in a negotiation, first adopted from convenience and since acquiesced in from habit, is now considered by some as an unquestioned right. But in the early administration of the Government it was different. General Washington, pursuing the spirit of the constitution, before commencing any new negotiation, laid before the Senate the views of the Executive, the instructions proposed to be given to ministers, and all the information in his possession, and then asked the benefit of their council. He appears to have thought the information necessary to both should be viewed in all respects as the common property of both. But now, instead of those full and explicit communications, a portion only of the requisite information is sparingly doled out—just enough to satisfy the successive calls of the Senate; calls always made with reluctance, because considered by some as implying an unwillingness to communicate what may be desired. It will be recollected, that it was not until the 2d of February that the Senate obtained the information upon which it consented to act. It is not my intention to impute to the Executive a disposition to suppress any thing connected with this subject. I have no reason to believe that these views exist. It is to the practice itself, which he found on entering into office, that I have deemed this a proper opportunity to object, not without a hope that a remedy may be applied. It is known to every member of the Senate, that, from this cause on the subject before us, its deliberations have been embarrassed, and its action impeded.

Hoping to be excused from a digression not wholly irrelevant, I shall proceed to the discussion of the subject.

What is the character of the Congress of Panama, first, as it respects the Spanish American States, by whom it is constituted, and secondly, the footing on which our Representatives are to stand? Is it to be, as asserted by the gentleman from Rhode Island, a mere Diplomatic Council, held for convenience in negotiation, with power to make and receive proposals, but without authority to bind the represented States? or is it to be an efficient public body, the permanent organ of a confederation of free States, formed for great national purposes? In short, is it to be an advising or an acting body?

The treaties between the Republics of Colombia, and those of Peru, Chili, Mexico, and Guatemala, formed in the years 1822, 1823, and 1825, so far as they relate to the institution and character of the Congress, are alike. By these treaties, a permanent league and confederation, in peace and war, is established among the parties: containing guarantees of the territories of the respective States, and stipulating for contributions in ships, men, and money, for the common defence. In a word, they provide for the union and application of their joint means, for the purpose of promoting the general good of the Confederate States, reserving to each its sovereignty in whatever relates to its internal concerns, and certain portions of its foreign relations.

Now, for the purpose of simplifying the question, permit me to ask, can the two specific objects and duties of the Congress, viz: the interpretation of treaties, and the umpirage of all disputes and differences between the confederate States, be effected upon the limited construction now, for the first time, given to its powers; a construction resorted to, and enforced with much ingenuity, by the gentleman from Rhode Island, when the dangerous steps we are about to take are fully presented to his view? Upon further reflection, that gentleman cannot fail to detect the fallacy of the reasoning, by which he has been induced to adopt a construction against the express letter of the treaties. He asks, where are the powers by which the Congress are to enforce its decisions? none are given; hence he infers that they are only authorized to advise, but not to direct. Permit me to ask the worthy gentleman to define the character of our Congress under the Articles of Confederation. Was that a mere diplomatic council—an advising power—a convention of diplomatists met to negotiate, but not to decide? It was a legislative body, acting to the extent of the powers conferred. If the gentleman will compare the treaties by which the Congress of Panama is established with our Articles of Confederation, he will perceive a striking similarity between them. Our "Congress was declared to be the last resort or appeal for all disputes or differences now subsisting, or that may, hereafter, arise, between two or more States, concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever." Was any direct power conferred to enforce its decisions? Not at all. That Congress was left, as the Congress of Spanish American States is left, to the obligations resting on each of the confederate States, to abide by the decisions of a tribunal of their own creation, and to the known consequences of contumacy. Our Congress, it is true, had the express power to decide on peace or war. But was it clothed with the means of sustaining their decision? Was it not wholly dependent on the voluntary contributions of the States? The gentleman also refers to the stipulation contained in the treaties, securing "the exercise of the national sovereignty of each of the contracting parties, as well as to what regards their laws, and to the establishment and form of their respective Governments," &c., &c. By advertising to the Articles of our Confederation, he will again find a stipulation "that each State should retain its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right," which was not expressly delegated to the United States. But, if he be correct in supposing that this Congress will be a mere diplomatic meeting, for the purpose of negotiating treaties in the usual form, and without power to bind any State, except by its own consent, whence the necessity of this reservation? Does he not perceive that the very fact of inserting the exception, on which he so confidently relies, overthrows the argument he attempts to sustain by it? It can require no argument or elucidation to establish the permanent character of the Congress; it has no limitation as to time in the treaties. It is to be the Congress of the confederation, and of course to last as long as the confederation endures. Such is the necessary result; and that such is the design of its founders, appears from the provision authorizing the removal of the seat of Government by the vote of a majority, if ever the casualties of war or any other cause, may render it advisable to do so. There is no express stipulation as to the manner of acting by the Congress. Our Government required information upon this point, and afterwards, as I have already stated, consented to act without it. But that its decisions are to be governed by a majority, results from the propriety of that course, from the equality of representation, from the provision that such shall be the case in relation to the place of meeting, and the absence of any other provision in regard to the other concerns of the Congress. This view of the subject is confirmed by the letter from the Government Council of Peru, to the Government of Buenos Ayres, of the 2d of May last, urging a union in the arrangements of the Congress, in which, after stating that, if the world had to elect a Capital, "the Isthmus of Panama would be pointed out for that august destiny, placed as it is in the centre of the globe, looking on the one side to Asia, and on the other to Africa and Europe; that the Isthmus had been offered for that purpose by the Republic of Colombia; that it was at an equal distance from both extremities, and on that account, might serve as a provisional place for the first Assembly of the Confederates:" it is added, that, "in the first conference between the Plenipotentiaries, the residence of the Assembly, and its powers, may be settled in a solemn manner, by the majority, after which every thing will be arranged to our satisfaction."

Such, in my judgment, is a correct view of the first great question arising on the subject of the Panama mission. I will now ask the attention of the Senate to the next branch of the subject, viz: THE BUSINESS TO BE TRANSACTED at the Congress, and particularly that portion of it in which we have been invited to participate. Unless I greatly deceive myself, the difficulties will be found to multiply as we proceed in the discussion of the matters proposed to be acted upon, so far as the United States are concerned. There are those, which, in the view of the Spanish American States, as well as of our own Government, are of primary importance; and others of a secondary character, which although they would not have furnished adequate inducement for the invitation or acceptance, are still deemed worthy of consideration if our Ministers attend. Of the former, stipulations on our part to make common cause with the Spanish American States, in the event of any European power assisting Spain to re-establish her dominion in Spanish America, and resistance to European Colonization on this continent, stand in the front ground. But for these the United States would never have been invited to send a Representative to the Congress of Panama. But for these the presence of our deputies would cause embarrassment, instead of affording facilities to the confederate States. Never, in the course of the little experience which it has been my good or ill fortune to have had in public affairs, have I been more thoroughly disappointed as to the probable course of discussion upon any point, than I have been upon this. That our Ministers, or Commissioners, or deputies, or whatever else they may be called, shall be fully empowered to enter into an agreement (in whatever form gentlemen may please)—first, that the United States upon the happening of the casus fœderis, the interference of any of the powers of Europe in the struggle between Spain and her revolted Colonies, shall make common cause with the latter in repelling such interference; and, secondly, that we shall resist, either jointly or separately, all attempts on the part of any European power to establish new colonies in this hemisphere, are matters so precisely enumerated, and so clearly concurred in by all parties, that I did not imagine either the views of our Government, or those of the Spanish American States, in regard to them, could be misunderstood by any honorable gentleman. Judge then of my surprise, to hear it denied from all quarters that such views are entertained by the Executive—to hear it announced that if there were grounds to believe that any such agreement was contemplated, there would be perfect unanimity in the Senate in checking in its birth, a design so adverse to the interests of this country. A state of things so unexpected, necessarily changes the course of discussion from an attempt to prove the impolicy of the contemplated measure, to the establishment of the position that such, in reality, are the views of the Executive. From the year 1818 to 1823, a sort of rivalry existed in this country between the President, (Mr. MONROE,) and a quasi opposition to his administration, on the subject of Spanish American affairs. On the one hand, the boldest steps were taken to impel the administration to the recognition of the independence of Spanish America, accompanied by unreserved censures on the imputed reluctance and timidity of the Government. This spirit was combated on the part of the administration, by ascribing their conduct to a prudent and circumspect policy, designed to effect the greatest good with the least possible hazard. Time will not permit the enumeration of the various acts of the contending parties on the political arena in reference to this matter: suffice it to say, that in 1823, Mr. MONROE determined to crown the measures of the Government upon this subject, by adopting a course in relation to it, which, while it rendered efficient service to the Spanish American cause, could not fail to secure to his administration the reputation of being its greatest patron. In pursuance of this policy, he, in his message of December, 1823, among other things, said—"We owe it, therefore, to candor, and to the amicable relations subsisting between the United States and those powers, [the powers of Europe,] to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European powers, we have not interfered, and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence, and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition, for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling, in any manner, their destiny, by any European power, in any other light, than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States, in the war between those new Governments and Spain. We declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition; and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur, which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of the Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States, indispensable to their security." And further, in the discussion with Russia, relative to the Northwestern coast of this continent, the occasion was embraced, "for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States were involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent position which they had assumed and maintained, were thenceforward not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

The character and effect which has been given, or attempted to be given, to these declarations, is full of instruction as to the probable consequences of similar acts at this day. To say here that they did not pledge the United States to any course, would be superfluous. There are few who require to be informed that no declaration of the Executive could have that effect. But he had no such intention. He asserted (if you please) correct principles, but left us at liberty to act, or not, in enforcing them, as our interest or our policy might at the moment require: a question to be decided, like all similar questions, by determining whether, under all circumstances, it will best promote the honor and interest of the country to act or stand still. But how strangely have these declarations been distorted, not only by others, but our public functionaries themselves. In a letter from the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Colombia, to the Envoy of the Republic of Buenos Ayres, of the 6th March last, announcing the assent of the Republic of Peru to the propositions of the General Assembly of the American States at Panama, and requesting the concurrence of the Government of Buenos Ayres, it is stated, that among the objects of the Congress will be to take into consideration the means to give effect to the declaration of the President of the United States of America, in his message to the Congress last year, concerning the means to prostrate any ulterior design of colonization upon this continent, by the powers of Europe, and resist all interference in our domestic concerns."

In the letter of invitation from the Mexican Minister, Mr. Obregon, of the 25th of November last, he says, the "Government of the subscriber never supposed nor desired that the United States would take part in the Congress about to be held, in other matters, than those which, from their nature and importance, the late administration pointed out as being of general interest to the continent; for which reason, one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress, will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation in the question and war of independence between the new powers of the continent and Spain. The Government of the undersigned apprehends that, as the powers of America, are of accord as to resistance, it behooves them to discuss the means of giving to that resistance, all possible force, that the evil may be met if it cannot be avoided; and the only means of accomplishing this object is by a previous concert as to the mode in which each of them shall lend its co-operation," &c.

"The opposition to colonization is in the like predicament with the foregoing."*

Having thus specified the objects of deliberation, he invites our Government to send "Representatives" to the Congress of Panama, with authorities as aforesaid, and with express instructions upon the two principal questions.

Mr. Salazar, the Colombian Minister, in his letter of invitation of the 2d November last, thus expresses himself upon the topics referred to: "The manner in which all colonization of European powers on the American continent, shall be resisted, and their interference in the present contest between Spain and her former colonies prevented, are other points of great interest. Were it proper, an eventual alliance, in case these events should occur, which is within the range of possibilities, and the treaty, of which no use should be made until the casus fœderis should happen, to remain secret; or, if this should seem premature, a convention so anticipated would be different means to secure the same end, of preventing foreign influence. This is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations of the Cabinet of Washington."

Mr. Canas, the Minister of the Republic of Central America says, that, "as Europe has formed a Continental system, and held a Congress whenever questions affecting its interests were to be discussed, America should have a system for itself, and assemble by its Representatives in Cortes, when circumstances of necessity and great importance should demand it.

The views entertained by those Governments as to the condition of the United States in relation to its obligation to resist any attempts on the part of Europe upon the two subjects referred to, appears still more clearly from the fact stated by our Secretary of State, (Mr. Clay,) that when in the course of last summer, an invasion of the island of Cuba was apprehended, from the appearance of a French fleet in our waters, we were promptly called on, by the Government of Mexico, to fulfil the alleged pledge of Mr. MONROE, in his message of December, 1823. Such are the views and expectations of the Spanish American States, in inviting us to the Congress of Panama.

* "Most of the new American Republics have declared their entire assent to them, and they now propose, among the subjects of consultation at Panama, to take into consideration the means of making effectual the assertion of that principle, (resistance to European colonization,) as well as the means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Government."—President's Message to the House of Representatives.

Permit me now to show how far these extravagant pretensions have been encouraged, countenanced, and recognized by our own Government. I confess, sir, that I approach this part of the subject with regret and disappointment. If I know my heart, it harbors no inclination to view either this or any measure of the Government, with any other feelings than those of liberality and indulgence. But if there be here no cause for censure, I am under the influence of the grossest delusion.

Mr. President: Consider for a moment, the entire coincidence between the language expressed abroad by Mr. Poinsett, our Minister, and at home, by Mr. Clay, the responsible organ of the Government, and if you do not concur with me in thinking it amounts to a recognition of the pledge on the part of the Government, of the character claimed by the Spanish American States, and an avowal of our readiness to redeem it, I will hereafter distrust the clearest deductions of my understanding. Had the opinion of the Executive been different, the language of our Government, instead of declaring what we would have done, "had the contingency happened," would have been, what it ought to have been, an explicit disavowal of all obligation on the part of the United States to take any other part in any state of things, than that which the interests of the country might be supposed to require. But if a doubt could exist as to the views of the Executive, it would be dispelled by a reference to the invitations and letters of acceptance, especially when connected with the subjects referred to. In the letters of invitation, the Mexican and Colombian Ministers specify the subjects which, in their view, are of "general interest to the Continent," viz: resistance to European interference—and colonization, and request that our Ministers should have express instructions upon these two "principal questions." Our Government, without questioning the specification thus given at their instance, in the letters of acceptance, say, their Commissioners to the Congress of Panama will be fully empowered upon all questions likely to arise in the Congress, on subjects in which the nations of America have a common interest. What those subjects are, had been stated by the parties inviting, with express reference to our explanations, and unequivocally assented to by us. The President in his message communicating the nominations, leaves the subject of European interference in the struggle between Spain and her former colonies, to the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the inviting Governments to which I have referred; but on the subject of colonization he contemplates an agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting, "that each will guard, by its own means, against the establishment of any future European Colonies within its borders." If these two prominent points were not intended, by our Government, to be the subjects on which stipulations were to be entered into at the Congress, what was meant by the President, in his declaration to the Ministers of Mexico, and Colombia, that, in his opinion, "such a Congress might be highly useful in settling several important questions of public law, and in arranging other matters of deep interest to the American Continent?" And if it be, indeed, true, that the proposed mission is designed to be no more than a matter of compliment to our sister Republics, without subjecting the rights or duties of the United States to the decision of that Congress, then why the solicitude on the part of our Government, to adjust, previously, the powers to be given to the deputies, and the mode of its organization and action? But I forbear to multiply proofs upon this point. Had it not been for the strong manifestation of unwillingness, on the part of the Senate, to enter into any such agreement, I am strongly inclined to think no question would have been made respecting it. With these Governments above all others, it is both our duty and policy to observe the most scrupulous sincerity and good faith. With them, at least, we ought not to encourage expectations not intended to be realized—a course alike reprehensible in principle, and ruinous in its effects. It is, then, the design of the Executive to enter into an agreement at the Congress, (it is not material for the present in what form,) that if the powers of Europe make common cause with Spain, or otherwise attempt the subjugation of Spanish America, we shall unite with the latter, and contribute our proportion to the means necessary to make resistance effectual; and further, that we shall bind ourselves, at that Congress, as to the manner in which we shall resist any attempts, by the European powers, to colonize any portion of this continent. The design has been fully, frankly, and explicitly stated to the Spanish American States, and to us. Is the Senate of the United States willing to sanction a measure of that description? I care not for the present whether it be by treaty or by act, decree, or ordinance of the Congress. Will you, in any shape or form, preliminary, or final, give to it your sanction? Upon this subject, at least, we have had "thoughts that breathe." In the confidence that I do not misunderstand them, I will venture to affirm that there is not a member on this floor, who will avow his willingness to enter into such a stipulation. If mistaken, I desire to be corrected. No—I am not. Whatever may be his views, no one, within these walls, is yet prepared to give his sanction to such a measure—a measure by which the peace of the country is to be exposed to a contingency beyond the control of our Government—by which the great question of peace or war will be taken from the Representatives of the people—by which, instead of retaining that freedom of action which we now possess, we shall bind ourselves, in a certain event, to pursue a certain course, whatever those, to whom the Government of the country may then have been committed, shall think the honor or interest of the country may require—by which, in the language of the Father of his Country, we “shall quit our own to stand on foreign ground.” No—thank Heaven—a policy so opposite to all the feelings of the American people; so adverse, as I firmly believe it to be, to its true interests, has no friends, at least no advocate on this floor. If, by any act of ours, we contribute to its adoption, it will be, (and I derive infinite satisfaction from the conviction,) through a mistaken belief that the measure of which I speak is not contemplated by the Executive.

I will now, Mr. President, call the attention of the Senate to another view of this subject, to a question of the gravest character, and most deeply affecting the dearest interests of the country—a question growing out of considerations which have heretofore occupied the best minds, and interested the purest hearts our country has produced: “WOULD IT BE WISE IN US TO CHANGE OUR ESTABLISHED POLICY UPON THE SUBJECT OF POLITICAL CONNECTIONS WITH FOREIGN STATES?” The President has said, that, “to form alliances,” is not among the motives of our attendance at the Congress. But what description of alliance does he mean? They are of various kinds, and of different extent. We are, at that Congress, to stipulate in some form, (and I care not in what,) that we will resist any attempt at colonization, by the powers of Europe, in this hemisphere, (or within our own borders if you please,) and that, in the event of any interference on their part, in the struggle between Spain and the Spanish American States, we will make common cause with the latter in resisting it. To this end we have been invited, and upon these points we have promised that our Ministers shall have full powers. We must do this, or the whole affair becomes empty pageantry; which, though it may be the offspring of personal ambition, will assuredly terminate in national disgrace. Call it an “alliance,” or whatever name you please, it is a political connection, at war with the established policy of our Government. And is this a light matter? Sir, when it is proposed to subvert a fundamental principle in our foreign policy, in the support of which we stand alone among all the nations of the earth—which, commencing with our Government, is endeared to the people, and upon whose deep foundations has been erected the magnificent superstructure of unequalled national prosperity—it surely becomes those intrusted with the management of affairs, to pause, and weigh, with scrupulous exactness, the importance of the step.

In the discussion of this subject, I shall first consider the general principle; then the grounds of the distinction attempted to be made between its application to the Spanish American States, and to those of Europe. At this moment the United States (thanks to the wisdom of their early counsels) are unfettered. No Government has a right to demand our aid or interference in any of the changes in the condition of the world—come what may, we are now unembarrassed in our choice. Until lately, I had flattered myself that the acknowledged obligation on the part of our Government to maintain that condition, was as firmly fixed as its Republican character. I had the best reason to think so, because I knew it to be a principle in our public policy, which had for its support all that is instructive in experience, all that is venerable in authority. That authority is no less than the parting admonitions of the Father of his Country. The earnest, eloquent, and impressive appeals upon this subject, contained in his Farewell Address, are yet, and will, I trust, long remain, fresh in our recollections; nor were the sentiments he thus avowed mere speculative opinions, founded upon an abstract consideration of the subject. No! they were sentiments matured by reflection, and confirmed by actual experience of the practical results which had arisen from a connection of the character he so ardently and so justly deprecated. A reference to the history of that period will illustrate the fact, and is replete with instruction. During the war of our Revolution, we entered into an alliance with France, “the essential and direct end of which was, to maintain effectually the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, of the United States, absolute and unlimited, as well in matters of government as of commerce.” By the treaty of alliance, we, in consideration of the guarantee by France of the freedom and independence of the United States, undertook, on our part, to guarantee to France the possession she then had in America. The revolution in France involved that country in war with the principal powers of Europe. Her American possessions were brought in danger; and, among other things, claimed under the treaty of alliance, she called upon us for the fulfilment of our guarantee. At no period of our history has our Government been placed in a more humiliating and embarrassing situation. The signal benefits we had received from France were known to the world, and fully appreciated by our citizens. Upon the terms of the compact there could be no dispute. The consideration upon which we had entered into it, was of the most sacred character. But the danger of compliance was imminent, and prevailed over every other consideration. Reposing itself upon the great principle of self-preservation—a principle extending itself as well to nations as individuals—our Government refused to comply with its engagement; and General Washington issued his celebrated proclamation of neutrality. The grounds relied upon to justify the step, were, that our alliance was a defensive one only; that the war, on the part of France, was an offensive war, in which we were not obliged, by the law of nations, to take part; that the contest was, moreover, so unequal, and our means so inadequate, that, upon the principle of self-preservation, we were justified in refusing to take part with our ally. It was not expected that France would acquiesce in the validity of the grounds thus taken. She did not. The loud solemn protests of her ministers are remembered; as, also, the measures resorted to, for the purpose of obtaining, indirectly, some of the advantages claimed from the alliance: such as fitting out vessels of war in our ports, and enlisting our citizens in her service. England remonstrated, made strong imputations of partiality against our Government—imputations founded on suspicions growing out of the known connection between us and France—and resorted to similar means to annoy her enemies and commit our neutrality. General Washington found it impossible to satisfy either party of the strict impartiality that governed our conduct. The result was war, in fact, with France, and many of the evils of war with England. She enforced against our commerce new and unjustifiable principles of public law on the subject of blockades and articles contraband of war. The sagacious mind of Washington, and the great men who enjoyed his confidence, traced the multiplied embarrassments of the country at that trying period, to the treaty of alliance with France. Had it not been for that, the task of preserving our neutrality would have been comparatively easy.

But I cannot consent to trespass long upon the time of the Senate in pushing the discussion of this point further, although various considerations, operating against the measure, press upon my mind. If it were proposed to form a connection with any European power, such as now designed with the Spanish American States, it is hoped and believed, that the measure would not meet with one approving voice—shall I say—on this floor? No, not in the country. But it has been supposed that the United States ought to pursue a different policy in respect to the States in this hemisphere. It is true Mr. MONROE, in his message, makes a distinction of this character, although he by no means carries it to the extent proposed. If he did, all that the distinction could derive from that circumstance, would be, the weight of his opinion, always considerable, but never decisive. The question still recurs, is the distinction founded in principle and policy? If it be, it must arise from one of two reasons: either the character of the Governments of the Spanish American States, or their local situation; or, perhaps, from both. The United States have hailed the emancipation of those States with satisfaction; they have our best wishes for the perpetuity of their freedom. So far as we could go to aid them in the establishment of their independence, without endangering the peace, or embarrassing the relations of our country, we have gone. More than that ought not to be asked. Nor has it. Sensible of the embarrassments which their invitation might produce, they declined to proffer it until advised that we desired to receive it. Next to being right, it is important to Governments, as well as individuals, to be consistent. Has the character of these Governments been the principle upon which we have hitherto acted in relation to those States? It has not—Mexico and Brazil were the last to shake off their dependence on foreign authority. They were among the first whose independence we acknowledged. Mexico was, at the period of its acknowledgment, under the dominion of the Emperor Iturbide, and Brazil of its Emperor, Don Pedro. As a special compliment to the Emperor of Mexico, we sent, or rather intended to send, to his Court, one of the most distinguished men of the nation, (General JACKSON.) At the Court of the Emperor Don Pedro, we have our Minister; whilst in the Republic of Peru—the power with which the first of the treaties, in virtue of which the Congress of Panama is to be held, was concluded—we have not yet been represented. Do our principles admit that we should adopt the measure proposed with such reference, and upon such grounds? What are those principles? That man is capable of self government; that the people of every country should be left to the free selection of such form of government as they think best adapted to their situation, and to change it as their interests, in their own judgments, may seem to require. Wherein consists our objections to the Holy Alliance? Because they confederate to maintain governments similar to their own, by force of arms, instead of the force of reason, and the will of the governed. If we, too, confederate to sustain, by the same means, governments similar to our own, wherein consists the difference, except the superiority of our cause? What is their avowed motive? Self-preservation and the peace of Europe. What would be ours? Self-preservation and the peace of America. I wish to be understood. I detest, as much as any man, the principles of the Holy Alliance. I yield to no man in my anxious wishes for the success of the Spanish American States. I will go as far as I think any American citizen ought to go, to secure to them the blessings of free government. I commend the solicitude which has been manifested by our Government upon this subject, and have, of course, no desire to discourage it. But I am against all alliances, against all armed confederacies, or confederacies of any sort. I care not how specious, or how disguised; come in what shape they may, I oppose them. The States in question have the power and the means, if united and true to their principles, to resist any force that Europe can send against them. It is only by being recreant to the principles upon which their Revolution is founded; by suffering foreign influence to distract and divide them; that their independence can be endangered. But, happen what may, our course should be left to our choice, whenever occasion for acting shall occur. If, in the course of events, designs shall be manifested, or steps taken in this hemisphere by any foreign power, which so far affect our interest or our honor, as to make it necessary that we should arm in their defence, it will be done: there is no room to doubt it.

Debate on the Panama Mission in Secret Session.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, said: two gentlemen, of transcendent talents, and great political experience, have advocated the measure. Wishing for light, I listened to them with intense interest; but to my utter disappointment, they, so far from defining the character and objects of this Congress, disagreed as to both. With one it was not belligerent, because it was seeking peace by arms and managing a defensive war. With the other, it has no power to touch the political condition of Cuba—the principal subject in which we can have any interest. And yet this gentleman would send Ministers to prevent their doing, what, he says, they have no power to do; just as the President would send them to prevent the Spanish American nations from conceding to Spain any commercial privileges, as the price of their independence, when, by their treaties before us, they have jointly, and severally, and solemnly, stipulated that they will make no such concessions.

The proposition is to send deputies of some character to a Congress at Panama. The questions I shall put, and in which I have in substance been preceded by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) are these: What is this Congress? What are its objects and powers? Have we any coincident objects and powers which render a mission necessary and proper? In these questions is involved the whole inquiry; they embrace the whole subject, and yet they have been deemed but "preliminary points."

Instead of recurring to the opinion of the President, or of the Spanish American Ministers, it is safest to go to the foundation, the constitution of this Congress. Whatever we might suppose or their ministers might imagine, it is very certain that the Deputies there must be limited in the exercise of their powers to the compacts which gave birth to the Congress. We have before us four treaties, in all which the Republic of Colombia is a party: one of the 6th July, 1822, with Peru; one of the 12th July, 1823, with Chili; another of the 15th March last, with Guatemala; and the other of 20th September following, with Mexico. They are termed "compacts of perpetual union, league, and Confederation." In some respects they differ from each other. In that with Peru, the quota or contingent of troops for mutual defence is stipulated, and they are to "maintain in common the cause of independence." In one, they are to "identify their principles in peace and in war;" and in another, their agreement is against "whatever may menace the security of their independence and liberty, affect their interests, and disturb their peace;" and they unite in whatever will "assure the mutual prosperity, harmony, and good intelligence," with each other; and there is in some a provision in regard to boundaries. Excepting these discrepancies they concur. Their compacts are perpetual—they are offensive and defensive; each may repel an invasion of the other, observing the laws of the invaded territory; insurrections are to be mutually suppressed; privileges and immunities of commerce and citizenship are to be equal, and State sovereignty is secured; indemnity to Spain as the price of independence, and a separate peace, are prohibited, and the Confederation is limited to the American nations "formerly Spanish."

To secure these objects, a Congress is instituted, to consist of two Deputies from each of the parties, with certain delegated and defined powers; to ordain and establish the proportion or contingent to be furnished for the common defence; to be a council on great occasions or in great conflicts; to form a rallying point in case of danger; to be an interpreter of treaties, to act as umpires in case of disputes, and to establish intimate relations between the parties. Now, sir, whether these grants confer Legislative, Executive, Judicial, or Diplomatic powers, any, or all, it is certain that this Congress is made as perpetual as any Government can be made. Its model is our articles of confederation of 1778; and the slightest comparison will convince any one that this was the identical instrument from which this Congress was constituted. They have, as near as possible, taken the words. Theirs are compacts of "perpetual union, league, and confederation;" ours, "articles of Confederation and perpetual union;" but, by recurring to the third article, you will see ours are called "a firm league of friendship"—each, then, is perpetual, both secure State sovereignty, provide equal privileges and immunities of commerce and citizenship, fix the quota or contingent for the common defence, are offensive and defensive, umpires in case of differences, prohibit a separate peace, and establish the rule by which new parties are to be admitted into the league.

It is but poor consolation to be answered that nothing definitive can be done there, and treaties made cannot become the supreme law of the land, until ratified by the President and Senate. How many questions may be determined by negotiation which the House of Representatives can never reach?—where no appropriation is necessary? Find a nation whose views of legislation are coincident with yours, and almost every municipal law, whether federal or local, may be modified by the President and Senate, in spite of Congress or the State Governments. The laws of devise, primogeniture, entailments, &c., may be established by treaty, made by the Executive power, which are to be the supreme law of the land, and to ride over and trample down all laws of Congress, and of the States.

To become parties to a treaty-making or a treaty-originating Congress, of unlimited duration, is a new and extraordinary step. It becomes more dangerous from our practice under the constitution, which, in my view, is a perversion of its spirit. The President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, is to make treaties. The power of making is taken away, and nothing But that of ratifying is left to the Senate. A new power unknown to the constitution, is sprung up, termed a "Cabinet"—instructions to Ministers, the first step of negotiation, are never submitted to us; these are discussed and agreed on in "the Cabinet," and, with these, and probably with the project or draft of a treaty, the Minister is despatched to make "supreme laws of the land," which it is extremely embarrassing and invidious for the Senate to reject. If it be true, as the gentleman from Rhode Island has told us, that this is a diplomatic Congress, and is of perpetual duration, it is alarming indeed.

But I hope and trust the case is not quite so bad as he makes it. It seems to me that no power of diplomacy can be exercised—no such power is granted—"National Sovereignty" is reserved, and is not to be interrupted "with respect to their relations with foreign nations," and making treaties is specially reserved to such power by its constitution. And it is, moreover, inconsistent with every principle of free government, that the makers of treaties should be the expounders or "interpreters"—that Legislatures should interpret the laws which they shall have enacted. The powers granted are, therefore, of another order, and they are Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. In the exercise of any of these, can we, or ought we, to participate? As Ministers they have no power to receive our delegates—as Ministers you have no power to send them. An Ambassador, or public Minister carries your sovereignty with him. He is your Representative near the Government to which he is sent, and is under the protection of that Government, and to be protected according to your own laws. Here you send him to no Government authorized to receive him, or having the power to protect him. Besides, the powers granted to that Congress are to be exercised exclusively by the American nations "formerly," or "ci-devant Spanish." To admit us to vote, or even deliberate, would be as much a violation of the compact or constitution as for us to have admitted the Dutch or French Minister to take a part in the deliberations of Congress, under our Confederation. Neither can they be permitted to hear the discussions. From the nature of the powers granted, this Congress must be an organized body, governed by a presiding officer, and subjected to rules. Many of their deliberations must be of a belligerent character, and therefore secret. They must have the authority, and it would often become their duty, to impose secrecy, even by oath. Now can your members take such an oath? Suppose (a case most likely to occur) an invasion of Cuba should be there discussed, this measure your Ministers must oppose. Could they, without a violation of duty to their own Government, give an obligation of secrecy, and could they be admitted without that obligation? Your Ministers Plenipotentiary then, are to be nothing but lookers on, or listeners, and in that in which your interest is most concerned, cannot be permitted to act in those characters. If the United States intend seriously to oppose an invasion of Cuba, they ought long since to have made known their determination fully and definitely to the Spanish American Ministers here.

But we will suppose these obstacles surmounted, and your deputies admitted in full communion. We are then first to discuss the contingent to be provided by each for the common defence. On this subject, Mr. Obregon is very explicit. We are to fulfil our pledges against European colonization, and interference of any of the powers of Europe, except Spain, against the independence of the Spanish Americans. This subject of colonization, which seems to be so involved in mystery that no mortal can clearly perceive its meaning, has been so well disposed of, by other gentlemen, that it would be indeed fruitless to bestow on it any further observations. The other pledge is more explicit. But, sir, as to pledges, allow me to say, once for all, that the President of these United States has no power whatever to pledge the people of this Union to any nation in any thing. And every declaration of his, made to the world, must be understood by other nations, not as a pledge of what we must do, but as an opinion of what we will do. Until Congress concur, or assent to a measure affecting our foreign relations, nothing is binding. Still, the Mexican Minister understands it differently, and intimates that, to fulfil the obligation there must be "a previous concert as to the mode in which each shall lend its co-operation." And Mr. Salazar recommends "an eventual alliance," to be kept secret until the casus fœderis occurs. If these Ministers are correct, we are already entangled, and, whether by "our own means," or by "previous concert" with them, we are bound to fulfil stipulations made by the late administration: and, however we might, at this time, deny the force of the late President's pledge, still, if we give our assent to this mission, for the purposes thus avowed, we are ever after foreclosed. One of the "precise questions" disclosed, then, is the means to be furnished by the United States, to prevent European colonization, or interference in American affairs, and the manner of furnishing the means, whether by secret treaty or otherwise. Yet the Executive informs us that we are "not to deliberate on any thing of a belligerent character, contract alliances, nor undertake with them any thing hostile to other nations." Now, these things are not to be done, and yet, if we accept the invitation to this Congress, we are bound to concur in the avowed objects. How will gentlemen reconcile these conflicting opinions?

But the greatest lure to us, is the thought of participating in "A COUNCIL ON GREAT OCCASIONS!" You know, sir, that Republics are never ambitious—they are always humble, forbearing and unassuming—their leading politicians are always as meek as Moses. Yet it seems, in this case, we are fascinated and im-flated with this "great occasion." My life for it, this is no scheme of the President—he is a cool, deliberating, calculating, penetrating, discriminating, reasoning sort of politician. It is a toy, yielded to the importunity of the Secretary of State. The President has no strong partialities for the Spanish Americans—Mr. Clay wanted a plaything, and the President, probably with reluctance, consented so far to gratify him, as to present the proposition to the Senate, hoping no doubt that we would reject it. Sir, who has been the leader of this crusade in favor of Spanish American liberty? Who, more than seven years ago, became their chief advocate, in the House of Representatives? Whose speeches have been translated and retranslated, and circulated throughout their vast dominions? Who has been toasted as the champion, and canonized as the Saint? Who, in fine, is to reap the reward? The Secretary well knows that public opinion has already made him their grand advocate and intercessor, and he will so manage it that, if there is to be any glory, it is to be his inheritance—if any disgrace, it is to be entailed on the President. No, sir, this is the magnificent scheme of the favorite—the genius, the master spirit of the West. I intend nothing invidious to my friends here, from that interesting section of the Union. I respect them much, I admire their frankness, intelligence and liberality; and even their extravagance has its apology. They occupy a vast, interesting country—they have aspiring forests, majestic rivers, sublime mountains. They look upon the scene, and contemplate the prospect before them; and the mind is enlarged, expanded, elevated, sublimated. But this scheme of the Secretary, in point of extravagance, transcends all imagination. All the nations of this vast continent are to be arrayed. Buenos Ayres, the Banda Oriental, Chili, and Peru, are to form the right; Colombia, Guatemala, and Mexico the centre; the United States the left, and Maine the extreme left. The little empire of Brazil, and the hordes of Canada and Nova Scotia, are probably to be disposed of; and then we can present one undivided front to Europe and Africa, and another to Asia and the Isles of India. And the conception and contemplation of this mighty achievement, posterity is to ascribe to the matchless spirit of the West!

Here I might stop, had not the President in his message, and the Spanish American Ministers, in their correspondence with us, pointed out other objects, not embraced within the limits of their constitutional compacts. As it appears to be the opinion of each, that objects, other than those confided to this Congress by these compacts, may be matters of consideration and decision, it is proper to examine them. The President, in his message, is of opinion that we may aid them by our experience, and instruct them in principles of religious freedom; and the gentleman from Louisiana speaks of the moral effect to be produced, and the dignity to be conferred. Thus, we are to depute Mr.

Sergeant and Mr. Anderson, in the double capacity of Ministers and Missionaries. Whether they are to have double outfits and salaries, we are not yet informed. Indeed, sir, I apprehend, from recent disclosures, they will think less of our experience than they have done, if not of our sincerity; and if we could send Ministers at all, it should be to relieve us from the thralldom in regard to the mediation of Russia. When the documents communicated were in reading, and I perceived from the letters of Mr. Middleton and Mr. Clay, that the Emperor Alexander had agreed to mediate with Spain, for the recognition of her colonies, I was inspired with admiration at, and gratitude for, such magnanimity—that the head of the holy Alliance, the defender and protector of the rights of Kings, should become a mediator in favor of Republics, was extraordinary and unexpected, and an indication of real greatness. I listened, therefore, with intense interest for his declaration to that effect. The letter of Count Nesselrode was read—this was a polite, but frank refusal. From the next despatch we expected to hear that the Emperor had changed his mind—but, this was all. [Here Mr. H. read Count Nesselrode's letter of 20th August, 1825.] I had previously learned that the condition, not the independence of the Spanish Americas, had been discussed in the European Congress; that the Mexican Legation had been ordered to leave Spain—that Government refusing to hear the subject of their independence even discussed, and with this information and this letter before him, how any man could have been led to believe that this document was an agreement of the Emperor to mediate for this recognition by Spain, was to me utterly astonishing. But it is more extraordinary still, if we suppose that the Secretary had, at the time of the first message, the papers from Mr. Everett, afterwards sent us. These go to establish, unequivocally, the determination of Russia not to mediate, and of Spain not to recognize the independence of her colonies, on any consideration. That Mr. Middleton should have been deceived, I could readily suppose; he is much more distinguished for his honesty and goodness of heart, than for his political or diplomatic wisdom or experience; and it is not singular that his wishes should get the better of his judgment. But how the adroit secretary could have thus deluded himself, is past conjecture. The stupid and infatuated Spanish monarch is firmly and confidently relying on Divine Providence to give him back his colonies, without any exertion of his own—that Providence, who cares, probably, less for him than for the "sparrow that falls to the ground," and who will interfere, if at all, "to break the rod of the oppressor and let the oppressed go free."

I need only call the recollection of gentlemen to Spanish history, to prove that this obstinacy and perseverance is characteristic of that nation. Portugal, after having been sixty years subject to Spain, in 1640 revolted, and under the Braganzas, drove the Spaniards from their country. You well recollect how long Spain struggled to reconquer that then gallant people; she persevered against reason, and hoped against hope. The United Provinces were subject to Spain. They were the carriers for all Europe; from Lisbon, the depot of the wealth of the East, and Cadiz, the depot of that of the West, they transported to, and supplied, all the north of Europe. Antwerp was the most commercial city in the world. In 1570, the Hollanders revolted. Spain was then to Europe what Russia is now. The power established by Charles the Fifth, was in its strength and vigor. These revolted provinces, however, maintained the struggle, under every disadvantage, but with wonderful success. In ten years after the first revolt, they were excluded from Lisbon by the subjugation of Portugal to Spain, and in five years after, their beautiful Antwerp was sacked and ruined by that monster the Duke of Parma; but amid these reverses and misfortunes, they maintained the war. Amsterdam rose on the ruins of Antwerp. Driven from Lisbon and Cadiz, they sought the commerce of the East and West Indies at its sources; and the colonies of Spain and Portugal, in the remotest parts of the world, felt their power, and were subjected by their arms. After a vindictive and cruel war of near forty years, Spain was compelled to agree to a truce for twelve years. The truce was violated before it had expired; the war was renewed; and Spain again experienced everywhere, disaster and defeat. Her rich galleons were captured; her fleets were defeated in repeated conflicts; her Armada was destroyed, even in the Downs; and, though beaten, weakened, humbled, and on the brink of ruin, it was not until the peace of Westphalia, in 1648, that she consented to acknowledge the independence of these Provinces. The character of Spain is not changed, and in modern times you have witnessed the same persevering obstinacy against one of the most powerful and successful conquerors the world ever saw. And with these facts before us, how comes it to pass that we are encouraging these Americans, that Spain is disposed to acknowledge their independence, and that, when her infatuated monarch says, emphatically, No, he undoubtedly means Yes? And what has been the effect of this delusive hope which we have inspired? The Spanish Americans have been deterred from striking Spain in her most vulnerable part, and the only one within striking distance, and Cuba and Porto Rico are so strengthened, that they may probably now bid defiance to the united efforts of the Spanish American nations. This is one of the blessed effects of officiously intermeddling in affairs of our neighbors. But this is not the only effect of this officious friendship. In pressing this hopeless intermediation of the Emperor Alexander we have dropped a word, which, if fairly understood by the crafty Nesselrode, may justly give great offence to these our friends. We are, it seems, to use our influence "in defeating, as far as may be in our power, every interference against those islands in securing the rights of his Catholic Majesty constant and proper respect, and in maintaining the only state of things that can preserve a just balance of power in the sea of the Antilles."

The course we have pursued, and ought to pursue, in regard to Cuba, is a matter of much perplexity. A dark cloud hangs over that island, and bears a threatening aspect. Which way it will pass over, where it will burst, or whether it will burst at all, no mortal can predict. Suppose the worst—an insurrection of the slaves, a servile war—can you, ought you to interfere? Which side would you take? Against the insurgents? My life for it, you could not maintain such a war—public opinion would not sustain you. A war out of the limits of the United States, a foreign war, to reduce men to servitude! Not an arm and scarcely a voice north of the Potomac, would be raised in your behalf. An administration who should attempt it, would seal its own destruction. No, sir, the liberal and discreet politicians of the North, sympathize with their brethren of the slave-holding States. Our maxim is, that it is an evil, which we cannot remedy. The only relief we can give them, is to let them manage it themselves, and that any interference on our part will make it worse. But beyond this we will not go. To send our troops, the sons of freemen, to a foreign country, to be the victims of the sword and the pestilence, for the purpose of suppressing an insurrection of the slaves, is a measure against which we shall ever protest—to which we shall never submit. We could not if we would—the apostles of liberty, the advocates of universal emancipation would cry aloud, and denounce this war in favor of slavery! Their voices would be heard, even in the humble habitation of the slave, and you would soon find it necessary to withdraw your army to preserve peace at home. So much for the North. I now ask the gentlemen of the South whether, if it is only intended to discuss the condition of Cuba, Panama is the proper place. You have already said too much against emancipation. By provoking a discussion you increase the evil you attempt to remedy. On this subject your wisest policy is to say but little. But if you will speak, let it not be on the house top. To this extraordinary Congress the eyes of the world are turned. Its objects, its deliberations, its determinations, are matters of universal interest. Let it be known that the rights of the slaves of Cuba are to be discussed there, and every philanthropist and fanatic in Europe will be on the alert—their voices will be responded from the American continent—the blacks will take fire, and the scenes of St. Domingo will be re-acted at home. No, let me repeat, when you cannot see where to go, nor what to do, stand still and do nothing. And wherein is the justice of your interference? You go there as invited friends, and on a subject most of all important, you oppose them. So far as regards Spanish America, leave Cuba to its fate. These nations will, as they have told you, go in aid of the Creole population, and surely it would be a miserable aid indeed to let loose the slave upon his master. Your interference, in any way, will be an injury to them, if not a curse to your country.

And what good reason can induce you to unite in settling the political condition of Hayti? Are you not now satisfied with its condition? If your political relations are not sufficiently close, it is your own fault: for Hayti has always been solicitous for a closer union. You need not surely send to Panama to determine what are your own wishes. Nor need you fear what will be the determination of that Congress, in regard to that island. When France, as you had supposed, acknowledged its independence, you felt no alarm; and why should you fear if the Spanish Americans should do the same? But the gentleman from Louisiana insinuates, that, if the Haytiens should ever be represented at Washington, their Minister or agent must be a white man. Now, if it is really a question of sufficient importance, to determine whether he should be black, yellow, or white, Panama is the last place in the world where I should go to settle it. When our fresh and fair Ministers shall enter the hall of that Congress, and look round it on their associates, I apprehend that they will deem it invidious and indelicate to talk about color. If you or I, sir, had been selected for this mission, or some of my friends who sit around me, or some of those on the other side of the way, we might have discussed a question of complexion with a much better grace. But as it is, I am inclined to believe we had better leave it to the United States and Hayti to determine it themselves.

Mr. BERRIEN, of Georgia, addressed the Senate as follows:

Sir, the measure to which we are called, is distinguished by a novelty, which induces me to pause. So far as the project is disclosed, it is plainly injurious to the best interests of this people, while much of it is veiled from the view of the most scrutinizing inquiry. Clouds and darkness rest upon it. It comes, sir, in such a questionable shape, that I will speak to it. Under the guise of a just sensibility to the interests of the Spanish American Republics, it proposes to change the whole system of our foreign relations, by the mere exercise of the appointing power—to involve the interests of this Union in a foreign association, composed of States with whom we have no natural connection, and over whose councils we can exercise no efficient control.

More distinctly, sir—and in the first place. In a season of unexampled prosperity, which we have attained by a rapidity of march, to which history affords no parallel, which invites to no change in the general system of our foreign relations, “and least of all to such change as this would bring us,” we are required to abandon the wise and salutary policy which has hitherto conducted us in safety, to form a political association with the Republics of Spanish America.

I should waste the time of the Senate, if I were to detain you by the formal proof of the fact, that the United States are at this moment in the enjoyment of an unexampled prosperity. I appeal to the Message of the President at the opening of the session, for the evidences of our prosperous and happy condition, of the flourishing state of our finances, of the increase of our commerce, our wealth, our population, and the extent of our territory; and for the proof that we are permitted to enjoy these bounties of Providence in peace and tranquillity; in peace with all the nations of the earth, in tranquillity among ourselves.

What are the duties which these considerations inculcate? I propose the question in sober sadness to the majority of this House. Thus situated, what is it that we owe to the Republic? Is it to embark in quest of novelty on the ocean of experiment—to yield ourselves to the visionary and fantastic schemes of political projectors—to the splendid but delusive suggestions of a wild and reckless ambition? Is it not rather to preserve, to cherish, to guard with more than vestal vigilance, that enlarged and liberal, but stable and self-dependent system of policy, which, by the blessing of God, has conducted us to our present happy and prosperous condition? What is that policy? Sir, it is the policy which guided the councils of WASHINGTON—which produced the celebrated proclamation of neutrality, a measure which saved us from the vortex of European contention—to which each successive administration has adhered with fidelity—which Washington himself thus emphatically announced—“The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.”

The proposition which I am endeavoring to illustrate, asserts merely, that the proposed inission to Panama involves an abandonment of the policy by which this Confederation has hitherto been governed, at a time when, by a steady adherence to that policy, we are prosperous and happy. It is of the character of the measure in this view alone, that I speak at this moment. To the motives which are urged to induce its adoption, it will be my duty hereafter to advert. Here it is sufficient to recognize these facts, that the proposed association of American nations at Panama, is a political one, and that such an association is a departure from the settled policy of this Government. That such is the character of the association, is not denied by those who advocate the measure, is proclaimed in every page of the documents before us; and if to the brief remark which I have made, it is necessary to add any thing to prove, that the policy of this Government is such as I have represented it, I refer myself to the argument of the gentleman from New York, with whom I concur generally, in the view which he has taken of this distinctive feature, in the political history of this Union.

Standing on an elevated position in an attitude which has secured to us the respect and admiration of the world—having attained this elevation, by preserving an entire freedom of action, and by the rapid development of our own resources, what is it that should tempt us to descend from our high estate, to mingle in diplomatic intrigues, and to make ourselves parties to international Confederacies, on this or the other side of the Atlantic? Especially it is most obvious to inquire, what is the character of that association, of which we are about to become a party, by approving this nomination? Sir, it is not a mere Diplomatic Council. It is an international assembly, created by treaties, and invested with powers, which are efficient for the purposes of its institution, some and the principal of which are belligerent. An association with such a Congress, must necessarily commit our neutrality.

The general argument on these propositions, has been pressed with so much perspicuity and force, by gentlemen who have preceded me; they have gone into such fulness of detail, that I do not propose to tax the patience of the Senate, by a renewed discussion of the whole question. There are two points connected with it, however, on which I desire to be heard.

In the first place, I ask the attention of the Senate to this remark.

Whatever declarations may be made to the contrary, however foreign it may be from the intention of the President, it will be the necessary consequence of this mission, that we shall become parties to the Congress of Panama, to the extent of what is denominated the pledge of Mr. Monroe, or we must disappoint the expectations, and excite the resentments, of the Spanish American States. This proposition includes these ideas:

That the Spanish American States consider this Government as pledged to them to resist the interference of any European power in the war which they are waging for their independence, by force of the official declarations of Mr. Monroe, and the subsequent acts of our administration.

That it is one and a principal and distinctly avowed object of the proposed Congress of Panama, to concert the means by which effect is to be given to this our system of policy.

That the assent of the Senate, the remaining branch of the treaty-making power, is alone wanting to commit the national faith, however the forms of the constitution may require other agencies for its redemption.

That a failure to realize these expectations, must be productive of feelings of coldness and ill will.

Let us examine the two first in connection.

Does any gentleman doubt what is the view taken of this declaration by the Republics of Spanish America, or that they consider it to be one of the subjects of the deliberations of the Congress at Panama, in which we are to participate? On both these points, the Minister of the United States of Mexico is clear and explicit. He expresses himself thus: "The Government of the subscriber never supposed nor desired that the United States of America would take part in the Congress about to be held, in other matters than those which, from their nature and importance, the late administration pointed out and characterized as being of general interest to this Continent." This is the strongest mode of expressing both the expectation and the desire of the Mexican Government, that the United States would take part in the Congress, in those matters which had been so characterized and pointed out. The Minister proceeds: "For which reason, (that is, because the late administration had pointed it out as of general interest to the Continent,) one of the subjects which will occupy the attention of the Congress, will be the resistance or opposition to the interference of any neutral nation, in the question and war of independence, between the new powers of the continent and Spain." Here is the idea in bold relief, a distinct assertion, that resistance to the interference of any European power, in the war between Spain and those States, is a question of general interest to the continent, this Government included: that it has been expressly so characterized by the late administration, and that it is one of those subjects to be discussed in that Congress, in which we are expected to participate. But how participate? By our counsels merely? No, sir. Being, as this Minister asserts we are, "of accord (with them) as to resistance," we are, in that Congress, to "discuss the means of giving to that resistance all possible force," which, he adds, is only to be accomplished "by a previous concert as to the mode in which each shall lend its co-operation." The Minister of Colombia is equally decisive on this point. He speaks of this subject as one to be discussed in the Congress, and one of great importance; suggests the propriety of a treaty in relation to it, to remain secret until the casus fœderis should happen, and adds, "This is a matter of immediate utility to the American States that are at war with Spain, and is in accordance with the repeated declarations and protests of the Cabinet at Washington." To this discussion, and this treaty, he manifestly expects that we are to become parties.

Is it not then obvious, that these invitations have been given by the Ministers of the Spanish American States, under a perfect conviction, which is plainly and frankly expressed in the very letters of invitation, that we would participate in the deliberations of the Congress at Panama, in the resistance to be made to the interference of any neutral nation, in the question and war of independence between these States and Spain? And that, conceding the principle, that we are bound to much resistance and opposition by our own previous and repeated declarations and protests, we would proceed to concert with them in that Congress, the means of giving to that resistance the greatest possible force?

Shall we realize these expectations? We are, then, to take our seats in an international assembly, composed of Deputies from five belligerent States, with instructions, I care not how restricted, to stipulate with them the terms of an eventual alliance, in the prosecution of the very war in which they are now engaged; to arrange the means of giving to our joint efforts the greatest possible force. Are gentlemen prepared to do this? Sir, this wretched bantling must one day breathe the upper air. However darkly nurtured in this political dungeon, to which the sign manual of the President, and our own too easy confidence have consigned us, it must see the light. It must stand before the majesty of the American people. Do gentlemen believe that they are prepared to do this thing? To stake the fair and goodly heritage, to which they have succeeded, on the issue of a contest with the powers of Europe, in defence of these new Republics? In defence of any other rights but their own?

But, does this pledge exist? Is this Government bound by a contract so disastrous? If it be so—fides servanda est. But I deny the fact. I deny that this celebrated pledge, as the Secretary has denominated it, has any existence but in the imagination of the visionary. Let us, for a moment, examine it. If genuine, it will bear inspection. It is described by the Secretary, as the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his message to Congress of December, 1823. Now, the President had no authority, by his own act alone, to pledge the United States to a foreign power. He did not intend to do so. It was a mere declaration of the policy, which, under given circumstances, he believed it proper for the United States to pursue. It did not bind him. It did not bind Congress. They declined to respond to it. No foreign power could demand the enforcement of it, because no foreign power was party to it. If, when the crisis arrived, the President and Congress, for the time being, should take the same view of the policy of the United States, the principle of this declaration would be acted upon. If otherwise, it would be abandoned. The notion of a pledge is visionary. That implies a contract, an agreement, on consideration. Here was a mere gratuitous declaration to Congress, of one of the public functionaries of this Government, which never received the sanction of that body.

Last year I was told, in the court below, that the United States had given a pledge to the nations of the world, for the suppression of the slave trade. I denied the existence of such a pledge, and the doctrine was not acknowledged by that tribunal. The answer was obvious. That could not be a pledge, which the United States might capriciously withdraw. It was a rule prescribed for the conduct of our own citizens, under the solemnity of an act of Congress, indeed, but which another act of Congress might repeal, and the pledge was gone. The pledge of which we are now speaking, had not even the sanction of an act of Congress, nor of either branch of the Legislature. Hitherto, then, we are free to act. We are bound by no pledge. But the President of the United States has proclaimed a principle of policy, on the basis of which the new powers have given us an invitation to this Congress, the chief and avowed object of which is to concert the means of giving effect to this principle, by the combined exertions of the American States, this Government included. If the Senate advise its acceptance, is not the faith of the U. States committed? The power to give effect to the principle, will indeed depend on the ratification of a treaty by two-thirds of the Senate, and the provisions of that treaty can only be called into active operation by the whole force of the legislative power. But if either be withheld, will not the public faith be violated? If yielded, will not the peace of this Union be put in jeopardy, and made to depend on events with which it has no natural connection, and over which it can exercise no efficient control? Can you refuse, without disappointing the just expectations of the Spanish American States!—expectations which this Government has created, and which it has distinctly and expressly recognized in its negotiations with these States? Of such a conduct, the inevitable result must be feelings of resentment and indignation, which will not be the less strong, because, peradventure, in obedience to the suggestions of policy, they may for a time be suppressed.

Sir, this is not the only belligerent question which we must discuss in the Congress of Panama. The second remark which I have to make on this branch of the subject, is this: If we do go there, our own interests will imperiously demand, that we should share in those deliberations which are to determine the fate of Cuba and Porto Rico; and this is a question which we cannot safely commit to negotiation.

The original message of the President, which called us to the exercise of our advisory duties, left us wholly without information on this subject. When the additional documents, for which we had asked, were furnished, it became obvious that the fate of these islands was to be decided in the Congress of Panama, so far as the Spanish American States had power to decide it. This state of things at once demanded our most earnest and serious attention.

When we look to the situation of those islands—to the commanding position which they occupy, with reference to the commerce of the West Indies—we cannot be indifferent to the change of their condition. But when we reflect that they are in juxtaposition to a portion of this Union, where slavery exists; that the proposed change is to be effected by a people, whose fundamental maxim it is, that he who would tolerate slavery is unworthy to be free; that the principle of universal emancipation must march in the van of the invading force; and that all the horrors of a servile war will too surely follow in its train—these merely commercial considerations, sink into insignificance—they are all swallowed up, in the magnitude of the danger with which we are menaced.

Sir, under such circumstances, the question to be determined is this: With a due regard to the safety of the Southern States, can you suffer these islands to pass into the hands of buccaneers, drunk with their new-born liberty?

I repeat the question—can you suffer this thing, consistently with the duty which you owe to Maryland, to Virginia, to Kentucky, to Missouri, to Tennessee, to North and South Carolina, to Georgia, to Alabama, to Mississippi, to Louisiana, and to Florida? Nay, sir, New England, securely as she feels on this subject, is not without interest in the result. A numerous colony of her sons are, at this moment, toiling in temporary exile, beneath the fervid sun of Cuba. If the horrors of St. Domingo are to be re-acted in that beautiful island, they will be its first victims.

What, then, is our obvious policy? Cuba and Porto Rico must remain as they are. To Europe, the President has distinctly said, “We cannot allow a transfer of Cuba to any European power.” We must hold a language equally decisive to the Spanish American States. We cannot allow their principle of universal emancipation to be called into activity, in a situation where its contagion, “from our neighborhood, would be dangerous to our quiet and safety.” The President would brave the power of England, to prevent her acquisition of Cuba—and why, sir? To keep the receipts of our custom house at their maximum—to preserve our commerce and navigation. Will he quail before the new Republics of the South, when a dearer interest is at stake?

I know, sir—the documents before us prove it—that we have been exhibiting the character of a political busybody, in the Cabinets of Europe and America. I know, sir—the documents before us prove it—that, in the progress of this splendid diplomatic campaign, certain declarations have been made to the different powers, cis-Atlantic and trans-Atlantic, which it may be difficult to reconcile. But, so far as they conflict with the duty which we owe to ourselves, they must be reconciled. The safety of the Southern portion of this Union must not be sacrificed to a passion for diplomacy.

The United States are yet free from these diplomatic fetters. They are not pledged. We have entered into no bonds. If it shall consist with our interest that Cuba should pass into the hands of England or of France, rather than to see another Haytian Republic erected there, we are free to permit it. If our interests and our safety shall require us to say to these new Republics, Cuba and Porto Rico must remain as they are, we are free to say it. Yes, sir, and, by the blessing of God, and the strength of our own arms, to enforce the declaration, and let me say to gentlemen, these high considerations do require it. The vital interests of the South demand it, and the United States will be recreant from its duty, faithless to the protection which it owes to the fairest portion of this Union, if it does not make this declaration, and enforce it.

Shall we go to Panama to do this? It is one of the thick-coming fancies, which bewilder the minds of the advocates of this measure, that it will tend to protect the interests of the Southern States; that their interests require that we should send Ministers to Panama, to discuss this question concerning Cuba and Porto Rico; yes, sir, enfettered as our Cabinet is by its pledges and declarations, that we should commit to the hazard of negotiation, a question of vital interest to us, in relation to which we have nothing to yield.

The Deputies of the Spanish American Republics go to Panama, with the settled conviction that they have the right to strike at Spain, by inciting and aiding Cuba and Porto Rico to revolt; and although they will not ask us to join in the operation, they will expect us to consult with them, as to the relations to be maintained with this new power. Unless we are faithless to ourselves, our Deputies must be instructed, that no change in the condition of these islands can be permitted. What benefit can you expect from such negotiations?

Our Deputies will be told—The Cabinet of Washington have recognized our right to strike our enemy wherever we can reach him. They have expressly disclaimed their right to interfere, to prevent us from attacking Cuba. At their instance, we have suspended this movement, until the result of their mediation with Russia was ascertained. In requesting a mere suspension, they have reiterated the admission of our right. We have performed an act of courtesy in yielding to this request, but the period of suspension has passed. We return to our original purpose, and you cannot consistently interfere with its execution.

Sir, we must cut this Gordian knot. We must relieve ourselves from these diplomatic fetters. We must pledge ourselves, not to foreign nations, but to that portion of our own citizens who have a deep and vital interest in this question, that the condition of Cuba and Porto Rico shall remain unchanged. To the Spanish American States, we must notify our determination, in terms of perfect respect and good will; but still as our fixed determination. Shall we go to Panama to do this? To expose our Deputies to their reproaches for our imputed inconsistency? Or to insult them by a studied mockery in opening a negotiation with a fixed determination to dictate the terms—with an entire conviction that we have nothing to yield to them? Sir, on such a subject, the will of the people of the United States should be expressed, through their Representatives in both Houses of Congress, by an act to invest the President with the powers which will be adequate to the crisis.

Debate on the Panama Mission in Secret Session.

These, sir, are the reflections which occur to me on this branch of the subject. To my mind it is obvious, however we may protest against any intention to violate our neutrality, that as a necessary consequence of this mission, we must become parties to the Congress of Panama, to the extent of what is denominated the pledge given by Mr. Monroe—a pledge which the people of the United States are not prepared to admit, and to redeem,—a pledge, the redemption of which would most distinctly commit our neutrality; or, refusing to do so, that we shall disappoint the expectations which we ourselves will have created, and that feelings of ill will and of eventual hostility, must be the necessary result.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, rose, and said, it was his intention, when this subject was first brought before the Senate, to take no part in the discussion; but, on the final question as to the expediency of the measure, to call for the yeas and nays, and record his negative. The extraordinary course, however, adopted within, as well as without these walls, had put those opposed to the mission upon the defensive.

I am not willing (said Mr. D.) to be considered as belonging to an organized opposition to the administration—if, indeed, there is such an opposition. On the contrary, yielding to the administration, I have, on more occasions than one, voted in favor of nominations by no means agreeable to me, and have no doubt I shall often do so, in future; others act with me, most probably, from similar motives. But we must not be taxed too heavily. We must sometimes be allowed to think and act for ourselves—and if, for the exercise of this right, the Government papers are to be let loose upon us, we must defend ourselves as well as we can.

We, who are opposed to this mission to Panama, are accused in papers that receive the patronage of the Government, of being conspirators, who seek to conceal our views; and, by closing our doors, to seal up every avenue to information. Here, at least, it is known, that, in discussing this question with closed doors, we have yielded, reluctantly, to the injunctions of the Executive. Under these circumstances, I must be permitted briefly to state the reasons for the vote I shall give, and to convince my associates within these walls—for we are denied an appeal to our constituents without—that I am no conspirator; that I am not governed by motives of faction, or a desire unnecessarily to embarrass the administration.

I am, from principle, opposed to all unnecessary extension of our diplomatic concerns—next to a passion for war on the part of our Government, I most dread a passion for diplomacy—a stronger symptom of which I have never seen, than in the case now before us.

I consider it a serious misfortune that any of the new States of Spanish America have been induced to invite the Government of the United States to send deputies to their great Congress at Panama; and moreso, that the President of the United States has felt himself authorized to accept the invitation. The invitation itself was of a character so extraordinary, that the Ministers of Colombia and Mexico would not present it, until, by inquiry, they ascertained a point, on which they certainly had strong doubts, that it would be well received. And the President at first perceived, and stated, so many difficulties, to be obviated before the invitation could be accepted, that, unless they had been removed, by some process which we are utterly incapable of comprehending, the invitation must have been declined. The explanations given by the Ministers of the new States, were calculated to increase, rather than obviate, the difficulties that had suggested themselves to the President, and we find those explanations were not satisfactory, when he determined to accept the invitations.

Mr. Clay, in his letter to Mr. Obregon, of the 80th November, five days before the meeting of Congress, says, "in your note there is not recognized so exact a compliance with the conditions on which the President expressed his willingness that the United States should be represented at Panama, as could have been desired;"—yet, "the President has determined, at once, to manifest the sensibility of the United States to whatever concerns the prosperity of the American Hemisphere." The President has not condescended to inform us of the circumstances which induced him to abandon the cautious policy which he first adopted, but seems to presume upon some sympathetic movement in this body, which shall induce an acquiescence in his views on our part, without the light which has shed its influence over his mind; and, no doubt, it is considered as an extraordinary circumstance that we do not, also, determine, at once, to manifest the sensibility of the United States to whatever concerns the prosperity of the American Hemisphere.

This body, however, is not in the habit, and I hope never will be, of determining, at once, upon questions of doubtful policy, as this was certainly considered to be, on the first impression, by the President himself. Deliberation is the peculiar characteristic of the Senate of the United States; such has been its character heretofore, and the present case affords abundant proof that such will continue to be its character. We are not governed by sudden impulses—no course pursued within or without these walls, can force us into a hasty decision, upon this, or any other important measure.

The United States have, at all times, manifested the utmost sensibility, as to what concerns the Republic of Mexico, and those of South America, by being the first to acknowledge their independence—by sending Ministers to their respective courts, and by adopting treaties with them of the most friendly character, upon terms of perfect reciprocity. We shall, no doubt, keep Ministers at their courts, to cultivate and preserve the most friendly relations between them and us; to go farther than this, will lead to embarrassments—a system of fraternization must end in dissension.

It is not the interest of these Republics that we should embark in their cause, and surely there is no reason for their embarking in ours; with them, there is a sense of common danger, which alone can bind and keep them together. In that danger, we need not, and it is to be hoped, will not participate.

It was long after these new States had made their arrangements for holding their Congress at Panama, before they thought of inviting the United States to take any part in their union, league, and confederation; nor is it probable it would have occurred to them at all, but for what Mr. Clay calls, "the memorable pledge of the President of the United States, in his message to Congress of December, 1823," that the allied powers of Europe could not extend their political system to any portion of either continent of America, without endangering our happiness; that we could not believe that our Southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord; and that we could not behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference. And the still more memorable pledge, in the same message, that the American continents are, henceforth, not to be considered as subjects for any future colonization by any of the European powers.

As to the first, we may see the light in which it was viewed by the Government of Mexico, when they called upon the United States to redeem this pledge, by interfering to prevent, what they supposed an attempt to invade Cuba, by a French force last summer.

If these new Governments suppose we are to redeem this pledge, any farther than to promote our own views in preventing a change, as to the possession of the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, they deceive themselves—and it is very certain they have deceived themselves. As to the other pledge, that the nations of Europe shall not plant colonies on either of the continents of North or South America; these new States ought to know, that the President had no power to give such a pledge. If the powers of Europe possess, by right, any portion of either of these continents, they may colonize such possessions, and this Government will not prevent them—the pledge of the late President to the contrary, notwithstanding.

These pledges, which the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSON) thinks produced an electric shock in Europe, and brought the Holy Alliance to a pause, in my humble opinion produced but little effect, except to induce the new Republics to give this invitation to join the Congress at Panama, and will produce but little effect, except to embarrass our Government hereafter.

What is the nature and character of the Congress to be assembled at Panama?

It is to be composed, in the first place, of Delegates, called Plenipotentiaries, from five new States, formerly Spanish, and still claimed by Spain as Colonies, but whose independence has been acknowledged by the United States and by Great Britain. From the novelty of their situation, and exposure to danger from internal as well as external enemies, they have thought proper to strengthen themselves by compacts of union, league, and confederation, to be consummated by this Congress at Panama. The powers of this Congress are regulated by the treaties of union, league, and confederation upon which it is founded—and no doubt, is to be as lasting as those treaties themselves.

The Congress at Panama will be brought together, and can only be kept together, by a sense of common danger amongst the States represented; and, in all particulars, it will more nearly resemble the Amphictyonic Council, than any other assembly we read of.

This Council was founded on compacts of union, league, and confederation, among the States represented, for the protection of their liberty and independence against powerful enemies, who, but for such union, would have subjugated them in detail. It was instituted principally with a view of uniting in a sacred bond of amity, the several States of Greece that were admitted into it, and of obliging them, by that union, to undertake the defence of each other, and to be mutually vigilant for the tranquillity and happiness of the country. They were, also, created to be protectors of the oracle of Delphos.

The powers of the Congress at Panama have been accurately delineated by gentlemen who have preceded me. I shall endeavor to be more explicit as to powers which are denied them.

This Congress is not to be considered as a sovereign power—as by the treaties on which it is founded, they must in nowise interrupt the exercise of the national sovereignty of the contracting parties; nor can they interfere, in whatever regards the relations of the States represented, with foreign nations. There will, therefore, be no court at Panama to receive Ministers from sovereign States or powers. It will be observed that the Deputies to be sent to this Congress by the new States, are nowhere called Envoys or Ministers, but Plenipotentiaries; the plenitude of their power, however, is limited by treaties to specific objects. They are not considered in the character of Ministers entitled to protection by the law of nations: for the States respectively have taken care to secure to their representatives this protection by express treaty. No provision, however, of this kind, is made in behalf of the Deputies of the United States, and clothing them with the titles of Envoys Extraordinary to the Assembly of American nations at Panama, which is not a court or sovereign power, will not ensure to them the protection due to Ministers under the law of nations. But, as Colombia has joined in the invitation, and as Panama is within its territories, if our Ministers shall not be treated with the hospitality due to their characters as Deputies—and more they are not entitled to, as they were only invited as such—we shall have just cause of complaint against that Government, and that is all we have to rely upon in this particular. The Congress at Panama is confined strictly to the States formerly Spanish, by all the treaties between them, for holding the same. The President nominates our envoys to the Congress of American nations at Panama—which would embrace the United States—a name which it will be proper to assume, if our Delegates take seats in this Congress, and not otherwise. This proves, if other evidence were wanting, that it is intended our Ministers shall take their seats in this Congress.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, said he had not expected to speak in this debate; and, if he had spoken among the first, it would have been on a different side from that on which he now appeared. Before I had examined this question, (said Mr. B.,) I was willing to have voted for this mission, such as I saw it represented to be in the President's message, and in the publications of the day. But time and reflection have done their office. The report of our Committee on Foreign Relations, when read at the Secretary's table, set me thinking, and the subsequent study of the report, and of the treaties which create this Congress, have wrought a decided change in my mind. I am now ready to vote against the mission, but do not wish to vote upon the resolution reported by the committee, because a vote upon that will not express my exact opinion, and because it contains a word, strictly correct I admit, but calculated to lead undisciplined minds, in this age of loose talking, to an erroneous and false conclusion. Thus, I am laid under a sort of necessity to submit an amendment. The submitting of this, lays me under an absolute necessity of exposing my reasons for doing so; and the exposition of these reasons presents me as a speaker in a case in which I had expected to act no other part than that of a juror in his box. But the Senate need not be alarmed. I do not premeditate a speech of formal parts against them; for it is no time now for exordium and peroration. In this last hour of a long debate, nothing can be tolerated but a straightforward argument of facts and conclusions; reasons and authorities. The politeness even of this Senate can endure no more; and, with this conception of my duty, I proceed immediately to the discharge of it.

The Senate is called upon, as the constitutional adviser of the President, to give its opinion to him upon his proposition to send Ministers to the Congress of the Spanish American States assembled upon the Isthmus of Panama.

The circumstances out of which this proposition has grown, as disclosed to us in the President's communications, are these: A conditional invitation to send representatives to this Congress was made to this Government last spring, and conditionally accepted by it. The Ministers of Colombia and Mexico, two out of the five powers which compose the Congress, made known to our Secretary of State, in an unofficial conversation, the wishes of their Governments that the United States should be represented in that assembly of the States of the two Americas; and the President, upon receiving the Secretary's report, expressed his willingness to send the Representatives requested, upon condition of receiving satisfactory information upon four preliminary points, which he designated. This might be in the months of April or May last, for they are both spring months, and the time is not otherwise indicated than by a reference to the season. The summer then passed away, and the autumn also, without hearing more upon this subject; but the commencement of winter, the month of November, brought up the Ministers again, reinforced by the envoy from Guatemala, with an invitation, in form, to send the Representatives which had been conditionally invited in the spring, and without having complied with the conditions stipulated for by the President. This took place on the 2d, 8d, and 14th of November; and, on the 30th of the same month, six days before the meeting of the Senate, the President accepted, unconditionally, the invitation which he had accepted on condition in the month of April or May preceding, and without a compliance with his own stipulated terms, or an excuse for a non-compliance with them. The annual message, of the 6th of December, made known to the two Houses of Congress the fact of the invitation, of the acceptance, and of the President's intention to commission and send forth the Ministers. The annunciation of this design arrested the public attention, set people to thinking and to talking, and in the same identical time in which a thousand heads were at work to make "reconciliation and peace" between this declared intention of the President, on the one hand, and the constitution of his country on the other, another message was received by the Senate in secret sitting, in which the President directly and unequivocally asserted his "constitutional competency" to institute the mission, without the advice and consent of this body.

The further declaration, in the same message, that he had not "thought proper" to take any step in this business, without ascertaining the Senate's opinion of its "expediency," expressed upon the "nominations," contains no qualification of the asserted right; and to suppose that the Senate would not take the distinction between the assertion of a right, and the effect of a condescending temper, would be to suppose them intellectually incompetent to pass judgment upon that claim to "constitutional competency," which the President had so openly and boldly set up.

The character of the Congress itself, whether diplomatic, legislative, judicial, or merely "advisory;" the character of the Representatives to it, whether Ministers, Deputies, or Judges; the subjects upon which they are to deliberate; the mode of acting, whether as a Council merely, a Congress of Deputies, or an Assembly of diplomatic Ministers; all are fruitful sources of inconsistent and contradictory opinions, running foul of each other, and differing, more or less, from the treaties which would govern and control all. The report of the committee points out many of these differences; the labor of gentlemen who have preceded me, have detected many others; and enough yet remain for my enumeration to exhaust your patience, in listening, and my strength, in detailing. The task will not be undertaken, but a few of the most glaring and prominent differences, omitted by others, will be seized upon and presented by me. First, upon the character of the Congress. The President treats it as a diplomatic assembly for the negotiation of treaties in the ordinary form; the Colombian Minister considers it a Congress which is to "fix" principles and "determine" questions of national law. The Mexican Minister treats it as a Council of War, which is to give the greatest effect to the military operations of the Confederates; the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. ROBBINS) declares it to be a mere advising Council, without power to negotiate a treaty, or to enforce obedience to its advice; and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) looks upon it as a Committee of Public Safety, in which questions of common interest may be discussed, but nothing decided, nor any treaty negotiated. Next, as to the subjects of deliberation in the Congress. Upon this point, the greatest discordance prevails in the enumeration given by each. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) has clearly exposed these inconsistent and contradictory catalogues; and I will not impair the force of his statement by a lame and imperfect recapitulation. Then, as to the powers of the Ministers. These would seem to result, of course, from the subjects upon which they are to act, and as these are unknown, so are the powers undefined and undefinable. The Ministers from Colombia and Mexico entreat us to clothe our envoys with "full powers—ample powers." The President invests our envoys, and presumes the envoys of the other States to be invested, with power to negotiate treaties; while the Senators from Rhode Island and Louisiana, who support the President, utterly deny any such authority to any of the Ministers. Upon the organization of the Congress, its mode of acting, and of deciding questions, there is no contrariety, because no information has been given, or opinions expressed. The Ministers of Colombia, Mexico, and Guatemala, after taking from May till November to answer the President's interrogatories, return him no answer upon these three points, nor any excuse for not doing so. I refer to all these contrarieties, at this time, Mr. President, not for the purpose of showing them to be erroneous—that will be done when I shall come to the analysis of the treaties themselves—but for the purpose of showing the CONTRARIETY itself, and of proving, by this single fact, the truth of my position, that we are without "satisfactory information," upon the character, powers, and duties of this Congress. Having done this, I proceed to inquire:

Is this information necessary to us?

The affirmative of this inquiry, it does seem to me, results from the nature of the thing which we are required to do. The President has called upon us for advice; the constitution makes it our duty to give it. But, to give it in the spirit of the constitution, we must first be informed ourselves upon all the circumstances of the case concerning which the advice is required. This is the natural course and order of things, even in the ordinary transactions of life. No prudent man gives advice to his neighbor, without first acquiring exact information of that neighbor's situation. No honest lawyer will give advice to his client without the exercise of a like precaution. And shall we, the Senators of the United States, required by the constitution to be thirty years of age, to ensure our arrival at years of discretion, and vested with a tenure in office longer, by one-third, than that of the President, to inspire us with independence—shall we, the Senators of four-and-twenty States—act without discretion and without independence, in giving advice upon the affairs of ten millions of people? Reason would say, no! But we are not left to reason and argument, even upon a point so plain. We have authority, and that of the highest order, for insisting on the justice and reasonableness of our request. It is the authority of the President himself, acting upon the identical case now before us, and communicated to the Senate by himself, in his confidential message of December 26th.

[Here Mr. B. read a passage from Mr. Clay's report, in which the Secretary informs the Ministers from Colombia and Mexico, that the President held it to be "necessary, before" he could accept the invitation to send Representatives to Panama, to arrange "several preliminary points, such as the subjects to which the attention of the Congress would be directed, the substance and form of the powers to be given to the respective Representatives, the mode of organizing the Congress, and its mode of action."]

Compare the terms of my amendment, Mr. President, with the terms of the report just read, and you will find them to be identically the same, to a word, and even to a letter. One is a fac-simile of the other. My amendment is a mere re-occupation of the ground which the President took, as I conceive, with judgment, in May, and which he abandoned, without any reason that he has seen fit to assign to the Senate, in November following; and I must be permitted to argue, that the same "satisfactory information" which was necessary to him, before he would accept the invitation to send Ministers, is equally necessary to the Senate, before it can advise him to send them.

But, sir, we are placed in a strait. The

[SENATE.]

President exacts our advice, and refuses us further information. The gentlemen in support of the Administration, back the President in this course of conduct, and even deny us the short respite of an adjournment. We are in the condition of a petty jury in a case of homicide or larceny, locked up, sir, night and day, restricted to the enjoyment of candle and water, and not permitted to separate until the verdict shall be rendered. This is a new way of getting advice from the Senate. The oldest members say they never saw the like of it before, not even during the war, when the dangers of the country required the most arduous sittings; but, after what we have seen, we are all prepared for any extremity.

The fact being established, that the Senate has not satisfactory information upon which to act, and being nevertheless forced to act, I shall proceed to examine what we have got, and prove from this that the United States ought not to entangle itself with the Congress of the confederated States of Spanish America.

The most innocent character in which this Congress has been presented to us, is that for which we are indebted to the ingenious speech of the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. ROBINSON)—that of a mere advising Council. Taken in that sense, and it is a Council of War, deliberating upon the plan of a campaign—meditating the invasions of Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands, and the Canaries. Its essential character is belligerent, and to go into it as an “associate,” is to partake of that character. I take a distinction between going, in the ordinary diplomatic form, to the sovereignty of a country which is at war with another, and going into a Council of War for directing military operations, such as this is. The one may be consistent with the neutral position, the other is utterly incompatible with it. Gentlemen betray their sensibility to this fact, when they allege, in mitigation of our conduct, that we go to dissuade the Confederates from invading the possessions of Spain. If, in reality, they go for that purpose, they will be very unwelcome counsellors to those who are determined upon that invasion, and who are collecting all possible means to give it the greatest possible effect. And Spain—what will she say to our excuses and apologies? She may disbelieve them, and, in that case, she will consider us as the “associate” of her enemy; or, she may affect to credit them, and make them the ostensible groundwork of a gracious act of amnesty and oblivion of our offence. They cannot be received in justification: for associates in any illegal purpose are guilty in equal degrees, without regard to the particular part which each may have acted. A plea, that part of the associates did not concur in the criminal act, rises no higher than to establish a claim for pardon—a claim which, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) has shown you, a king of Great Britain refused to recognize in a Peer of the realm.

The advising power is a high one. It cannot be assumed by nations or individuals. Between them, consent alone can give it; between functionaries, the law alone can confer it; but, wherever it is given by consent, or conferred by law, a high moral and honorary obligation is contracted by all the parties concerned, to conform to such advice. Nothing but fraud, imposition, or change of circumstances, can justify a want of conformity; all of which are grounds of extreme delicacy to be assumed between nations, and yet the only ones which the dissentient party can plead with honor. If we go into council with these nations, we must either follow the advice given, or reject it. If we follow it, then the free deliberations of our Congress here are trammelled and controlled by the Congress at Panama. If we reject it, we must either dissent in silence, and incur the imputation of perfidy, or come out with reasons which may impeach the honor of our associates, and draw upon us the serious consequences of their resentment. Upon this subject, we already have some experience with one of these powers. A convention for the suppression of the slave trade was negotiated with Colombia in 1825, sent home for ratification, and rejected by the Senate in the undisputed exercise of its constitutional power. Yet, Colombia is dissatisfied at this rejection. Her Minister here has adverted to it in terms which cannot be misunderstood, and has even proposed it for the consultation and advice of the Congress at Panama! The decisions of the American Senate to be overhauled by the Congress at Panama! * Suppose we agree to this proposition. The result is easily foreseen. The decision will go against us, five to one. Then we must submit; the American Senate must conform; the resentment of the Confederate powers will be held up to alarm us; and if we do not yield to that argument, the effect of the resentment itself will surely be incurred.

The maxims of prudence are the same among individuals and nations. Neither can become too intimate with the other, without danger of breaking up all friendship between them. The sweetest wine makes the sourest vinegar; the best of friends become the worst of enemies! No feuds so bitter as those of families; no cause of quarrelling so common as intimacy over-much! No peacemaker half so powerful as distance, independence, and complete separation of interests! and, to my mind, there is infinitely more danger of making enemies than there is chance for gaining friends, in this project for going into this “advising council,” to mix up our affairs with those of half a dozen foreign nations.

I say, Mr. President, the advising power is a high one: it is little less than a power to control and govern the event. The President has no power to advise this Congress; he can only recommend; and, little as a recommendation was intended to influence our deliberations, we all know and see its potent and almost irresistible effect. Shall we take advice, then, from abroad? May the President go abroad for that advice which he cannot obtain from this Senate—his constitutional advisers—and then deliver it to this Congress, with the option, on our part, of following this foreign advice, or of incurring the resentment of all these powers, in addition to his own, if we do not act as desired? The States of this Union have a right to send us their opinions; but have we a right to send Ministers abroad to get other opinions to overrule, or even to confirm their instructions?

But, Mr. President, this is a council for something more than consultation and advice: it is for deliberation and action; it is a council in the sense of the Amphictyonic—that council which Bolivar had in his eye when he declared that the Isthmus of Panama would become more celebrated in history than that of Corinth. The only place in the treaties in which the Congress is mentioned as a council, announces it to be a tribunal for the decision of questions in the last resort, and without the power of appeal. It is to be an arbitrator of differences among the States; an interpreter of their treaties; a rallying point in common dangers; a council in great events; a council of war in time of war—of peace, in time of peace. What else can this imply, but a power to decide, and to enforce obedience? The power to enforce the decision results from the right to decide. So said the Federalist, speaking of our Congress of 1778. But our Congress was restrained from putting refractory States to the Ban because it was limited to the exercise of powers "expressly" granted. This restriction upon the exercise of a power resulting from the nature of the Confederation, and held by some to be necessary to its preservation, (General Hamilton, in the Federalist.) was given as the illustration of the necessity of omitting the words "EXPRESSLY delegated" in our constitution. The treaties of the Spanish American States contain no such restriction, and the Ban of the Confederates will be as naturally resorted to by the majority in the Panama Congress, as it always has been by the majority in the Diet of Ratisbon or Frankfurt.

Keeping steadily in view the double aspect under which this Congress has been presented to us, we have next to inquire, whether it constitutes a "Diplomatic Assembly" with power to negotiate treaties in the ordinary form? The President, in his Message, evidently holds the affirmative of this inquiry: the two Senators who support him with their voice on this floor (Messrs. ROBBINS, of Rhode Island, and JOHNSTON, of Louisiana) maintain the negative. These gentlemen call it, sometimes, a Diplomatic Assembly, but deny its power to negotiate a treaty. Strange diplomatists, indeed, who cannot do the only thing which confers the title of diplomatic! For complimentary embassies are unknown to these United States; they belong to the crowned heads of the Old World; and with us, the power to negotiate treaties is the essential and indispensable attribute of the diplomatic character. I hold these gentlemen to be in error upon this point, and the President also. The respect which I owe to him and to them requires me to state the grounds of their opinions with all possible candor, and to advance my own arguments in opposition, with all the diffidence which is compatible with a firm reliance upon their truth.

Thus it is shown, Mr. President, that Deputies in Spain frequently wore the title of Ambassadors, without having any pretension to diplomatic character; that Ministers to Congresses might be nothing but Deputies, or vice versa; that the name of Minister would add nothing to the Deputy, nor the name of Deputy detract any thing from the Minister. Then, we may conclude that these Spanish American States, in giving the name of Plenipotentiaries to their Deputies, were acting upon a usage with which they were familiar in Old Spain; and I will very soon show you, that in giving this name, they neither gave, nor intended to give, diplomatic functions or character.

For this purpose I take up the second of the articles which I have read, article 15th of the treaty last referred to. This article stipulates for the rights of hospitality, and for the inviolability of person due to the character of Ambassadors. Now, sir, why stipulate for ambassadorial privileges if they were already possessed? And if these Plenipotentiaries are Ambassadors, they have all the privileges of the character, without the officious help of treaty stipulations. They derive them from the law of nations, which covers with the rights, privileges, and immunities of the diplomatic character, every Minister, the instant that he is appointed, just as readily and as naturally as the municipal law throws its protection over every child the instant it is born. To suppose that a treaty stipulation would be necessary in one case, would be just as absurd as to suppose that a special act of assembly would be wanting in the other. Why then these treaty stipulations? I answer, because inviolability of person is necessary to all legislators, to enable them to do the public business. We have it ourselves, not under the law of nations, but under an article in the Federal Constitution. The members of Congress in Colombia, Mexico, Guatemala, and the other Federate States, have it likewise, and in like manner, under articles in the constitutions of their respective countries. Why then this treaty stipulation in behalf of these gentlemen at Panama? Because, exemption from arrest and imprisonment was necessary to the free and regular transaction of their business, and their official character being unknown to the constitution of their respective countries, or to the law of nations, a treaty stipulation became necessary in their behalf; and the inviolability of the ambassadorial character was adopted as a criterion, because it presented the twofold advantage of furnishing an adequate measure of protection, and a rule of measurement known to all the parties.

How will gentlemen escape from this difficulty? The facts are undeniable, and the conclusions irresistible. It will not do to set down these treaty-stipulations to the account of Spanish American ignorance. The writings, proclamations, and State papers of the new powers, place them above the reach of such an insinuation. Besides, they have given us practical proof that they know just as well when treaty stipulations are unnecessary, as when they are not. They have Ministers now here, no less than three of them, and no treaties with us for the rights of hospitality or for the protection of their persons. I repeat it, sir, the conclusion is irresistible! They have protected their Plenipotentiaries at Panama with treaty stipulations, because they are not a diplomatic body, and not entitled to diplomatic privileges under the law of nations; and they have not protected them by like stipulations at this place, because they bear the diplomatic character, and are protected by the law of nations.

This is decisive; I challenge gentlemen to meet it; but a further view yet remains to be taken. These confederates stipulate for less in behalf of their Plenipotentiaries, than public Ministers receive without stipulation. They stipulate for nothing but hospitality and inviolability for the persons of their Plenipotentiaries; whereas, under the law of nations, this inviolability extends to the Minister's wife, his children, and his servants; to his house and his coaches; it makes him independent of the jurisdiction of the country, both civil and criminal, in which he resides; in fine, it gives him the privilege of diplomatic ex-territoriality, and thus makes him, in legal contemplation, out of the country in which he is, and in the country from which he came. What an immeasurable distance between these rights and privileges, and a claim for food and bodily protection. Yet even this miserable modicum of ambassadorial privilege is limited in its application to the particular spot in which the Plenipotentiary Congress may chance to sit for the time being. While at Panama, Colombia is to give it to them. If forced by the current of events to remove to Guatemala, or to Mexico, Colombia is released from her obligation, and these States assume it. But Ministers, with diplomatic character and privilege, are not only protected in the country to which they are sent, but in every country through which they pass. The sovereign, indeed, to whom they go, is under a more particular obligation to respect and protect them; but they are entitled everywhere to the rights of hospitality, and to an entire exemption from bodily hurt or harm. If injured or murdered in such passage, the outrage ceases to be an offence against the municipal law of the country; it swells into a crime against the law of nations; it becomes a justifiable cause for war; and the whole civilized world are bound to condemn, if not to avenge it.

[Mr. B. here referred to several historical examples, to illustrate the truth and force of what he advanced. He mentioned the case of the ambassadors of Francis I. to Venice and Constantinople, who were assassinated on the river Po by the orders of the Governor of Milan, acting under the countenance of the Emperor Charles V.; and that of the French Ambassadors, in the time of the Directory, returning from the Congress of Rastadt, and waylaid on the road by a detachment of Austrian husars, pulled out of their carriages, and cut to pieces with sabres, in the arms of their wives. The first of these events, he said, had given new allies to Francis in his wars with the Emperor; and the second had arrested the current of public indignation, counterpoised the crimes of the Revolution, and, for a while, turned the sympathies of the civilized world in favor of those who were themselves red with the blood of the human race. But he did not mention these examples from any apprehension that our gentlemen of Panama would be murdered on the way, but to show the immeasurable difference between Ministers invested with diplomatic privilege, and these Plenipotentiaries with their treaty-stipulation for food and bodily protection.]

Having made good this point, Mr. President—having shown, upon indisputable facts, clear reason, and undeniable authority, that this Congress at Panama is not a Diplomatic Assembly for the negotiation of treaties—I will proceed, without now stopping to show what it really is, to the great constitutional question, which results from this position—the competency, not of the President alone, but of the President and Senate united, to send Envoys Extraordinary, and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to such an assemblage.

The power of the President and Senate to send Ministers abroad, is derived from the 2d section of article 2d of the Constitution of the United States. The section is in these words:

“The President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers, Consuls,” &c.

The Ambassadors and Ministers here intended, are such only as are known to the law of nations. Their names, grades, rights, privileges, and immunities, are perfectly defined in the books which treat of them, and were thoroughly understood by the framers of our constitution. They are, Ambassadors—Envoys—Envoys Extraordinary—Ministers—Ministers Plenipotentiary—Ministers Resident.

The honors due to each of these orders of public Ministers, differ with their respective ranks and degrees; but the essential character of each is the same, and the rights of all are equal. In the first place, they must all be accredited from sovereign to sovereign. So say all the books, without a solitary exception. In the next place, they all possess the diplomatic privilege of ex-territoriality; and this includes exemption from the payment of duties, exemption from local jurisdiction, and the right of inviolability for themselves and families, the houses in which they live, and the carriages in which they ride. In the third place, they derive all this from the law of nations; no part of it from treaties and conventions. In the fourth place, they usually carry letters of credence, always letters patent, containing full powers, which are to be exchanged with those of the Ministers who may treat with them; and, finally, they are governed by instructions, and send home the treaties they sign for ratification or rejection.

Now, let us try our intended Ministers by these tests. Let us see whether they possess the attributes, the characteristics, and the essential features of Ministers, such as are known to the law of nations, and to the constitution of this Confederation. Are they to be sent from sovereign to sovereign? No, Mr. President! They go to an "advisory council," a "committee of public safety." They set out, indeed, from a sovereign; but, instead of moving upon a horizontal line, upon that elevated level which knows no descent, they run down an inclined plane, and land themselves in a Congress of Deputies* upon the Isthmus of Panama. Have they the rights, privileges, and immunities, of public Ministers? Far from it: for, after yielding to them all that their fellow-deputies, fellow-counsellors, or fellow-committee-men (as the case may be) can take, they will still have nothing but the rights of hospitality, and of personal inviolability. Have they even this under the law of nations? Not at all: but under certain treaties, to which we are not parties, and which can only include our Ministers by help of a most liberal construction. Will they carry letters of credence? I presume not: for they will find no sovereign powers on the isthmus to whom to deliver them. Will they exchange full powers with the Plenipotentiaries of the other powers? I should think not: for these Plenipotentiaries will be acting under treaties, and our Ministers under a constitution and the law of nations. Will they negotiate treaties, and send them home for rejection or ratification? I maintain that they will not; all the Senators who have spoken before me, both friends and foes to the mission, agree with me that they will not; I maintain that they will not, and cannot; the President alone seems to think otherwise; probably because he has not had time to study the treaties as we have done. But the fact is remarkable, that no gentleman upon this floor, friend or foe to the measure, supports him in that opinion; and I feel myself justified in dwelling upon the circumstance, and pointing it out to the renewed and continued attention of the Senate.

Tried by these tests, and the diplomatic qualities of our intended Ministers fail at every attribute of the character. Spite of the names which are imposed upon them, they turn out to be a sort of Deputies with full powers for undefinable objects. They are unknown to the law of nations, unknown to our constitution; and the combined powers of the Federal Government are incompetent to create them. Nothing less than an original act, from the people of the States, in their sovereign capacity, is equal to the task. Had these gentlemen been nominated to us as DEPUTIES to a CONGRESS, would not the nominations have been instantly and unanimously rejected? And shall their fate be different under a different name? The delicacy of this position was seen and felt by the Administration. The terms "Deputy," and "Commissioner," were used in the official correspondence up to near the date of the nomination, but as these names could not pass the Senate, a resort to others became indispensable. The invitations and acceptance were in express terms, for "Deputies and Representatives to a CONGRESS." The nominations to the Senate are wholly different.

The Secretary read—

"To the Senate of the United States:

"WASHINGTON, 26th Dec., 1825.

"In confidence that these sentiments will meet the approbation of the Senate, I nominate Richard C. Anderson, of Kentucky, and John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and William B. Rochester, of New York, to be Secretary to the Mission.

Assembly of American nations! Is this the fact? Are the nations there? I do not mean to inquire, Mr. President, whether the men, women, and children, who compose the Republics of Colombia, Guatemala, Mexico, Chili, and Peru, have collected themselves in masses upon the Isthmus of Panama—that, sir, would be a vile and contemptible play upon words; but I do mean to inquire, and, "these ceremonies being burst," I do mean to go before the American people for the answer, whether the sovereignty of these nations, in fact, or by representation, is at the Isthmus of Panama? For, unless it is so present, the institution of this mission is, and must be, a breach of our constitution.

Is, then, the sovereignty of these nations present in fact? I answer, it is not—the thing is impossible: for these States are Republican, and Republics are incapable of exercising the right of sovereign ex-territoriality. That quality belongs alone to kings and emperors, who bear about with them, whithersoever they go, the sovereignty of their respective empires. Ministers can be accredited to the sovereignty of a State, wheresoever it may be; and, hence the resort, in this nomination, to the word nations. They can be accredited to nothing below the sovereignty, and hence the necessity of dropping the word Congress. A nomination to the Congress would have been void, upon its face—the Journal would have shown it; and, peradventure, we, the people, might have got it into the Supreme Court, “as a case arising under the constitution,” and had it reversed for manifest error. The error would then have been patent, instead of being, as it now is, latent. Gentlemen have evinced their sensibility to this difficulty—they have felt the necessity of support, and have gone to Ghent and Utrecht for precedents. The references are unfortunate for them and the President—happy for me and the constitution. The cases are antipodes to each other, in every essential point. Here is a nomination of Ministers to nations in gross, at the place where their sovereignty is not, and cannot be. The Ghent nomination was not to the nations at Ghent, nor even to Great Britain at Ghent—but to “Great Britain.” The meeting of the Ministers at Ghent, was an incident—a mere affair of arrangement, and constituting no part of the nomination. There, and at Utrecht, the Plenipotentiaries were accredited to sovereign powers—met their Representatives, under the law of nations, and for a purpose strictly diplomatic—that of negotiating treaties.

Doubtless there may be nominations to sovereigns without their dominions. The late Congresses in Europe furnish examples of the fact; but they are limited to kings and emperors, possessing the quality of sovereign ex-territoriality. But even to these a Minister could not be accredited in mass. He must have separate letters of credence to each, and separate full powers to treat with each. Reason tells us this: for each sovereign has the right to receive and to reject Ministers—to treat or to let it alone. Authority tells us the same thing; and, as authority is often more potent than reason, and this may be one of the cases in which it is so, let us look at the books.

[Here Mr. B. read—

“One letter of credence may serve for two Ministers, sent at the same time, if they are both of the same order. Sometimes, on the contrary, one Minister has several letters of credence; this happens when he is sent to several sovereigns, or to one sovereign, in different qualities. The Ministers sent to Switzerland are often charged with more than four different letters of credence. So it is with those sent to the Emperor, to the circles of the Empire,” &c.]—Martens.

It is the same with the letter of full powers. There must be as many as there are sovereigns to be treated with; the exchange of these must be mutual and simultaneous; each Minister judges for himself the full powers of the other. Yet our intended Ministers to Panama are nominated to the “nations” in mass; the nomination will govern the commissions, and the commissions will govern the letters of credence and of full power. By consequence, the credentials and the full power will be presented to a Congress—to an organised body—and passed upon by it. Peradventure a committee will be raised upon their papers; the Congress vote upon them; and the President announce the result; a clerk write it down; and a door-keeper let them in! What a process for the reception of Ambassadors! Not so at Ghent. There the Ministers of the two powers met upon the footing of equality. The full powers of each were mutually and simultaneously exchanged: (See the Preamble to the Treaty.) Each judged for himself; and from this equality, and this right of reciprocal decision upon each other's powers, there can be no exception except in one single case—a case which did exist at Ghent, and does not exist at Panama; it is the case of a negotiation opened under the auspices of a Mediator, to whom the full powers of each may, and ought to be, submitted, if they disagree. Our Ministers then must be accredited to each of the nations supposed to be at Panama; they must bear full powers to treat with each of their Plenipotentiaries; these again must have full powers to treat with each other, and with us; and these powers must be reciprocally exchanged all around. So it was at Ghent, so at Utrecht, so at Westphalia, so at every Congress of Plenipotentiaries for the negotiation of treaties of which history gives us any account.

The sovereignty of these nations not being, in point of fact, at Panama, the next inquiry is, whether it is there by representation?

This is a thing possible. Ministers, known to the law of nations, may represent the sovereignty of their nations at any point upon the globe. They may come from the four quarters of the globe and form a diplomatic assembly. But is this Congress at Panama an assembly of that description? I maintain that it is not; and in maintenance of this opinion, I bring up and enforce again, the circumstance of their creation under treaties; their limited privileges, and their dependence for these upon treaty stipulations. I will then go forward and show what this Congress is. In doing this, I shall follow the example of the Senator from Rhode Island, (Mr. ROBBINS,) and improve a little upon it. He looks to the treaties which create this Congress, for its character, and he leaves out of view all that has appeared in reviews, proclamations, and newspaper essays. In this he acts like a Senator—like a statesman. I shall imitate him in looking to the same treaties, and in leaving out of view so much of the President's Message, and so much of the same loose authorities, as differ in any degree from the terms of the treaties; and I shall improve upon his example, by adding to the catalogue of excluded authorities, so much of the Secretary's communications, and of the letters of the Colombian, Mexican, and Guatemalan Ministers, as vary from the same standard. In the absence of these treaties, this message and these communications and letters would have governed us: for they would then have been the highest evidence in our possession; but, in the presence of the treaties, they are useless: for they signify nothing when they agree with them, and must be rejected when they differ from them. And here, Mr. President, I shall admit that I was put upon this track by the words of wisdom which fell, in the first days of this debate, from that venerable Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. MACOON,) who, I am proud to say, permits me to call him friend, and am still prouder to know, has been the friend of me and mine through four generations. This venerable Senator said, that this Confederation of Spanish American States, and their Congress at Panama, was to them what the Confederation and Congress of the Revolution was to us. This remark struck me, and set my mind at work. I determined to analyze the two Confederations, and their Congresses, and I have done so. The result is in my hand, [showing a paper,] and I derive confidence in its correctness from seeing that the Senator from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) and the Senator from New Jersey, (Mr. DICKERSON,) without any concert with me, or even knowing what I was about, have, in part, made the same analysis, and arrived at the same conclusions. Their labors not only fortify me in the strength of my position, but relieve me from a part of my own: for, after what they have said, I will do no more in this place, than to read from my notes the analysis which I have made of these Congresses and Confederations, respectively.

[Mr. B. then read from his notes, as arranged under appropriate heads, and in parallel columns, the analysis which he had made of the object of the two Confederacies, and the powers and duties of their respective Congresses.]

Mr. President, I must be permitted to take a closer view of this Congress, under its character of an organized body. It is admitted, on all hands, that it is to have organization and rules. Now, this is a thing impossible in a diplomatic assembly. The Ministers in such an assembly represent sovereign powers, and cannot be organized. We had as well undertake to organize Kings and nations. The Ministers can have no rules of action, for their personal deportment, but those manners of gentlemen which they are presumed to possess; and none for their official conduct but such as are contained in their own instructions. The idea of organization is fatal to the diplomatic pretensions of this assembly. What is organization? It is the disposition of the parts to make them subservient to each other; it subjects the whole to one will, or to one principle of action; it reduces this Congress to a unit, to one party, deciding for all, with one voice. A diplomatic assembly, on the contrary, is multiplicate; it consists of as many parties as there are powers represented, each independent of the other, each making the best bargain he can for his own side. How will our Ministers act with such a body? They must either become parts of its organization, or not become parts of it. Take either horn of the dilemma. In the first event, they make us parties to the confederacy, and bind us by the voice of the body. Well, it is agreed, all round, that this will never do. Then, try the other. Let our Ministers stand off, become no part of the body, but undertake to negotiate with it. This is impossible: for the Congress is not sovereign to receive Ministers, nor can it, like our Congress of the Confederation, appoint Ministers to treat with them, nor treat as two parties: for the body will contain five parties, with only one voice, and we shall present a single party, with two voices. One will have to speak through a President or Secretary; the other, in their own persons. In short, Mr. President, the simple idea of organization explodes every pretension of this Congress to the character of diplomatic.

Yes, sir, "Deputies to a Congress" is the invitation and the acceptance. It is in vain to endeavor to cover it up with the drapery of names and titles. The thing stands before you stripped and naked, in all the nudity, if not in all the beauty, of a Grecian statue. Words can neither hide nor alter it. It is a thing unknown to the constitution, and the constitutional question then recurs upon it. Can the President and Senate send the nominees, as public Ministers, to this Congress, upon the Isthmus of Panama? I contend that they cannot; neither to it, because it is not sovereign to receive them, nor diplomatic to negotiate with them; nor into it, for that would make our envoys a part of its organization, and ourselves parties to the Confederacy; nor to act with it, because the Congress will act as an organized body, and our Deputies as individuals. It is in vain to affect indifference towards these difficulties. They are seen and felt by those who conduct this affair; and the almost utter impossibility of managing it, is betrayed by the Babylonian confusion of terms and ideas which pervade their councils. Behold the effects of this confusion. The Deputies to the Congress are called by all sorts of titles—Agents, Commissioners, Representatives, Plenipotentiaries, and finally promoted, in the President's nomination, to Envoys Extraordinary, and Ministers Plenipotentiary! The Congress itself is equally the subject of a vague and contradictory nomenclature—sometimes a Congress; sometimes a Diplomatic Assembly, without power to negotiate treaties; once a Cortes; now an advising Council; then a Committee of Public Safety; and at last swelled by the President into an Assembly of nations! Then, as to the powers and duties of the Deputies themselves, what contradictions upon these points! Sometimes they are to be giving advice; sometimes to be consulting; sometimes negotiating treaties, and sometimes not; sometimes they are to "settle" the unsettled points in the laws of nations; yea, sir, to give the law to the two Americas, and Europe, Asia, and Africa to boot! Then they are to do nothing in the world but make bows and compliments, and walk in and out, like our territorial Delegates, and exhibit the extraordinary spectacle of lobby Ministers Plenipotentiary and lobby Envoys Extraordinary! And, with all these high and low pretensions, they are to be worked through this chamber upon the plea of an innocent operation; upon the recommendation of an old woman's medicine, that they will do no harm if they do no good.

I trust, Mr. President, that it is now made clear, that the proposed mission is unknown to the law of nations, and to the constitution of this country; but, as it may, nevertheless, be sent, it becomes my duty to proceed upon that supposition, to follow it to Panama, and to show that its objects are, in some respects, already accomplished, in others, unattainable, in others, inexpedient—that we have nothing to expect from it but a heavy item of expense, some unpleasant apologies to foreign nations, the risk of getting into difficulties with the new republics themselves; and that every desirable and attainable object would be better accomplished by an agent or commissioner, without diplomatic character, with little expense to our treasury, and without harm to our constitution.

Pursuing these Ministers to Panama, we have next to inquire, what are the objects of interest to us, which are expected to be accomplished by them at that place?

The President, in his Message, has enumerated several, at the head of which stands the item of commerce. Upon this subject, he expects to establish: 1st. The doctrine, that free ships make free goods. 2d. The restrictions of reason upon the extent of blockades. 3d. The "consentaneous" adoption of principles of maritime neutrality. 4th. The principles of a liberal commercial intercourse.

The first question which presents itself, Mr. President, is one of power in the Congress to treat of these subjects at all. It seems to me that it has no power to touch them. They belong to the "foreign relations" of the confederates, and these it is forbidden to the Congress to "affect in any manner," as shown in the analysis of its powers. The article to that effect is the same in every treaty. It is article 17th, in the treaty between Colombia and Chili; 6th, in that of Colombia and Peru; 18th, in that of Colombia and Guatemala; and 17th, in that of Colombia and Mexico. It is in these words:

"This compact of union, league, and confederation, shall not affect, in any manner, the exercise of the national sovereignty of the contracting parties, in regard to their laws, and the establishment and form of their respective Governments, nor in regard to their relations with other Governments."

Here are three restrictions upon the powers of the Congress:

1. Against interfering with the municipal laws of the confederates.

2. Against interfering with their forms of government.

3. Against interfering with their foreign relations.

The last of these restrictions ought to prevent the Congress from touching the commercial relations of the United States, with any or all of the Confederate powers. But, admitting that this restriction had not been imposed, would it then have been the part of a wise and prudent policy to open the subject of our commercial relations in the Congress of these Confederate powers? I think not, sir, for many reasons: and, first, because we have already so nearly all that we want from each of these powers respectively, that it would be impolitic to put to stake the much which we have in possession, for the chance of gaining the little which we have not yet acquired. With Colombia we have a treaty, ratified by ourselves about sixty days ago, containing every stipulation which we can possibly ask for: the flag to cover the property; free ships to make free goods; the trade of the two countries to be placed on the liberal basis of perfect equality and reciprocity; liberty of conscience, and the right of worship, allowed to our citizens, and the privilege secured to them of being buried in decent and suitable places; and, finally, the crowning stipulation, that, if a better treaty should be made with any other power, all the advantages of it shall immediately accrue to the United States, in the same manner as if it had been made with us. This is certainly covering the whole ground for which we went into the mission to Europe, at the close of the Revolutionary war—it is gaining all that can be got from Colombia. Then for Guatemala. We have a treaty with her, ratified likewise by ourselves, at the present session, in which every point is secured which is contained in the one with Colombia, even to the stipulation for contingent advantages, in the formation of better treaties with other powers. With Buenos Ayres and Chili we had no treaties, positively signed, at the date of our last advices; but our Ministers were in negotiation; and, on the 28th of September last, our Government was officially informed that these negotiations were probably concluded, and treaties signed by that time, which would contain every stipulation which had been put into the treaty with Colombia.—(See Mr. Poinsett's letter of that date.) With Peru we have neither treaty nor negotiation; but it is understood that a Chargé d'Affaires will soon be sent to that country, and, unless he goes to make a commercial treaty, I presume he will go uncharged with any affairs at all. Mexico, alone, remains to be considered. With her we have interchanged Ministers, and from our Plenipotentiary "near" her Government, we are informed, under date of the 18th and 28th of September last, that every article in the proposed treaty was adjusted to his entire satisfaction, save one, and that one a proposition, on the part of Mexico, to reserve the right of granting some commercial privileges with the other American States, formerly Spanish, which would not be granted to other powers. The last intelligence from our Minister, left the negotiation hanging upon this single point, with a peremptory declaration, on his part, that he would never agree to it. Since then, the Message of the Mexican President to his Congress has been seen and read by us all, in which he speaks of this treaty being so nearly concluded as to enable him to say that it would be laid before Congress in a few days! Then, take this matter as you will, in the first place, it is highly probable that we have, before this time, treaties with all these powers, containing every stipulation that we wish. Certain it is, that we have such with Colombia and Guatemala, two out of three of the powers that have invited us to Panama. It is almost certain that we have the same from Mexico, the remaining power that invited us—highly probable that we have just what we want from Buenos Ayres and Chili; and, if we have not, it would seem like a sleeveless errand to go to Panama to get it, because Chili has not invited us to meet her there! And Buenos Ayres has, herself, refused to go there! Neither has Peru invited us, nor can it be presumed that, without the expectation of seeing us at Panama, either this power or Chili has given full powers to their Plenipotentiaries to treat with us at that place. Shall we, then, voluntarily incur the hazard of losing all that we have secured from these nations separately, by opening fresh negotiations with them in a body? Shall we run the risk of seeing Colombia, Guatemala, Peru, Chili, and the rest of them inoculated with this Mexican doctrine—a doctrine so well calculated to become infectious, of granting to each other peculiar privileges to the exclusion of us? Is not a bird in the hand worth two in the bush? Are not four birds in the hand worth the feather of one in the bush?

A third object to be accomplished by this Congress, is one indistinctly seen in the message—the establishment of a league of Republics to counterpoise the Holy Alliance of Europe. The honor of being at its head, seems to be tendered to us. This, Mr. President, is a most seductive object. It addresses itself to the generous and heroic feelings of our entire population. The brilliant honor of presiding in such a league would cast a new splendor over our administration; but it is the business of those who are appointed by the constitution to counsel the President about it, to take counsel themselves rather from their judgments, than from illusions of glory, and the ardent feelings of young men.

the purpose of putting down liberty. They have embodied one million five hundred thousand bayonets to march against the banner of freedom wherever it can be seen. One of the protégés of this alliance is engaged in war with the Spanish American States, formerly his colonies; and these States have confederated against him, as we confederated against our ancient master, in the war of the Revolution. For the success of all their objects in this Confederation, they have the prayers and the best wishes of all the friends of liberty throughout the globe. But I cannot advise the President to enter into this Confederation as a partner, neither upon the open sign, nor in the secret articles. I cannot approve even of a dormant partnership in this business. Not that I am determined, in no event, to make common cause with these new Republics, or any one of them, in a contest with the combined powers of Europe; but because I would be the judge of the occasion which required me to do so, and free to act as I thought proper, when the occasion occurred. The occasion may occur, Mr. President. We have the Holy Allies in front and in rear, in Europe and in Asia. They may conceive it to be the shortest way of accomplishing their final object, to extinguish, at once, the light of liberty in the New World; and the subjugation of the new Republics might be the first step in that great work. In such an event, I would not wait for the dastardly privilege of being the last to be devoured. I would go into the contest from the beginning; I would grapple the universal enemy while he was engaged with my neighbor; I would go into the conflict not as ally, but as principal; not with regulated quotas and starveling contingents, but with all our power by land and sea. I would go into it to conquer or to perish. I would stake life and property, and household gods, upon the issue. I would fight the battle of desperation and of death. It would be the last struggle for human liberty, and should be worthy of the cause; great in the triumph, and greater still in the fall!

The relations of Hayti with the American States, (these United States inclusive,) and the rights of Africans in this hemisphere, are two other questions to be "determined" at the Isthmus. We learn this from a paragraph in the letter of Mr. Salazar, the Colombian Minister. I will read it, for in matters of this kind we cannot be too exact:

THE PARAGRAPH.

"On what basis the relations of Hayti, and of other parts of our hemisphere that shall hereafter be in like circumstances, are to be placed, is a question simple at first view, but attended with serious difficulties when closely examined. These arise from the different manner of regarding Africans, and from their different rights in Hayti, the United States, and in other American States. This question will be determined at the Isthmus, and, if possible, a uniform rule of conduct adopted in re gard to it, or those modifications that may be demanded by circumstances."

Our policy towards Hayti, the old San Domingo, has been fixed, Mr. President, for three and thirty years. We trade with her, but no diplomatic relations have been established between us. We purchase coffee from her and pay her for it; but we interchange no Consuls or Ministers. We receive no mulatto Consuls, or black Ambassadors from her. And why? Because the peace of eleven States in this Union will not permit the fruits of a successful negro insurrection to be exhibited among them. It will not permit black Consuls and Ambassadors to establish themselves in our cities, and to parade through our country, and give their fellow blacks in the United States, proof in hand of the honors which await them, for a like successful effort on their part. It will not permit the fact to be seen, and told, that for the murder of their masters and mistresses, they are to find friends among the white people of these United States. No, Mr. President, this is a question which has been determined HERE for three and thirty years; one which has never been open for discussion, at home or abroad, either under the Presidency of General Washington, of the first Mr. Adams, of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, or Mr. Monroe. It is one which cannot be discussed in this chamber on this day; and shall we go to Panama to discuss it?—I take it in the mildest supposed character of this Congress—shall we go there to advise and consult in council about it? Who are to advise and sit in judgment upon it? Five nations who have already put the black man upon an equality with the white, not only in their constitutions, but in real life; five nations who have at this moment (at least some of them) black generals in their armies and mulatto senators in their Congresses.

But gentlemen say it is only for advice and consultation. I answer, that the question is not debatable, neither at home nor abroad; not even in this chamber, where we have sincere advocates and unprejudiced judges. They say they only go to consult! I say, there are questions not debatable. I would not debate whether my withholding the advice which the President requires upon this occasion, is the effect of a "faction and unprincipled opposition;" I would not debate whether my slave is my property; and I would not go to Panama to "determine the rights of Hayti and of Africans" in these United States. Mr. President, I do repeat, that this is a question which ought not to be agitated by us, neither at home nor abroad. The intentions of the agitators are wholly immaterial. The consequences to us will be the same, whether their designs be charitable or wicked. Knaves can do nothing without dupes. The wicked would be harmless, were it not for the good men who become their associates and instruments. Who made the massacre of San Domingo? Was it not the society of "Les Amis des Noirs" in Paris? And who composed that society? I answer, every thing human, in the shape of virtue and of vice, from Lafayette and the Abbé Gregoire, down to Marat and Anacharsis Klost. The speeches, the writings, and the doctrines of this society, carried to San Domingo by emissaries, with "religion in their mouths, hell in their hearts, and torches in their hands," produced that revolt, the horrors of which yet harrow up the soul, and freeze the blood—that revolt, in which the sleeping babe was massacred in its cradle—in which the husband and the father, tied to his own gate, beheld, by the light of his burning house, the violation of his wife—saw his daughters led off—and received, as a relief from his horrors, the blow of the axe which scattered his brains upon the ground.

The last, and the main argument, relied upon by the President, for sending this mission, is the fact of invitation to do so. This he calls the "decisive inducement." The President is particular in the use of words; we are permitted, therefore, to say, that all other reasons for sending the mission, were persuasive only, until the weight of this invitation decided his mind. I felt the full force of this decisive reason myself. Invitations to mere individuals are often embarrassing, and cannot be accepted without inconveniences or impropriety, nor refused without giving offence. With nations, the acceptance or decline of respectful invitations, often become an affair of State, full of responsibilities. When then I saw it stated in the newspapers, that we had been "invited," I felt the delicacy of the position in which our Government was placed. When the annual Message was read, and I heard from authority, that the invitation had been given and accepted, and that Ministers would be commissioned, I was ready to give my advice in favor of sending them, with a protest against the President's right to send them without such advice. When the Message of the 26th December was read, and the fact of the invitation placed in high relief, as the decisive cause, I responded to the sentiment, and said to the senator next to me, "THAT is the strongest of all the reasons." But what was my astonishment, on coming to look among the appended documents, to find out the real circumstances of this invitation! I found them to be entirely different from what I had supposed them to be, and from what the newspapers and the President's Messages had induced me to believe them to be. But as this ground is delicate, sir, I must trust nothing to memory, nor even to my notes. Let the President's organ speak, the report of the Secretary of State, which accompanied the Message of December 26th.

[Here the report was read.]

This report, Mr. President, put a new face upon the character of the invitation. I found it had not been peremptory, not of a kind to impose an obligation of acceptance, nor so understood by either of the parties. I found that our Government had been sounded with the utmost delicacy, in an unofficial conversation, to know whether it would be agreeable to itself to receive the invitation, and that the President had met the overture with the utmost propriety, with friendly professions, and with a stipulation for preliminaries which gave him the vantage ground, and enabled him to accept the invitation, eventually, with safety and honor, or to decline it without offence. Thus far the conduct of both parties must receive an unqualified approbation. But what next? Why, sir, on the second, third, and fourteenth of November ensuing, the preliminaries not being complied with, the invitation is delivered in form; and, on the thirtieth of the same month, it is accepted "at once."—Six months roll away, and at the end of that time, the Ministers send in their answers, the conditions not complied with, and our Government accepts "at once." Call this an invitation! Sir, it is but little short of the reverse. We are invited provisionally—we make conditions;—the conditions are not complied with; but the invitation is extended in form. What is this but a dispensation to stay away? The non-compliance with the conditions is the substantive answer, and the formal invitation to attend, nevertheless, &c., is the compliment to grace the repulse. Let any gentleman make the case his own. He is invited to a party, either for business or pleasure—he makes conditions—he must know four things, or not come. The four things are told him, but the inviters say, "we shall be glad to see you, sir!"—What is this but leave of absence? Sir, I am not joking about this matter. I do believe that our attendance, at the forepart of this session, will be embarrassing and disobliging to the Confederates, and that, if they wish us to come at all, it is not immediately. I will give another reason for this inference, in the proper place. At present it is sufficient to know the fact, that these Confederates are determined upon the invasion of Cuba and Porto Rico, and that we are going to Panama to advise against it.

From this view of the invitation, it is clear that it was not of a character to lay us under an obligation to accept it—that we might have declined it without offence, and that our final acceptance was more our invitation than theirs. But there are two other aspects under which this invitation is still to be looked at. In the first place, it comes from a part only of the Confederates—three out of five—Colombia, Mexico, and Guatemala; Peru and Chili not having joined in giving it. In the next place, our invitation is by word of mouth, or, at least, by a note. We go, if we go at all, upon a parole request, whereas all the other powers go upon treaties. They create the office by treaties, before they fill it, and in this they do right. Their constitutions are copied from ours, and from their example our Government should learn, if not from our arguments, that this office should be created before it is filled. But, on these points, as on many others, I limit myself to stating the proposition, and refer the Senate to the unanswered and irrefutable arguments of gentlemen who have preceded me—the Senators Macon, Randolph, Hayne, Woodbury, Dickerson, Van Buren, White, Holmes, Berrien, and him whose arguments we have, but unhappily not his presence—Tazewell: these have broke the way before me, overturned all obstacles, silenced all voices, and left to me the easy task of following in the rear—a file closer in the column which traverses the field without resistance.

I think, Mr. President, that enough has now been said, surely enough until some part of it is refuted—to justify the Senate in withholding its advice to the President to send these Ministers to the Congress at Panama. I admit that Congress to be a wise measure for the Spanish American States, as our Congress was a wise one for us in 1778; but it is impossible for us to advise this mission in any of the various forms, or under any of the names and colors, in which it has been presented to us. We cannot send Ministers into the Congress: for that would make us a party to it; we cannot send them to it: for they are not sovereign to receive them. We cannot send them to act with it: for that is an organized body, and our Ministers will be individual. We cannot send them to hang about it, and talk, and remit home accounts of consultations: for they are accredited to nations, and cannot sink to the condition of unofficial agents and lobby Ministers.

But the mission is said to be popular. Certainly it is exhibited under forms to catch the public favor. Religion, Liberty, and Commerce! Such are the banners under which it goes forth! Banners well calculated to draw after them a crowd of followers from every walk and station in life. The prospect of a political crusade against the "bigotry and oppression" of the Roman Catholic Church, must warm the hearts and command the benedictions of every religious sect in the Union. Even the Unitarians, who are not Christians, must be struck with joy, and filled with delight, at beholding it. The institution of a Sacred Alliance of Republics, to counterpoise the Holy Alliance of Kings, must fire the souls of all the votaries of Liberty. The generous Republicans of the West must be particularly inflamed by it. Then comes Commerce, with her golden train, to excite the cupidity and to fire the avarice of the trading districts. New Orleans, Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, must see their riches suspended upon the issue of this mission to the Isthmus. In a word, every section of the country, mountain, valley, and sea-coast; every class of citizens, and all denominations of religious sects, must find something in it to suit their particular taste, and to accommodate their individual wishes. It will be to no purpose that Prudence, in the form of a Senatorial minority, shall come limping on behind, and endeavoring to prove that all these expectations are vain and illusory. Cold calculation will avail nothing against the fascinations of Religion, Liberty, and Commerce. Two of these objects alone, so far back as three hundred years ago, precipitated the Old upon the New World: fired the souls of Cortes, Pizarro, and their followers; overturned the thrones of Montezuma and the Incas, and lighted up a flame in which the "Children of the Sun" were consumed like stubble. What, then, may not be expected, when, to the inspirations and the glitter of these two objects, are added the noble impulsions and the brilliant attractions of Liberty? But great as are all these causes of popular excitement, the success and popularity of the mission is not allowed to rest exclusively upon them. The terrors of denunciation are superadded to the charms of seduction. Those who cannot be won by caresses, must be subdued by menace. A body co-ordinate, and bodies not co-ordinate, have been set in motion against the Senate. Loud clamors beset our walls. The cry of "faction!" "opposition!" "unprincipled!" resound through the streets. Woe to the Senator that hesitates! Woe to him that refuses his advice! Woe to him that asks for information before he gives it! To withhold advice, is to deny confidence—to deny confidence, is to oppose the Administration—to oppose the Administration, is to commit a crime of the greatest enormity; for the instant punishment of which, the air itself seems to be alive and filled with avenging spirits.

I have now finished, Mr. President, what I had to say. I do not mean to recapitulate. I am no enemy to the new Republics to the South. On the contrary, I have watched their progress with all the solicitude of a partisan and all the enthusiasm of a devotee, from the first impulsion at Buenos Ayres, in 1806, and at Dolores, in 1808, down to the "crowning mercy" at Ayacucho, in 1824. I saw with pride and joy the old Castilian character emerging from the cloud under which it had been hid for three hundred years. When first on this floor, in 1821-'2, I voted for the recognition of the new Republics—I gave my vote with a heart swelling with joy for the greatness of the event, and with gratitude to God that he had made me a witness to see, and an instrument to aid it. Whether these Republics shall be able to maintain their independence, and the free form of their Governments, is not for me to say, nor is the decision of that question material to my decision of this. I wish them to be free and Republican, and I shall act upon the presumption that they are to be so. I wish for their friendship and commerce, and, to obtain these advantages, I have advised the sending of Ministers to all the States, no matter how young and unimportant, and would now advise an Agent or Commissioner to be sent to Panama. I will not despair of these young Republics. Under all their disadvantages, they have done wonders. The bursting of the chains which bound them to Old Spain, and the adoption of our form of Government, is a stupendous effort for a people sunk for ages in civil and religious despotism. BOLIVAR, VICTORIA, BRAVO, and a host of others, have deserved well of the human race. They have fixed the regards and the hopes of the civilized world. I trust that these hopes will not be disappointed; but in this age of miracles, when events succeed each other with so much rapidity; when the diadem has been seen to sparkle on the brow of the Republican General, it is not for me to hail any man as WASHINGTON until he shall have been canonized by the seal of death.

[Mr. RANDOLPH concluded the debate in a very long speech, not reported for the reason before stated: after which, late in the night of the 14th, the final questions were taken on this subject, as stated in the preceding record of Executive Proceedings.*]

FRIDAY, March 17.

Executive Proceedings—Reinstatement of Mr. Randolph's Motion, Made and Withdrawn in Secret Session.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH:

Ordered, That the following motion, submitted by Mr. RANDOLPH, on the 21st February, and withdrawn on the 22d February, be inserted on the Journal:

Resolved, That the Senate having, on the 15th day of February, passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That, upon the question whether the United States shall be represented in the Congress of Panama, the Senate ought to act with open doors, unless it shall appear that the publication of documents, necessary to be referred to in debate, will be prejudicial to existing negotiations.

"Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to inform the Senate, whether such objection exists to the publication of the documents communicated by the Executive or any portion of them; and, if so, to specify the parts, the publication of which would, for that reason, be objectionable."

To which the President returned the following Message in answer, viz:

* This terminated the debate at midnight. The vote was taken, and resulted in favor of the mission—24 to 19. The yeas were: Messrs. Barton, Bell, Boulligny, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Mills, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Vandyke, Willey. The nays: Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Randolph, Rowan, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.

The mission being sanctioned, the confirmation of the Ministers (Mr. John Sergeant, Mr. Richard Clark Anderson, and the Secretary of Legation, Mr. William B. Rochester) followed of course, but without further consequence. The Congress, itself, never met; and our deputies, after waiting until one of them died, (Mr. Anderson, at Carthage,) were relieved of their appointment by lapse of time.

"To the Senate of the United States:

"In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate of the 15th instant, marked (Executive,) and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all the communications from me to the Senate, relating to the Congress at Panama, have been made, like all other communications on Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requesting them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications, between the Executive and the Senate, ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it to be my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question, involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide.

Resolved, That the Senate cannot, consistently with a due sense of its constitutional rights and duties, proceed, under the circumstances of the case, to a further consideration of the question, whether or not it be expedient for the United States to send a mission to the Congress at Panama.

On motion, by Mr. RANDOLPH:

Ordered, That the following motion made by Mr. RANDOLPH, on the 14th March, and afterwards withdrawn, be entered on the Journal:

Resolved, That the States of South Carolina and Alabama, being unrepresented, in consequence of the death of JOHN GAILLARD, and of HENRY CHAMBERS; and the State of Virginia being also unrepresented, by the unavoidable absence of LITTLETON WALLER TAZEWELL; and the State of Mississippi, by the vote that THOMAS B. REED, one of the Senators, be excused from voting, he not having had time to make up his opinion, so as to be prepared to vote understandingly on the question: The Senate cannot, on a question involving the dignity and neutrality of the United States, and the fundamental principles of their union, and the peace and security of a great subdivision of the Confederacy, proceed to consider the nominations, until the States shall be more fully represented.

On motion, by Mr. HAYNE:

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the foregoing proceedings, and that the Secretary cause the same to be published.

Extracts from the Journal.

Attest, WALTER LOWRIE, Secretary.

MONDAY, MARCH 20.

Intrusive Establishment of Lawless Whites on Indian Reservation at Lake Washington, State of Mississippi.

Mr. REED rose to offer a resolution, which, as it embraced some principles on which he believed the Senate had not hitherto been called upon to act, he begged leave to submit a few remarks by way of explanation.

Mr. R. said it struck him that this resolution which he was about to offer to the Senate, involved some principles in which several of the States of this Union had a joint, and something like an equal concern. It related to the Indians, and to the light in which they were to be viewed by this Government. It was well known, Mr. R. said, to every member of this honorable body, that there were several States of the Union, a great portion of whose territory is in the occupancy of the aboriginal inhabitants; and he presumed it was already known to the Senate that more than half of the State of Mississippi, which he had the honor, in part, to represent, is still in the occupation of the Indian tribes—the Choctaw and the Chickasaw nations. In regard to the action of the State laws on these people, there never had been any difficulty, nor was it ever sought on the part of the State of Mississippi, to extend its jurisdiction over them; but there were evils growing out of their situation in this territory, which required the consideration of this Government. Mr. R. said he did not mean to call the attention of the Senate to the actual condition of these people who inhabit the territory within the limits of the State; his object was to call the serious consideration of the Senate to the condition of our own citizens, who, after having committed crimes, or contracted debts, locate themselves amongst these Indians, and consider themselves as beyond the jurisdiction of our laws. He would recount to the Senate some singular facts, which, he believed, to the same extent, existed in no other State of the Union, and which he thought would go far to show that something, if within the competency of this Government, ought to be done on this subject.

There is, said Mr. R., in the territorial limits of the State of Mississippi, and near to the white settlements, one of the most beautiful regions in the world, called Lake Washington. The territory surrounding it is most beautiful, the soil is rich, and this lake and territory are both situated within the Indian territory. A man, notorious for the commission of various crimes in the State of Tennessee, has fled for refuge within the jurisdiction of these Indians, and has subject to his jurisdiction, by a kind of feudal sovereignty, fifty or a hundred persons, living on this lake, who know no other authority but his own. These persons are exempted from the jurisdiction of the laws of the Union, and cannot be reached by the laws of the State of Mississippi. This was a state of things, Mr. R. said, the Senate would easily perceive, was not to be endured, and if there was any thing within the competency of the Senate to remedy the evil, it was time it should be done. There was another fact which had fallen within his observation. A man emigrated from Georgia twenty years ago, and settled amongst the Choctaw Indians. He acquired property to a large amount, and he recently died without leaving any legitimate heirs in the place where he lived and died. His brother came on to claim the property; he applied to counsel for an opinion; it was given, and decided that the State laws did not extend to the case, and that no remedy whatever could be provided, to put him in possession of the property. Even some of the officers of Government, now resident in the Choctaw nation, are considered as entirely beyond the reach of the laws of the United States, or the State laws. It had occurred to him, therefore, that it was a duty incumbent on him to call this matter to the consideration of the competent authority of the United States. He repeated, it was not sought on the part of the State of Mississippi, or by her Senators in this House, to enforce the action of the laws on the Indians themselves; they did not claim to consider them as subject to their operation. The Indian tribes have laws and traditional usages of their own, and are entitled to the patronage and protection of the General Government; and, Mr. R. observed, the Indian rights are sufficiently secured, and they themselves are protected in the enjoyment of the lands in which they are located—but they have no right to constitute their country into an asylum for debtors and criminals, from every State of the Union, and to afford them protection. He remarked to the Senate, and particularly to those gentlemen who were not acquainted with this subject, having no Indian territory within their limits, that the Indian territory in Mississippi affords a complete sanctuary for debtors and vagabonds and criminals from every part of the Union. This state of things ought not to be endured, and he intended to offer a resolution, which had in view the taking the sense of this body, whether it was competent for them to extend to our own citizens, who happen to be within the Indian territory, the process of the courts of the United States, in order that justice might be done. At present, as far as he had been able to investigate the subject, it was the opinion of some able jurists on this point, that process does not extend to persons residing in the Indian territory—and he would wish to bring to the consideration of the Legislative authority of the Union, the question, whether it is competent for us to extend our civil and criminal process; or whether it is one of the appendages—one of these people's rights, as sovereigns, to afford a sanctuary to vagabonds from every part of the Union, and who are of no service, but detrimental to the Indians themselves.

There was, Mr. R. said, another question involved in this matter, which he was very anxious to bring before the consideration of the proper authority of the Union. How far it is within the competency of the State to extend the action of its own laws, without the aid of the United States, to persons thus circumstanced, is a question somewhat novel, and has never been decided. Being forcibly struck with the importance of this question to the States within whose territorial limits the Indian territory is situated, at the last session of the Legislature of Mississippi, a proposition was made to extend the civil power of their courts to their own citizens who had contracted debts within the State, and had fled to this savage sanctuary: the matter was debated for many days, and it was at last decided that there existed no power in the State to extend the action of its laws in the manner which was sought by the proposition before the Legislature. Mr. R. said his own opinion on this point was, that it is in the power of the State to act within its own territorial limits, so far as to serve its own civil process, and the action of its laws, on citizens who may have contracted obligations. The State decided otherwise, and said it was a matter for the General Government; therefore, if there was any remedy on this subject to be obtained, it was to be at the hands of the General Government, and not by force of any competent authority in the State Government. The resolution he was about to submit, Mr. R. said, would go to investigate this point, in which he considered rights of high importance to be involved—his proposition would go to inquire how far it is competent for the State alone, by its own authority and power, without the aid of the General Government, to act within their own territory, on their own citizens, who had contracted obligations amongst the whites, and then had fled to the Indian territories. On the subject of this resolution, Mr. R. begged the particular attention of the gentlemen from Georgia and Alabama. One question which was involved, would be, to see how far it is in the competence of any State situated as his or theirs were, to act on this subject, without invoking the aid of the General Government. If, upon investigation, it was found that the States have no such competency by their individual efforts, to attain the aid he had in view, then the resolution contemplates the matter in another point of view, how far it is competent for this Government to concede its assent to such States, that they exercise the right of sovereignty for such purposes of justice. Mr. R. said he did not intend to enter into a full discussion of this matter, which he regarded as highly important to those States whose territories were similarly situated with those of Mississippi.

In regard to these Indians, Mr. R. said it was unnecessary now to discuss their actual posture in our social and political order: it had been a matter of debate from the first establishment of this Government up to the present time. Their actual condition in our political order has not yet been settled—whether they are considered as an independent people, entirely free from the action of our legislation and laws, or whether they are to be considered as independent sub modo only, are questions which have not yet been decided. How far their rights to the soil are plenary or imperfect, or under what modifications they hold the right of occupancy, is still a question on which no determinate opinions have yet been formed. On one question, Mr. R. said, his opinion, from an observation of fifteen years, was settled beyond possible change—it was, that the prospect of civilizing these people by the actions of surrounding communities, is illusive. It is a dream, which never can be realized. He was entirely persuaded that, so long as the tribes of Indians, within any State of the Union, were exempted from the action of our laws, they never would consent to remove from the territory they occupy. He thought it was a fair and correct policy, instead of making vain and illusive efforts to civilize them, and include them in our political institutions, to remove them to the borders of our territories, where the real character of the savage man can be benefited. If this policy cannot be pursued, the tribes of Indians in the State of Mississippi will not last for twenty years longer. The seeds of national dissolution are sown; they are operating with extraordinary rapidity, and the period is not far distant when these nations must undergo an entire dissolution. But, until our legislation can, in some form or other, be brought to act on these people, or those resident amongst them, they never will consent to abandon their lands. So soon as our laws can reach those abandoned citizens, who settle amongst them and become as savage as the Indians themselves, a powerful motive for their continuance will be removed. It is the first step in a system of removal; it is the first step in a system tending to a change of residence.

Mr. REED concluded by submitting the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the courts of the United States to issue process, both civil and criminal, and to cause the same to be executed against persons resident upon land, occupied by the Indians, within the territorial limits of any State. And that the same committee be further instructed to inquire, whether there is any mode by which the United States can yield their assent, that any State may exercise the power of issuing civil and criminal process against persons so resident upon lands, occupied by Indians, within its limits; and whether such assent, on the part of the United States, be necessary to the exercise of this power, on the part of any individual State.”

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and said, I do not rise to detain the Senate, or to give a history of this very extraordinary road, or of the compact between the State of Ohio, or rather Territory, and the United States, out of which this appropriation for roads grew. I will only say, that that subject, when before Congress, now about twenty-four years ago, if I don't forget—was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I was a member. There was a gentleman from the State of Ohio attending here in behalf of that State—I do not now recollect whether he was a territorial Delegate—I think he was not—he has since been Governor of Ohio. The committee did not choose to come into the views of that gentleman in many respects, and, among others, in reference to the boundaries of the State of Ohio—extending them beyond the Miami of the Lake—they did not give him a carte blanche to make the bill what he pleased. The Committee of Ways and Means were so extremely—what shall I say! so extremely impracticable by this agent, that they were discharged from the farther consideration of the subject, and the question was referred to another committee. That committee brought in a bill under which Ohio came into the Union, and that bill was the work almost exclusively of the Representative of what is now the State of Ohio, with some little modifications on the part of the then Secretary of the Treasury, who had this road a good deal at heart, and through whose interest, instead of going through Clarksburg, as was contended for by the Representative from that district of country, it was carried through Pennsylvania, to Wheeling, only going through a small portion of Virginia, called the county of Brooke, hardly as wide as the eastern shore of Virginia—extending between the western boundary of Pennsylvania and the river Ohio, which, in that particular reach of its course, is nearly due south, and almost parallel to the line that separates Pennsylvania on the west from Virginia. The bill passed as modified by the agent of Ohio, giving to her a greater disposable area of arable land, than any other State in this Union possesses—giving her a superficies of land fit for cultivation, surpassing the other two States of Indiana and Illinois, and cutting off from the Territory of Michigan all that fine country which lies beyond the Miami of the Lake, to suit the designs of this agent, and those of another gentleman, then at the head of the Post Office Department, (Gideon Granger,) who I heard declare with his own lips, that he would make a State there, which should countervail “the great State of Virginia,” and he has done it. I did not rise to give this history, but to vindicate my consistency—it is by that consistency, for although the truth may be blamed, she never can be shamed—it is to that consistency that I owe my place here—that it is that consistency, which, according as the several parties of this country have vibrated one way or another, has brought me into collision with, or in support of them. I hope the Senate will pardon this egotism—it is due to myself to release me from the imputation of any “bad faith” in respect to the State of Ohio—I disclaim it—I declare, before God and man, that I never did—though the record will speak to the contrary—yet the record don't tell the truth—I never did vote for the admission of any one new State into the Union from the time that I took my seat in Congress—and, so help me God, I never will. Ohio was the first State which was admitted after I took my seat in Congress—in the Journal you will find my name, but you will find it as one of the Committee on Ways and Means to whom the subject was in the first instance referred. You will not find it on the committee, to which, the Committee on Ways and Means being discharged from the subject, it was referred, because the Committee on Ways and Means were not sufficiently practicable to the views of this—(whether a territorial delegate or lobby member, it don't value that!) this diplomatic agent on the part of Ohio. I did not vote against the admission of the State of Ohio into the Union, not only because there was no occasion for me to throw myself into the ranks of opposition against my best friends, with whom I was united in the closest bonds of intimacy, when that opposition could not avail, but because I was unable to attend on the final question. If I had been in the House, I should have voted against the State of Ohio being admitted into the Union, but I could not get to the House from indisposition, when the question was taken on the passage of the bill. From that day to this (and I recollect that I was once in a minority of two with an old sedition-law and black-cockade Federalist on some of them) I voted against the admission of any new State into the Union—I won't be positive, for I have not hunted the Journal—my last vote I think was in reference to the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, which seems to excite the risibility of my friend from that State, (Mr. BENTON,) and the facts are these: As Ohio was the first State admitted, so was Missouri the last—the facts are these—I don't see any one here who can corroborate them, but my then colleague, W. S. ABERNETHY can, so can twenty, thirty, fifty gentlemen in the House of Representatives. The facts were these: On the night that that bill had its last vote in the other House, my colleague was a new member—I declared publicly and openly that in case that bill should pass, with the amendment then proposed, unless another amendment should succeed, which did not succeed—I declared conditionally, that I should move for a reconsideration of the vote—myself and my colleague, who, with another gentleman whom I shall not refer to, though near me, (Mr. MAHON,) were the only persons whom I have heard of, belonging to the Southern interest, who determined to have no compromise at all on this subject. They determined to cavil on the nineteenth part of a hair in a matter of sheer right—touching the dearest interests—the life-blood of the Southern States. The House was exhausted—a gentleman fainted in front of the chair, and tumbled on the ground—in this state of things, my colleague asked me whether it would not do as well to put off the motion till to-morrow, (for he was in ill health and much fatigued.) I said I could not agree to that till I had taken the opinion of the court in the last resort. After that question had eventuated, as I foresaw it might, I rose in my place, and asked of the Speaker whether it was in order to move a reconsideration of the vote—he said that it was. Sir, I am stating facts of more importance to the civil history of this country than the battle which took place not far from this—he said it was. I then asked him—(to relieve my colleague, who had just taken his seat for the first time that session) whether it would be in order to move the reconsideration of the vote on the next day. He said something to this effect: Surely the gentleman knows the rules of the House too well not to know that it will be in order at any time during the sitting to-morrow, the next day—I replied I thought I did; but I wanted to make assurance doubly sure—to have the opinion of the tribunal in the last resort. I then agreed—to accommodate my colleague, in the state of exhaustion in which the House then was—I agreed to suspend my motion for reconsideration, and we adjourned. The next morning, before either House met, I learned—no matter how—no matter from whom or for what consideration—that it was in contemplation that this clock, which is hardly ever in order, and the clock in the other House, which is not in a better condition—should somehow disagree—that the Speaker should not take his seat in the House till the President had taken his seat here, and then, that when I went into the House to make my motion, I was to be told that the Chair regretted very much that the Clerk had gone off with the bill—that it was not in their possession, and the case was irreparable—and yet I recollect very well, when we applied to the Secretary of State for a parchment roll of an act which had not been duly enrolled—two sections were left out by the carelessness of the clerks and of the Committee of Enrolment—that act was, by the House of Representatives, in which it originated, procured from the archives of the Department of State, and put on the statute books, as it passed, not as it was on the roll—and enrolled anew. It was the act for the relief of the captors of the Mirboha and Missouda. As soon as I understood this, sir, I went to the Speaker myself, and told him that I must have my vote for reconsideration that day—I can only say that I inferred—not from what he told me—that my information was correct—I came off immediately to this House—it wanted about twenty minutes of the time when the Senate was to meet—I saw that most respectable man whom we have just lost, and begged to speak with him in private. We retired to a committee room, and to prevent intrusion we locked the door—I told him of the conspiracy laid to defeat me of my constitutional right to move a reconsideration—(though I think it a dangerous rule, and always voted against its being put on the rules at all—believing that, to prevent tampering and collusion, the vote to reconsider ought to be taken instantly—yet, sir, as it was there, I had a right to make the motion)—I told this gentleman that he might, by taking the chair of the Senate sooner than the true time, lend himself unconsciously to this conspiracy against my constitutional rights as a member of the other House from the State of Virginia. I spoke, sir, to a man of honor and a gentleman, and it is unnecessary to say that he did not take the chair till the proper hour arrived. As soon as that hour arrived, we left the committee room together: I went on to the House of Representatives, and found them in session, and the Clerk reading the Journal—meanwhile, there had been runners through the long passage, which was then made of plank, I think, between the two Houses, hunting for Mr. Gaillard—where is he? he is not to be found. The House of Representatives having organized itself—when I came in from the door of the Senate I found the Clerk reading the Journal—the moment after he had finished it I made the motion, and was seconded by my colleague, Mr. AROHER, to whom I could appeal—not that my testimony wants evidence—I should like to see the man who would question it on a matter of fact—this fact is well remembered—a lady would as soon forget her wedding day as I forget this. The motion to reconsider was opposed—it was a debatable question, and the Speaker stated something this way—“that it was not for him to give any orders—the Clerk knew his duty.” The Clerk went more than once—my impression is, that he went more than twice—I could take my oath, and so I believe could Mr. AROHER, that he made two efforts, and came back under my eye, like a mouse under the eye of a cat, with the engrossed bill in his hand—his bread was at stake—at last he, with that pace, and countenance, and manner, which only conscious guilt can inspire, went off, his poverty, not his will, consenting, and, before the debate was finished, back he comes with the bill from the Senate which had then become a law, before it was decided whether they would reconsider it at my motion or not, which motion nailed the bill to the table until it should have been disposed of. I mention this fact to show what unprincipled men, “feeling power and forgetting right,” are capable of doing even in the presiding chair of a deliberative Assembly—yet, notorious as these facts are, so anxious was one side of that House to cover up their defection; such was the anxiety of the other to get Missouri in on any conditions, that this thing was hushed up, just as the suspension of the HABEAS CORPUS was hushed up.

The bill was passed through the forms of law—Missouri was admitted into the Union contrary to the constitution, as much so as if I had voted the other way in the first instance, and the Speaker had ordered the Clerk to put my name with the AYES in the Journal when I had voted no—because, sir, agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, every member has a right to his vote under the forms of the House, whether these forms are wise or foolish, and my colleague and myself were ousted out of our right to reconsider, for which I would not have taken all the land within the State of Missouri.

permit me to say that, without voting upon any principle, as it is called, upon the subject of internal improvement at all, without calling that matter into question—without calling into question any “plighted faith,” real or imaginary—unless I allowed myself to vote inconsistently with the manner in which I have voted from 1802 ’8—I remember the time, because it was the only session that I lived next door to the Secretary of the Navy; and I was a fellow lodger with a gentleman whom I now see in his place—I may be mistaken, but (whether mistaken or not in the date) I know that few men in Congress stood higher than I did at the time with the then administration; but I could not stomach this thing—I would not vote for it. I saw the old States playing what I thought a most ruinous and pernicious game, and what, in the end, it has proved to be—giving away to the States, north of the Ohio, immunities and privileges, and making concessions, which they must sooner or later rue—which they rue at this time, which I then rued, and shall forever rue—even till “the day of judgment,” which some of us may wish to be with a stay of execution. I have no design, as you may perceive, sir, on the Presidency, nor on any other office which is in the Presidential gift, or in that of “the nation,” whose power has increased, is increasing, and never will, I fear—although it ought to be, and I wish it could be, diminished. I have persevered in this course, ab ovo usque ad mala—from the beginning of the feast—I fear I must say, to the beginning of the famine. I shall continue to do so, whether I commit a breach of faith or not. I shall vote on this as on any other question—if you can find an instance in which I have nodded, then will I agree that, with abler and better men, I too have slumbered on my post—aliquando optimus dormitat.

Having said thus much on this bill, there is one more subject on which I will touch, and sit down. In the National Intelligencer, last Friday, I saw a piece signed IMPRANSUS; that is, if I have not forgotten my Latin, a man that wants his dinner. This dinnerless gentleman is doing what the printers of the public laws in Kentucky and elsewhere are doing every day—lauding to the skies certain gentlemen, and libelling others; you, in particular, sir. This hungry man, who stands so much in need of a dinner—there is no man’s appetite so sharp as his who is to eat at another’s expense—who was the cynic, sir? I think it was Diogenes—who, being asked what wine he liked best, answered, that which he drank at another’s expense. I am not of that opinion at all. I like no dinners but such as I pay for out of my own pocket. De gustibus non est disputandum, even between cynics, sir. So there are none so sharp set as those who mean to eat out of the public larder. I should like to know how long it is since that respectable journal (for so I have always considered it to be) has lent itself—this is the first instance that I have seen—and to an insinuation of the grossest kind and degree to the honor of this body, and of its presiding officer. I am not at all surprised to see it in the "KENTUCKY REPORTER," or other papers of that stamp; but I am astonished to see that respectable journal lend itself to an insinuation derogatory to the body whose public servant it is. Nor, when I say this, do I mean to hold out any thing like a rod in terrorem—a threat. They who wish to stand well need not deprecate my opposition, as was proved in the case of the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

And now, sir, with regard to those gentlemen who feed their horses out of the public crib, who never plant any corn, there is no country under the sun where they dine so sumptuously at the public cost as in this. There is no country under the sun where the inferior officers are paid so largely, whether absolutely or relatively, or with such punctuality as here; where even the superintendence of the Cumberland road is a better office under the General Government, and has annexed to it a larger salary, than is allowed to the Governor of Ohio. I have said thus much, though I should have consulted my own ease and health by keeping silence. There is one member in this body who ought to be obliged to me, if no one else is, for the part that I have taken of late: for, sir, from father to son, I have proved the best conductor, the best imaginable conductor, of the inimical properties of that dynasty, and if the gentleman to whom I allude enjoys a temporary respite, he will have been indebted to me—not that he owes me any thanks—not that I have done what I have done with a view to relieve him—if he enjoys a temporary respite from the abuse of the satellites of the administration, from the abuse of those who are paid with the people's money to abuse us their representatives, who are paid with our money, (the money of the States,) for abusing us—I say, sir, if that gentleman enjoys any respite, he will have been indebted to me for it; but he owes me no thanks, I can assure him—it was from no such motive that I have endeavored to take the bull by the horns—bull by the horns, did I say? No, sir: another, and very different animal, by the tail.

Mr. HARRISON said he could not at this moment, from indisposition, go into the discussion of the subject, in relation to the Cumberland road; he regretted this the less, as he found those who had spoken on the subject, had avoided bringing into the discussion any thing relating to the constitutional power of Congress on this subject. Mr. H. said, if he understood the gentleman from Virginia rightly, he had alluded to the gift of great immunities and advantages to the State of Ohio. If this was the fact of the case, that State had greatly misunderstood the subject. It was a matter of complaint against those who formed that compact; the people of that country all conceive the immunities to have been on the side of the General Government. The single concession by the State that it would not tax the lands of the United States, was worth tenfold all those advantages that any of the States north-west of the Ohio ever received from the General Government.

The Legislatures of the States, through which this road is to pass, have, Mr. H. said, given up the right to the United States to make it; not only that, they have requested it. One of the objections which had been urged against internal improvements is, the right of the United States to make a road without the consent of the States. Another objection is, that, to appropriate the money of the United States to internal improvement, is not one of the enumerated powers of Congress. The respectable Western States had come before Congress; those sovereigns came as suppliants, and asked Congress to lend on this two per cent. fund, which they considered as sufficient security, a sufficient sum of money to accomplish this purpose. The question is, is it an important purpose? Mr. H. said he considered the United States would be more benefited by the construction of this road than any of the States which it was intended immediately to benefit. What is it, Mr. H. asked, that binds and connects this great Union together? Is it a string of words and sentences, called the constitution? or was it mutual interest? It would be an insult to this body to say, such was the fact. When had interest ever produced the continuation of an alliance, when that alliance was not secured by the affection and attachment of the parties to that alliance? Whenever the time shall come that these United States are connected together by no other bond than interest, they will then have tottered to their foundation. What is it then that connects them together? It is the affection that exists between the individual citizens of the different States; it is the attachment that the people of Ohio feel for those of Georgia and Maine; that attachment which was manifested, and which led the people of Ohio to step forward at once, in support of what? Not their immediate rights, but the rights of their seafaring fellow-citizens in Massachusetts. Were they deficient in their duty on that occasion? He trusted no gentleman would say so. Mr. H. then proceeded to consider the question, of how this appropriation would tend to increase this principle of affection, which he contended and insisted was the bond of this Union; and argued that, by facilitating the means of intercourse, it would bring the long absent daughter to the embraces of her mother, and the son to receive the blessing of his father. Mr. H. said he had seen a great deal of human misery, but he had never seen it in any shape which touched his heart in a greater degree, than in the emigrants to the western country before the Cumberland road was constructed. A farmer, with a fine family of children, finding a difficulty of procuring subsistence in some of the old States, and looking forward to their future welfare, determines to go to the western country, where land is cheap; and he sets out with a little cart, and two poor horses, to carry his wife and half a dozen children; and, not knowing the distance, or the road accurately, his slender means are soon exhausted; the horses are unable to carry any farther all that is dear to him; he is broken down by sickness, and his children cry around him for that relief which he is unable to afford them; and, when he arrives at the place of his destination, he is separated forever from all those relations whom he may have left behind. But now, by the means Congress has given to level the mountains, and causeway the swamps, this poor man turns his eyes once more to the place of his nativity—he recollects once more the mother whom he has left; he returns, and is once more blessed by her embrace. This is no story, sir; it may be daily realized. By traveling along the same Cumberland road, you may see persons in the situation I have described, who are offering their prayers to Heaven, and calling for blessings on the heads of those who have again enabled an affectionate daughter to be restored to a tender mother. Such are the facilities which this road gives, has given, and will give, that, aided by the genius of Fulton, the most imbecile man in St. Louis may hope to travel comfortably once more to behold those who gave him birth. It is on the confidence, reverence, and attachment, with which the people of the United States look on Congress, that the prosperity of this Union depends. The word Congress—not the Congress of Panama—is an important word with the people of the United States. This very road is called by the people, not the Cumberland road, but the Congress road; and they remember with gratitude and veneration, the venerable body of men who first assumed that appellation; and the men, women, and children, that travel along that road, offer their prayers to Heaven for that body who afforded them this facility.

Mr. H. thought it unnecessary to detain the Senate longer on the subject, and would say no more.

Mr. RANDOLPH again rose, and said, the gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I begrudge the people of Ohio the lands within the body of Ohio. I wish that every new State had all the lands within the State, that, in the shape of Receiverships and other ways, these States might not be brought under the influence of this ten miles square. In other words, I wish that all the patronage of the Land Office was in the hands of the individual States, and not in the hands of the General Government. I am the friend of State rights, and will cut down the patronage of this General Government, which has increased, is increasing, and must be diminished, or we the States shall be not only "shorn of our beams" sir, but "abolished quite." Having cleared the ground, so far, let me state to the gentleman that such is the difference between the measure meted out to the new States and to the old ones, that in consequence of my having missed the post this morning, I shall have to-morrow to send a servant two hundred miles; and why? because my attorney in fact, as well as counsel at law, resides near Halifax Court-house, eighteen miles beyond my own dwelling, and about two hundred miles from Washington; and, so far from my possessing any of those facilities which the gentleman describes, I cannot get an answer to a letter from Halifax Court-house under three weeks, even if there be no miscarriage of the mail. Ever since I have been in Congress, gentlemen from Lexington, Kentucky, could get answers to their letters sooner than I could to mine. I shall then be told it is owing to the great Serbonian Bog between Neabsco and Ohappawamsick; but to pass that bog, the mail from Richmond to this place takes only a day and a night, even when the navigation prevents its being avoided by the steamboat—but then, sir, when it comes from Richmond to my county, which is only one hundred miles—it is only ninety-five miles from Petersburg—I cannot get an answer to a letter sometimes under a month: and it is only in consequence of a cross post from Fredericksburg to Farmville, that I can get an answer in the time that I do. I intended to have mentioned this to the gentlemen from Kentucky; if we were only one-half as well off in post offices and post roads as that querulous country, we should make our bow and be thankful. Such is not the fact—I can send to Savannah—from Savannah to Boston, and get back an answer sooner than I sometimes can from here to my own home—for any miscarriage adds a week to the delay. The Postmaster General—I don't attribute any blame to him—has very kindly promised me "to rectify the procedure;" and how! By a mail twice a week, which will enable me then to get an answer in one-half the time—say in ten days on an average—and I shall then almost consider myself as half a freeman on the subject of post offices and post roads—I shall feel almost, not altogether, as if I did not belong to one of the "Negro States." Now, sir, the only difference between the gentleman from Ohio and myself is this—and it is vital—that gentleman and myself differ fundamentally and totally, and did differ when we first took our seats in Congress—he as a Delegate from the Territory north-west of the river Ohio, I as a member of the other House from the State of Virginia; he was an open, zealous, frank supporter of the sedition law and black-cockade Administration; and I was as zealous, frank, and open an opponent of the black-cockade and sedition law Administration. We differ fundamentally and totally—we never can agree about measures or about men—I do not mean to dictate to the gentleman—let us agree to differ as gentlemen ought to do, especially natives of the same State, who are antipodes to each other in politics. He, I acknowledge, just now, the ZENITH, and I the NADIR; but unless there is something false in the philosophy of the schools, in the course of time even these will change their places. I shall not here enter into a lecture on the precession of the equinoxes, much less on the figure of the earth—I don't know whether it is established by the modern Philosophers that it is hollow at the South pole as well as at the North—but I don't mean to enter into that question, sir, because I don't mean to enter into the earth, as long as I can keep above ground. It is the height of folly in us, as it would be in any other nation under the sun, to acquire by conquest, whether by the conquista of Blackstone, which he says means purchase or conquest by force of arms, territories—in order that these territories may govern us instead of our governing them; this I deem to be madness or folly, not wisdom; my doctrines are not, I know, at all orthodox, and why? I go on the principle that the first duty of a nation is to itself; aye, and of a man, too, sir—if Old England was to admit representatives, black or white, from her fifty millions of Hindoos according to a certain ratio, in the Commons House of Parliament—or even from Scotland and Ireland, they would govern Old England, instead of Old England ruling them—and if as an Englishman, I would never consent to be governed by Scotland or Ireland, a fortiori, I would not submit to be ruled by Canada, by the East Indies, or by New Holland—Virginia acted very foolishly when she followed this ignis fatuus of equality of rights to her own undoing. I say ignis fatuus: for, whenever it leads to her advantage, it is not allowed to be the true guide. For is not the smallest State, as a State, on a footing with the largest here? What, then, do you tell me about a representation per capita in the Federal Government? I don't care a pinch of snuff whether your representation be per capita, or whether your districts, like every sheet of paper in this quire, consists of an equal number of square inches or square lines. You may make your districts thus equal in superficial area or in population—you may provide, that, if a woman in the chequer A, be brought to bed of twins, that one of the children shall be removed into chequer B, to preserve equality of representation—for any uncertainty is fatal in the certain sciences—a miss is as good as a mile. These notions of applying geometry and arithmetic to government is the Government of Lagado—it is Laputan—it is Lilliputian—mathematics have no more relation to government than chemistry. You might as well undertake to construct a Government upon chemical principles for the use of man.

I don't pretend to be more learned on the subjects of the partition of this Territory than the gentleman from Ohio—but Congress did reserve the power of carving five or three States out of the lands on the other side of the river Ohio—did reserve to itself the power, and in the act defining the boundaries of Ohio, gave to that State territories which ought to be part of the State of Michigan—I mean beyond the Miami of the Lake. I don't mean to enter into a squabble, whether it is your land or my land: this is what I mean, sir—Congress, after having passed this act, which, by cession of the State of Virginia, did what? It said, as long as 80,000 men shall remain in Pennsylvania, in the county of Washington, they shall send one Representative here: and, as an integral part of Pennsylvania, shall send their proportion of her two Senators—let only these men strike their tents, and go in quality of emigrants, and set down in one of those political diagrams called States, beyond the Ohio, and they shall not only send a member, whether they have the requisite number or not, (each State shall have at least one Representative,) but they shall send two Senators here—to counterpoise Pennsylvania or New York. That is, that 80,000 men in one place have rights that the very same men have not in another place; upon the principle that the rights of men depend upon the question of numbers, and nothing else—which is manifestly contradictory and absurd. Did they do no more than that? I am a matter-of-fact man, sir, and abhor abstractions in politics, and in every thing else, except pure mathematics and metaphysics; which last I have long since given up to the boarding schools for young ladies—but did not this same State of Missouri, which is not even now lawfully in the Union, which by its one member would have controlled the whole thirty-seven of New York—did not this State of Missouri, which is not now constitutionally one of the United States, make the Chief Magistrate of the Union by the vote of one single man in the other House? Does the gentleman consider this as nothing? Is this the nothing given to the western country? Aye, sir; is it not by this nothing given to that country, that the voice of the majority of the people of the United States has been suffocated—strangled—and counter-voiled; and are we, because we are not in favor of it, to hold our peace? It would be prudent in us to do so, perhaps gentlemen think it would be very civil in us to do so, and no doubt it would be more agreeable to them—but I shall not do so.

I have no hesitation in saying, that never were people so wild as we have been in the pursuit of this ignis fatuus, not only across the Ohio, but beyond the Mississippi—beyond Aurora and the Ganges—to barter away their independence to the control of one man, and the State of Virginia stood looking on in helpless impotence—there was only one man in her delegation who was capable of voting for the present incumbent (Mr. Newron)—verily he shall have his reward—but not from us—from him. Yes, sir, we twenty helpless individuals stood by to see the single Delegate from Missouri countervail the vote of the ancient and renowned Commonwealth, whose true Representatives we were. I speak of the fact, that one Delegate was put in one scale, and Virginia, with her two and twenty members, in the other—we kicked the beam, sir—we were not merely balanced, but we kicked the beam—for the Missouri vote settled the question. Is this nothing? Is this a correct statement, or is it the romance of love-sick girls—or boys—"all for love, or the world well lost"—the ascendency of old Virginia destroyed—I speak not of her ascendency abroad, but at home—not over other States, but over her own unquestioned territory—in Virginia herself, all for love of our Western brethren, of liberty and equality—the liberty of being dictated to by them, not in the election of President, but upon our own soil—of being upon a footing of equality with Missouri, upon this very Cumberland road, and on the subject of our black population, involving not only all our property, but what money cannot buy. I don't want to have an ascendency over our brethren beyond the Ohio, or north of the river Potomac, or—east, I was going to say, of the western boundary of Pennsylvania—yes,—I do want to get back to the country of Youghiogheny. I owe my seat here to no favor, or affection from any man under the sun—and the moment it is to be kept by conciliating opinions that come in direct collision with my own, unless they come in a shape that I am bound in duty and in honor to respect; in that of the Legislature and people whom I represent—I am ready to resign it. I do not set up the claim of acting independently of instructions, to what I know to be the sentiments of the State—far from it—I think any man here who does go against what he knows to be the sentiments of the State which he represents, is in the situation of a Foreign Minister who goes against what he knows to be the opinions of his court, and violates the instructions which he has received; and he who deliberately violates such instructions, I consider to be ripe—did I say?—rotten rather, and fit for every mischief. Suppose, what is not to be supposed, an extreme case, a real case of conscience—let him resign.

Having used some pretty plain language on this subject, all that I have now to say is, that that sort of equality which gives to thirty thousand people on one of these diagrams, power in this House equal to the largest of the good old United States—which gives to them an influence in the first instance over the Presidential election in a ratio treble of that population in the Electoral College, and, in a certain contingency, equal power with the largest and oldest of the original States, is an equality that I do not understand. I would not concede it to them if their population was equal to ours; so far, at least, as relates to the intermeddling with the internal affairs of Virginia: and why? No Government can be safe for Virginia, that is not a Government of persons having a common feeling—a common interest—a common right with Virginia; and this holds good in every Government under the sun. Therefore it was that the British Parliament was not the proper Representative of this country—therefore it is, that the saints and fanatics are not the proper Representatives of Jamaica; and if Jamaica was strong enough, she would tell them so.

This is not a Court of Law where we are to plead, but it is a deliberative Assembly—I throw out these imperfect hints, and if my opinion is worth nothing, it may serve to excite a train of thought in others, and elicit that which is of great value. We should cease to be a deliberative Assembly if we did not deliberate—if we were logicians in the schools it would be otherwise—if, when a man comes into the world to converse with mankind, he were to put on the armor of the schools and courts of law—to deal in syllogisms and enthymemes—and rebutters and surrebutters—to set a price upon his tobacco by syllogism, and court his wife by a dilemma of marriage or single blessedness, he would only show himself to be a learned fool. It will not do to bring into a parliamentary body the technical habits of a profession that is more remarkable for sharpening the perception, than for enlarging and liberalizing the understanding. A good deal has been said, sir, about the dignity of this Assembly; about its being improper to talk vernacular English here—we must speak so super-fine and mincing that nobody but an accomplished lady from a “female seminary” can understand us. Is that the case in the House of Commons, or even in the House of Peers? Again, sir, on the subject of talking beside the question; can you conceive any question more foreign to the business of the House of Peers than a contested election in the House of Commons? Any thing more foreign to the subject here, be it what it may, than a contested election in the other House? Yet, sir, on what subject did Lord Chatham make that great speech in which he put down Lord Mansfield, who, endeavoring to shelter himself under forms and technicalities, the refuge of the bar, declared that the House could not entertain the question on the expulsion of Wilkes? It was on that occasion that Chatham made that great speech—in which he did only not call him, to his face, a rogue: for, after praising two other great luminaries of the law, for their integrity, and legal science, and attainments, he said, I vow, my Lords, I think the noble Lord [Mansfield] equals them both in abilities. When you know how much depends on the tone—the eye—the finger—though a man may not be disciplined to put out his hand and place it on his breast—“here's my hand, and here's my heart; I never will deceive you;”—it is self-evident that he could not have called him a dishonest man in terms more forcibly than by this innuendo.

Again, sir—have not assertions, not the most delicate, been made on the floor of both Houses of Parliament, in the House of Peers, with all its robes and wigs, and every thing else? Was it not broadly insinuated, over and over again, that there was an adulterous intercourse between the Dowager Princess of Wales and the Earl of Bute, the favorite? Is this very delicate? Is this very sentimental and refined? And was there not, when I was last in England, a Bishop obliged to fly from the country for the commission of a crime not to be named amongst Christians? And would not this have been investigated and tried in open court? Courts of law are sometimes very coarse things; they have to call spades, spades, to try tough cases, whomsoever's fastidious delicacy they may offend. So are legislative bodies coarse things—it is there where the passions of men are brought into collision; and when the strife is for empire, that if you expect to carry on the intercourse as you would at a meeting of ladies and gentlemen, where everybody is in the most amiable disposition possible, and where nothing in the slightest degree indelicate can be endured, you are grossly mistaken—this body must probe every thing that comes before it, in the same manner that the House of Peers in England probes every thing, without consulting the delicate sensibilities of young misses of either sex, or going to the circulating library, or the Sorrows of Werter, or Rousseau's Nouvelle Heloise, where the most abominable sentiments are covered up in the most elegant yet voluptuous language, or one of Anacreon Moore's songs, which the poor little things sing, and do not know that they are singing all the time—what cannot be named. The refinement of a nation is in language always in the inverse ratio of the purity of their manners. Did not the House of Commons compel Sir John Trevor to put the question himself whether or not he had been guilty of bribery, and corruption, as their Speaker? They would not let the Clerk put it—he was reduced to propound it himself; and when it had voted that he was guilty, they expelled him, and he had to walk out, and make his humble bow of thanks that he was not kicked out.

I have said these things to put myself rectus in curia here—we don't come here to pay compliments to one another—we don't come here to blink any question—to call bribery and corruption "influence"—we don't come here to call military despotism "a vigor beyond the law"—we come here to do our duty as men, to be the faithful Representatives of the States that send us here. Having done that, sir, according to my views of the true interests of Virginia, I shall feel indifferent myself whether I fall under the censure of any other State, or subdivision of States, beyond a certain mystical line, a parallel of latitude, not having a common feeling and common interest with me, and which I will not trust to legislate within the limits of the State of Virginia on any subject, unless they can show me the grant in this blue book, [holding up the constitution,] and when they can, I cannot gainsay it—but never, under pretence of districting the States, or any other, however plausible, shall they put their hands within the limits of that State, and do any one act that by the terms of the constitution they cannot now lawfully do.

After some explanatory conversation between Messrs. HOLMES and RANDOLPH, the question was taken on the motion to strike out the appropriation, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

VOL. VIII.—31

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Chandler, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Findlay, Hayne, King, Macon, Randolph, Sanford, Van Buren, White, Willey, and Woodbury—15.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Chase, Eaton, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Marks, Mills, Noble, Reeds, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas.—21.

Mr. COBB next moved to strike out the item of $750 for repairs made on the Cumberland Road in 1825; which motion was lost.

FRIDAY, MARCH 24.

Case of Col. Delassus, Ex-Spanish Governor of West Florida.

Mr. BENTON rose, to ask leave, of which he gave notice on Wednesday, to bring in a bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus. This individual, said Mr. B., was the king of Spain's Governor in Upper Louisiana, at the time of the cession of that province to the United States, and upon the cessation of his functions there, he was transferred to Baton Rouge, and became the King's Governor over the province of West Florida. It is known to everybody that we claimed this province, as far as the Rio Perdido, under the terms of the Louisiana treaty, and that the King of Spain denied our right and refused to give it up. In this posture of demand and refusal, the question continued until the night of the 28d of September, 1810, when the American inhabitants of the west end of the province rose in arms against the Spanish authorities, captured the fort in which they resided, killed some, and made prisoners of the others, including the Governor. The Federal Government of the United States had nothing to do with this affair. It excited nobody to insurrection, nor seized any thing by the hands of its agents; but the Federal Governor of Louisiana was hard by, and after a decent interval, the fort and its armament, with the province and its population, was delivered up to him; and, after a further interval, the captors, for their trouble and expenses in the premises, were gratified with some seventy or eighty thousand dollars out of the Treasury of the United States. In the mean time the prisoners, by order of the Governor of Louisiana, were set at liberty: but the sum of thirteen hundred dollars, taken by the captors out of the Governor's private desk, and reclaimed by him as his own, and the further sum of six thousand dollars, taken out of the military chest, and reclaimed by him as the King's money, (sent to him for the payment of salaries, his own salary included;) these sums, I say, were not given up, but applied by the captors to the payment of their own men, and the Governor was told to look to the United States for his indemnification.

These, Mr. President, are the facts upon which is founded the application for leave, which I now make, to bring in "A Bill for the Relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus."

With the bill, I shall present his petition, supported by vouchers; and, at the proper time, I shall, by a reference to these, prove the truth of every word of the statement which I have made. But my bill differs from his petition in the measure of relief which it proposes to give. The petitioner prays for the restoration of his own money, with interest, and for so much of the King's as would pay the arrearages of his salary to the day of his capture. He prays for this, and for nothing more nor less. He has not framed his petition, like a suitor in chancery, with a double aspect, looking to this, if he cannot get that. But, as a good chancellor always grants relief according to the case made out, and not according to the suitor's prayer, so we, in my opinion, should give to the petitioner in this case the relief to which he is entitled, whether he has asked it or not; with this impression, I have drawn the bill for the whole amount taken, and conceive it our duty to make the entire restitution to be just as clear, as is the petitioner's right to receive it. In the first place, we are bound to restore it, because we had no right to take it. We claimed West Florida, as far as the Rio Perdido, under the terms of the Louisiana treaty; but we claimed no money under that treaty, neither the King's nor his subjects'; but the money of both was taken, and taken by those who took the province, and we have made their act our own, and assumed all its liabilities, by receiving the fruits of their enterprise, and rewarding them for what they did. In the next place, the petitioner has a right to receive back all the money that was taken from his possession, both the King's and his own. His right to his own cannot be questioned; his right to receive the King's is just as clear. He was the King's officer, and had the keeping of the money for the purpose of paying certain salaries. The King trusted him, and it is not for us to say that he is unworthy of trust. Besides, the laws are in force, and payment can be coerced if refused. But the great moral ground is, that, having no right to take this money, we have none to retain it; that it is our duty to restore it, and the duty of others to account for its disbursement.

I think, Mr. President, that these considerations are sufficient, not only to procure me leave to introduce the bill, but to ensure its final passage. But, if other considerations are necessary, they may be found in the character of the petitioner, his former state, and present condition, and in the injustice with which all his countrymen of Louisiana have been treated by these United States. The Ex-Governor Delassus is as irreproachable a man in private and public life, as any that lives. He has been Governor, with almost unlimited powers, over a province larger than the kingdom of Europe, and he is now the cultivator of a farm of some twenty acres in the suburb of the town which was the capital of his dominion. He had more, or rather ought to have more, than twenty acres. The King of Spain gave him some thousands; but the United States Government picked a hole in his title papers, and have fought him out of his land for five and twenty years. He is one of that body of Frenchmen who were transferred to us with the cession of Louisiana, and who have seen the young grow old, and the old die; who have seen a quarter of a century roll over their heads, and a generation pass from the earth; while they have stood at your doors vain petitioners for the land which they received from the bounty of a King, and which they are in danger of losing from the cupidity of a Republic.

The leave being granted, Mr. B. introduced the bill; which was twice read and referred.

THURSDAY, March 30. .

Executive Powers—Right of the President to Institute a New Mission without the Advice and Consent of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. BRANCH, the Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, protesting against the competency of the President of the United States to have appointed Ministers to the Congress of Panama, without the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BRANCH rose, and said: Under the impression that the first and most important duty I owe to the State that sent me here, is to preserve inviolate, and to transmit to posterity unimpaired, the form of Government under which we live, I have believed it to be my duty to submit, for the consideration of the Senate, the resolution which has been read. My opinion is, that a Representative has performed but a part of his duty, and perhaps the least part, when he discharges the ordinary duties of legislation as delegated to him by the constitution. I feel, said Mr. B., that we have an important task to execute in resisting the encroachment of ambition on the constitutional powers of this body, whether they be open or covert.

The principle embraced by the resolution is so plain, in itself, so obvious in its nature, as to need no argument on my part, to make it plainer. I should conceive it to be an insult to the understanding of the Senate to attempt such an argument. The resolution asserts a constitutional principle. Yes, sir, a fundamental principle, which is, doubtless, properly appreciated by this body.

It may be, however, proper for me to call the attention of the Senate to the opening message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the present session, and to his Executive communication to the Senate, of the 26th December last. For it will be found that, in these communications, he has assumed a power, and asserted a right, which I boldly contend he does not possess: and in making this denial, I feel confident that I am sustained by the Constitution of the United States. In the opening message he says: "Among the measures which have been suggested to them by the new relations of one another, resulting from the recent changes in their condition, is that of assembling at the Isthmus of Panama a Congress, at which each of them should be represented, to deliberate upon subjects important to the welfare of all. The Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, have already deputed Plenipotentiaries to such a meeting, and they have invited the United States to be also represented there by their Ministers. The invitation has been accepted, and Ministers, on the part of the United States, will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations," &c., &c.

Executive Powers.

This language, I thought at the time, was unequivocal, and since has been rendered more explicit by the Executive communication before alluded to, of the 26th December, which I will take the liberty of reading to the Senate: "Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature."

Has he not then asserted that he has the right to appoint Ministers independently of the Senate—Ministers, too, of no ordinary character, clothed with powers, admitted, on all hands, to be of the most important and perilous nature? Now, sir, what does the constitution say—this invaluable and inestimable little book, which I hold in my hand—the commission under which we all act, and from which we derive all our powers; which every officer of the Government takes a solemn oath, in the presence of his God and country, to preserve, maintain, and defend? "That the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties; provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers," &c.

I shall not, as I said before, attempt, by language, to make this subject more explicit than it is. The wise framers of our constitution, under the most auspicious circumstances, formed it, and transmitted it to us. It is our duty to preserve it in all its pristine purity and vigor. Although it may not be necessary to illustrate this principle, I hope the Senate will indulge me for a few minutes, while I attempt to give them some additional reasons why I submitted this resolution.

I view the usurpation which it notices, and purports to repel, as a link in a chain threatening the most portentous and calamitous consequences to the liberties of this people. In this light it has made a deep impression on my mind. Isolated, unconnected with any thing else, yet so plainly and palpably conflicting with the letter and spirit of the constitution, it is truly appalling to the friends of liberty; but, when I connect it with the transactions that have tarnished the page of our history for little more than a twelvemonth past; when I connect this open usurpation, this wanton trespass on the form of Government under which we live, with the covert and insidious innovations which gave existence to, and characterizes the conduct of the present Chief Magistrate, I am decidedly of opinion that every friend of his country should be at his post.

It is time to re-enact Magna Charta. It is time to reassert the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

The danger to be apprehended from precedent, even from what has been termed the harmless ipse dixit of the President of the United States, may be made manifest by a recurrence to a few circumstances of comparatively recent date. Two years ago the immediate predecessor of the present President proclaimed to the European world, that they must not interfere with Old Spain, and her revolted colonies; intimating, if they did, that we might take part. I considered it, at that time, as an unauthorized, unmeaning, and empty menace, well calculated to excite the angry passions, and embroil us with foreign nations. Yet, sir, has this declaration been construed into a pledge or guarantee to the South American Republics; and, moreover, has been recognized as being obligatory on this nation, by those now in power. In proof of this, look to the letter of Mr. Poinsett, our Minister at Mexico, to Mr. Clay, dated September, 1825:

"To these observations I replied, that, against the power of Spain, they had given sufficient proof that they required no assistance, and the United States had pledged themselves not to permit any other power to interfere, either with their independence or form of government: and that, as, in the event of such an attempt being made by the powers of Europe, we would be compelled to take the most active and efficient part, and to bear the brunt of the contest, it was not just that we should be placed on a less favorable footing than the other Republics of America, whose existence we were ready to support at such hazards."

See the language of this gentleman, well known and highly estimated for his talents and integrity. Are we not bound to believe that the sentiments he avows, are in conformity with his instructions? Can we attribute to him so gross a violation of his duty? To fortify this opinion, I will call the attention of the Senate to Mr. Clay's letter to Mr. Poinsett, 9th November, 1825, in which he speaks of Mr. Monroe's pledge, in language that cannot be mistaken. When we reflect that the Secretary of State is a gentleman officially and confidentially connected with the President of the United States, shall we, are we at liberty to doubt, that this pledge, given by Mr. Monroe, has been recognized by the present President and Secretary of State? I say, we can come to no other conclusion. Does it not then become our imperative duty, when we clearly see the dangerous consequences resulting from analogous usurpations, to protest against it, though he may not think proper at the moment, to carry the principle into practice?

Again: I contend, if the President is bound to advise with the Senate in ordinary cases, of appointing and sending Ministers where, by the laws and usages of nations, their powers and duties are susceptible of the clearest and most explicit definitions, and where the consequences likely to result are known and properly estimated; much more should he be bound where the objects to be obtained, and the duties to be performed, are not even understood by the President himself, as in this case may be seen by reference to the documents; in which it appears that he himself declined it, in the first instance, until he could be satisfied on those points. But, strange to tell, this ground was abandoned, without assigning a reason, and the invitations were accepted. Now, sir, as to the objects understood and openly avowed, what are they? to expound and settle important principles of international law—to concert the means for a more effectual resistance to the approaches of European domination, and doubtless to give efficiency to the recognized pledge of Mr. Monroe, in connection with a wild and enthusiastic crusade against the Roman Catholic religion. Are these legitimate objects, to say nothing more of them? Or, rather, are they not fraught with consequences of the most dangerous and most ominous nature, to the future peace and tranquillity of this country?

I will not trespass on the patience of the Senate, by an argument on this point. My object is to show that these Ministers to Panama are Ministers of the first and most important character, clothed with powers of awful import, and calculated to excite the well-grounded fears of every lover of his country.

We are called upon to send Ministers to South America to combat the prejudices of the Roman Catholic religion. I should think our labors had better be confined at home.

Furthermore—I contend that, if the President of the United States is not constitutionally bound to advise with the Senate in appointing Ambassadors and Ministers, that the Senate is not bound to act on the subject at all; in truth, has no right to act. Are we dependent on the whim, or caprice, or courtesy of the President, for power? Is it competent for him to enlarge our functions? Can he circumscribe them at pleasure? I trust not, sir.

We rely on higher authority; we rely on the commission given to us by the people themselves in convention; and, before my country, I protest, most earnestly protest, against all and every encroachment of the kind. Before my God I declare, that I never will be diverted from what I conceive to be the true policy of my country. I never will be persuaded by any power save the constitution, and “the will of my constituents.” Yes, sir, however unfashionable the recognition of this dependence on our constituents may be, I must be permitted to pay my devotion to it, and recognize its obligation on me. They are the early impressions of my youth; they have been riveted on my mind as fundamental Republican truths; they have taken the firmest hold. They are such as I have fondly cherished in my bosom, and such as the people of this country never ought, never can, abandon, unless they prove false to themselves.

The Senate was wisely designed to act as a check upon the appointing power, not, I admit, to be exercised capriciously, but fearlessly and independently, when the public good requires it. It, therefore, becomes imperiously our duty, to guard well the powers conferred on this body. We are tenants at will, or, rather, trustees for the present and future generations; and it is, comparatively, of very little moment, as regards the few fleeting moments we occupy here. It is as time to eternity, when compared with the fundamental principles contained in this book. This is, I hope, intended for ages to come. It is intended, I trust, to be perpetual. It was so designed; but I have the most awful forebodings that it will not be. I have my fears, although, sir, it has stood the severest storms in a recent contest, and has carried us triumphantly through a war which has covered our country with imperishable renown—a struggle that embraced in its consequences the dearest principles of a free Government. But, though it carried us through this struggle successfully, it may not prove an adequate protection against the insidious encroachments of ambitious leaders.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and said: I rise, sir, for the purpose of making an apology to the gentleman from North Carolina, for an unintentional word, [“never”] uttered, involuntarily, whilst he was speaking, although I was happy to see that it caused any thing rather than embarrassment to him. I rise, also, for the purpose of expressing to that gentleman my hearty thanks for having called up his motion, and for having relieved the Senate from that embarrassment, under which we have labored so long as that motion was nailed to that table. The unavoidable absence of the gentleman from North Carolina prevented its being taken up and disposed of; and the subject was thus put out of the reach, even of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and is, therefore, not embraced in their report. And, whilst I am making my acknowledgments to the gentleman from North Carolina, I will make one more, in which, I believe, sir, another, and not the least member of this body, may participate with me, as an almost equal sharer in the obligation. The gentleman from North Carolina has steered his ship into action with a manliness and decision, a frankness and promptitude, a fearless intrepidity, that scorns all compromise with the foe, the common enemy of every true friend of his country; that will relieve, certainly, one, and, I believe, more than one, of this body from some part of the odium which has hitherto been borne almost exclusively by two. He forcibly reminded me of that gallant man, (was he not our countryman by birth, sir?) Hallowell, who so gallantly took the lead in the SWIFTSURE, at the battle of the Nile—the most brilliant and sublime naval conquest—the most important, whether in reference to itself or its consequence, that was ever won by man; when the brave but unfortunate Culloden, the leading ship, got aground; when Trowbridge, for the first time, performed an important but unwilling service, in marking, as a beacon, the channel to the rest of the fleet. I am glad to find that the gentleman from North Carolina has spoken to this House with the plainness that belongs to him, not only as a Southern man, but, emphatically, as a planter; it belongs to him as a slave-holder; it belongs to him as one who is not bound to electioneer and to curry favor with the driver of his carriage, or the brusher of his shoes, lest, when he shall have driven him to the polls, the one may dismount from his coach-box, or the other lay down his shoe-brush, and annihilate the master's vote at the next election; lest his servant may give him warning that he may no longer consider him as his "help," and go as a spy into the family of his enemy, if he shall have one, to tell, not only what he may have seen and heard, but what he never saw and never heard, in the family of his master. Master! did I say? No, sir, "his gentleman." This delator and champion of universal suffrage owns no master—he claims the mastery over you. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina—most sincerely and heartily do I thank him. I trust that it will turn out in the end—whether our adversaries be born to consume the fruits of the earth—fruges consumere nati—whether or not they belong to the caterpillars of the Treasury or of the law; that, of us, it may be truly said, nos numerus umus; that our name, too, is Legion: for, sir, we belong to the cause and the party of the people; we do claim to belong to the majority of this—"nation?" No, sir, I acknowledge no nation—of this Confederate Republic. For I, too, disclaim any master, save that ancient Commonwealth whose feeble and unprofitable servant I am. The President himself has confessed that he does not possess the suffrage of the majority, or the confidence enjoyed by his predecessors. He is even desirous of a new trial. He shall have one, and no thanks to him for it. God send him a good deliverance from the majority; and God send us, the majority, a good deliverance from him.

Having thus, sir, disburthened myself of some of the feelings that have been excited by the gallant and fearless bearing of the gentleman from North Carolina, allow me to go on and question some of his positions.

One of them is the durability of the constitution. With him and with Father Paul (of the constitution of Venice) I say "esto perpetua." but I do not believe it will be perpetual. I am speaking now of what Burke would call high matter. I am not speaking to the groundlings, to the tyros and junior apprentices; but to the gray-headed men of this nation, one of whom, I bless God for it, I see is now stepping forward, as he stepped forward in 1799, to save the Republic. I speak of William B. Giles. I speak to gray-heads; heads grown gray, not in the "receipt of custom" at the treasury, of the people's money; not to heads grown gray in iniquity and intrigue; not to heads grown gray in pacing Pennsylvania Avenue; not grown gray in wearing out their shoes at levees; not to heads grown gray (to use the words of the immortal Miss Edgeworth, the glory and the champion of her lovely sex and wretched country) in ploughing the Four Acres. Am I understood? There is a little court, sir, of the "CASTLE" of Dublin, called the Four Acres; and there, backwards and forwards, do the miserable attendants and satellites of power walk, each waiting his turn to receive the light of the great man's countenance; hoping the sunshine; dreading the cloudy brow. Spenser has well described the sweets of this life,* and technically it is called ploughing the Four Acres. Now, when a certain character, in one of her incomparable novels, Sir Ulic—I have forgot his name, but he was a McSycophant; courtier, placeman, pensioner, and parasite—upbraided that kind, good-hearted, wrong-headed old man, King Corny, with his wretched system of ploughing, the King of the Black Islands ("every inch a king") replied, that there was one system of ploughing worse even than his; and that was ploughing the Four Acres. This was a settler to the McSycophant.

Sir, I shall not detain the Senate long. We are now making an experiment which has "never" yet succeeded in any region or quarter of the earth, at any time from the deluge to this day. With regard to the antediluvian times, history is not yet very full; but there is no proof that it has ever succeeded, even before the flood; one thing, however, we do know, that it has never succeeded since the flood; and, as there is no proof of its having succeeded before the flood; as, de non apparentibus et non existentibus eadem est ratio; it is good logic to infer, that it never has succeeded, and never can succeed anywhere. In fact the onus probandi lies on them that take up the other side of the question: for although post hoc ergo propter hoc be not good logic—yet when we find the same consequences generally following the same events, it requires nothing short of the skepticism of Mr. Hume, to deny that there is no connection between the one and the other; whatever, metaphysically speaking, there may be of necessary connection between cause and effect. I say, then, that we are here making an experiment which has never succeeded in any time or country; and which, as God shall judge me at the great and final day, I do in my heart believe will here fail; because I see and feel that it is now failing. It is an infirmity of my nature—it is constitutional—it was born with me—it has caused the misery (if you will) of my life—it is an infirmity of my nature to have an obstinate constitutional preference of the true over the agreeable; and I am satisfied that if I had an only son, or what is dearer, an only daughter—which God forbid! I say God forbid, for she might bring her father's gray hairs with sorrow to the grave; she might break my heart—but worse than that—what! Can any thing be worse than that? Yes, sir, I might break hers. I should be more sharp-sighted to her foible than any one else.

Sir, as much as they talk of filial ingratitude, how, sharper than the serpent's tooth, it is to have a thankless child—how much more does it run counter to all the great instincts of our nature, planted for good and wise purposes in our bosoms—not in our heads, but in our hearts—by the Author of all good—that the mother should be unkind to the babe that milks her; the father cruel to his own child. They are well called unnatural parents: for it is a well-known law of nature, that the stream of succession and of inheritance, whether of property or affection, is in the descending line. I say, in my conscience and in my heart, I believe that this experiment will fail—if it should not fail, blessed be the Author of all good for snatching this people as a brand from the burning which has consumed as stubble all the nations—all the fruitless trees of the earth; which before us have been cut down and cast into the fire. Why cumbereth it the ground; why cumbereth it? Cut it down—cut it down. I believe that it will fail; but, sir, if it does not fail, its success will be owing to the resistance of the usurpation of one man by a power which was not unsuccessful in resisting another man of the same name, and of the same race. And why is it that I think it will fail? Sir, with Father Paul, I may wish it to be perpetual, esto perpetua, but I cannot believe that it will be so. I do not believe that a free Republican Government is compatible with the apery of European fashions and manners—is compatible with the apery of the European luxury and habits; but if it were, I do not know that it is entirely incompatible with what I have in my hand—a base and baseless paper system of diplomacy, and a hardly better paper system of exchange. I speak of paper money under whatever form it may exist; whether in the shape of the old continental Spanish milled dollar, printed on paper, or in the promise to pay, which promise is never intended to be redeemed—of the sound significant [a word] for the thing signified, [dollars]—of the emblem, multiplied at will, for the reality, which has an actual, if not a fixed, value: for there is and can be no unchangeable standard of value—it is worse than shadow for substance: for shadow implies some substance; while promises to pay dollars, imply neither ability nor inclination to pay cents.

This Panama mission is no new thing, as I shall now proceed to show: "January 20th, 1824. House of Representatives. On motion of Mr. Webster, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, Mr. Taylor in the chair." It was well understood that our present Minister to Mexico—to the Government, I presume, of Mexico—I don't say near Mexico, because a man who is at a town must certainly be more than near to it—was to offer a string of resolutions, and did offer them; but Mr. Clay, who was then Speaker of the House of Representatives, and who could not make a motion except in Committee of the Whole, by the rules of the House, anticipated Mr. Poinsett by moving this resolution, Mr. Webster having first enabled him to do so, by moving for the committee, whereupon Mr. Taylor was called to the chair:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of these States would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible interposition, by the allied powers of Europe, in behalf of Spain, to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the Continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, Independent Governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States."

"The Committee of the Whole having resumed the consideration of the resolution recommending an appropriation to defray the expense of a mission to Greece, Mr. Poinsett, of South Carolina, rose, and addressed the House, in a speech of some length, which he concluded by moving the following amendment:

"Resolved, That this House view with deep interest the heroic struggle of the Greeks to elevate themselves to the rank of a free and independent nation; and to unite with the President in the sentiments he has expressed in their favor; in sympathy for their sufferings, in interest in their welfare, and in ardent wishes for their success.

"Resolved, That this House concur in the sentiments expressed by the President, in relation to this hemisphere, and would view any attempt to oppress or control the free Governments of America, south of us, by the allied powers of Europe, as dangerous to the peace and happiness of the United States; and that such measures as may be deemed expedient to protect them from the attacks of any power, other than that of Spain alone, and unassisted, will meet its cordial support."

[The latter resolution was withdrawn by Mr. P., in consequence of a resolution to a similar effect having been laid upon the table by the Speaker.]

I shall not read more. I say now, sir, that the House went into Committee of the Whole, on motion of Mr. Webster—that Mr. Taylor was in the chair—I beg your attention to the names—that Mr. Poinsett had resolutions to offer on the subjects of South America and Greece, in which he was anticipated by the then Speaker, now Secretary of State. I am speaking from the record—from the book. Is my date noted?—January 20, 1824. I must remark (in passing) that a proposition was brought forward by Mr. Webster, at that very identical time, if my memory don't deceive me, in reference to interference of the United States in behalf of Greece. The "nation?"—no, sir, the United States, the people of the United States can never forget the zeal, the more than parental zeal, with which the present Secretary of State then hovered over the resolution—aye, and over the personal and political character of the mover, (Mr. Webster,)—with all the tender anxiety of a parent hen with her one chicken. There was full as much bustle, and the object of at least equal value; for, little things are great to little men. We all know the gentleman (Mr. Bartlett) from New Hampshire—Portsmouth, New Hampshire—unfortunate Portsmouth!—haud ignarus mali, miserie succurrere disco—thrice unhappy Portsmouth—infelix Dido—she who stands again almost alone, as in the days of John Langdon, for our rights—how was she treated on that occasion, and by a former representative of Portsmouth too, as well as by his new ally—in defence of what? In defence of the proposition of Mr. Webster, and of his political character, as a federalist of the true Boston stamp; and by whom? By the then Speaker, now Secretary of State. Now, sir, I do not pretend to be a man of more than ordinary sagacity. I never pretended to be able to see farther into a millstone than other people, and not so far as those that look through the eye—but I did, immediately after this transaction, write a letter to a friend, which letter, with its postmark and date, can now be produced, stating that, according to my view of things, an alliance, offensive and defensive, had been got up between old Massachusetts and Kentucky—between the frost of January, and young, blythe, buxom, and blooming May—the eldest daughter of Virginia—young Kentucky—not so young, however, as not to make a prudent match, and sell her charms for their full value. I had been an eye and ear witness of the billing and cooing between the old sinner and the young saint, and had no doubt that the consummation would, in a decent time, be effected. I wrote that letter then, in the month of January, 1824; and, therefore, when I came here in the month of December, 1824, on my return from Europe, I wanted no ghost to tell me about the future movements of certain "distinguished public characters," and consequently of the evolutions of the forces, whether the heavy phalanxes, or active legions, under their command. I wanted nobody to tell me, what I thought it required not more than half an eye to see. I put myself, therefore, calmly into winter quarters, at Dowson's, No. 2, and hibernated very quietly during the session, taking no part in what was done, legislatively or otherwise. Almost the only time that I took a part, I was acting, like the rest, a very selfish part; I was taking care of number one; and having put number one rectus in curia, I left number two and number three and four to play out the game, and to divide the spoil in the ratio that they might deem equitable—to have "a settlement upon equitable principles"—not at the treasury—such accounts could never pass there—but on the new-fashioned principles—"equitable principles," by which accounts of anomalous character, without voucher or law, except the act of settlement, are cast and paid out of our money—the people's money. Here were the knowing ones adding their pates, and cudgelling their brains, and wearing out their shoes, and wasting their money, their whole per diem, some of them in hack hire, driving from one end of this interminable and desolate city to the other, intriguing about the Presidency; trying, perhaps, to make some dirty bargain for the Presidency, when the question was settled as far back as in January, 1824. I have not proof positive, but I think I have what the lawyers call a negative pregnant, that this election was not conducted as it ought to have been conducted—that it was managed, not conducted at all. The great Mr. Pitt once said in his place in Parliament, that if any man, gentle or simple, should put the direct question to him, whether or not a corrupt influence was used in elections there and exercised ("through the means of patronage") "over both Houses of Parliament?" (aye and over the body of the people too, and over the press)—he should laugh in such gentleman's or simpleton's face, and say, "Sir, it is not so."*****

I intended, sir, to have gone into some other considerations more at length. I must reserve them for a future time. I believe that they have vital warmth in them sufficient to preserve their animation till that time shall arrive. I believe they will stand a Russian frost.

Now, sir, the election being over, about which I shall say nothing—I bring no sort of innuendo against great men—great let me call them, since they have conquered me, my constituents, my people—and so, having conquered that people, that is the affair of that people—I deal with them only as the half Representative of the State of Virginia—but there are some curious coincidences, sir, in regard to this matter. Not only do we find one of these gentlemen, almost the avowed confidential organ of the Executive and manager of the House of Commons—I beg pardon—the House of Representatives—another, in the Secretaryship of State; a third, in the Speaker's chair; but we find the fourth, Minister to Mexico. Now, sir, what better could be done for a gentleman, avowedly well qualified for the mission, than to make him some reparation for this cruel decoliation of his motion? The reparation was due to him—it has been made. At that time—I mean in 1824—I took something of an active part in the House of Representatives; I was forced on in the Greek question, and we put the Greeks on the shelf, mover and all—pro hac vice I mean. But at that time the mover of this resolution, which I have just read, about South America, says, in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, to whom it does not become me to allude if I could possibly avoid it, that, when that discussion should come up, he pledged himself to show, I don't know how many fine things; and the gentleman said he had been too long acquainted with his promises to rely on them, and he looked for performance—which never came from that day to this—for that resolution has never been called up—it slept—it took a dose of Turkey opium—a dose from the Levant, brought in a Greek ship—it fell sound asleep, and has not waked from that day to this—did I say from that day to this? Yes, sir. It waked up like the man in the Arabian Nights Entertainments, who, having fallen asleep a groom, waked up in the palace of the Grand Vizier, with the Vizier's daughter for his wife—it waked up in the Department of State—while the friendly genius who had metamorphosed him, had put the bridegroom in a place not to be named before gentlemen, much more before ladies.

So much for the Presidential question, out of the House; now, one word of coming in. Sir, it was on that very occasion—[Here Mr. HAYNE said something, in a low voice, to Mr. R.]—I beg pardon, I must go on. Well, sir, this alliance between the East and the West being consummated by a new species of Congress—not the Congress between the sexes, but a different one—this alliance being consummated, do you wonder that the President of the United States should, from his new ally, learn to play at the political game of brag? The gentleman from North Carolina complains of the President coming here with a plan of his powers: he imitated the wise man at Rome, who could jump thirty leagues at a leap, but took care not to go through it there—they buried the hatchet, and, with it, the pledges they had given to prove each other to be—what, I shan't say.

Sir, in what book is it—you know better than I—in what parliamentary debate was it, that, upon a certain union between Lord Sandwich, one of the most corrupt and profligate of men in all the relations of life, and the sanctimonious, puritanical Lord Mansfield, and the other ministerial leaders—on what occasion was it, that Junius said, after Lord Chatham had said it before him,* that it reminded him of the union between Bliff and Black George? I, who am no professional man, but only a planter: I, whose reading has not gone very deep into black letter, though I do know some little of that too: I do believe there is more wisdom, after the Bible, Shakspeare, and Milton—I do believe that, in Don Quixote, Gil Blas, and Tom Jones, there is contained a greater body of wisdom than is to be found in the same number of pages in the whole collection of English and foreign literature. I might have added to them, the famous Thousand and One Nights: for, though they are fabulous, they are human nature, sir. It is true, it is Eastern nature, but it is the same thing that Fielding served up—it is human nature. I remember very well, one of the numerous heroes of Gil Blas, the son of Coscolina, our old friend Scipio—I recollect very well, an adventure that befell him. Towards the close of that inimitable and immortal romance, Scipio is called on to tell the story of his life. He begins by saying that he—it is a remarkable coincidence—he was born in infancy to indigence, ignorance—and, sir, the son of Coscolina might have kept up the alliteration, by adding, to impudence; and that, if he had been the author of his own being—if he had been consulted on the occasion, he would have been a grandee of the first class. Who doubts it? Who doubts Scipio or any one else, when he says he should wish to have been born of a

* When the author of this Abridgment was ten years old, which was in the last decade (borrowing Livy's division of time in the expression) of the last century, and before enlightened writers had thrown darkness on the authorship of Junius, it was well conceded that there was but one man in England, or the world, who united in himself all the qualities of head, heart, and temper—all the incidents of political and personal life—which the writing of those letters required. But one man who had such power to drive the English language—such knowledge of men and things—such amplitude of information—such lofty and daring spirit—such inducement to publish his thoughts, and conceal his name—an oratorical fame already so great as to set him above the assumption of that of Junius, great as it was. That one man was Lord Chatham! then old, and out of favor with the king, and dominant parties—relegated (by his peerage) to that "Hospital of Incurables," the House of Lords, whence no patriot voice could reach the Commons of England—retired to his country seat at Hayes, and all visitors shut out—discontented—despairing—restless—and seeing no way to reach the people, but through the press, and by means of appeals; bold to audacity, patriotic to temerity; and the more impressive because shrouded in the mystery of an unknown origin. So stood Lord Chatham and Junius in the latter part of the century in which they lived—convertible characters, identical in person.

good family, to a good estate, and to have been brought up in good habits, and with the manners and principles of a gentleman? Who doubts it? It was Scipio's misfortune that he was not; and I would take even Scipio's evidence in this case, or any other man's. Among other adventures that befell the son of Coscolina, he entered into the service of a certain Don Abel, who carried him to Seville, in Andalusia; and, on a certain occasion, coming home with very bad luck from a card table—that will sour the temper even of the mildest—I have seen ladies themselves not bear heavy losses at cards very well—he gave Scipio a box on the ear, because he had not done something which he had not ordered him to do, but which it was the part of a good servant to have done, without being ordered. Scipio goes to tell his story to a bravo, and tells him that his master is going to leave Seville, and that, as soon as the vessel runs down the Guadalquivir, he shall leave him. If this is your plan of revenge, says the bravo, your honor is gone forever—not only do this, but rob him—take his strong box with you. Scipio, at that time, had not conceived the atrocious idea of adding robbery to breach of trust; but he agreed to the proposition. But, as they were descending the staircase, the bravo—strong as Hercules to carry off other men's goods—with the strong box on his shoulders, they are met by Don Abel. The bravo puts down the coffer, and takes to his heels, and Scipio awaits the issue of his master's wrath. He can tell his story, and put a face on the matter. What are you doing with my coffer? I am going to take it to the ship. Who told you to do so? Nobody. What is the name of the ship? I don't know; but, having a tongue in my head, I can inquire. Why did you carry my coffer off? Did you not chastise me the other day for not having done something without being ordered? Did not I know you were about to embark, and was it not my duty to see your luggage safe on board the ship? Abel's reply was, "My good friend, go about your business. I never play with those who sometimes have a card too many, and sometimes a card too few." It shall be my business (said Mr. R.) to prove, at a future time, that this is the predicament in which our present Ministry stand; whereas, on a certain occasion, they had a card too few, on another, they had a card too many, or a conceit. I believe I can prove it both ways. I, like Don Abel, am ready to bid them go their ways in peace, and to determine that they shall never play again, with the power and the money of the people that I represent, with my leave. I say I will prove, if the Senate will have the patience to listen to me—I will prove to their satisfaction that the President has clapped an extinguisher on himself. If I don't prove it—it is a pledge that shall be redeemed—not like the pledge about the navigation of the Mississippi—not like the pledge about the Spanish American resolution—it shall be redeemed, or I will sit down infamous and contented for the rest of my life. And how, sir, has he extinguished himself? He has done it by the aid and instrumentality of this very new ally. I shall not say which is Bliffl and which is Black George. I do not draw my pictures in such a way as to render it necessary to write under them, "this is a man, this is a horse." I say this new ally has been the means of extinguishing him, and for what? Sir, we hear a great deal about the infirmity of certain constitutions—not paper constitutions—we hear a great deal of constitutional infirmity—seven years is too long for some of us to wait; and if the President can be disposed of at the end of three years, then, being extinguished, may they not, by some new turning up of trumps, expect to succeed him? I shall suggest to my good friend from Missouri, whether there is not in fact a Trojan horse within the walls of the Capitol—no, not of the Capitol, but of the Executive palace. I would suggest to him whether there is not an enemy in the camp who, if I should fail in blowing anybody sky high, will put them—below not only the sky, but the ground—bury them. But, whatever the motive may have been, the fact is as I have stated it, that there is a discrepancy in the communications of the Executive to Congress; and I will state another thing when I come to it. It is, that I do believe—though I do not pledge myself to prove—but I will pledge myself to make out a very strong case, such as would satisfy a jury in the county of Charlotte—and I would put myself on that jury, and be tried by God and my country—I then say, sir, that there is strong reason to believe that these South American communications, which have been laid before us, were manufactured here at Washington, if not by the pens, under the eye of our own Ministers, to subserve their purposes.* Sir, though in one respect I am like the great Earl of Warwick the king-maker, and a little unlike him in unmaking one king—though between two hawks I can tell which flies the higher pitch—between two dogs, which has the deeper mouth—between two horses, which bears him best—between two blades, which hath the better temper—between two girls, which hath the merrier eye—yet, in matters of law, I am like the unlearned Earl Goodlack. One thing has my attention been turned to—language—words—the counters of wise men, the money of fools—that machine and material with which the lawyer, the priest, the doctor, the charlatan of every sort and kind, pick the pocket, and put the fetters upon the planter and upon the slaveholder. It is by a dexterous cutting and shuffling of this pack that the business is done. They who can shuffle the whole pack, are often quite ignorant of any foreign language, even of their own, and, in their attempts to write and talk finely, they only betray their poverty, like the fine ladies in the Vicar of Wakefield, by their outrageous attempts to be very genteel. The first thing that struck me in these documents was, how wonderfully these Spaniards must have improved in English in their short residence in the United States. It reminded me of a remark in one of Scott's novels, in the part about old Elspeth, of the Craighurnfoot: "Aye," says old Edie, "she's a well educate woman; and an' she win to her English, as I hae heard her do at an orra time, she may come to fickle us a'." These Spaniards have got to their English, and we are all ficked. But I shall be told—not as I have been told—but as I am prepared to be told—because I have kept this thing locked up here to bring it out here in this Senate—I shall be told that these English letters were translations from the Spanish, made in the office of the Secretary of State. I hope not—I should be sorry to see any such tokens of affinity, and consanguinity, and good understanding; but they have the foot-prints and the flesh-marks of the style of that office, as I shall show on a future occasion. I cannot show it now—it would be unreasonable—but show it I will, and in a manner that shall satisfy any honest jury on the south side of the Ohio, and on the south side of Mason and Dixon's line—any honest jury—and I will bring the presumption so strong, that he must possess more than Christian charity (which covereth all things) who will deny that there exists strong presumptive evidence—and, sir, against the honor of a man, as against the honor of a lady, strong presumptive evidence is a fatal thing—it is always fatal when that presumptive evidence cannot be cleared up and done away. Do you read the letters of these South American Missionaries over again, and compare them with the tone of the messages and letters which we have received—put them in columns one against the other, and mark the similitude. My suspicious temper may have carried me too far—if it has, I will beg pardon—but will show enough—not a handkerchief—not to justify the jealousy of Othello—yet I believe that the jealousy might have been pardoned to the noble Moor, certainly by me, had he not been a black man; but the idea to me is so revolting, of that connection, that I never can read that play with any sort of pleasure—see it acted I never could.

Now, sir, John Quincy Adams coming into power under these inauspicious circumstances, and with these suspicious allies and connections, has determined to become the apostle of liberty, of universal liberty, as his father was, about the time of the formation of the constitution, known to be the apostle of monarchy. It is no secret—I was in New York when he first took his seat as Vice President. I recollect—for I was a school-boy at the time, attending the lobby of Congress, when I ought to have been at school—I remember the manner in which my brother was spurned by the coachman of the then Vice President, for coming too near the arms blazoned on the scutcheon of the vice-regal carriage. Perhaps I may have some of this old animosity ranking in my heart, and, coming from a race* who are known never to forsake a friend or forgive a foe—I am taught to forgive my enemies, and I do from the bottom of my heart, most sincerely, as I hope to be forgiven; but it is my enemies—not the enemies of my country; for, if they come here in the shape of the English, it is my duty to kill them; if they come here in a worse shape—wolves in sheep's clothing—it is my duty and my business to tear the sheep skins from their backs, and, as Windham said to Pitt, open the bosom, and expose beneath the ruffled shirt the filthy dowls. This language was used in the House of Commons, where they talk and act like men—where they eat and drink like men, and do other things like men—not like Master Betty. Adams determined to take warning by his father's errors, but in attempting the perpendicular, he bent as much the other way. Who would believe that Adams, the son of the sedition-law President, who held office under his father—who, up to December 6, 1807, was the undeviating, staunch adherent to the opposition to Jefferson's Administration, then almost gone—who would believe he had selected for his pattern, the celebrated Anacharsis Cloots, "orator of the human race?" As Anacharsis was the orator of the human race, so Adams was determined to be the President of the human race, when I am not willing that he should be President of my name and race; but he is, and must be, till the third day of March, eighteen hundred and—I forget when. He has come out with a speech and a message, and with a doctrine that goes to take the whole human family under his special protection. Now, sir, who made him his brother's keeper? Who gave him, the President of the United States, the custody of the liberties, or the rights, or the interests of South America, or any other America, save only the United States of America, or any other country under the sun? He has put himself, we know, into the way, and I say, God send him a safe deliverance, and God send the country a safe deliverance from his policy—from his policy. Sir, it is well known to you, that up to the period of getting this message from Adams, I was the champion here of his rights as a co-ordinate branch of the Government. I was the person who rose immediately after the gentleman from New York, and protested against our opening the doors, for reasons with which I will not trouble the Senate. On the question of a call on the Executive, for other information than the treaties, &c., I said, the President is a co-ordinate branch of this Government, and is entitled to all possible respect from us. It is his duty to lay before us information on which we must act—if he does not give us sufficient information, it is not our business to ask more—I never will ask for more, and to be given confidentially, &c. [Mr. R. here briefly adverted to the history of the resolutions in the secret session.] I did maintain the rights of the President, said Mr. R., but from the moment he sent us this message—from that moment did my tone and manner to him change. From that moment was I an altered man, and I am afraid, not altered for the better. [Here Mr. R. read the Executive Message, of the 16th February, as follows:]

"In answer to the two resolutions of the Senate, of the 15th instant, marked (Executive,) and which I have received, I state, respectfully, that all the communications from me to the Senate, relating to the Congress at Panama, have been made, like all other communications upon Executive business, in confidence, and most of them in compliance with a resolution of the Senate requiring them confidentially. Believing that the established usage of free confidential communications between the Executive and the Senate, ought, for the public interest, to be preserved unimpaired, I deem it my indispensable duty to leave to the Senate itself the decision of a question"—Sir, said Mr. R., if he would leave to the Senate the decision of the question, I would agree with him; but the evil genius of the American House of Stuart prevailed—he goes on to say, that the question "involves a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide." If this had been prosecuted for a libel, what jury would have failed to have found a verdict on such an innuendo? that we were breaking up from our own usages, to gratify personal spleen? I say nothing about our movements, because he was not informed of them; the innuendo was, that our motives were black and bad. That moment did I put, like Hannibal, my hand on the altar, and swear eternal enmity against him and his, politically. From that moment I would do any thing within the limits of the constitution and the law; for, as Chatham said of Wilkes, I would not, in the person of the worst of men, violate those sanctions and privileges which are the safeguard of the rights and liberties of the best;—but, within the limits of the constitution and the law, if I don't carry on the war, whether in the Peninsula or anywhere else, it shall be for want of resources. Mr. R. went on to speak of the motions to which this message of the President's had given rise; one of which described the nature and character of the message. To the resolution, said he, I objected. I said, I would have all the nakedness of the Greek statue; I would even take off the skin, that the muscles might be developed, and that we might have the naked fact. After further observations on the resolutions moved in conclave on this subject, Mr. R. repeated what he had then said, in reference to the message of the President. Who made him a judge of our usages? Who constituted him? He has been a professor, I understand—I wish he had left off the pedagogue when he got into the Executive chair. Who made him the censor morum of this body? Will any one answer this question?—Yes or no?—Who?—Name the person. Above all, who made him the searcher of hearts, and gave him the right, by an innuendo black as hell, to blacken our motives?—blacken our motives—I did not say that, then—I was more under self-command; I did not use such strong language—I said if he could borrow the eye of Omniscience himself; and look into every bosom here—if he could look into that most awful, calamitous, and tremendous of all possible gulfs, the naked unveiled human heart—stripped of all its coverings of self-love—exposed naked as to the eye of God—I said, if he could do that, he was not, as President of the United States, entitled to pass upon our motives, although he saw and knew them to be bad. I said, if he had converted us to the Catholic religion, and was our Father Confessor, and every man in this House at the footstool of the confessional had confessed a bad motive to him, by the laws of his church, as by this constitution, above the law and above the church, he, as President of the United States, could not pass on our motives, though we had with our own lips told him our motives, and confessed they were bad. I said this then, and I say it now. Here I plant my foot—here I fling defiance right into his teeth, before the American people. Here I throw the gauntlet to him and the bravest of his compeers, to come forward and defend these miserable dirty lines: "Involving a departure, hitherto, so far as I am informed, without example, from that usage, and upon the motives for which, not being informed of them, I do not feel myself competent to decide!" Amiable modesty! I wonder we did not, all at once, fall in love with him; and agree, unavocis, to publish our proceedings—except myself—for I quitted the Senate ten minutes before the vote was taken. I saw what was to follow—I knew the thing would not be done at all, or would be done unanimously. Therefore, in spite of the remonstrances of friends, I went away, not fearing that any one would doubt what my vote would have been, if I had staid. After twenty-six hours' exertion, it was time to give in. I was defeated, horse, foot, and dragoons—cut up—and clean broke down—by the coalition of Bliffl and Black George—by the combination, unheard of till then, of the puritan with the black-leg.

Having disposed of this subject, I shall say one word more, and sit down. I said, on the subject already adverted to, let the Senate take a dignified stand—don't let them say, We sent to you for that thing, you sent us this; therefore, we shall not go any farther—we shall stop. Let them behave like Romans, like Conscrip't Fathers. I am sorry I was prevailed on to withdraw my motion, even to make way for that of the gentleman from Portsmouth, New Hampshire. But she once went with us—we rode through the equinoctial gale together—Portsmouth overcame the first Adams, and Portsmouth, New Hampshire, I trust, will overcome the second. I should not have made this allusion, but for a toast I heard lately from a friend of mine—"Those who fell with the first Adams rise with the second." Very true—c'est vrai. Agreed—they who fell under the wrath and desperation of the first Adams—the dust and ashes men—have risen too. I saw one of them this morning. We too have risen, and the strife is to come. North Carolina has started forth boldly and manfully, like the fine fellow at the battle of the Nile—I believe he was an American—he led the van, and I humbly follow in the wake. It is skirmishing with the light-armed troops—with the voltigeurs—I hope we shall here form a phalanx, a legion—I hope to see, not only Hector in the field, but Troilus, and a host of worthies with him. If not, we too shall have to sing Fuit Ilium—we too shall have to sing, Where the Capitol stood, there grows the harvest. We must put our shoulders to the wheel—having put our hand to the plough, we must not fall back. How men can find time to be sick I can't conceive—I must be dead before I could refrain at a call like this.

I never write out speeches. I am glad I am singular in that respect. But I would not lose those that have been published, and those that are about to be published very soon, (on the Panama mission,) for all the books that have been written in defence of constitutions—that on the British Constitution (De Lolme) included. We poor narrow-minded wretches believed that it was not our business to go on a crusade to Terra del Fuego, to prevent somebody making a settlement where man cannot live, or to the North Pole. Our business is to attend to the interests and rights of the American Confederacy here. Like Hector's wife, who was found spinning amongst her maids, we did believe that the care of our household was our main concern. The card-table has gone out of fashion now—even lotteries are denounced—I don't mean such a one as that granted to Jefferson by the Legislature of Virginia—I should have voted for that bill if I had been there—horse-racing and billiards are no longer in vogue—all these having been discarded, what is got up in their place? The same meddling, obtrusive, intrusive, restless, self-dissatisfied spirit shows itself in another way. The ennui breaks out in a new place—the tedium vite appears in Sunday Schools, Missionary Societies, subscriptions to Colonization Societies—taking care of the Sandwich Islanders, free negroes, and God knows who. It is the same spirit which drove men from home to the card-table, to the billiard table, and the horse race. It is a matter of fact, that a gentleman told me, that, going to visit a very pious lady and gentleman in Virginia, the little negroes were so ragged as to be obliged to hide for shame, and the women of the family were employed in making pantaloons and jackets for the free negroes at Liberia. Whenever any of these ministers, male or female, come to me with their complaints and petitions for aid, I never can forget Gil Blas and Señor Manuel Ordonez, who got rich and lived comfortably by administering the funds of the poor. If we cannot get here an account of the money we vote by appropriation, I should like to see a settlement of the accounts of the Otaheitans. I should like to see the vouchers of the expenditures for these Sandwich Islanders, and these Liberian people—I am afraid we should have to settle them on equitable principles—they would never pass the Treasury. When I cannot get an account from my own steward, as a private man: when, as a public man, I do not know what has become of the millions of the people's money; should I not be the veriest ass that ever existed, to expect a proper application of money when there is half the diameter of the globe between me and the applicant? I hold out this as a hint to all benevolent gentlemen and ladies, whose good hearts are imposed on for the support of sturdy beggars, who would rather beg than work. Begging is gone out of fashion for one's self—it is for some miserable establishment—we must convert the Catholics at Panama—we must convert the Jews—"Give me the money, my dear madam, and I will see it properly applied." We are now doing in this country what has been done in every country under the sun—as the old cheats wear out, new ones spring up. As the old faro banks wear out, banks of discount spring up. When, in Virginia, we had billiard tables, and cards, and races, and not half the population we now have, I could produce you two honest men where we can now show one. We have no faro bank, no billiard table—we have hardly a race—we have got too good to run races—but we are not too good to embezzle the money intrusted to us, or to do any thing that is covered up under the garment of religion. Hypocrisy is the only sin that walks abroad that cannot be discerned, except by the eye of God alone; yet, when you see a man's whole conduct at variance with his religious profession, you will not be defective in charity alone if you do not come to the conclusion that, like Manuel Ordonez, he is pretty much of a cheat.

I find, sir, that the regular speech I had been preparing for the Senate, has not arrived at its due term of parturition. But, in due time, I trust it will make its appearance. I will trespass no longer on the time and patience of the Senate—but there is more behind—come out it shall—redeem the pledge I will—I will show that this Panama mission is a Kentucky cuckoo's egg, laid in a Spanish American nest. I will show that the President of the United States and his Ministers have Jonathan-Russell the Congress of the United States—that he has held one language at one time, on the same subject, to one House of Congress, while to another House he has held a different language on the same subject. I will not bring it here in notes. I will have the letters printed in parallel passages, that they may be compared with the style of the Department of State—whether the Department of State be, in this case, the President of the United States, or whether it be the officer who presides over that Department, it will show sufficient to satisfy any man of common penetration that these things were manufactured here, and that this Don Salazar, or whatever he is, had just as much hand in it as the Grand Inquisitor had in the commission with which Don Raphael and broker Ambrose de Lamela, in company with Gil Blas, made a visit to the Jew, and rifled his coffers. I will prove to any man—they may write what Spanish they please—carry it to an indifferent translator, and there shall be no similarity in style, grammatical construction, or any thing else, between the letter they write, and the letter which it is alleged they have written, and which has been translated and sent to us. Why were not the originals sent? Is the name of the translator given? No. They are not sent as purporting to be translations.

This is a strange world. The man who is whistling over the furrow, at the time he is turning in corn to give bread to his wife and family, knows no more of what is doing here than a man in South America. He does not know that they who never did plant corn, or never shall plant corn again, are to take the best part of his crop. He does not know, while his horses are poor because he cannot afford to keep them fat, that horses are driven in this city that are fed out of his crib—he does not know this, because you get the money from him tariffically—he is tariffed, as we say in Virginia. He is taxed for all the real necessities of life—and how does his money go? I wish he could come here to see. If every man in the United States could spend one day in Washington—if every woman could spend one hour here—and God forbid that my wife or daughter should spend more—then you would have salvation for the Republic. It must be some special interposition of Providence, though working by secondary causes, that will snatch this nation from the downhill progress it is making, not merely to bankruptcy, but to perdition. We may flatter ourselves as long as we please, and think, and talk, and brag, and boast, in fourth of July orations and others, of being the most enlightened people under the sun—we may be all that, and yet be radically ignorant. We are going the road that has ruined nations before us—we are copying, as far as we are able, the worst parts of the British system, leaving out the best—and who are we, that we should be exempt from the law which the Author of the being of all mankind has imposed on them? What is the history of man, and what is he? The young lady who thinks so highly of her Philander, her Werter, her Sylvio, who will go with him to a certain point—who will go with him to the bottom of the garden, and listen to the nightingale and the mocking-bird, and talk sweet sentiment—but if she goes so far as that she is lost—she had much better go to her grandmamma, and not Philander. So it is with a nation—the man who says, this is but a trifle—a peccadillo—I was absent for a few days from the Senate, but none will think of it—c'est le premier pas qui coute—the moment a man leaves the path of religion or virtue—the moment he takes Paley and the Jesuits to ascertain how far he may go on the border line of villany without overstepping it—that man, or woman, is lost. Our situation is awful beyond conception—we are in a state of utter ignorance of ourselves, and perhaps I may be supposed at this time worrying the patience of the Senate, when they would rather I should take my seat. It is my duty to leave nothing undone that I may lawfully do, to pull down this administration. I see it, and only wait till the third of March, 1829—this month three years—and, if the people do not step in to correct the procedure, I am much mistaken if I ever take their part again—and why, sir? I do not think the honor of a daughter is to be preserved at the expense of bars and bolts: for, where the mind is polluted, what care I who has the worthless possession of the body? He who goes out animò furandi, is a thief, whether he exacts a purse or not. So it is with a nation. They who, from indifference, or with their eyes open, persist in hugging the traitor to their bosom, deserve to be insulted with different messages than this; they deserve to be slaves, with no other music to soothe them but the clank of the chains which they have put on themselves and given to their offspring.

Mr. BRANCH then varied his motion to the following form:

"The President of the United States, in his opening Message at the commencement of the present session, informed Congress that invitations to this Government to attend and take part in the deliberations at the Congress of Panama had been given and accepted, and that Ministers on the part of the United States would be commissioned: and, having further, in his Executive communication to the Senate of the 26th of December last, accompanying the nomination of Richard C. Anderson, of Kentucky, and John Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to the Assembly of American Nations at Panama, and William B. Rochester, of New York, to be Secretary of the Mission, thus expressed himself: 'Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with both branches of the Legislature, &c. Therefore,

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the proposed measure was not within the constitutional competency of the Executive. And, also, Resolved, As the opinion of the Senate, inasmuch as the claim of power thus set up by the Executive, might, if suffered to pass unnoticed by the Senate, be hereafter relied upon to justify the exercise of a similar power, they owe it to themselves, and to the States they represent, to protest, and they do hereby, solemnly but respectfully protest, against the same."

On motion of Mr. MILLS, the resolution was postponed to, and made the order of the day, for Monday next.

TUESDAY, April 4.

Duty on Salt.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Agriculture, proposing to repeal the duty on imported salt.

Mr. HOLMES moved to strike out the obligatory instructions "to report by bill," and insert, "to inquire into the expediency of providing," the effect of which would be, to leave the Committee of Finance a discretion on the subject, instead of instructing them specifically to report a bill; and after a discussion of near three hours' duration, between Messrs. KING, LLOYD, SMITH, HOLMES, BRANCH, FINDLAY, WOODBURY, SANFORD, HAYNE, RANDOLPH, MACON, and CHANDLER, the question was taken on Mr. HOLMES' amendment, and carried, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Boulligny, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Willey—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Cobb, Harper, Hayne, King, Macon, Randolph, Reed, Rowan, Tazewell, White, Williams, Woodbury—14.

Thus amended, the resolution was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, April 5.

Obstructions in Savannah River.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill "for removing the existing obstructions in the river Savannah."

[This bill appropriates the sum of $50,000, to be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for removing certain hulks sunk in the river Savannah during the Revolutionary War, for the defence of the city.]

Mr. LLOYD (the Chairman of the Committee on Commerce) explained the present situation of the river Savannah, and the injurious consequences which resulted to the extensive commerce with the city of Savannah, from the obstructions formed by the hulks which had been sunk, and the sand which had accumulated on them. He dwelt upon the advantages which would result to the commerce of the United States at large, by the removal of these obstructions, and urged the justice of granting to Georgia that assistance, in this case, which had been granted to so many other States on similar occasions.

Mr. BERRIEN supported the bill with great force, and at some length.

Considerable discussion then took place, in which Messrs. BERRIEN, CHANDLER, BRANCH, HOLMES, HARRISON, COBB, FINDLAY, RUGGLES, EDWARDS, and KANE, took part. The bill was supported on the ground that the people of Savannah and Georgia claimed, and were entitled to be restored to, the advantages they enjoyed in the unimpaired navigation of the river anterior to the time when, on considerations of public benefit, they were deprived of them, by the obstructions placed, for the public defence, in the principal inlet of the State. It was the interest of the United States itself to restore to its natural condition this inlet of a great agricultural and commercial State, and an act of justice to the State. It was argued that, wherever the Government of the United States, in prosecuting a war, had destroyed or injured private property, there never was an instance of their withholding payment for it; and wherever the enemy had destroyed property in consequence of its having been used against them by the forces of the United States, this Government had always made compensation; and, on these, and other grounds, urged in the debate, the bill ought to pass. Mr. BERRIEN, in particular, supported the bill earnestly and repeatedly, in answer to objections made to it.

The bill was opposed on the ground that the obstructions were partly placed in the river by the enemy, and the claim could not therefore be well sustained, as it was not incumbent on the United States to repair injuries done by the enemy in particular portions of the country—and that Georgia had received her share of the funds which had been appropriated for settling Revolutionary claims, &c.

In the course of the debate, Mr. CHANDLER moved an amendment, which was carried, confining the expenditure of the appropriation to the raising of those vessels only which were sunk by the American Commander, and not to those sunk by the enemy; and then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Boulligny, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Harper, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, King, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—36.

NAYS.—Messrs. Macon, Tazewell, Van Buren—3.

Sale of Rent Lead.

Mr. BENTON rose to ask the leave, of which he yesterday gave notice, to introduce a bill "to authorize the President to dispose of certain lead, the property of the United States, in Missouri."

Mr. B. said, a brief statement of the facts might be necessary, and would save time hereafter. The bill supposes, said Mr. B., that there is lead in Missouri, belonging to the United States. These are the facts: The United States have received lead for the rent of certain lead mines, and it appears, from the report of the Commissioner, that the lead is in his hands. Not having any authority to dispose of it, by the laws of the United States, he proposes, in his report, to send it to some of the arsenals of the United States. Of the two nearest arsenals, one is at the distance of 1,000 miles, and the other 1,200 miles, from the place where the lead is. The expense of sending 2,000 dollars' worth of lead such a distance as this, independent of the chance of losing it, will be nearly worth the thing itself. I therefore propose, that this lead shall be given for the object specified in the bill; that object is to give it to the State of Missouri for the purpose of making a road from the lead mine to the river Mississippi. My reason for asking to make this disposition of it is this. The United States are the great landholders of all the new States. In the lead mine district, this is particularly the case: for the mineral lands are reserved by law, and cannot be sold. They are found, as elsewhere, in the poorest parts of the country: for, though there are some tracts of rich ground, the body of the country is poor. The mineral lands, which are valuable, are reserved by law; they cannot be sold—and the inferior lands, which are not mineral, are held up at a price which they will not command in some hundreds of years to come. The consequence is, that the United States is the absolute landlord of the great mineral district. There is no person to make roads. It is the landholders in every country who make roads. In all parts of the world, where a landlord possesses an estate, he expends a large proportion of the proceeds of that estate in making roads to it. Where he owns a coal mine, or a lead or copper mine, he expends a portion of the proceeds in making roads to it, for the benefit of his own property. Taken in this point of view, it is the duty of the United States to lay out part of the proceeds to make a road through their own lands. It is also advantageous to do so, because, making a road from the river to the mine, a distance of thirty miles, will give a value to the country itself. I therefore propose to introduce a bill with provisions to this effect.

And leave having been granted, Mr. B. introduced the bill; which was twice read, and referred.

FRIDAY, April 7.

The Judicial System.

The Senate proceeded, according to the order of the day, to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, "further to amend the Judicial System of the United States."

The Senate Committee on the Judiciary, to which the bill was referred, reported a substitute for the second section of the bill. This section of the bill, as it came from the House, is, in substance, as follows:

"That the seventh Judicial Circuit of the United States shall, hereafter, consist of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and Kentucky and Missouri shall form an eighth Circuit; Tennessee and Alabama a ninth Circuit, and Louisiana and Mississippi a tenth Circuit; and the Justice of the Supreme Court now assigned or allotted to the seventh Circuit, shall, until the next term of the Supreme Court, and until a new assignment or allotment shall be made by said court, be assigned to the eighth Circuit; and the three additional Justices, whose appointment is provided for by this act, shall be severally assigned by the President of the United States to the said seventh, ninth, and tenth Circuits, until the next term of the Supreme Court, when it shall be the duty of the Justices thereof to assign or allot themselves to the several Judicial Circuits of the United States, and to make record thereof according to law."

The substitute for this section, recommended by the committee of the Senate, is as follows:

"That the seventh Judicial Circuit of the United States shall hereafter consist of Ohio and Kentucky; and that Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, shall form the eighth Circuit; Tennessee and Alabama shall form the ninth Circuit; and Mississippi and Louisiana shall form the tenth Circuit; and the Justice of the Supreme Court appointed for each of said seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth Circuits, shall reside therein."

On the question of agreeing to this amendment, Mr. VAN BUREN rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

In noticing the proposed amendments, I shall give my own views, and, as far as I understand them, the views of the majority of the committee, in relation to the bill under consideration. The ample discussion which the subject has so recently undergone elsewhere, and which, though not heard, has been seen, by the Senate, will induce me to omit many observations which I might otherwise have felt it my duty to make.

The committee propose two amendments to the bill from the House of Representatives. They consist of an alteration of the seventh and eighth circuits, and a provision requiring the new judges, as is now required of the present judges, to reside in their respective circuits. In the bill as it stands, Kentucky and Missouri form one circuit, and Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana, another. The amendment connects Kentucky with Ohio, and forms the other circuit out of the districts of Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana. The amendment relative to the residence of the judges shall be noticed in the course of my remarks on the general subject. Of the other amendment I shall say but little. I was absent, on account of indisposition, when that amendment was discussed and decided in the committee. The explanation of its reasons will therefore be left to those by whom it was made, and who are more conversant with its merits. A bill was reported by me, in behalf of the committee, early in the session, by which the circuits were arranged as they are in the bill from the House. Subsequent to the report, it was ascertained that, out of the ten Senators representing the States included in the two circuits, seven were dissatisfied with that arrangement. They contend that it is unnatural, with reference to localities, unnecessary as it respects the state of the business, and will be inconvenient in its operation.

The question is exclusively of a local character, and the reasons for the opinion sustained by the amendment will be given by those particularly interested.

The bill proposes an alteration of the existing legislative provision on the subject of the judicial system, by adding three additional judges to the Supreme Court, and to increase the number of circuits from seven to ten. It is admitted that the change is important, and ought not to be made except upon the most urgent inducements. It is my object to state briefly and distinctly, the nature and extent of those inducements.

The grounds of complaint are :—

1st. The unavoidable accumulation of business in the Supreme Court :

2d. The great amount of unfinished business in the Seventh Circuit, composed of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, which cannot, it is alleged, be disposed of under the present arrangement :

3d. The exclusion of the six States last admitted into the Confederacy, viz : Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, from the benefit of the Circuit System.

Our first inquiries should be directed to the facts upon which these complaints are founded, and the character and extent of the alleged evils.

I obtained, last year, a certificate from the clerk of the Supreme Court, which has been mislaid, but the amount of which, as far as my recollection serves me, was, that of the causes on the calendar for the last ten years, one-half were left undisposed of at each term.

This is an evil that is everywhere felt and complained of. Its existence is universally admitted, and in many cases it amounts to a denial of justice.

The seventh circuit, as I have already stated, is composed of the districts of Ohio, Kentucky, and East and West Tennessee. The mischief complained of arises partly from the great extent of country embraced in the circuit, the immense distance from court to court, and partly from the great amount of litigation in that portion of the Union. Upon the first branch of this subject—the great extent of the circuit, remarks are unnecessary ; the facts are open to the observation of all. In one of the memorials on the table, the extraordinary extent of travel which the judge has to perform, and the difficulties of doing so, are fully stated. Upon the second, a few remarks may not be unprofitable. It is said, and upon good authority, that there are now pending in the Kentucky District, 950 causes ; in Ohio, about 200 or 250, and in East and West Tennessee, about 300 ; in all, about 1,500 causes. Although these facts are doubtless as stated, still, to many of us the statement, unless explained, would present an exaggerated and deceptive view of the real business in the circuit referred to.

By the laws of the United States, and the rules of the Supreme Court, made in pursuance thereof, the practice in the Circuit Courts of the United States has been assimilated to that of the Superior Courts of the States. That of the latter is various. Whilst in some of the States every pending cause, whatever be its nature or condition, is placed upon the docket, in others, such only as are to be tried upon issues either of law or fact : the former appears to be the practice in the seventh circuit. Of the 950 causes pending in the Kentucky District, there are, therefore, in all probability, not more than 250 which require to be tried ; the others pass by default, or are otherwise disposed of ; and the same estimate may, with safety, be made of the business in the other districts in the circuit.

That there is, notwithstanding, a greater amount of business in those districts than the court can perform, constituted as the circuit now is, appears from representations which have been made from time to time to Congress, coming from sources deserving entire confidence. It may appear strange to gentlemen that a circuit, so little commercial, and of a population inferior in point of numbers to several of the old circuits, should be so greatly overburthened with business, whilst in the others, the judges cannot only do all the present business, but might, without much inconvenience, do more. The fact is in part attributable to the great length of time necessarily employed by the judge in travelling, but chiefly to another cause. By the Constitution of the United States, jurisdiction is given to the Federal Judiciary, among other things, in "all cases between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States." A very great proportion of the causes pending in these courts concern the title to lands thus circumstanced. The United States Court derive from this branch of their judicial power an incomparably greater access of business in the circuit in question, than they do in any portion of the old States. Such is briefly the actual condition of things in the seventh circuit. Of the courts, its inhabitants do not, nor have they any reason to complain—as much has been done for them as the number of the judges and the situation of the judicial system would admit of. From Congress they have had the assistance that has been given to the same, and even larger numbers of citizens, in other sections of the country, and more than has been given to some. They have, therefore, no ground for any thing like clamorous complaint, nor am I aware that they have made it—to us they certainly have not. But as they clearly suffer inconvenience—as the cause of the evil is without their fault and beyond their control, they have a right to ask present redress; and the bill on the table proposes to give it as far as that can be done consistent with the interests of the other States. The remaining ground of complaint is the condition of the six States to which the circuit system has not been extended. The following is the state of this part of the case:—The other States have District Courts, which are held by district judges, receiving salaries of from eight to sixteen hundred dollars. They have also Circuit Courts, held by one of the justices of the Supreme Court, together with the District Judge. In all judgments and decrees in civil suits, for an amount over fifty dollars, a right of appeal is secured from the District to the Circuit Court, and a similar right to appeal from the Circuit to the Supreme Court, where the matter in controversy exceeds two thousand dollars. In all cases, civil or criminal, where a difference of opinion exists between the circuit and district judge, the matter is certified to the Supreme Court, and decided by them, and such order taken in the court below, as the Supreme Court shall direct. No imprisonment is allowed, or punishment inflicted, when the judges are so divided. Such is the provision made for the States which have been admitted to a full participation of the judicial system of the United States.

In the petitioning States, the situation of things is very different. Instead of the Circuit Courts thus constituted, provision is made by law to vest the District Courts with Circuit Court powers, so far at least as it relates to the original jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts. The appellate jurisdiction of the Circuit Court could not of course be vested in the District Court. An appeal lies from the District Court directly to the Supreme Court, similar to that allowed in other States from the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court, which it has been seen lies only where the matter in controversy exceeds the value of two thousand dollars. The injustice and inconvenience resulting from this system to the States in question, is supposed to consist—

1st. In depriving them in the first instance of the talents, experience, and learning, of a judge of the Supreme Court, who, from the higher duties he is expected to perform—from the greater inducement held out to men of talents, by larger salaries, and increased respectability, it is but reasonable to presume, would be far superior in point of capacity and respectability to the district judge.

2d. In cutting them off from an appeal in all matters in controversy between fifty dollars and two thousand dollars—an evil which, they say, cannot be redressed without the establishment of Circuit Courts, as it would not be a relief to suffer causes of a less amount to be carried from remote parts of the Union to the City of Washington.

VOL. VIII.—32

3d. That, although they have a right of appeal in all cases of over two thousand dollars, they can only have it to the Supreme Court in the first instance, and are thus deprived of the benefit of the first appeal to the Circuit Court, by which justice might be obtained at less expense.

4th. That, in criminal cases, in which no appeal is provided in any case, and which may involve life, character, and liberty, they are deprived of the advantage of a judge of the Supreme Court, and of the humane provision requiring the assent of two judges before punishment.

5th. That they have been admitted into the Union upon equal terms with the old States—that one of the great advantages secured to them by the condition of their admission, is a full participation in the perfect administration of justice, now enjoyed by their sister States, and that the withholding it is an act at once hostile to their best interests, and, what is equally interesting, humiliating to their pride.

This subject has been frequently before the Senate, and the Judiciary Committee. I have bestowed upon it, at different times, that deliberation and dispassionate attention which the wishes and the interests of so many members of the confederacy imperiously require. The result is a strong conviction, that there is, at least, some justice in each of the grounds of complaint made by the petitioning States, and enough in all of them, to make it the duty of Congress to make some suitable provision for their relief.

Whilst, however, I concede thus much, I am not willing to be understood as uniting, or even so much as acquiescing in the vehement complaints, which it has of late become fashionable to make, for having, as it is alleged, withheld from those States, rights which ought long since to have been granted to them. The petitioning States have been treated in this respect (circumstances considered) with as much favor, and have received as full a measure of justice as has been meted to those of their sister States, which have been admitted into the Confederacy since the adoption of the constitution.

The right of an ultimate participation of every new State in all the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the other States under the constitution as far forth as her situation enables her to enjoy them, and from which she is not precluded by the condition of her admission, is undoubted. But the immediate and entire extension of those privileges has never been regarded as a matter of imperative duty. The courtesy of the States, and general justice of their citizens, (if other considerations have not,) have, from the beginning, induced an acquiescence in a different rule, viz: that the measure should be a progressive one, to be completed as soon as a due regard to circumstances would admit. On a reference to the history of the Government, in this particular, it will be found, that the States now in question have fared as well, and better, than those admitted before them. Vermont and Maine, it is true, had the benefit of the circuit system soon extended to them. But it was because their local situation enabled the judges to hold circuits there without creating a necessity for increasing the number of the judges, or unreasonably increasing their duties. But towards States differently situated, a different course has been pursued, without producing any of those acrimonious complaints, of which we have lately heard and seen so much. Kentucky was admitted fifteen years before the circuit system was extended to her—Ohio four years, and Tennessee eleven. Missouri has been admitted but four years—Alabama but four—Illinois but seven—Mississippi but eight—Indiana but nine—and Louisiana but thirteen.

Nor has the matter been looked upon by the States in question in so grievous and offensive a light. As far as my knowledge extends, the States of Louisiana, Missouri, Illinois, and Alabama, have not, as yet, memorialized us upon the subject, and the representations of Mississippi and Indiana have been precisely such as they should be.

I mention these circumstances, not only to vindicate the Government from supposed injustice to so large a part of the Western States, but to allay whatever of censure and contagious excitement the collisions of opinion elsewhere may have produced, and which is always adverse to that calm and dispassionate consideration which this subject, above all others, demands.

The committee are all of opinion that relief of some sort is required, and that it should now be given. The next question is, what should that relief be—what can it be? The States asking our interference, point out no specific mode in which their wrongs should be redressed, but submit themselves to the wisdom of Congress.

It may with great truth be said, that there has not, for many years, been any subject presented to Congress of greater difficulty. It is admitted to be so by all. No less than four different plans have, for the last three years, been submitted to the Senate without success. The present bill was reported at the last session, received the assent of a majority of the Senate, but did not pass for want of time. The great difficulty arises from the extent of country to which the system must be made to apply. If you do justice to the circuit courts, you are unavoidably met by the danger of making the judges on the Supreme Bench too numerous.

I speak of the system that now exists, a system established by those who formed the constitution—departed from in 1801, but restored by the act of 1802, and persevered in to the present day. As the subject on which the system was to operate extended, Congress have extended it. Nothing is clearer than that for the old thirteen States, a better plan has not been needed, if the wit of man could have devised one. It is certain, that existing enactments do not carry the system over the whole ground. It must be so extended, or a new one established. The question is, whether that can be done—whether the country has not so far outgrown the system, as to render it necessary that it should be abandoned, and a new one substituted, more capable of extension.

Shall we do as was done in 1807, when circuit courts were provided for Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, or shall we strike out a new path? But little reflection can be necessary to convince the most superficial observer that to do so would be a matter of great delicacy. To change the entire judicial system of a country, and especially of a country whose form of Government is so complicated as ours, can never be a matter of light import. If there be a case in which, more than any other, the hand of innovation should be watched with lynx-eyed jealousy, this is surely that case. A total change was made in 1801, but the measure met with a total overthrow in one short year. Strong as the feelings then produced were, time and experience have demonstrated the wisdom of the act of 1802, by which the system of 1789 was restored and improved. Men who then saw, or thought they saw, the prostration of the fairest and firmest pillar in the edifice, have been enabled by observation and more dispassionate reflection, to see the error of impressions made by the excitements of the moment, and, what is of equal value, have had the wisdom and the honesty to acknowledge their conversion to better and sounder opinions. But let us, instead of submitting ourselves to the influence of general opinions, examine into, and consider, the substitutes which have, from time to time, been proposed.

The plans proposed at different times have been the following:

1st. To continue the present system and appoint circuit judges for the six new States, with a provision for their ultimate advancement to the Supreme Court, as vacancies occur on the bench.

2d. To revive the old system of 1801, appoint circuit judges, and confine the judges of the Supreme Court to the discharge of term duties.

3d. To direct the circuits to be held by the district judges, allotting three to a circuit.

4th. To increase the number of the judges of the Supreme Court, and of the circuits, according to the provisions of the bill upon the table.

Each of the three first-mentioned schemes has advantages, but, upon careful consideration, they have all been found liable to insurmountable objections. I will briefly consider the plan of having circuit judges for the six Western States only. A bill to that effect was, a session or two since, reported by the Judiciary Committee of the other House, and has been proposed by way of amendment in this. So far from being received as a measure of favor to the States interested, it produced nothing but excitement of the most unpleasant character. The earnest dissatisfaction manifested by the Western members was certainly not without cause. They reasoned thus—We have done without the circuit system until this time, and we have not complained, because it has not been the course of the Government to extend that system at once, but gradually, and according to circumstances. As long as a compliance with our request is found impracticable, or so greatly inconvenient as to amount to an impracticability, we will still wait. But when you make provision, covering the whole ground, and by that provision place us permanently, or nearly so, upon a footing inferior, in point of utility and respectability, to our sister States, who are but our equals, then our State pride is justly alarmed, and we cannot, in justice to the States we represent, submit to what they will regard as a degradation. So, sir, they reasoned, and it was soon seen that the measure ought not to be persisted in. It has, therefore, been abandoned in both Houses.

The Judicial System.

I will next notice the Circuit System of 1801. Some seven or eight years ago, a bill to that effect passed the Senate, and was fortunately not acted upon in the other House. Independent of the paramount objections which exist against this and every other plan, which, either directly or by probable consequence, separates the Justices of the Supreme Court from the circuits, there are others deserving consideration. A less number of circuits than ten would not be thought of. There are now, I think, twenty-seven district judges. They hold their office during good behavior, and many of them have spent the best portions of their lives in that situation, and become, more or less, dependent upon their places for their support, and that of their families. To remove them, therefore, by abolishing their courts, if a consolidation of the District and Circuit Courts should be thought desirable, could not fail to be regarded as a harsh measure. To keep them in office, receiving salaries without performing service, is so hostile to the character and genius of our Government and the sentiments of the people, that public opinion would not tolerate it. It would, therefore, be necessary to appoint ten new judges at least, which, added to the District and Supreme Court judges, would make forty-four judges of the United States Courts, independent of the territorial judges. It is certainly true, that the business of the courts would not furnish employment for this great number of judges. The high duties imposed upon them, imperiously require that men of talents of a particular order, should be selected for the new appointments. To obtain them, fair salaries will be indispensable; for men of such character could not, and would not, give up their business without an equivalent. It is, therefore, highly probable, that the expense of this system, the circumstance (always looked upon with much jealousy) of creating so many offices of so stable and irresponsible a tenure, and the seal of condemnation once placed upon this measure, would excite, indeed, could not fail to excite, great dissatisfaction. At the same time, it is due to the subject to state, that if there were no other objections to the system, and if the business of the courts would furnish sufficient employment, the expense ought not to be regarded, as there is nothing more true, than that the judicial department of the Government is, by far, the least expensive. Upon a reference, it will be found, that the whole expense of the judiciary, including marshals, &c., &c., does not exceed the sum of about three hundred thousand dollars per annum.

The remaining scheme is that of directing the Circuit Courts to be held by the district judges. A plan to this effect was digested, and a bill reported to the Senate two sessions ago. It was explained, considered, and laid over. As far as inferences could be drawn, it did not meet with favor. A leading objection was, the supposed incapacity of the district judges, arising from the circumstance that they had originally been selected for the performance of duties supposed to be of an inferior grade, and that they were allowed salaries of so limited an amount, that the selection had, of necessity, been more confined than was desirable. I confess that, if I could consent to any system which separated the Justices of the Supreme Court from the circuits, I would prefer the one now referred to. Much may be said to obviate the objection raised, but as the committee have abandoned it, as no such proposition has been, or, as far as I can judge, is likely to be made, and as I am, for the reasons I shall hereafter give, opposed to that, or any other system like it, in the great point I have alluded to, I will not, at this time, detain the Senate by further comment upon it.

But there are objections of a more general character to the adoption of either of the plans I have spoken of.

By the present judiciary act, it is provided, "that the laws of the several States, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in courts of the United States, in cases where they apply."

In many, if not most, of the controverted cases between individuals, of which the Federal Courts derive jurisdiction from the character of the parties, the titles under which they claim, or from other sources, the local or State law forms the rule of decision. An intimate knowledge of that is, therefore, an indispensable qualification for a judge of the Supreme Court. The difficulty of acquiring and retaining it is infinitely greater than would, on first impression, be supposed. Of the twenty-four States, there are not two, whose laws, affecting the rights of persons and property, are, in all respects, the same. Between many the differences are as great as is usual between States on different continents. Each has an established system, wholly unconnected with its sister States. This system is composed of portions of the English common law, adopted with various modifications and alterations, of more or less of the principle of the English Equity system, of the statutes of the States, and the constructions which have, from time to time, been put upon them by the State Judiciaries. It is true that these are all to be found in books, but we well know how little apt men are, when they can avoid it, to study subjects of this description, and men of experience in these things know the extreme difficulty, not to say impracticability, of making one's self at all familiar with them in any other way than by actual practice in the courts, either in examining them for argument, or in deciding them from day to day.

The importance of a full knowledge of the local law is greater in the Western States, than in the rest of the Union. This arises from the fact of so great a portion of the territory of those States having recently belonged to foreign Governments, and so many of the titles to lands, of consequence, dependent upon the laws, colonial as well as those of the mother country, before their cession to the United States. It arises, also, from other peculiarities in the titles to land in such of the Western States as are not thus situated. The addition of three justices, therefore, from that portion of the country, would bring to the bench of the Supreme Court a stock of valuable knowledge, of which it would be deprived, if either of the plans spoken of were adopted. Again: by compelling the judges of the Supreme Court to hold the circuits, the knowledge they have acquired of the local laws will be retained and improved, and they will thus be enabled, not only the better to arrive at correct results themselves, but to aid their brethren of the court who belong to different circuits, and are, of course, deprived of an opportunity to acquire such information, except in that manner. There is another consideration belonging to this branch of the subject, entitled to great weight. It is impossible, with the best intention on the part of the Executive branch of the Government, to avoid bad appointments. Influence and favoritism sometimes prevail, and to a want of correct information the Government is always exposed. Incompetent men, therefore, will sometimes be appointed. If confined to the discharge of term duties only, the country may be saddled with them during their whole lives. They might assent or dissent at terms, and the kindness of their brethren, and their respect for the character of the court, would induce them to do the rest. But the case is greatly otherwise, if they are obliged to preside at circuits, to discharge their high duties in the face of the people, unaided by their brethren of the bench. There is a power in public opinion in this country—and I thank God for it: for it is the most honest and best of all powers—which will not tolerate an incompetent or unworthy man to hold in his weak or wicked hands the lives and fortunes of his fellow-citizens. This power operates alike upon the Government and the incumbent. The former dare not disregard it, and the latter can have no adequate wish that they should, when he once knows the estimation in which he is held. This public ordeal, therefore, is of great value; in my opinion, much more so than what has, with some propriety, been called the scare-crow of the constitution—the power of impeachment.

But there is still another view of the subject, bearing, with irresistible force, against the separation of the Justices of the Supreme Court, under any circumstances, from the Circuit Courts, and against the adoption of any system, which, though it does not directly, may, ultimately, lead to that result.

By the act of 1792, the justices were left at liberty to distribute themselves among the different circuits annually. By the act of 1802, they were attached, by law, with a single exception, (Judge Washington,) to the circuit in which they resided; and the act of 1807, adding one justice to the number, made it his duty to reside in the seventh circuit. Time and experience, the best of all tests, have shown that this provision, also, of the much-abused act of 1802, was a wise and salutary one. The amendment proposed by the committee, preserves that feature of the acts of 1802 and 1807, by requiring that the three new judges shall reside in their respective circuits. To its propriety, I believe, no serious objection will be made, here or elsewhere.

Hitherto, the Justices of the Supreme Court have resided in the States, and with a single individual exception, within their respective circuits. Before the act of 1802, because the principal part of their business was there; since 1802, because the law made it their duty. If other provision is made for holding the circuits, the whole business of the Justices of the Supreme Court would be done here, and, sooner or later, they would, in the natural course of things, all move to, and permanently reside at, the seat of Government.

From that result, inferences, of a contrary character, but uniting in deprecating its policy, are drawn. Some think they see in it danger to the court, others apprehend danger from the court. In my judgment both are right.

It has been justly observed elsewhere, that "there exists not upon earth, and there never did exist, a judicial tribunal clothed with powers so various and so important" as the Supreme Court.

By it, treaties and laws, made pursuant to the constitution, are declared to be the supreme law of the land. So far, at least, as the acts of Congress depend upon the courts for their execution, the Supreme Court is the judge, whether, or no, such acts are pursuant to the constitution, and from its judgment there is no appeal. Its veto, therefore, may absolutely suspend nine-tenths of the acts of the National Legislature. Although this branch of its jurisdiction is not that which has been most exercised, still instances are not wanting in which it has disregarded acts of Congress, in passing upon the rights of others, and in refusing to perform duties required of it by the Legislature, on the ground that the Legislature had no right to impose them.

Not only are the acts of the National Legislature subject to its review, but it stands as the umpire between the conflicting powers of the General and State Governments. That wide field of debatable ground between those rival powers is claimed to be subject to the exclusive and absolute dominion of the Supreme Court. The discharge of this solemn duty has not been unfrequent, and, certainly, not uninteresting. In virtue of this power, we have seen it holding for naught the statutes of powerful States, which had received the deliberate sanction, not only of their Legislatures, but of their highest judicatories, composed of men venerable in years, of unsullied purity, and unrivalled talents—statutes, on the faith of which immense estates had been invested, and the inheritance of the widow and the orphan were suspended. You have seen such statutes abrogated by the decision of this court, and those who had confided in the wisdom and power of the State authorities, plunged in irremediable ruin. Decisions—final in their effect, and ruinous in their consequences. I speak of the power of the court, not of the correctness or incorrectness of its decisions. With that we have here nothing to do.

But this is not all. It not only sits in final judgment upon our acts, as the highest legislative body known to the country—it not only claims to be the absolute arbiter between the Federal and State Governments—but it exercises the same great power between the respective States forming this great Confederacy, and their own citizens. By the Constitution of the United States, the States are prohibited from passing "any law impairing the obligation of contract." This brief provision has given to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court a tremendous sweep. Before I proceed to delineate its tendency and character, I will take leave to remark upon some extraordinary circumstances in relation to it. We all know the severe scrutiny to which the constitution was exposed. Some from their own knowledge—others from different sources. We know with what jealousy—with what watchfulness—with what scrupulous care its minutest provisions were examined, discussed, resisted, and supported, by those who opposed, and those who advocated its ratification. But, of this highly consequential provision—this provision which carries so great a portion of all that is valuable in State legislation to the feet of the Federal Judiciary, no complaints were heard—no explanations asked—no remonstrances made. If there were, they have escaped my researches. It is most mysterious, if the constitution was then understood, as it now is, that this was so. An explanation of it has been given—how correct I know not.

The difficulties which existed between us and Great Britain relative to the execution of the treaty of peace, are known to all. Upon the avowed ground of retaliation for the refusal of England to comply with the stipulation on her part, laws were passed, between the years 1783 and 1788, by the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Georgia, delaying execution, liberating the body from imprisonment on the delivery of property, and admitting executions to be discharged in paper money. Although those laws were general in their terms, applicable as well to natives as to foreigners, their chief operation was upon the British creditors, and such was the leading design of their enactment. England remonstrated against them as infractions of the stipulation in the treaty, that creditors, on either side, should meet with no impediments to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all debts previously contracted, and attempted to justify the glaring violations of the treaty, on her part, on that ground. An animated discussion took place between the Federal Government and Great Britain, and between the former and the States in question, upon the subject of the laws referred to, their character and effect. It was during this time that the constitution was formed and ratified. It is supposed that the difficulties, thus thrown in the way of adjustment with England, through the acts of the State Governments, suggested the insertion in the constitution of the provision in question, and that it was under a belief that its chief application would be to the evil then felt, that so little notice was taken of the subject.

If it be true, that such was its object, and such its supposed effect, it adds another and a solemn proof to that which all experience has testified, of the danger of adopting general provisions for the redress of particular and partial evils. But, whatever the motive that led to its insertion, or the cause that induced so little observation on its tendency, the fact of its extensive operation is known and acknowledged. The prohibition is not confined to express contracts, but includes such as are implied by law, from the nature of the transaction. Any one, conversant with the usual range of State legislation, will, at once, see how small a portion of it is exempt, under this provision, from the supervision of the seven Judges of the Supreme Court. The practice under it has been in accordance with what should have been anticipated.

There are few States in the Union, upon whose acts the seal of condemnation has not, from time to time, been placed by the Supreme Court. The sovereign authorities of Vermont, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Missouri, Kentucky, and Ohio, have, in turn, been rebuked and silenced, by the overruling authority of this court. I must not be understood, sir, as complaining of the exercise of this jurisdiction by the Supreme Court, or to pass upon the correctness of their decisions. The authority has been given to them, and this is not the place to question its exercise. But this I will say, that, if the question of conferring it was now presented for the first time, I should unhesitatingly say, that the people of the States might, with safety, be left to their own legislatures, and the protection of their own courts.

Add to the immense powers of which I have spoken, those of expounding treaties, so far, at least, as they bear upon individuals, citizens, or aliens, of deciding controversies between the States of the Confederacy themselves, and between the citizens of the different States, and the justice of the remark will not be questioned, that there is no known judicial power so transcendently omnipotent, as that of the Supreme Court of the United States!

Let us now, for a few moments, consider the influence which this ought to have upon our legislation. It would not be in accordance with the common course of nature, to expect that such mighty powers can long continue to be exercised, without accumulating a weight of prejudice that may, one day, become dangerous to an institution which all admit to be of inestimable value. It is true, as has elsewhere been said, with apparent triumph, that the States, whose legislative acts have successively fallen under the interdiction of the court, have excited little or no sympathy on the part of their sister States, and, after struggling with the giant strength of the court, have submitted to their fate. But, sir, it is feared that this will not always be the case. Those who are most ardent in their devotion to this branch of the Government, knowing the feelings produced by these decisions in the States affected by them—sensible that those feelings are rather smothered than abandoned, upon conviction of their injustice, fear that, by adding another and another State to the ranks of those who think they have reason to complain, an accumulation of prejudice may be produced, that will threaten, if not endanger, the safety of the institution.

Seeing, and feeling, and fearing this, they, with wise and patriotic foresight, wish to adopt every measure which will retain and increase, as far as practicable, the general confidence in the court, and to avoid such as may, by possibility, have a tendency to weaken it. No reflecting man can doubt, that the residence of the Judges of the Supreme Court in the States, being subject in their persons, family, and estates, to the laws of the State—portions of their families, as is frequently the case, members of the State Governments, and themselves only temporarily absent—going in and out before the people of the States, and commanding their confidence by the purity of their lives, and the modesty of their demeanor—enforcing and expounding their own decisions in the face of the different classes of the community at the circuits, and in free and familiar intercourse with those who have such great influence in giving a proper direction to public opinion on legal subjects—must have an infinitely greater tendency to enable the judges to sustain themselves in the honest discharge of their high duties, than if they were cut off from all connection with the States. Greater than if they were settled in this metropolis, and to the great mass of the people of the States unheard and unseen, but felt in their power, through the remotest borders of the Union—and how felt, sir? Not as is the case with the other branches of the Government—in extending favors, in munificent grants, and all the various measures of relief—no, sir, always on one side, and not unfrequently on all sides, their measures are regarded as harsh and vindictive. Their business is to punish the guilty, to restrain the vicious, to curb power, and to correct its excesses. Such acts are necessary to the well-being, to the very existence of society, but are not those which have the strongest tendency to conciliate popular favor. It is to effect this object, in part, that the friends of the bill, as I cannot but think wisely so, zealously resist every measure which will or may separate the Justices of the Supreme Court from the circuits, and bring them to this city. But this is not the only, or the most interesting view, which may be taken of the subject. The political character of the court, so far as it becomes its duty to pass on the laws of the respective States, affecting personal rights, has already been referred to. A few cursory observations upon the character and tendency of its jurisdiction, so far as it relates to the powers of the General and State Governments, considered as independent, and, in many respects, rival States, will conclude my remarks on this branch of the subject.

The unfortunate extent of the grounds of collision between the respective Governments, has already been referred to. It was beyond the wit of man, in the constitution of a Government like ours, to have wholly avoided it, and it can only be lessened by mutual forbearance and explanatory amendments. He must be but a superficial observer of events, who is not sensible that it is a subject which is every day attracting more of public attention and solicitude. There are those, sir, and they are neither small in number, nor light in character, who think that the uniform tendency of the political decisions of the Supreme Court has been to strengthen the arm of the General Government, and to weaken those of the States. Such men think that danger to the State Governments is to be apprehended from permanently fixing the Judges of the Supreme Court at the seat of the Federal Government. They fear (to use an expression, though not literally applicable here, still so well conveys the idea) that it would be "establishing a power behind the throne stronger than the throne itself." Thus thinking, they commenced, as far back as the now vindicated, but formerly much-abused, act of 1802, to confine the Justices of the Supreme Court to their respective circuits, and that course has been persevered in to the present day. They think the inevitable tendency of a change would be for the worse—that, if the judges come here under the eye of the Government, prominent parties as they always must be to all collisions between the respective Governments, they could not fail to embark more strongly in the feelings of men in power here, than they now do.

Sir, this has become a subject on which it is difficult for one to speak without unpleasantly encountering the strong opinions entertained on different sides of the question. On the one hand, expressions of distrust and dissatisfaction are heard, of a character so strongly marked, as to defeat their object and recoil upon their authors. On the other, a sentiment, I had almost said, of idolatry for the Supreme Court, has grown up, which claims for its members an almost entire exemption from the fallibilities of our nature, and arraigns with unsparing bitterness the motives of all who have the temerity to look with inquisitive eyes into this consecrated sanctuary of the law. So powerful has this sentiment become—such strong hold has it taken upon the press of this country, that it requires not a little share of firmness in a public man, however imperious may be his duty, to express sentiments that conflict with it. It is nevertheless correct, sir, that in this, as in almost every other case, the truth is to be found in a just medium of the subject. To so much of the high-wrought eulogies (which the fashion of the times has recently produced in such great abundance) as allows to the distinguished men who now hold in their hands that portion of the administration of public affairs, talents of the highest order and spotless integrity, I cheerfully add the very humble testimony of my unqualified assent. That this uncommon man who now presides over the court, and who I hope may long continue to do so, is, in all human probability, the ablest judge now sitting upon any judicial bench in the world, I sincerely believe. But to the sentiment, which claims for the judges so great a share of exemption from the feelings that govern the conduct of other men, and for the court the character of being the safest depository of political power, I do not subscribe. I have been brought up in an opposite faith, and all my experience has confirmed me in its correctness. In my legislation upon this subject, I will act in conformity to those opinions. I believe the Judges of the Supreme Court (great and good men as I cheerfully concede them to be) are subject to the same infirmities, influenced by the same passions, and operated upon by the same causes that good and great men are in other situations. I believe they have as much of the esprit du corps as other men: those who act otherwise, form an erroneous estimate of human nature; and if they act upon that estimate, will, soon or late, become sensible of their delusion.

I conscientiously believe, that, to bring the Judges of the Supreme Court to the seat of the General Government, and making them, as it were, a part of the Administration—for such, it is to be feared, would soon be its effect—would bode no good to the State Governments. With feelings for the General Government, as I humbly hope, purely catholic, I firmly believe, and my daily experience confirms that conviction, that much, very much of the present prosperity of the country and its institutions, depends upon the successful action of the State Governments, and that the preservation of their rightful powers is the sine qua non of our future welfare. I will not, therefore, give my assent to any measure which may still further disqualify the States to sustain themselves in those collisions of power which are unavoidable, and in which the situation of the parties is already so unequal. I believe a different disposition of the Judges of the Supreme Court from that provided by this bill, would have such effect, and I am, therefore, most decidedly opposed to it. Sir, it would be strange if the tendencies of this high tribunal were not such as I have supposed; unless, indeed, they were more or less than men. It is not only made by this Government, and sustained by this Government—its members not only owe to it all they have and are to be, but they are the only portion of it that is permanent, that is beyond the reach of any power known to the constitution. The billows of faction may run mountain high, and yet reach not them. The indignant voice of an abused people may, at stated periods, sweep by the board every other portion of the men in power—may take from them the little brief authority under which they have strutted their busy hour upon the stage, and cause them to be seen no more—but the Supreme Court alone, "can never be palsied by the will of its constituents." And, sir, all things considered, it is best that it is so.

I know well, that the opinion that the tenure of the office of the Justices of the Supreme Court is the rotten part of the constitution, is entertained by men who have established for themselves imperishable claims to the characters of saviors of their country, and benefactors of the human race. Of men, whose opinions on other subjects must save this Government, if it be saved at all. I am not of that sentiment—my pursuits in life, and early and constant connection with the courts, may have given an undue bias to my opinions: but from whatever cause it may proceed, such are my views. Whether it might not have been wise, so far to have imitated the example of the country from which we have derived so much of our jurisprudence, as provides for the removal of the judges on the application of a certain and great portion of the Legislature, is another question; but I have no hesitation in saying, that rather than adopt the sentiments I have referred to, and which have sometimes been broached upon this floor, I greatly prefer that things should be as they are. But whilst I do so, I cannot forget what the experience of all ages has demonstrated, the tendency of power to its abuse, and the consequent duty of those entrusted with its investment, to keep its possessors as far as practicable from temptation.

I have done with this branch of the subject. My argument leads to the conclusion, if it be correct, that no bill which separates the judges from the circuit duties can be correct; the bill under consideration avoids that supposed evil, and the question is—does it effect what is desired? and is it, or is it not, obnoxious to objection of an insurmountable character?

By lessening the duties of the judge in the seventh circuit, he will be enabled to do what he cannot now do, attend at Washington one month sooner, and unite with his brethren in holding the Supreme Court one month longer. The duties of the other judges, old and new, will be such as to enable them to do the same. The consequence cannot, therefore, I think, fail to be, that, if this bill, and the other bill on your table, pass, all delay in the Supreme Court will soon be removed. As to the circuit system, there exists not to my knowledge any complaint against it in the Atlantic States. I am sure there is no good ground for any. If additional circuits should be necessary in the western districts of New York and Pennsylvania, the present justices of those circuits can easily hold them. All that the Western States want is, to have the circuit system extended to them as we have it. No one doubts that, with the addition of these additional judges, a sufficient number of circuit courts can be held in all the districts in the Union to do all the business.

It has been supposed, that at some future day the exigencies of the country will require a different system. I see no good reason for such an opinion. I do not understand why this system may not well be looked upon as calculated to secure the purposes of its institution in all time. At all events, it will for our day; and for what is to come after, "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." There is, in my judgment, but one objection to the system or the bill, and that is the number of the judges. I wish they could be less, but they cannot. If the number is an objection, it is an unavoidable one. But I confess that this objection does not loom half so large to my eyes as it once did. Perhaps it is because I have made myself more familiar with its observation than before. Perhaps from more accurate reflection. For some purposes, such as the decision of constitutional questions, and the acquisition on the bench, of a perfect knowledge of local law, the number will certainly be a positive advantage. For others, possibly an objection; but we are consoled with the reflection, that we have safe precedents, entitled to great weight, that should serve to allay our apprehension.

In England, whose judicial system and jurisprudence is supposed by many to be the best in the world, the twelve judges have, for time out of mind, met in the Exchequer Chamber for the decision of cases and questions of law; and their number has never, to my knowledge, been complained of as an inconvenience. In Scotland, whose judicial character also stands high, the Court of Dernier Resort is composed of fifteen judges. England allows appeals and writs of error to the House of Lords; and to come nearer home, my own State has for its court of final resort, the Senate of the State, composed of thirty-two members, its President, the Chancellor and Judges of the Supreme Court. It might not do so well for me to speak of the character of the administration of justice in that State under its old and present system, which, in this respect, are alike; others will judge of that—our light has not been hid; but this much I will say, that our citizens are now well satisfied with it, and that in a convention held a few years since, no attempt was even made to change that feature of the system—the Court of Errors as it now exists, and has from the foundation of the Government. I have, therefore, made myself easy upon this point. I believe the bill will not only do well, but will do all that is desired from it, and I sincerely hope it may pass.

Mr. RUEGLES, of Ohio, followed, in opposition to the amendment, and in favor of the bill, as it came from the other House; and it was opposed also by Mr. HARRISON.

The amendment was supported by Messrs. ROWAN, NOBLE, KANE, and BENTON, each at considerable length, and Mr. RANDOLPH also advocated the amendment, and addressed the Senate in a speech of more than two hours' duration.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment, and carried by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Boughn, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Clayton, Cobb, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, King, Macon, Marks, Noble, Randolph, Robbins, Rowan, Smith, Tasewell, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Willey, Williams, Woodbury—32.

NAYS.—Messrs. Harrison, Johnson of Kentucky, Ruggles, Sanford—4.

Mr. ROWAN then moved further to amend the bill, by adding thereto the following sections:

"4. And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court shall, in no instance, decide that the Constitution of any State, or any provision thereof, or the law of any State, or any law of Congress, or any part or portion thereof, or of either or any of them, is invalid or void, by reason of any supposed collision between them, or any part or portion of them, or any or either of them, and the Constitution of the United States, or any article, section, or clause thereof, unless at least seven of the justices of said court shall concur in that decision—in which case it shall be the duty of the justices who shall concur therein, to make out each his opinion in writing, separately, and deliver it to the Clerk, whose duty it shall be to spread the same upon the record of the court.

"5. And be it further enacted, That, hereafter, until it shall be otherwise provided by law, such kind of process only shall be issued, and in such order only, upon the judgments or decrees of any of the courts of the United States, as are authorized and permitted by the laws of the State wherein such judgment or decree shall be pronounced, to be issued upon the judgments or decrees of the highest judicial tribunals of that State; and the marshal, or other ministerial officer of such court of the United States, shall be governed by, and conform to, the laws of the said State, in his execution of the said process, as well in relation to the property or person subject thereto, as to his proceeding therewith: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to extend or apply to any judgment or decree pronounced by any of the said courts, in cases affecting the public revenue, or to the process which may issue thereon, or the management and execution thereof, by the ministerial officers of the said courts."

The amendment was ordered to be printed; and then

MONDAY, April 10.

The Judicial System.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill further to amend the Judicial System of the United States: the amendment proposed by Mr. ROWAN, on Friday last, pending.

Mr. ROWAN rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The two sections which I had the honor to offer as an amendment to the bill now under consideration, contain, each, a distinct proposition. Both, as I conceive, of very great importance, in their import, to the people of the States of this Union. By the first, it is proposed that seven of the ten Justices of the Supreme Court, shall concur in any judgment or decree, which denies the validity, or restrains the operation, of the constitution, or any law of any of the States, or any provision or enactment in either. By the other, it is proposed that the ministerial officers of the Federal Courts shall be governed, in levying, and carrying into effect, the executions which issue from those courts, by the Execution Laws of the States respectively, in which those courts shall respectively be holden.

Every amendment, Mr. President, implies a defect in the subject proposed to be amended. Every remedy presupposes the existence of an evil. It therefore behooves him who proposes the remedy, not only to point out the evil, but to show the fitness and competency of the remedy. I solicit your indulgent attention, and that of the Senate, while I attempt to point out some of the evils which are expected to be alleviated, at least, if not remedied, by the amendments which I have proposed.

And first, of the evils on which it is hoped the first section will have a remedial effect. They are those which result from the exercise of implied powers by the Judges of the Supreme Court. From an enlargement of the powers of the General Government, by inference and construction, through their instrumentality.

To distinguish between the powers which may be legitimately exercised by that tribunal, as the organ of the General Government, and those which they have derived, and are in the habit of deriving, by implication, a short inquiry into the nature, origin, and extent, of the powers which justly belong to the Government of the Union, may not be inappropriate. I promise you, sir, not to be tedious: I will just premise, that a little attention to the import of some of the terms, which are necessarily employed in political discussion, and which I shall be constrained to use, may save from some confusion, in the progress of this inquiry, and enable us to comprehend more clearly the subject embraced by it.

I feel that it is necessary: because the terms to which I allude have, in the discussions of much abler persons than myself, for the want of this precaution, run into each other, and somewhat obscured their arguments. There is nothing more common than to call a Government a State, and, e converso, a State a Government; and the General Government is almost universally called the National Government, the Government of the Nation, &c. The indiscriminate use of these terms tends to confuse the ideas which they import; and their import, thus indiscriminately applied to the States, the State Governments, and the General Government, tends to confound distinctions of the utmost importance to the people of the States.

State is a word of technical import in the nomenclature of politics. I understand it to mean civil society, as incorporated by the social compact; and by social compact, I do not mean, as many do, the constitution of a State—no two words differ more in their import. The social compact, I understand to be that contract by which men pass from a state of nature, to a state of civil society; that contract in which each agrees with all, and all with each—that each will surrender to all the control of himself, his powers, and his property, and that all shall protect each, in his person, property, and possessions. Anterior to the formation of this compact, every man was, sui juris, in the fullest meaning of those words—exempt from the control of others, and without the right to control anybody; he was subject only to the control of his own will; every man was independent of every other man. By this compact, civil society was not only formed, but incorporated, became a body politic, a moral agent, a State. The State thus formed, by the consent of all its members, expresses its will, by the voice of a majority, which will is, by the compact, to be the rule of their conduct, the law of their rights, the arbiter of their disputes.

Civil society, thus formed by the social compact, is denominated a State. The will of the people who compose that society, is the sovereign power of the State. But how that power shall be exercised, most beneficially for the people, is the question presented to the State, immediately after its formation. It has to settle upon the plan, by which its will shall be exerted in regulating the conduct, defining the duties, and protecting the rights, of its members. This plan of government is ordained by the State, in its constitution: so that, instead of the constitution being the social compact which forms the State, the State forms the constitution; which is but a diagram of the manner in which the will of the people is to be exercised in governing; that is, managing the concerns of the State, by the functionaries to be employed for that purpose. Those functionaries are legislative, judicial, and executive, according to the constitutions of the States of this Union, and constitute what I call, and what I think can only be properly called, the Governments of the States, or State Governments.

The State, by the constitution, confers on those functionaries the authority to exercise the governing power. The power which is exercised in governing, is neither created, nor specifically conferred, by the constitution. The authority, only, to exercise that power, is specifically conferred by that instrument.

The constitution and laws of the State are formed by the will of the majority. In the formation of the State, unanimity was required. To the formation of the constitution, and the enactment of laws, the will of the majority is competent. The competency of the majority, to the formation of the Government, was derived from the unanimity which had existed in the formation of the State—in its formation, all assented that the majority should be competent to the formation and administration of the Government. The State derives its existence, and its power to govern, from the social compact, and forms its plan of exercising that power, by its constitution, which is properly called its Government. So that the State is as distinct from its Government, as the Creator is from his creature. The former can alter, amend, or abolish, the latter, at pleasure. It still exists, whatever may be the mutations of its government, upon the firm, unaltered, and inextinguishable basis of the social compact. It is upon this principle that the debt of a State, or Nation, cannot be cancelled by any revolution whatever in its Government. The debt was not due from the Government, but from the people, in their corporate State capacity; and nothing but their extinction could extinguish the debt. If we define liberty to be the right of the citizens to do, each, what he ought to will to do, and not to be constrained to do what he ought not to will to do, the social compact furnishes, in the will of the majority, the rule of that right, and the power—the moral force, which guarantees its enjoyment. And this is the sense, Mr. President, in which liberty is power: it is the power created by the social compact—which constitutes the liberty of the citizens. The controlling power of the will of the majority, is not only the power, but the essence of liberty. The control of this will, by the functionaries of the Government, whether Executive or Judicial, is any thing but the power of liberty. Liberty is power, when the people of the State govern themselves, by their own will, according to their own plan of government; by functionaries of their own appointment. Thus it is evident that the States were, anterior to the formation of this Union, independent Sovereigns—aliens in their nature, as all sovereigns are, to each other. That each had an organized government—its constitution; that the people, and their property, belonged exclusively to the States of which they were citizens.

Now the question is, by whom was the Government of the United States formed? By the people, by the States, or by the State Governments? Does it emanate from the States in reference to the social compacts by which they were created? Or in reference to the constitutions which they formed? Or from the people of all the States, without regard or reference to either compacts or constitutions? This is a question of great import, as it relates to the extent and character of the powers of the General Government.

That the Constitution of the United States was not formed by the aggregate people, absolved from the social compacts, whereby they had incorporated themselves into States, we know—because, in that case, they must not only have dissolved those compacts, and thereby annihilated the States; but, after having done so, they must, as one people, have incorporated themselves by social compact, in order to get the power of forming the constitution by the voice of the majority. For, without this compact, the dissentients from the constitution could not, on any conceivable principle, be bound by it: for assent is the only rational basis of obligation.

Without this compact, either express or tacit, the control of the minority by the majority, would be tyranny. Besides, the existence of the States is not only recognized by the constitution, but many of its provisions are predicated upon their co-existence; and some of its machinery upon the co-existence of the Governments of the States. It was not formed then by the people in their naked character as such. It was not formed by the Governments of the States. It does not purport to have been formed by them: they had not been invested by the States with the powers requisite for that purpose; the State constitutions were not only not adapted, but opposed to its formation by the functionaries of the State Governments. How, then, was it formed? I answer that it was formed by the people of the States, in their corporate capacity—in that corporate capacity which is inseparable from civil society—which capacity can be conferred by the social compact alone, and which alone exalts the people of that society into citizens, and enables them to act as a moral agent—as a unit—as a State.

The Constitution, then, of the United States, was formed, not by the people, but by the people of the States, in their corporate State character. The people of each State, separately and distinctly, resting on the basis of the social compact, by which it was formed, and by the exercise of that sovereign power, which that compact created—by the exercise of which, it could alone participate in the formation of that instrument.

The power of the State is commensurate with the volume of the will of the people who compose it. The power of the Government is less than the power of the State, by the extent of the restrictions, imposed in its constitution and bill of rights upon its functionaries. They exercise the power of the State in the manner prescribed, and subject to restrictions, imposed upon their exercise of it in that instrument.

If, then, the Constitution of the United States was formed by the people of the States, and the people acted in their corporate State capacity, in its formation, it must be a Federal, and cannot be a National Government, and the powers of which it consists must necessarily be specific. For if, as I have asserted, (and I do not repent of the assertion,) the governing power is a moral force, and consists exclusively in the will of the people, and the people belong to the States, then there is no source whence this power can be derived to the General Government, by implication or inference. The power of the General Government consists exclusively in its constitution. It is a mere government, consisting of designated functionaries, permitted to exercise specified powers. It does not consist of the people, and, therefore, cannot legitimately use their will, except as concocted by the States.

It is, Mr. President, I believe, a just dictate of reason, that the zeal to guard against an evil, should be in proportion to its magnitude. What is the magnitude of the evil apprehended from the exercise, by the judges, of implied powers; and what are the reasons for apprehending it? The evil apprehended is the absorption of the powers of the States by the General Government, through the instrumentality of its judges: the reasons for this apprehension are to be found in what they have already done. It is fair, Mr. President, to judge of the future from the past; the past is, in fact, the only medium through which we can look into the future; the present will not stay with us long enough to be examined; it is the only portion of time which always seems to be in a hurry. We see, in the humiliation of a majority of the States, the triumphant encroachments which the General Government has made, by judicial construction, upon State rights. It is impossible, Mr. President, to depict either the extent or the magnitude of the evils inflicted upon the States, by the judges, in the exercise of implied powers. I have attempted to show, not that liberty is power, but that power is liberty; if I am correct in the position that liberty consists in the right of every citizen to do whatever he ought to will to do, and that the guarantee of that right is in the power of the State, then any diminution of the power of the State is a correspondent abridgment of the liberty of the citizen; and, consequently, the prostration of the power of the State is the vassalage of its citizens. The magnitude of the evil, then, in its extreme, is neither more nor less than the loss of their liberty by the citizens. But if we define liberty to be the right of every citizen to do what the laws permit him to do, and the power of the State to consist in the will of its citizens, then the code of the State, regulating the conduct of its people, is but the will of the citizens, regulating their own conduct. Hence, the liberty of the people of each State consists in the power of self-government: and the abstraction of that power is the destruction of liberty. The denial to a State of the power to make laws, in relation to the social intercourse, conduct, or interests, of its own citizens, is, in so far, a paralysis of the power in which their liberty essentially consists. This paralysis has been inflicted by the judges upon a majority of the States which compose this Union. They have been successively stripped, by that tribunal, of their sovereign power, to an enfeebling and degrading extent. These instances are past; they cannot be recalled. The mortification they inflicted can only be compensated by the lessons of caution which they inculcate—the admonitions which they give to the States, to guard against their recurrence. To maintain the power of a State is to maintain the efficacy of its laws: for its power consists in the enactment and enforcement of such laws as its condition may require, conformably to its constitution. The importance of the free and unhampered exercise of this power to the freedom and happiness of the people, must be obvious to the most superficial observer.

This power, Mr. President, consists, as I have already perhaps too often repeated, in the will of the people. This will, to be beneficially and efficiently exercised, must, from its nature, and the nature of man, be exerted within a limited sphere. To be efficient, it must be confluent; to be beneficial, it must be harmonious. But there is a territorial extent, beyond which the people cannot mingle sympathy and sentiment—beyond which, that confluence and compaction of the people's will, which is necessary to their liberty and their comfort, is impracticable—beyond which, if its confluence were even practicable, its harmonious interfluence is denied by physical, and, of course, invincible causes. The climate and the soil, occupied by any people, have a powerful influence upon the complexion of their will. The same climate, and the same kind of soil, produce substantially the same kind of pursuits, the same customs, habits, and manners; and, of course, the same complexion of will. If they occupy the seaboard, they are commercial, as well as agricultural, (unless the soil forbids agriculture,) and those pursuits accommodate themselves to each other by the kindest reciprocation of their respective facilities. If they occupy the bosom of a continent, their pursuits are less diversified, and their habits and manners more simple; because, the climate has been uninterrupted in the concoction of their will, by the interference of the ocean. But, whether in the bosom of a continent, or on the margin of the ocean, they can only be free to the extent in which they can exert their mingled will, in the exclusive management of their own interior concerns. Upon this theory, Mr. President, the States of this Union should be maintained, with their powers undiminished from any quarter. The States are happily suited, in their territorial dimensions, to the practicable exertion of the confluent will of the people who compose them, in the enactment of laws for the regulation of their own concerns, suited not only in their dimensions to compaction of will, but to those physical causes which, by producing sameness, give strength to that compaction.

Is this theory illusive? Is it not verified by the history of civil societies, in all ages, and in all countries? What instance, Mr. President, does history furnish, of a free Government covering a great extent of territory? Has freedom ever been the entire occupant of a continent, or of a great portion of a continent? No, sir; entire continents are the property of despots; and, of course, the abodes of slavery and wretchedness; and that, not because the people are less fond of freedom than the people within more circumscribed limits: for the love of liberty is natural to man—but because of the impracticability, resulting from territorial extent, combined with physical causes, of producing and maintaining in a lively and active condition, that concert, that compaction of will, in which alone consists the power which is liberty; in which alone consists the liberty which is power. For, I repeat that liberty is power in that sense only in which power is liberty.

The Government of a continent must be, of physical necessity, a despotism. It cannot be even a monarchy. And why? Simply because the will of the people cannot circulate in volume, actively and wholesomely; that is, in compact confluence throughout the mass. It cannot be confided in, farther than its effects can be seen and felt. They cannot be seen and felt throughout. Its circulation becomes languid; stagnancy succeeds to languor, apathy to both. Sensation usurps the place of intellection, and fear succeeds to the place of volition, and becomes the principle and the power of the Government. The people cease to govern themselves by the power of their own will, and permit the despot to govern them by the power of their own fears. He keeps up their fears; and exacts their obedience by employing, coercively, the physical force of the extremes against each other. He keeps every portion in awe by the force of the whole, and the whole by the force of every portion.

Such, Mr. President, must be the condition of the people in these States, when, through the instrumentality of the Federal Judiciary, or any other means, the States shall have been destroyed, or reduced to consolidation. Their condition will be even worse: for the machinery of the State Governments, which were formed by the will of the people, to suit their wants, will be employed as the coverts and conduits of oppression. Those corporate devices, by which the refreshing streams of public will were conducted to the vine and the fig-tree, under the comfortable shade of which every citizen sat, when there was none in all the land to make him afraid, will be organs through which official tyranny and misrule will inflict fear and misery upon the once happy abodes of peace, security, and comfort; and for this there is no remedy, while the dominion of the despot retains its territorial extent. The only remedy is, in cutting the continent up into Governments, no one of which will be too large for the energetic circulation of the governing will of the people. In that way, they may establish and maintain their freedom, until they are construed by their functionaries out of their right to govern themselves.

Mr. President: there is not any thing beneath the sun but mind and matter: one or the other of those two substances must govern. Matter cannot; mind, of course, must. And the question must always be, whether the will of all, of a few, or of one, shall govern. The people can only govern by their united will, when they are so situated as to be able to unite their will for that purpose. When that is the case, their happiness is in their own power; for the power of the united will of the people of a State is almost indefinite. In England, when the will of the people has, through the Representative principle, been employed as the governing force, it has, though encumbered with rotten boroughs and with royalty, achieved wonders. It has secured to the people as much happiness and liberty as were compatible with their condition and form of government.

In Rome, in Greece, and wherever else the people have been free, they have been happy and powerful while their freedom continued. But, in those places, and wherever else, in all time past, freedom has been found, it has been found in the possession of a people occupying a comparatively small territory.

The Judicial System.

While, therefore, the States can maintain the free and unfettered exercise of their own will, in the management of their own interior concerns—while the Federal Government will be content to exercise the powers conceded to it by the States, in the Constitution of the United States, and leave to the States, respectively, the exercise of their will as sovereigns in the regulation of their internal polity, the people of the States will be free and happy; and the States will be strong in the vindication of the rights of the Union, in proportion to the freedom and happiness of their citizens. Their strength, upon an emergency, will be the strength of giants refreshed by sleep.

And, Mr. President, permit me to ask if it is not more in accordance with the nature of our complex Government, that the Union should depend upon the States for its vigor, than that the States should look to the Union for their strength. Does not the theory of our Government enjoin that we should look rather to the good of the whole, by taking special care of the parts, than that we should look to the good of the parts, by taking special care of the whole? Can we hesitate upon this question, when we consider that the liberty and prosperity of every citizen is in the exclusive keeping of his State, and not of the Union? That the citizens owe their happiness to their respective States, and derive their liberty from them? That it is in the States that patriotism, to whatever extent it may exist, must be found? It is in the States, and under their protection alone, that the family altars are reared, and the family firesides consecrated by family endearments; and that it is under the protecting toleration of the States that temples are erected to the living God, and public and social devotion conducted. The Federal Government does not possess, in any of the States, nor has it the capacity to procure, the ground on which to erect a temple, unless as lessee of the United States Bank. It has no country. It has, I repeat it again, no people, no citizens. Let it, then, look to the States for its wealth, its strength, its prosperity. They are the true and only source of them all. It is a mistake, to suppose that the wealth of a State consists in the richness, in the redundancy of its exchequer. It is rich only in proportion as the money of the country is in the pockets of its citizens. It is impoverished by every dollar unnecessarily taken from their pockets. Its true wealth consists in the wealth of its citizens—in their industry and enterprise. Its strength, in their freedom. No State can be strong, or even wealthy, whose citizens are not free. No State can be weak, or poor, whose citizens enjoy liberty. Take notice, Mr. President, that I am speaking of States, or nations, and their citizens. The Federal Government is neither a State, nor a nation; nor has it citizens. It is a Government, merely: rich, in the true political sense of that word, only in the wealth of the States; strong, only in their strength. It is to guard the General Government from enfeeblement, by encroachments upon the powers and rights of the States, that I made you the propositions, the first of which I am now, feebly, I fear, attempting to support.

There is no lodgment of power, in the making of which there has been so much difficulty experienced by the statesmen of all countries, as that of the Judiciary. There is none which has been exercised, by those who were invested with it, more oppressively to the people, and with more obliquity by the fiduciaries. The history of Rome and of England abound in instances of judicial malversation, bribery, and corruption.

At Rome, as we learn from the oration of Cicero against Verres, the bribery of the judges was matter of course; and that those who were wealthy enough to do it, spoke of it with the same indifference with which they spoke of the common and ordinary dispositions of their money. From the history of that country, we learn, that the moment a man became an informer, he was put under guard, lest he should bribe the judges or the witnesses.

In England, the reigns of Edward the 1st, Richard the 2d, Henry the 8th, James the 1st, Charles the 1st, and Charles the 2d, were marked by judicial tyranny, obliquity, and corruption. Sir Ralph de Hengham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Sir Thomas Wayland, Chief Justice of the Common Bench; and Sir Adam de Shallon, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, were convicted and punished, and that heavily too, for their corrupt exactions in the administration of justice. The Earl of Suffolk; M. D. la Pole, Lord Chancellor of the kingdom; the Duke of Ireland; and the Archbishop of York, were declared guilty of high treason; and a number of judges, who, in their judicial capacity, had acted as their instruments, were involved in their condemnation: among whom were Sir Robert Belknap and Sir Robert Treselean, the latter Chief Justice of King's Bench. The crime of those I have last named, consisted in their attempt to subvert the liberty of the people; some of them were hung, and the rest were banished. To these may be added the names of Sir Thomas Empson and Edmund Dudley, guilty of exactions; Lord Bacon, of corruption; nor ought the names of Chancellor Finch, Keeper of the Great Seal; Judges Davenport, Crowley, and Berkly, who were guilty of attempts upon the liberty of the people, to be pretermitted.

Sir William Scroggs, Lord Chief Justice of King's Bench; Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Common Bench; Sir Thomas Jones, one of the judges of King's Bench; and Sir Richard Weston, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, were all impeached by the Commons of England for partialities in the administration of justice. These instances show, that no influence nor dignity could secure the judges, either from corrupt practices, or from the vigilance of the representatives of the people of England. Other instances, Mr. President, might be adduced, from the English history, of judicial corruption; but these will suffice to prove, what, in fact, needs no proof, namely, that judges are but men; that the ermine furnishes no security against the force of temptation, or the frailties of human nature; that they are as liable to err, as any other description of public functionaries; and from some unhappy fatality, are, in the organization of almost every Government, made more irresponsible: while, from the comparative paucity of their numbers, and the nature of their powers and duties, they are greatly more exposed to temptation than their co-ordinate fiduciaries.

Happily, the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States—I mean the present incumbents—are men upon whose integrity suspicion has never scowled. They have suffered only—if they have suffered at all, in the discussion of this bill—from a profusion of injudicious eulogy in the House of Representatives. The ermine should never be tarnished with the spatterings of fulsome adulation. There is a sanctity about the judicial, like that about the matron character, which ought not to be profaned, even by well-meant declamatory praise. The matron should be content with the affectionate confidence of her husband, the judges with the approving confidence of the people. Oclamorous praise is injurious to the character of either: neither, if they do their duty, need it; and, with the intelligent, it is apt to be suspected to be but a fig-leaf expedient, kindly got up to conceal violated duty. The absence of murmurs and discontent is the most substantial commendation of both.

I feel emboldened, Mr. President, by the unsuspected integrity of the judges, to speak the more freely of their encroachments upon the rights and powers of the States, by decisions merely erroneous. For, if irreparable injury may be done to the liberty of the people by mere error of judicial opinion, what may not be apprehended from judicial corruption? And, what right, Mr. President, have the people of these States to hope for a greater exemption from judicial obliquity and corruption, than the people of Rome or of England? The present incumbents are not immortal; they cannot remain upon the bench forever. I have shown you, by reference to the history of England, that judges in that country, loaded with wealth, encumbered with honors, and distinguished for their intellectual attainments, were convicted, some of them for corruption in office, and others for what was worse, if possible—combining with the ambitious and unprincipled to destroy the liberty of the people. I urge, Mr. President, not that our judges are bad men, (for I believe them to be good men,) but that we may have bad judges; but whether we shall or not, that it is wise to guard against those errors and indiscretions to which, as men, they must be subject. What has been, may be again. There not only have been bad judges, but the world has been infested with them. The country whose history I have just quoted, was harassed by them for centuries, and would have continued to be so, had she not learned wisdom from experience, and converted her punitive into cautionary vigilance; and, instead of hanging and banishing her judges, placed them in a posture of dependence upon, and responsibility to, the will of the people. This was done by an act of parliament, in the thirteenth year of William 8d, which fixed the salaries of the judges, and provided that the king should remove them, upon the request of a bare majority of that body. By this act, the judges were brought within the reach of the representative principle, and thereby made accountable to the people, and dependent upon their will. Since that time, the judges of England have been pure, upright, and independent. Since that period, the people of that country have enjoyed, so far as related to their judges, what no other people ever enjoyed for the same length of time, namely, that tranquillity, peace of mind, and security of person and property, which constitutes the essence of human comfort, and which alone can be enjoyed under a just and impartial administration of the laws. Since that period, the judges, instead of lending themselves to the king, as the avenues and instruments whereby to oppress the people, have become, by being made dependent upon their will, and independent of the crown, the impregnable bulwark of the liberty of that country.

The English are the only people in the Old World who have found out the great secret wherein judicial independence consists. It was a precious discovery. They knew its worth, and availed themselves of it, by the provisions of the act to which I have just alluded. Before that time, the king appointed and paid the judges. They were his judges—so called. The king's judges—of course his creatures. By that act they became the People's judges; dependent upon the will of the people for their salaries, and the tenure of their offices. Before that time, they were dependent upon the will of the king for both; they were commissioned by him during his pleasure. By that act, it was provided that they should be commissioned during good behavior; that is, during the pleasure of the people, instead of the pleasure of the king. Before that time, the nation was repeatedly agitated, and sometimes almost convulsed, by the efforts of the people to get rid of corrupt, oppressive, and tyrannical judges. They had no mode of doing it, but by banishment and hanging.

There the judges had the protection of the king, whose pliant instruments they frequently were. Since they have been made dependent upon the people, and responsible to them, there has been no attempt to remove any of them; no agitations; no convulsions. And why, Mr. President? Because, knowing that they could be deprived of their salaries and offices by the people, whenever they should please to exercise that power, they have administered impartial and even-handed justice; and the people are not so capricious as the advocates for judicial infallibility are in the habit of representing them to be. For a people who govern themselves, to require their judges to be independent of their will, or even to permit it, is to surrender their liberty.

The judges of the United States, then, Mr. President, are, unhappily for the States, more independent of the people than were even the judges of England, while they belonged to the king. There the punitory power of the people, when they were agonized by judicial iniquities, and only then, could reach the judges. Here they cannot be reached effectually by either the punitory or restraining power of the people. There is, Mr. President, a peculiarity in the Government of the United States; it has all the energy, and aims at all the grandeur and magnificence of a National Government, without being really so. It is a great corporation, removed from the people by the intervention of other corporate structures. The State Governments are between it and the people. The judicial functionaries of the General Government, removed, as they are, from the people, by the intervention of the machinery and functionaries of the State Governments, and created, as they are, without any immediate agency, on the part of the people, cannot be expected to regard the people of the States with any very peculiar sensibility, or to be regarded by them with the vigilance necessary to the preservation of their rights. The attention of the people must be engaged in superintending the agency, and in restraining the official vagrancy, of their own immediate State functionaries. And when was it, that any people were known to be able to preserve their liberties from the encroachment of those to whom they had confided the administration of their Government? The powers delegated by the people to their official agents, for the purposes of one Government, have always been perverted to the destruction of their liberty, in despite of all the vigilance they could use. How then can it be expected, that they can guard their liberties against the encroachments of two sets of functionaries; between one of which, and themselves, there is no intimacy of relation; indeed, no relation, but that which consists in the exercise of power, on the one side, and submission on the other; power on the side of the judges, and submission on the side of the people.

The judges of the General Government are subject to no legal responsibility; and they cannot be under the influence of moral responsibility. They are the judges of a Government that has no people, no citizens. There is, between them and the people, the State Governments, and the State functionaries. They are not on the level of human agency, and human sympathy. They visit that level clad in the panoply of power. Their contact with the people is marked by authority; is marked only by the display of power on the one side, and submission on the other. For, although the General Government and its functionaries are the property of the people of the States, yet, emboldened by their irresponsibility; secure in their salaries, and their offices; conscious that neither can be affected by the people, or Governments of the States, they treat both as their property; they can, therefore, be under no moral responsibility—there is no medium through which it can act upon them. They occupy an exalted corporate theatre; they are seated upon an eminence of power, which, though erected by the people of the States, cannot be affected by them. To talk of the moral responsibility of judges placed by their installation beyond the reach of the will of the people, is to betray a want of knowledge of human nature; the manners, the customs, habits, and moral sentiments, of the people, cannot be expected to control those judges, who are not only not controlled by, but have the absolute control of, the people.

Mr. President: The present incumbents are above all suspicion; obliquity of motive has never been ascribed to any of them; their successors may not possess, or deserve, public confidence to the same extent. But, let it be remembered, that the judges against whom injurious imputations were not made, even when the fervor of party politics was at its highest, sustained and enforced the alien and sedition laws. American citizens were fined heavily, and imprisoned too, under the sedition law: such was the *prone*ness of those judges to swell the power of the Government whose functionaries they were. Although the liberty of speech, and of the press, were guaranteed by the constitution to all the citizens of the States; yet they fined and imprisoned several of our citizens for exercising that liberty. That law, which struck at the very root of liberty, was gravely decided to be constitutional by the judges of the Federal Government, while laws, enacted by the States, in relation to the soil within their limits; laws, enacted to give repose to occupancy, by limiting the period within which suits should be brought for the protection of the honest occupants, have as gravely been decided by them to be unconstitutional and void. But what power is it, which any of the States has exercised, which tended at all to assert its sovereignty, and vindicate the rights, real or personal, of its citizens, which those judges have not either disparaged or vacated by their decisions?

And, Mr. President, what law of Congress has been enacted which tended to trench upon the rights of the States, or of the citizens of the States, which that court has not affirmed to be constitutional and valid? The Congress, in an evil hour, enacted a law, creating a Bank, with a capital of $35,000,000, with power to plant offices of discount or deposit in any, and all, of the States, without their consent. The power to enact this law was not given to Congress in the constitution—I have, I trust, shown, that the powers of the General Government exist in grant; that they are, and must necessarily be, express, and cannot be implied; that the people of a State, or nation, may, through the agency of their functionaries, create a corporation; but that the corporation, when created, must be content with the powers granted; that its powers, necessarily, consist in grant, and that it cannot create another corporation—and that too, with powers not conceded to itself.

There is, Mr. President, in this matter, something which has hitherto escaped scrutiny; and escaped, because of the sanctity of the region in which it lies concealed. It seems never to have occurred to anybody, that the judges might as readily be supposed to enlarge the Constitution of the United States by construction, as the States to violate it by legislation. There has been, and is at this moment, in this country, a judicial idolatry—a judicial superstition—which encircles the judges with infallibility. To have them independent, public sentiment has, as I have before stated, accorded to them absolute power. That concession implies infallibility. Upon the supposition that they cannot err, their imputations upon the States have passed for oracular. The States have been disparaged; and the legislation of the States, the living fountain of the liberty of the people, has been degraded. Mr. President, if the object had been to destroy the liberty of the people of the States, and human ingenuity had been tortured to devise a plan, more effectual for that purpose, than any other, the one which is now, and for some time past has been, in operation, is the one which, in my opinion, would have been adopted as the most effectual. What is it? To disparage, by every possible means, the State powers, and especially the legislation of the States: disgust the people with the only organ by which they can express their will—with the legislative department of the States. And by what means? None more effectual than for the judges of the Federal Government to vacate the State laws by solemn decisions; with apparent reluctance, but with great gravity, impute perjury by implication to the one hundred and fifty select and selected men who enacted them—perjury, not by design, but by negligence, or ignorance; not by saying that they were either knaves or fools, but by leaving it to be inferred that they were either the one or the other. Nobody will have the hardihood to believe that the imputation of either, could attach to the ermine. What next? Why, impress the public mind with the belief that, however fit the States may be for the regulation and decision of little matters of meum and tuum, between their own citizens, they are utterly incompetent to decide upon any matter, in which so important a personage as the Bank of the United States is concerned; that the dignity of the origin of that institution, the weight of its character, and the extent and nature of its resources, entitle all its concerns to a place on the federal docket. Let the judges rivet this impression upon the public mind, by a solemn decision that the bank has the privilege to sue, and be sued, in the Federal Courts alone: in addition to this, let the presses, which are under the control of the General Government, and of its bank, vilify the States, as petty, partial, and turbulent corporations; and portray, in glowing colors, the excellence and grandeur of the General Government; let them linger, at the close, with fond delight, upon the independence and intellectual pre-eminence of its judicial functionaries: again—let the President recommend it to Congress to cut the States up into roads and canals; and let the Congress take the hint, and commence operations: does any thing remain, Mr. President, to complete the prostration of the States, and with them the liberty of the people? Nothing, but what the bank can very easily effect; and that is, to constrain its debtors, immediate, proximate, and remote, who form a majority of the people of the States, to give to all these operations the unction of popularity. The bank, it is known, has able counsel retained in each of the States. Their efforts and influence must not be wanting to propagate the sentiments which, whatever they may be, are best calculated to swell the tide of its influence; the bank is their client; it is in the way of their vocation. Add to all these the usurers, brokers, stock-jobbers, merchants, and manufacturers, and who can doubt the result? I am one of those, Mr. President, who do not believe that the States are incompetent to the management of their own affairs; that they are, in their legislation, regardless of the Constitution of the United States; that they are petty, partial, turbulent corporations. On the contrary, I believe that their rights, and their constitution, and that of the United States, have been grossly and repeatedly violated by the Congress and Judiciary of the United States. I believe that the tendency of the General Government towards the absorption of the States, is visible, rapid, and, I fear, resistless. Yet, I would make the experiment to resist it. But, any experiment which purports to impose any restraint upon judicial discretion, is assailed by all our prejudices in favor of the sanctity of the ermine. The exclamation is, Do what you please with the States, but do not meddle with the Judiciary; you may tax and tariff the people, to swell the influence of the bank, by chaining to its car the manufacturers, whom you privilege by that process; you may make roads and cut canals, in any of the States, because you are thereby promoting the general welfare; and, because, then, you are only interfering with the constitutional rights of the States; in that, you are acting upon the people, and they, in all time, have been lawful game. But, touch not the judges; they are the great umpire between contending sovereigns; between the General Government and the States. The happiness of the people is in their holy keeping. The Judges of the Supreme Court the umpire! They looked up to by the States as umpire between the General Government and the people! They the most efficient organs of that Government which wants but people to have vassals—the just and impartial umpire between States contending to maintain the power of the people, and the mere Government, contending for the power of controlling the people; between the people of the States contending for the right of governing themselves, and the General Government, to govern them!

Strange infatuation! to suppose that self-interest is the just basis of impartial and disinterested umpirage. Let us, Mr. President, disenchant ourselves from our fatal delusions, in relation to this Judiciary. Let us invoke our reason to disenchant our feelings, and relieve us from this blind devotion to the judges, this self-destroying idolatry. Let us not forget that they are men—and suppose it possible for them to err. I ascribe to the present incumbents nothing worse than the faculty of erring; and, if they may err—if their successors may, possibly, do worse than err—is it not wise to guard, as far as practicable, against that occurrence? Is not prevention more wise than remedy? But why speak of remedy? Their errors are irremediable; and, therefore, there is the strongest reason for every practicable prevention.

Mr. President, when the Senators sit in their judicial capacity, to try a judge of that court, the concurrence of two-thirds of that body is necessary to the conviction of a single judge; why should it require two-thirds of the Senators, in their judicial capacity, to convict one of those judges of a misdemeanor, while a minority of the very same judges may convict a State of having violated the constitution? There are now seven judges; four of whom constitute a quorum; three of the four, a minority of the whole, may, and in some instances have, pronounced State laws, of the most interesting character, void. Thus you see, Mr. President, three of the seven judges can vacate the laws of the twenty-four States successively; can disrobe them of their sovereign legislative power; while it takes the concurrence of sixteen States, or thirty-two Senators, sitting as judges, upon a single one of those judges, to convict him of unconstitutionality, or in any way to affect his judicial faculty. Is this reasonable? is it prudent? is it politic? Can the States hope to retain their sovereignty; can the people of the States hope to retain their liberty, under circumstances like these? But is it not a perversion of terms to call that liberty, which depends upon the will of another? Are the States free, when their sovereign will may be controlled, and its efficacy denied, by the minority of a court, over which it has not any, even the slightest, control? Over whose decisions all the States can, in no possible way, either through Congress, or otherwise, exert any control? But, sir, not only can three judges, as things now stand, paralyze the sovereign power of the States, but even one can do it. Yes, sir, a single judge can deprive a State of its sovereign power. As thus: suppose there are five judges upon the bench, the constitutionality of a State law is drawn in question; three of the five think the law unconstitutional; the other two are of a different opinion: how stands the matter, in relation to opinion? Why, the opinion of two on the one side neutralizes the opinion of the two on the other side; and were there but four on the bench, the law would remain valid and effective. But the opinion of the fifth judge, and his opinion alone, is against the law; and his opinion declares the law to be unconstitutional and void. And, Mr. President, under the bill on the table, if it shall pass into a law, without my amendment, the same thing may happen. Suppose there are seven judges on the bench, and six of them shall be divided, three against three, the seventh alone, makes the decision. If there are nine on the bench, and eight of them are divided, four against four, the ninth judge alone gives the opinion. For when the courts are divided into two against two, three against three, or four against four, the odd judge alone in each case pronounces the opinion; until he speaks, the law remains valid. The opposing opinions, possessing equal force, result in inefficacy; and when the odd judge declares the law to be unconstitutional, the judgment of the court, to that effect, is as exclusively his sole opinion, as if he alone constituted the court, and as effective, as if all the judges had concurred. Could a despot, Mr. President, do more than control the legislation of the States by his fiat? He could not do it with less than a hundred thousand bayonets. He could not do it with even that force. The people of the States would be prodigal of their blood, in vindication of their rights. And yet, strange to tell, these very people tamely, patiently, and even cheerfully, submit to lose those very rights, by the fiat of a judicial despot, which they would die to maintain against a despot, armed with whatever force—as if it could make any odds to them, after they had lost their liberty, whether it was taken from them by a judicial despot, armed with the moral force of their own fatal credulity, or by an ambitious aspirant, at the head of an armed force. Sir, a single judge may, in the same way, vacate a law of Congress. The two Houses of Congress may pass a law by a majority of two-thirds of each House, against the veto of the President. A single judge may, as in the instances I have mentioned, in relation to State laws, take side with the President, and overrule, by his single opinion, the two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. I mention this, Mr. President, to show that even the legislative power of the General Government may be controlled by that court—by even a single judge of that court. Not that I apprehend that the power of that court will be exerted in vacating the laws of Congress; I have really no such apprehension. They are the judges of the General Government, and will always have the wisdom to prefer foreign conquests to domestic broils. My great object is to save the States from being degraded, to save the liberty of the States from being frittered away, by the judicial oligarchy of the United States. For, I insist upon it, Mr. President, that the Supreme Court of the United States, if it shall be indulged in the exercise of the powers which it has assumed, by inference and construction, in addition to those with which it is legitimately invested by the Constitution of the United States, is the most stupendous aristocracy which was ever tolerated in any country in which the sound of liberty was uttered, and its import understood.

But I will leave this section to the reflection of the Senate; my deficient manner of discussing it, will be supplied by their good sense. I must, however, beg their indulgence for a few minutes, while I offer to them the reasons which influenced me to propose the remaining amendatory section.

The execution laws, Mr. President, of any people, who assert their right to self-government, should, in a more emphatic sense than any other of their laws, be suited to their condition. Their other laws are, comparatively, theoretic and abstract. They exist in the statute book, for contemplation, as rules of conduct and of property; while unobstructed in the acquisition of property, and uninterrupted in its enjoyment, the people, unfortunately for the durability of their rights, pay but too little attention to the complexion of their code. Busied with the avocations of life, vexed with its cross purposes, and thwarted by its vicissitudes, they have but little leisure, and less inclination, for abstraction of any kind. But execution laws, Mr. President, address themselves to the senses of the people; an execution law, is law, in its practical, noun-substantive, matter-of-fact shape. The other laws constitute the rules by which each man regulates his own conduct and disposes of his own property. The execution law constitutes the rule, and creates the authority, by which one man takes and disposes of the property of others, by which he even deprives others of their personal liberty. I repeat, then, that the execution system of any State should be enacted with a wise regard to the condition of its people. It is a despotic feature, which cannot be discussed from the countenance of the Republic; it should, therefore, be softened as much as possible. The laws of right were enacted by the Legislator of the Universe, and written legibly and irreversibly in the volume of nature; the social compact recognizes that code, and legitimates it: its fitness and its force is, instinctively, recognized, felt, and acknowledged by the people. But, Mr. President, the laws of remedy are created by the State; they are the rules by which civil society exerts its remedial and protecting force, in favor of one or more of its citizens, against the delinquency of others. They are the avenues through which that force finds its way to the delinquent citizens, and it should find its way in the gentlest of all the conceivable efficient modes. This is required by the peace, tranquillity, and harmony, of society. When the marshal seizes, and bears away with him, the property of an individual; if you abstract the authority under which he acts, his conduct amounts to robbery. The authority, therefore, under which he acts, should not only be visible, in his acts, but it should be obtrusively so; it should be a domestic, and not an alien authority; the individual who is the subject of it should perceive its justice from his consciousness that it was according to the will of the people of which he was himself a part, and in which he had confidence, because he had consented to it. He should, in fact, recognize his own power, as the agent, in producing his own privation.

Hence I insist, Mr. President, that it is the right of every State to enact the execution laws by which the judgment and decrees of the Federal Court, in that State, shall be carried into effect.

Mr. President, we are taught that the liberty and property of the citizens are regulated, guarded, protected, and guaranteed by the States. But how can they guarantee the liberty, or protect the property, of their citizens, if they permit their persons to be imprisoned, and their property to be taken from them, at the will of another Government, or at the instance of its functionaries? The citizens and their property must be regulated by the State; that is, by the people in their corporate capacity; or the State is not sovereign, and they are not free. The proprietary right of the States over the people, and their property, is, or is not, sovereign. If sovereign, it implies not only the right to regulate both according to their will, but competent wisdom for this purpose. If the power of the State is not sovereign, why are they mocked with it? If the General Government is the proprietor of the people, and their property; that is, if the citizens, and their property, are to be regulated by the Federal Government, why is not that power asserted by that Government? But I have, I trust, been successful in showing that the Constitution of the United States did not, and could not, confer this power; that it is inherent in the States, and that the States would be faithless to themselves, if they were to surrender it, or permit it to be usurped, or filched from them. It is not, it cannot be pretended, that the Congress could pass laws regulating conveyances, descents, and distributions, or last wills and testaments—laws regulating the purchase and transfer of property. But an execution law is, in fact, a law of this character; it involves, in its operation, the sale, purchase, and transfer, of property. And in States where land is, and shall continue to be, subject to sale under execution, that must, at no very distant day, (such is the vicissitude of human affairs,) become, in such States, the most prevailing title to lands. And, although Congress ought not, and, as I believe, cannot, legitimately, pass execution laws, except such as relate to its revenue; yet the Judges of the Supreme Court have construed themselves into the power of enacting laws of this character, under the denomination of rules of court. And some of, even the district judges, made haste, after this learned opinion was made out, by the Supreme Court, to exert their legislative power upon the States. In the State which I have, in part, the honor to represent, the legislative faculty of the district judge was very promptly and energetically exerted, in furnishing a system of execution laws for the people, or rather against the people; for it was, in all its outlines, and essential provisions, in utter contempt of their known and declared will. By the law of the State, imprisonment for debt had been abolished; by the law, alias rule, of the court, the ca. ea. was revived, and the citizens subjected to imprisonment for debt. By the law of the State, land could not be sold under execution, for less than three-fourths of its valuation; by the rule of the court it was enacted, that land should be sold, without valuation, for whatever it would bring, at a credit of three months; and, by several rules of the court, it was enacted that the marshal should convey the lands, sold by him under execution, to the purchaser. The rules, moreover, kindly prescribe the ceremonies necessary to be observed by the marshal, in making the conveyance, in order to give it validity.

The Judicial System.

Mr. President: it is time that it should be distinctly ascertained, whether execution laws should be enacted by the States, by the Congress, or by the courts. The object of the section which I am now attempting to discuss, is to silence all doubt on that subject, by rescuing that power from judicial usurpation, and leaving it with the States—its only appropriate source. And why should it not be exercised by the States? It originated with them. They have not conceded it to the General Government; they could not, consistently with the power they retained over the persons and property of their citizens, concede it to the General Government. The concession of it would have been an implied concession, to the General Government, of the power to regulate the conduct and the property of its citizens. It would, in fact, have been a virtual surrender, by the States, of all their sovereign power.

Mr. President, civil society is a unit; a moral agent; a sovereign, which prescribes by its will, and enforces the observance of its prescriptions by the power of its will. An execution law is but a display of the remedial energies of this will. This will is a stream that never ceases to flow, nor intermits its current; its current is, to be sure, sometimes more rapid than at others. In times of adversity it lingers, as it flows in a circuitous direction; in times of prosperity, it rushes forward in a right line, but is always the same; always, and necessarily, from the nature of sovereign power, a unit. It is therefore, I ventured, with great deference, to differ from their honors in the construction of the process act of 1789. That act declared, in substance, that "executions should be levied and carried into effect according to the execution laws now in force in the several States." They interpreted the word "now" to mean the very point of time at which that act went into effect, and confined its effects to the modification of the execution law of each State, at that point of time; and made that interpretation the basis of the necessity which impelled them to enact the rules of court which I have mentioned. The word now, in that act, was, in my humble opinion, susceptible of a much broader import than they gave to it; the nature of the subject required that a broader import should be given to it; and words should always be construed in reference to the subject-matter to which they relate. "Now is the time, now is the day of salvation," is a text containing a repetition of that adverb of time; and who would construe those words to refer to the very point of time at which they were uttered? Who could restrict their import to a shorter period than the lifetime of those to whom they are addressed? To the lifetime of this world—the subject to which they relate?

Mr. President: By the Constitution of the United States, it is declared, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Pursuant to the direction of this clause, the Congress created, by the Judiciary act in 1789, the Supreme Court of the United States, by the creation of Circuit Courts—with the direction, that the judges of those courts should constitute the Supreme Court. By the bill on the table, six additional Circuit Courts, and three additional judges are about to be created. This bill should be enacted with great caution: for the bill, if it shall pass, will scarcely have gone through the forms necessary to give it the validity of an act, before it will be asserted that the very courts and judges which it creates, were created by the constitution. The constitution now exists; the six courts and three judges, intended to be created by that bill, do not now exist. They will have been created by this bill, and will exist, if it shall pass. And yet, it will no sooner have passed into a law, than it will be asserted that these six courts and three judges, which will have been created by the act, were created by the constitution. The whole corps will assert it. The Bank of the United States will back the assertion with all its influence—with its convincing metallic intelligence—and it will be in vain to urge that the power of Congress to create and destroy this court, was settled, by the deliberate sentiment of the people, in 1801; practically settled in the repeal of the midnight Judiciary, of memorable memory. It will still be asserted, and re-asserted, that this court was created by the constitution; and, therefore, the necessity of exercising caution in its creation. Power delegated is never returned; and it is extremely difficult to reclaim it.

Mr. President: I am one of those who believe that the people do not belong to the judges; that the office of judge is created, by the people, for their convenience, and may be vacated by the same power that created it, when the public interest, or convenience, shall require it. The commission of the judge is but his letter of attorney, but the evidence of his authority to act as the agent of the people; which may be revoked, like all other power, at the pleasure of the principal. When you take the judge from the office, you must proceed by impeachment, and act by the constitutional majority upon him, upon the man. When you wish to take the office from the judge, you do it by the same process that you created it; you create the office, and confer the jurisdiction by law, and by law you can repeal them. This modern doctrine, that the tenure of his office by the judge, would be too precarious, if it depended upon the will of the people, strikes at the root of free government. You can have nothing in free government, more stable than the will of the people.

It is absurd to look to the will of the judge for stability in government. He is a tyrant, when he substitutes his own will for that of the people. It is in their will, and not in his, that the force of his judgments and decrees is to be found.

Away then, Mr. President, with all this delusive jargon, about the stability of the Judiciary, and the tumultuary and restless impatience of the people. The people are never impatient, but under unjust privation; it has been the misfortune of the world, that the people have always been too forbearing and patient. They never act, until oppression becomes intolerable, and then it is unhappily too late. They awake only to their wrongs, when their liberty is gone, and with it, the power of redressing their wrongs. They make an unavailing effort, perhaps a succession of efforts, to vindicate their rights; and the usurpers impudently impute to the struggles made to save their liberty, a restlessness of spirit, in the people, incompatible with its enjoyment. Sir, all experience proves the truth of what I say. Sir, why should the people surrender their freedom? Why should they surrender self-government? Nature made them free, gave them an organic fitness for its enjoyment, and in the power of will, the means of maintaining it. Freedom is the natural state of man—slavery is a forced state; the activity of freedom is charged upon the people, as the spirit of restlessness, of insubordination, and disorder. Sir, this is the cant of power, the lullaby by which liberty has been charmed into repose, and shorn of her strength while she slept. Are not the air we breathe, and the ocean which we navigate, subject to agitations? and are not those agitations necessary to their purity and salubrity?

Repose may be found in a despotism or a dungeon, but never where freedom prevails. The atmosphere of freedom is like the natural atmosphere, tempestuous—it must be so to be healthy.

Mr. President: Believing, as I do, that the liberty of the people depends, essentially, upon the maintenance of the rights of the States, I have always regretted that the wise men who framed the Constitution of the United States authorized the Congress to invest the Federal Judiciary with the jurisdiction of cases between citizens of different States; between aliens and citizens; and between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under patents derived from different States. This provision imports an imputation against the States, of either imbecility, or partiality, which cannot be made against sovereign States: for neither weakness, wickedness, nor incompetency of any kind, can be predicated of a sovereign State.

This provision, therefore, impressed the stamp of degradation upon the States, at the very origin of the General Government, which the judges, by their repeated decisions vacating State laws, have heightened, and almost riveted, and yet the provision does not apply its imputation to the legislative department of the State Governments; the imputation applies exclusively to the judicial department. It was not, at the time that instrument was formed, so fashionable as it has since become, to vilify and disparage the legislation of the States.

The Judiciary, and not the Legislature, of the States, was then distrusted; now it is the Legislature, and not the Judiciary—neither ought, either then or now, to be distrusted by any, but the people of the States respectively. The supplement to the constitution, which created the Bank of the United States, and conferred upon it the right to sue and be sued, in the Federal courts, has (backed by the influence of that institution) had a most disparaging effect upon the States. They must be redeemed from this bad influence, if we are destined to prosper; the States must be left to manage their own affairs; they must be believed to be competent to that task—I say believed: for public opinion is the saving or destroying force of every people. But I have been tedious; I plead the importance of the subject as an apology.

Mr. HOLMES said he had been much edified by the able remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky; he agreed with him in his positions, he admitted the correctness of his conclusions, and yet he was obliged to vote against the amendment. It would be necessary in a few words to explain this seeming paradox. He should not attempt to follow the gentleman in his general remarks in regard to the origin of Government, inasmuch as he deemed them in some measure unnecessary. It was unprofitable for us to go back to inquire into the origin of our respective Governments. In tracing the pedigree of a family, Mr. H. said, it would sometimes happen that we come to some illegitimate; so it was in regard to Government. No Government in the world that ever has existed, or that does now exist, but had its existence by usurpation. That is, there is no Government in the world, and there never has been any, where the whole will of the people was brought to bear in the creation of that Government; and when that is the case, the rights of some are usurped. Our own Government, Mr. H. said, was emphatically a usurpation. The very constitution under which they were now acting, was in direct violation of a pre-existing Government, or compact. The Confederacy provided there should be no alteration in that system, without the consent of every State in the Union; and the Constitution of the United States provided, that when nine States out of the thirteen should agree to it, it should be a Constitutional Government; thereby excluding four out of thirteen, taking away their confederation, and instituting a new Government, without their consent, when there was an express provision in the Confederation that these articles should not be altered, unless every State consented.

The Judicial System.

With regard to the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. H. thought the doctrines it embraced were generally unquestionably correct. The gentleman had made some remarks on implied power. Power, Mr. H. said, was always progressive; it never retrograded. It always had been proceeding on, and always would be so, under every attempt to restrain it. This would be the case in every Government, and in none more than ours; nor did he believe, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the Judiciary power was the only one that was progressive. By our legislation, Mr. H. said, we threw too much into the hands of the Judiciary; and if they passed the Bankrupt Bill which had been reported to the Senate, they would give the Judiciary more additional power than any act which had passed Congress since the time of the adoption of the constitution. Mr. H. said he would go further than the gentleman from Kentucky did. That gentleman considered the judicial power as a monarchy; Mr. H. said he considered it as something more: a monarchy was generally limited by the legislative power; there are few monarchies that are above it; but how is it with the Judiciary? Our Congress of the United States is one limited in their legislation by the constitution. It is not its expounder; it is not an efficient expounder, because, though we may explain the constitution, and pass a law on our own exposition, yet that law is to be expounded by the judges. But they can expound our constitution, and have efficient power to carry their decree into effect. You have none. They have done it: they issued their mandamus to Virginia, and she not obeying, they issued a decree, and executed it by the hand of their own marshal. The constitution is above Congress, but the judicial power is thus above the constitution: because they having the right to expound that constitution their own way, you have no control over them, and they make of that constitution what their exposition shall please. I would go very far to restrain this judicial power: I would require unanimity in the judges in all constitutional questions; at least more than a majority; still I would not encumber this bill. The want of this bill is a subject of universal complaint in the Western country. We have been trying to get something to satisfy them for several sessions past, and we have hit on this as the least objectionable; and, sir, if we pass this bill with those amendments, which will be debated in this and the other House, it will be hanging a millstone about the neck of the bill, which will sink it. If the gentleman will bring forward a bill embracing this principle, I will go with him, and discuss it. I am inclined to believe I should vote for the principle, and even go farther. The gentleman will recollect that one of his objects is perhaps attained. Of what does he complain? Of danger to the State Governments? Why was this Senate constituted the guardian of State Governments? Was it to guard the large States against the small? No, sir, the reverse. It was to guard the small States against the large, to prevent them being swallowed up by the large ones. By increasing the number of judges, what is the result? It would be difficult to take all these judges from the large States; if they are limited to five or to seven, as at present, it would seem necessarily to result, that these large States having so much more to give, the judges would be selected from them. They coming from a large State, would entertain the same feelings of the State they came from; and they would have a national in opposition to State feeling. If the number is increased to ten, a portion of them must be taken from the small States. The rights of the small States are to be guarded; and that is the reason we hear of an equal representation. Instead, therefore, of increasing the danger by increasing the number, you diminish it. This is one of the reasons why I was in favor of the amendment proposed the other day. I was in favor of throwing the district of small States together, that they might have an opportunity of having a judge who would have some feeling in favor of the rights of the States against the national right. One part of the object wished for by the gentleman from Kentucky, is already obtained in this bill. The object is to require a greater unanimity of the judges in deciding certain constitutional questions. There is greater unanimity required by the judges by this bill in deciding all questions. Does the Senate understand me? At the present number, seven, one-seventh may create a majority. By the bill before you, (increasing the number to ten,) one-fifth would be necessary to create a majority. One-fifth is more than one-seventh. You require six out of ten, that is, one in five; you require now only one in seven; the majority, therefore, by this bill, will be greater.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, said he should not discuss the general principles of the bill, or the amendments of the gentleman from Kentucky. For himself, whatever opinion he entertained of the principles involved in these amendments, he should be constrained at present to vote against them. The object of the first amendment was to modify one of the sections of the original bill passed by the House of Representatives. According to that, said Mr. W., the Supreme Court is to consist of ten judges, and six of these are to form a quorum for doing business. The first part of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, is to require the concurrence of the opinions of seven of these judges, in a certain class of causes that may be brought before them. The second part of the amendment embraces a new principle; it is a new subject, not touched upon in the original bill in any of the sections. For myself, were I ever so well satisfied that both the principles embraced in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, ought to be adopted, I should be decidedly of opinion that neither of them ought to be incorporated with the present bill. I believe it is a matter of great importance, that this bill should pass—firmly believing, as I do, that a large portion of the United States will be benefited by having, effectually, the operation of the Circuit Courts of the United States. I should not feel justified in adopting any amendment whatever, which would endanger the passage of the original bill. What will be the effect of introducing the proposed amendments? The probability is, that they will defeat all the benefits that are expected to be derived from an extension of the circuit courts to nine of the States of this Union. It will defeat all the benefits which that portion of the United States expected to derive from an improvement in the Judiciary of the United States. We are now acting on a bill which has passed all the forms of legislation in the other House: and if we adopt this amendment, what is the consequence? The bill must be returned to the other branch of the Legislature for their concurrence; and it is not probable that they will take them up to give them that deliberate examination which will be necessary, to gain them the sanction of a majority of that House. If they are introduced here or there, in the form of a distinct bill, it will have three readings, and there will be ample opportunity for the discussion of the principles on which each branch of the amendment rests; and after undergoing a fair and thorough consideration, it will be adopted or rejected. I am unwilling to jeopardize the benefits which will result from the original bill, by introducing these amendments, or any other, that embrace any principle of a general nature, that will require much consideration before a majority of that House will yield its consent.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he had listened with great attention and profit to the gentleman from Kentucky, on the subject of his proposed amendment; but he could not vote for it in the form in which it now stood. Not that he was opposed to the principle, but he did not think they were properly connected with the bill now under consideration. The general rule, Mr. V. B. said, which would influence his mind on this subject, had already been stated by the gentlemen from Maine and Tennessee; his object in rising was to state one or two facts. With respect to the first branch of the amendment, which required a certain number of judges to unite in the decision in certain cases, that subject was proposed when this bill was under consideration in the other House; it was discussed at large, and was resisted there on the same ground on which it is resisted here, and was finally rejected. It was in order, and proper, Mr. V. B. said, to advert to it. They knew, in all probability, that the adoption of it here, would serve no other purpose than to retard the passage of the bill, which he believed was necessary should soon be passed, that the advantages expected to be derived from it might soon be realized.

With respect to the second branch of the amendment, that subject also had been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and had received a good deal of their time and attention; and for himself, Mr. V. B. said, he thought the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, with some modification, would remedy the existing evil. The proposition was in itself proper and right; and he should be willing to unite in a report of the Judiciary Committee, recommending its adoption, with some alteration of the details. There is a bill now pending in the other House, containing the same provisions, as far as the United States are concerned. When that bill came here, Mr. V. B. said, or when the Judiciary Committee were referred to on the subject, he would lend his aid to carry into effect the views of the gentleman from Kentucky on these two objects. He was certain that some modification would be necessary; it was an object that had but recently been brought before them, and, connected with this bill, he was opposed to it, for the reasons he had stated.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and lost.

TUESDAY, April 11.

Judicial System.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Rhode Island, addressed the Senate, as follows:

The only effect of the proposed amendment, is to apply the present system to parts of the country to which it is not now applicable; so far it is a remedy, such as it is; so far it supplies

The Judicial System.

an existing defect; but the evil of the system itself, the intrinsic evil, and that is great, and one that calls loudly for redress, is left without any remedy at all; indeed, the proposed amendment tends rather to aggravate that evil. And what makes the proposed amendment the more aggravating is, that a remedy for this intrinsic evil would supply the defect to be supplied by the amendment, and supply it in a much better manner than will be done by the amendment: and further, that, by adopting the proposed amendment, we put the remedy of the intrinsic evil out of our power, now and hereafter, but with very great inconvenience and difficulty: indeed, if this amendment is adopted, for one, I shall despair of ever living to see that remedy applied.

The defect now proposed to be supplied, is a growing defect; the time is coming when this growing defect will call for another supply of judges; having begun with this plan, we must go on with it; and the Supreme Court will become so numerous that the sense of individual responsibility will be lost by being divided with the numbers that will compose it.

Numerus defendit: this ought never to be applicable to a judiciary body. It will in this way become applicable to the Supreme Court of the nation, and numbers will defend it; will shelter the individual from individual responsibility to public opinion; that best of all possible securities against his inattention, against his negligence. It is no answer to say you will have this security as to the judge on his circuit—that signifies nothing, if you are to lose it again on the Supreme bench.

It does tend to this—it will come to this in time: that this multitudinous Supreme Court will be little better than a mere registering court of the judgments and of the decrees of the inferior courts. This is the natural, the necessary tendency of the principle on which you are making this amendment; I see it plainly; it is too obvious not to be seen, I should think, by every one—it must, it will come to this result. For, when our present territories shall be States; when some of our present States shall become divided into other States, as they probably will be; when the whole valley of the Mississippi from the Alleghanies to the Rocky Mountains, from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, shall be full of people, full of business, full of wealth; (and time is rapidly rolling on this state of things,) will your four itinerant judges of the Supreme Court suffice for the courts of these boundless regions of country? for these countless multitudes of men, compared with which, any one kingdom of Europe would dwindle into insignificance? No, sir, not four, nor ten times four, would suffice. Yet this is the very state of things into which you are precipitating the country, by adopting this amendment; by riveting upon the country the necessity of going on with this miserable system of adding and adding and adding judges upon judges, and judges upon judges, to constitute your Supreme Court. Sir, it will not do—it is infatuation to think it will do. It is worse than tampering with a malady; it is applying a remedy that is in itself a disease, or the cause of disease, and much worse than the malady itself; a remedy as much worse as bad medicine, as poison is even worse than no remedy at all.

No man has said, no man will say, that this plan of a Judiciary will do for any length of time. All agree that it will not do; that sooner or later it must be abandoned, and a different plan adopted; one better adapted to the circumstances, and to the future progressive growth of the country. But the advocates of the plan content themselves with saying that it will do for the present, and for a while; perhaps for twenty years to come; and add, not very commendably, let those that come after us provide themselves a better. Is this the language proper for a grave and provident legislature, upon so grave a concern as a Judiciary for the country? Of all things, ought a reform of a Judiciary to be a temporary expedient?—knowing that it must be temporary, knowing that it must give place to a better, and knowing that it must operate as an impediment to a better. And will it be no impediment to those that come after us to have a host of supernumerary judges on hand, which your proposed plan will have entailed upon them? Will not that be an argument with them to go on as you will have begun? But you admit that they cannot go on; that they must, this difficulty notwithstanding, abandon your plan and adopt another. And why will they adopt another? Because, and only because, the reasons recommending it will make it a preferable plan: and pray, are not the same reasons as good for us as they will be for them? Surely they are: for the reasons must arise from the nature of the thing itself, which must be the same now as then; must arise from the superior intrinsic excellence of the system to be adopted, compared with the system in practice. We go on, then, if we proceed with the plan proposed, upon the presumption that those who come after us will be wiser men than we are; so much wiser, as to undo what we shall have done, and do for themselves what we ought to have done for ourselves and for them too. Why do we do any thing now? Because something must be done to appease the complaints of those parts of the country to which the present system does not extend itself—we extend the system to them to appease those complaints; and why do we not go further, and make the system what it ought to be, and what we admit it finally must be? Why, I ask again? Is it because some difficulties are to be overcome? Some divided opinions to be reconciled? Some prejudices of different kinds to be encountered? Is it then the part of statesmen, not to wrestle with difficulties, and overcome them, but to evade them by shifts and temporary expedients? It is the most short-sighted of all policy in all pursuits, whether by individuals or by the public. Difficulties evaded, but not overcome, are sure to return upon us again and again, till they either master us, or we master them. Surely then it is better for us to meet, and to overcome them, if possible, in the first encounter. I said that the intrinsic evil of the present system was great, and one that called loudly for redress. Now, what is that intrinsic evil? It is this: that the final justice of the country is so obstructed by delay, and encumbered with expense, that it is in effect denied to the great body of the citizens; an evil that is necessary and inherent in the system itself as at present organized; and is a growing evil.

As to the fact of delay, it is too notorious to require formal proof; if doubted by any one, that doubt will be removed by inspecting the docket of that court; the delay of trial by the course of the docket, and in that course is about three years. The delay is gaining ground from year to year, and it must keep gaining. At the late term, only thirty-six causes were disposed of in the regular course of the docket, and sixty-three new cases were entered; and of the entries in the vacation, we do not know how many there will be, but probably a considerable number. The docket now stands at about two hundred. And it is nothing but this very great delay, and the serious evils attending it, that prevents the entries from being much more numerous, even more than double what they now are. Nothing, in a word, prevents the delay from being at this moment altogether intolerable, but the difficulties interposed between the citizen and the final justice of the country.

It is proverbial that the delay of justice is injustice: it is true as most proverbial sayings are. It often happens that there is no difference between the denial of justice and its long delay; it comes too late when the unhappy suitor has become the victim of its delay; a too frequent result.

But the enormous expense and consequential losses caused by the delay, is a still greater evil; many a citizen is thereby shut out, and out off from all access to the final justice of his country. Men of moderate circumstances, and this is the condition of the great body of the citizens, cannot encounter these expenses and the other evils of this delay; they must compromise in preference, in the best manner they can; if they do not, they incur certain injury, they risk their probable ruin. And what a Judiciary is that, where only the rich can command its final justice, and where the middling classes must take of the rich only such justice as they may voluntarily accord them? I say, the wealthy litigant is enabled by this system to dictate his own terms of compromise to his antagonist who is not wealthy. He has done it, and may always do it.

Now, what is proposed as the remedy of this evil? proposed by this bill, I mean. It is the addition of about twenty days to the annual term of the Supreme Court. Can any one suppose that this can remove the evil? So far as it goes, it palliates the evil; but as a remedy it does not deserve the name. I do not think it will reduce the present delay at all; it may keep down the evil to what it now is, for a time; it may balance the gradual increase of the business of the court from the gradual increase of the business of the country; but more than this it cannot be expected to do; nor this for any great length of time; then it leaves it to become a growing evil, as it has been. It may enable the court to dispose of ten or fifteen cases more than they now can at the term. This will not exceed, probably will not equal, the annual increase of the annual docket.

Now, what is the remedy for this intrinsic evil of the system itself? It is this—to confine the Supreme Court to the duties of the Supreme Court. Then the business of every term will be done at every term; then the court might hold different terms, annually, at different places, and accommodate, thereby, every part of the Union. This would remove the evil of delay entirely—would reduce the costs of litigation within reasonable limits—would put the final justice of the country within the limits of the country—would remove complaint—would give satisfaction. No one can say that this plan is not for the interest of the private suitors; and why should not that interest be consulted, even especially consulted? The great mass of litigation is an individual concern. Why, then, the interest of the private suitors should not be consulted, and especially consulted, I cannot understand, but, for some reason, I do not know what, that interest is not regarded. If the Legislature, or any of its members, are jealous of the Judiciary—(I see no reason for any jealousy)—but, if they are jealous, is that a reason why the interest of the private suitors should not be consulted? The power of the Judiciary is what the constitution makes it, and must be, till the constitution is altered; and a modification of the system that would confine the Supreme Court to the duties of the Supreme Court, will not enlarge or diminish that power; but would leave it just what it now is. If the States, or any of them, have their griefs, or their fears, occasioned or alarmed by this department, with or without reason, why should that be permitted to affect the interests of the private suitors? If the prostration of State rights, or if the consolidation of the Union be the danger felt or affected, this danger is independent of the modification of the system—it is unaffected by this modification—it is neither more nor less on account of this modification.

Again: this separation—(but if what I am now going to say should excite some surprise, let me be heard out without prepossession; let it be considered before it be rejected; let me say, with Themistocles, "strike, but hear me")—I say, then, that this separation of the duties of the two jurisdictions, the original and the appellate, was intended and expected by the constitution. The constitution does not make a judge of the Supreme Court, ex-officio, a judge of the inferior courts. He may be made so by special appointment and commission; but he is not so ex-officio. The contrary construction and practice under it, is one that, one day, may give rise to questions that may involve consequences it were much better to avoid. It may do well enough as long as individuals alone are concerned. But a time may come, (God forbid that it should come,) when combinations of men, under the connivance or countenance of a State or States, shall resist the execution of the laws; and shall defend themselves, or be defended, on the ground, that the inferior courts have no constitutional power to enforce them. It is easy to conceive how this might involve the Government in difficulties of the most embarrassing nature; it is not necessary to point them out; they will suggest themselves to every reflecting mind. Is it advisable to leave the country exposed to this possible danger? It may be said that this danger may be prevented by special appointment and commission of the judges of the Supreme Court as judges of the inferior courts.

The Judicial System.

But would this be advisable now? Is it not too late; would it not tend to throw a doubt over questions that are now considered as at rest, and which ought to be so considered; over the whole train of decision heretofore made by the inferior courts? Will it be said that this danger is built upon an imaginary foundation? I put it to every lawyer in the Senate, to say if the constitution makes a judge of the Supreme Court, ex-officio, a judge of the inferior courts. The constitution vests the judiciary power in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress shall establish; it gives to these inferior courts the original jurisdiction, and the appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court; but it does not say that the judges of the Supreme Court shall be judges of the inferior courts, as it would have said, had this been intended; but it does say what amounts to saying the contrary; it says, "that the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their offices," &c.; clearly implying that the judges are to be different persons. I ask the learned lawyers of this Senate, whether the judges of the Supreme Court are, ex-officio, judges of the District Courts? Why not, if they are, ex-officio, judges of the inferior courts, of which the district is one? But will any one pretend this? I presume no one. If, then, the constitution intends a separation of the two jurisdictions, and to have them exercised by different persons, why should we hesitate to make the separation, when it is required by the constitution, and recommended by the special interest of every suitor to those jurisdictions.

ple, that the two jurisdictions should be blended together, and exercised by the same person. To give an appeal from a judge to the same judge, would be a mockery of the suitor; the pride of opinion, the pride of consistency, the pride of reputation, incident to human nature, and inseparable from it, and to be found in the judge as well as in every other man, would make such an appeal a mere mockery to him. Who, in his senses, would expect a judge to convict himself of error of opinion? If there are some instances on record, they are few, precious few, indeed, of such magnanimity; the very admiration which they excite, is a proof how very little they are to be expected. The appeal here, it is true, is to the same judge, conjointly with the other judges; but he himself sits, or declines sitting, according to his own sense of propriety. I believe, in practice, he declines sitting; but all the judges stand in the same relation to him that he stands to them; their judgments, in turn, are to be reviewed by him. This situation creates a bias, necessarily, unavoidably; no doubt unconsciously to the judge himself; but it does create this bias. I do not say that it has any decisive influence; far from it; but it has an influence; the mind does not remain indifferent; it ought to remain indifferent; that influence ought to be prevented. All human institutions must be predicated upon a reasonable confidence in human virtue; it is equally an error to suppose an entire want of virtue, or to suppose that virtue perfect; this plan of blending the original and appellate jurisdictions together, to be exercised by the same person, supposes a degree of virtue in human nature that is not to be found in it; at least, that will not ordinarily be found in it. If the suitor is to have the full benefit of an appeal, these jurisdictions ought not to be blended; he has not that benefit if they are not separated; he is denied the privilege intended him by the constitution.

But, be this as it will, the time must come when these two jurisdictions must be separated; this will become a matter of physical necessity.

Some of your children—perhaps some of you, will live to see the day when the people of this country will be some thirty millions and upwards; when the business and wealth of this people will be in proportion to their numbers; it may be far beyond that proportion. Can any one imagine that one court can do all the duties of both jurisdictions, the original and the appellate, for such an immense nation as this will then be; for such immense concerns as these jurisdictions will then embrace?—embracing, as they do, every species of jurisprudence, the criminal and the civil, the Chancery and the Admiralty; embracing, as they do, the whole range of jurisprudence that occupies all the different courts of Westminster Hall, the King's Bench, the Common Pleas, the Chancery, with her two courts, the Admiralty, both the vice and the appellate, the Exchequer and Doctor's Commons; and you may add to these the House of Lords, when sitting as a Court of Errors in the last resort. It will be an impossibility, physical as well as moral, that one court should do all these duties. The separation, then, must take place—why then hesitate or delay to make a change, that, whenever made, will be for the better, and which must be made, sooner or later? Why, when you are compelled to make a change, and are about to make it—why not make it such as it must be made hereafter, if not now? Why not provide for the future as well as the present, when, in providing for the future, you will provide for the present in the best possible manner? Why prefer a temporary amendment to a permanent one, when the temporary must give way to the permanent; and when, in the mean time, it is much worse than the permanent? I cannot conceive of greater want of providence, greater want of wisdom.

The gentleman tells us it will be dangerous to have the Supreme Court stationed and stationary at the seat of Government; that the court will become dangerous to the Government, and the Government dangerous to the court: but that this danger will not exist at all, if the court go the round of the circuits, in the recess of Congress; and are here only about two months during the session of Congress, if they are here only as boarders, and are not domiciliated here.

How these important results would be produced by these means, the gentleman left us to find out by our wits. I really wish he had favored us with a short lecture upon this point, and told us the how, the why, and the wherefore of all this danger, and of its prevention, the modus operandi. For one, I profess myself in want of instruction; I am in the dark; I am ready to cry out, as some of us did on the Panama question, for light; light, pray give me light; it is all enigma to me; I wish the gentleman had, and still would unriddle it: say how it is, that this judge is this harmless being, if he is kept rambling about the country a part of his time; but if he is kept all the time at Washington, he will set himself to work at undermining the constitution, or at some mischief or other to the Government; for the gentleman has not told us precisely what the mischief is to be, and how it is, that the Government, if he is at Washington all the time, will confederate with him in this mischief; but if he is here only a part of the time, will not have a thought of the kind; and also, how the "esprit du corps," of which he spoke—how that is to depend upon the locality of the corps—how upon its being stationary; and how that is prevented by its being partly itinerant, and partly stationary. All these *how*s I hope the gentleman will explain to us, if it will not give him too much trouble. And another thing I wish the gentleman would tell us, when and where he made the discovery, that if we found it so dangerous to have the Supreme Court stationed at Washington, we could not station it somewhere else. I find nothing in the constitution to prevent it; and the law for this purpose will be just what we please to make it. Let the gentleman, then, give us the distance at which the Supreme Court may be stationed, and be safe to the Government, and from the Government, and there it shall be stationed; that is, when he has proved the fact of danger. Then, so far as concerns myself, he shall have a carte blanche for fixing the place. He may fix it at Baltimore if he pleases; if that is not far enough, he may fix it at Philadelphia; and if that is not far enough, he may fix it at New York. I am apt to think the gentleman would think that a safe distance, and the proper place. But, as the gentleman has such faith in itinerant judges as an antidote to this danger, let the Supreme Court be itinerant, and hold their sessions at different places, but within practicable distances. This, I think, ought to be, not on account of the gentleman's danger, whatever that may be, but because it would be an immense accommodation to the country.

As to the very great powers of the Supreme Court, taking the gentleman's statement in this respect for fact, as I do, I would ask him whether these powers would be any greater by the Supreme Court being made stationary at Washington? or any less by its judges being made to itinerate the country? If not, what signifies it what their powers are as to this question? If their powers are too great, so great as to be dangerous, that is the fault of the constitution, and the remedy is an amendment of the constitution; the danger is independent of the judicial system, and of every modification thereof; for, in every form thereof, the powers will be the same. The gentleman complains that these powers ride over the laws of the several States, in certain cases. They do so; such is the constitution. There is no help for it so long as the constitution remains as it is. But these powers have been exercised in derogation of these laws, and the rights acquired under them; and in every instance the court have decided against the State in favor of the individual. Be it so; it is singular that this should be complained of as a grievance, and yet made an argument for continuing the very system under which it has been suffered.

There might be some plausibility in it if the Supreme Court had been stationary, and all this had happened, then to apply it as an argument in favor of a change to the itinerant system. It might be speciously said, that the grievance was owing to the court being stationary, and to the influence created by that circumstance; and that to make the court itinerant would be to destroy this influence. But when the grievance has happened under the itinerant system, to make the grievance an argument for continuing that system, appears to me (begging the gentleman's pardon) not a little preposterous.

But, to return to my object—how would the intrinsic evil of the system supply the defect to be supplied by the proposed amendment? In this way. This separation of these jurisdictions would induce the necessity of establishing separate courts, for the exercise of the original jurisdiction. A system that is much preferable to the present, for very many reasons; but I shall mention only two, as these appear to me decisive, and to settle the question of preference. These original courts, as they might be constituted, and probably would be constituted, would supply at once all parts of the Union with a competent Judiciary, and the system will adapt itself to the future wants of the Union, as they may arise from time to time. There will be future calls for additional courts; but never any call for any amendment of the system. It is a system that looks to the future as well as to the present, and to all future times; and will be equally suitable to all; it will expand itself as the country expands, accommodating equally all parts at all times. Then these circuits, besides being equally competent with the present in all respects, in one particular, and that one of the greatest importance, would be pre-eminently superior. The local law is the law most dear of any to the people of the several States; and justly so; it is made to them as they are made to it; their affections are wedded to it; it has become, as it were, "bone of their bone, and flesh of their flesh." Now these local judges will be much more competent judges of this law, as well as much more tenacious of it, than the itinerant Judge of the Supreme Court. These local judges will have been bred to this law, and bred in it; they will be its able expounders and zealous defenders; and their decisions will be the best of all instructors to the Supreme Court itself upon questions of this law. Their decisions will, in a manner, become authorities upon that law with that court. It is true, that the itinerant judge has the district judge to sit with him, and to give him information; but, the objection to this is, that it is given transiently, and acted upon suddenly. How infinitely preferable must be the judgment of coequal judges deciding from antecedent knowledge, from familiar experience, from mature consideration? Who would not trust to such judges all questions of local law, in preference, not only to a single itinerant judge, but to the whole bench of the Supreme Judges? Not one, I venture to say. It is strange to me, that my friends, the Western gentlemen, the pride of the Western country, and of whom the Western country has reason to be proud, should hesitate one moment to prefer this system to the poor diseased system that is offered by the proposed amendment; that must be temporary, and while it lasts will be a miserable one, and not to be compared in use and usefulness to the one they may have.

But, the honorable gentleman from New York tells us that the system of local courts, for the exercise of the original jurisdiction, will be unpopular. He says this on conjecture merely, and against all the probabilities of the thing; it is to be judged of by comparison with the present system: does he mean to say that the present system is so very popular, that any change of it would be unpopular? One would think, from his own account, it was not very popular with him at least—that at best it was but a necessary evil. I hope it is; I think it is more popular with others, but I do not think it so very popular but that a change for the better would be borne with, and without producing any popular commotion.

It will, as I said, be judged of altogether by comparison; and that must be in favor of separate courts for the exercise of the original jurisdiction. That plan is better in itself; it is better for the present; it is all better for the future; so obviously so, that it speaks its own preference, and speaks it to every mind. I venture to conjecture, (and I have as good a right to conjecture as the gentleman, and better grounds, I think,) that these courts would become the most popular courts in this country—the most popular with the suitors, the most popular with the bar, the most popular with the people. These courts would be the means of making the national Judiciary the national favorite, as well as the national pride. The gentleman has alluded to a similar system, that was once adopted, and soon after laid aside; and hence infers, that the system itself is unpopular. The inference is incorrect; the men who made that system, made it unpopular, and nothing else. It was not the thing itself, as being bad in itself, that caused it to be laid aside—it was the supposed calculation of the thing; it was the political effect of the thing that was the cause.

It was made by a party going out of power, in the last moments of power, and to secure in their hands (as was believed by the party coming into power) the whole Judiciary power of the country, to be wielded for their own political purposes; and the system was broken down to frustrate this calculation, and to wrest this power out of their hands. The ostensible objection, it is true, was to the thing itself, but as it could not be shown to be bad, the thing was stigmatized; it was called by many bad names; among others, by the name of the midnight Judiciary; and the bad name raised a hue and cry against it, and not the demerits of the system itself. It was deemed reason enough by the triumphant party, that it was presented to them by the defeated party, retiring from power. I remember it was said on the occasion, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," the designs, the wiles of the Greeks were feared, and the present was rejected.

But, I speak from knowledge, in a large district of country—from information, as to a much larger, and from belief, as to the whole country, when I say, that these courts, as courts, by all the suitors to them, by all the bar connected with them, were esteemed by far the most popular Federal Courts which we have ever had in this country. There is not the least reason to believe that such courts would now be unpopular.

The gentleman supposes the district judges would be in the way of this arrangement. It is true, they might be dispensed with; but no one would think of displacing one of them; nor is it necessary. Their jurisdictions might be transferred to the Circuit Courts, to take effect when their offices became vacant, and as they become vacant, and, in the mean time, to be exercised as they now are.

The gentleman very properly admitted, that the expense ought to be no objection, but seemed to apprehend that the people would think it one. There again, I think he is mistaken. The worst of all economy is that which is practised at the expense, and to the prejudice of judicial establishments; the people so view it. There is no institution which they regard with so much partiality; and the expense of which they so little regret, provided the institution is made as perfect as it may be.

I hope I need make no apology for the time I have taken up on a subject so important as that of improving the National Judiciary. No function of the Government is so interesting to the nation as the administration of the national justice. It touches directly upon every individual; it is felt by him as his own immediate personal concern; it is looked to by him as his shield and his sword, to protect his rights and to redress his wrongs. Other functions of the Government are interesting too; but not so immediately interesting; their effect upon the individual is indirect; they act upon circumstances which, in their turn, act upon him; thus and thereby affecting his condition in life, more or less favorably. But, it is distributive justice, and the hand that makes the distribution, that is watched and regarded by every one; for it is that hand which is to lift this shield for his protection, to wield this sword for his redress.

WEDNESDAY, April 12.

The Judicial System.

Mr. WHITE, of Tennessee, rose and said, if it could be shown that the remedy proposed to obviate the inconveniences complained of in those sections of country, would be injurious to the whole Union, he ought not to expect, or to wish that their special inconveniences should be removed to the injury of the whole community. The subjection which we are about to legislate, said Mr. W., is, in my mind, one of infinite importance. We are about to pass an act in relation to a department of the Government which every man feels and ought to understand. It is in vain we enact good laws unless they are well administered—it is that department of Government which operates directly on the persons and property of individuals who happen to be citizens of the United States, so far as the jurisdiction is local, or so far as it relates to the internal concerns of the citizens of the respective States. So far as it may operate on general principles it is still more important—therefore have I heard with great attention every thing that has been urged by gentlemen who are opposed to it, and I shall still be glad to hear all further objections that can be urged. We cannot judge whether the alteration will be beneficial or injurious, without first making ourselves acquainted with the inconveniences which are supposed to exist. Till we are acquainted with the disease we cannot tell what will be a suitable remedy. I think I can, if favored with the attention of the Senate, if not already satisfied on that point, satisfy them that the disease lies much deeper than the gentleman from Rhode Island seems to suppose. I paid great attention to the argument, and he seems to think, so far as I can understand it, that the main grievance which we are called on to remedy, is the delay which takes place in the Supreme Court of the United States. He has not even, in his excellent argument, given the most distant glance at the situation of that section of the country which is on the other side of the mountains, to see what the local inconveniences are, and whether the remedy he proposes would be a suitable one or not. The grievances which do exist in the country, are, as I think, of two kinds; one in the manner in which the business is conducted in the respective States; the other, that which exists in the Supreme Court itself: and this latter does not consist so much in the delay, as in the incorrectness of the decisions where the questions depend upon the municipal laws of the respective States.

These are the grievances which exist, and which it is the object of this bill to remedy: First, by extending to nine States the circuit system, which is applicable to, and practised in, beneficially, the other fifteen States: and secondly, to increase on the bench of the Supreme Court, a knowledge of the local laws. Those are its leading objects. These nine States, when we look to them, we find thus circumstanced; six of them have never had, either nominally, or in fact, the benefit of a circuit judge: three of these States have had nominally, and to a very limited extent, the benefit of the attendance of a judge of the Supreme Court from the year 1807 up to this time. I say they have had it nominally, but not so in point of fact. When the judge of the seventh circuit was in the vigor of life, and in the enjoyment of perfect health, it was his duty to attend and hold Circuit Courts in the Districts of East and of West Tennessee, of Kentucky and Ohio, and from the necessity he was under of leaving one court in time to arrive at the next, in his circuit, an opportunity was not afforded him of disposing of the causes on either docket. For example, he would have suits enough in West Tennessee to require a session of two months, but at the end of three or four weeks he was compelled to be at Kentucky, distant two hundred miles, and so on; and thus it happened either that the district judges must continue the courts after his departure, or the causes must remain undecided. In important suits parties would not be willing to trust the opinion of the district judge alone, and he would willingly yield to applications for delay, until he could have the assistance of the Judge of the Supreme Court, and thus the business must be either long delayed, or, in most instances, decided in the Circuit Courts of those three States, by the district judge alone. For several of the last years of Judge Todd's life, his want of health put it out of his power to attend his Circuit Courts, and thus it has happened that the business in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, has accumulated to an unreasonable extent, and those States have, in truth, been no better provided with an opportunity of obtaining a due administration of justice in their Federal Courts, than the other six Western States; and how is it with regard to them? They have never had the benefit of the circuit system, even nominally. They have each a district judge, who does all the duties which other district judges perform, and vested with the jurisdiction which other Circuit Courts possess in the other States. So far as relates to the grievances which exist in the country, we are safe in considering the whole nine States to be practically in the same situation. When we come to look at the laws which vest the courts with jurisdiction, we find that a large portion of the jurisdiction which is to be exercised in those nine States, is of that description which falls within the jurisdiction of a Circuit Court, and not within the jurisdiction of a District Court. A District Court, as such, can have no jurisdiction of suits between A and B, whether citizens of the United States, or of different States. Some attempts have been made to get them to entertain jurisdiction of suits between citizens of different States, when the matter in dispute is of more value than twenty, and of less than five hundred dollars, but, so far as I know, they have been unsuccessful.

As it relates to a great portion of the jurisdiction which is to be exercised in those nine States, the Senate must see at once, it is of that class of cases which belongs to the Circuit Courts in the other States. What is the situation of these other States? They have, in point of fact, as well as in point of law, a Circuit Court composed of one Judge of the Supreme Court, and the district judge. When a suit is brought, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of two thousand dollars, upon the trial, the parties have the benefit of the opinions of two men, which will, in most instances, be satisfactory; but if not, the unsuccessful party can remove it to the Supreme Court and there have the judgment revised, and if wrong, reversed. If the matter in dispute is less than two thousand dollars, and the judges disagree in opinion upon any point, either party can have that point certified to the Supreme Court, there revised, and the judgment of the Circuit Court rendered in conformity with the opinion of the Supreme Court. In all criminal cases the defendant has the like advantage. How is it in those nine States? In no case, either civil or criminal, can the parties, in the Circuit Court, have any opinion, but that of the district judge, which in every criminal case, and in every civil one, where the matter in dispute is of less value than two thousand dollars, is final and conclusive, whether right or wrong; and in all civil cases, although an erroneous judgment may be revised in the Supreme Court, it is an expense and trouble which would often be avoided if two judges sat in the Circuit Court.

Tennessee was admitted into this Union upon an equal footing with the original States, and so have the other Western States been. These States feel that this promised equality has not been extended to them; as sovereign States, they insist that their citizens must be placed in a situation that their persons and property shall be equally as safe in the Federal Courts, as the citizens of any other State are in their persons and property. With nothing less than this will they be contented. But, it is said, the proper time is not come; we are used as well as others have been used. I should be glad to know when the time will arrive? Tennessee is thirty years old, Kentucky is older. Ohio came into the Union in 1803, Louisiana in 1812, Indiana in 1816, Illinois in 1818, Missouri in 1821, Mississippi in 1817, Alabama several years ago. Will the gentleman tell us when it is we shall have arrived at such mature age, as to entitle us to the same benefits of the Federal Judiciary that are enjoyed by the other States? Sometimes they are willing to recognize us as at years of discretion, to put their dearest interests in our keeping. Personal services, money, any thing we have, we are disposed to render freely, our full share of, according to our abilities. We are willing to do our duty; and I call upon the Senate to say whether they do their duty to us, if they do not put the administration of justice on the same footing in the Western States, as it is in the others. Is not the life of a man in any one of these nine States, worth as much to society as it would be, if he were a constituent of the gentleman from New Hampshire, or Rhode Island? Is it not reasonable to afford the same man as good a chance for justice in the States where he now lives, as he would have if he lived in any other? Is that opportunity furnished? No, sir, it is not.

But, sir, we are told that the accumulation of business in some of these courts, in the three States, is produced by temporary causes that are passing away, and that there is no necessity for any alteration in the system on that account; that one circuit judge can do all the business in those three States. It is not to pass away so rapidly as the gentleman supposes. I do not doubt the correctness of the statement of any gentleman living in any one of those; he knows what the business is; therefore I do not choose to doubt the correctness of what was advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky. I have before me a certificate from the Clerk of the District and Circuit Court of Kentucky, and at the session of November last, the number of causes on the two dockets combined was 950. As very little business is to be done in the District Court, much the greater portion must be on the Circuit Court docket of that State. How is it in Tennessee? You have the statement of the gentlemen who belong to the Western part, and altogether it may be estimated at 200. But it is not the number of causes which proves the necessity of a circuit judge, and an extension of the system: this necessity is produced, more by the kind of causes that are to be decided, than by their number. These causes are in their own nature, especially those brought into the Federal Court of Tennessee, of the most litigated description generally. Many of them relate to lands; foreigners claim titles to them, and assert them in the Federal Courts. It is necessary to go back and examine what was the situation of the country forty years ago, and you get into a set of difficulties from which nothing can extricate you, but a patient, laborious, and protracted investigation. They necessarily consume a great deal of time, first, in ascertaining the facts, before a jury who are to decide the cause, and next, in investigating the legal principles which are to govern that decision. To investigate and decide one of those causes, has sometimes taken two weeks; suppose only one hundred causes on the docket, I ask if it would not be more necessary to extend the judicial system through a country like that, than to a place where there were 500 on the docket, of which 30 or 40 might be disposed of in a day. If we were to be governed by the mere number of causes, we would make a most important mistake as relates to this matter. Many disputes in Tennessee relate to lands, the titles to which are founded on the act of 1777 in North Carolina, or the act of 1788, or those acts which these two have given birth to; and in investigating matters of fact, it is necessary to go back and ascertain what were the names of different places at different times, from those periods up to this time; the whole country was a wilderness, and every man who had a claim under these laws had a right to select a piece of land within a certain boundary, of from four to five hundred miles one way, and one hundred miles the other. We had not only to investigate our titles derived from the State of North Carolina, but in some instances, those issued by Virginia, perhaps Kentucky likewise, as disputes respecting boundary with those States once existed, upon adjusting which provision is made to secure individual rights.

We have amongst our own citizens those who claim under Virginia grants, under Kentucky grants, under North Carolina grants, and under those issued by the State of Tennessee. Whenever there is a dispute respecting any of these conflicting titles, they may go into the Federal Court, although the parties may be citizens of the same State. You are extinguishing the Indian title as fast as those people are willing to sell; and wherever you do, the settlements will keep pace with the extinguishment of title. In Tennessee there is a very large district of country, granted to individuals under the law of North Carolina, in 1783, which, until a very short time ago, the United States had secured to the Indians by treaty: that country is now settling, and every man has to look for the land for which he obtained his patent. Many of these conflict, and whenever they do, and a foreigner happens to be the owner of one of these titles, the consequence is, that the cause goes into the Federal Court. So long as this process of extinguishing the Indian title, and settling the country, is going on, it is in vain for gentlemen to say that those disputes are produced by temporary causes, or that they are passing away: they cannot pass away until your settlements are completed.

Do we not all know that, in 1794, and onward for several years, a great rage for speculation existed in Philadelphia, New York, and the Eastern States; that immense quantities of Western lands were bought up by foreigners, or citizens of other States? considerable quantities were purchased in Tennessee. These companies have found it convenient to part with their titles to various individuals; and those claimants who have got titles in this manner, living in other States, when they come forward to assert these titles, now that the Indian title is extinguished, assert them in the Federal courts.

But, the gentleman says, you have Federal courts, and the people must have confidence in them, because, if they had not, they would sue in the State courts. Will the Senate reflect for a moment, on the idea here suggested, and they will easily see some of the difficulties under which we labor. The titles to land must be settled by the laws of the State in which the land lies. A citizen of another State, or a foreigner, claims title to a tract in Tennessee; he finds a man in possession under a conflicting title. This foreigner can sue either in the Federal or State court, at his election. He submits his title to counsel, who advises him that, according to the decisions of the State courts, the man in possession has the better title. The foreigner orders suit in the Federal Court—there is but one judge, and he, living in the State, will likely follow the State decisions, and give judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff takes a writ of error, and carries the cause to the Supreme Court, before a set of judges, who neither know, nor have they the means of knowing, the local laws, or the true reasons of the decision; and, for want of this information, judgment is reversed, and thus the plaintiff becomes the owner of a piece of property, which he otherwise would not have acquired. Plaintiffs often commence suits in the Federal courts expressly for the sake of gaining an advantage over their adversaries, which they could not get in any other tribunal whatever. And yet, this is the argument relied on to show that Federal justice is well administered to us.

What, sir, is the situation of the other States, Louisiana for example? There are British, Spanish, and French grants: so, also, in Mississippi and Missouri. All these may go, and mostly do go, into the Federal courts, principally for the sake of having these cases removed into the Supreme Court of the United States, if such a decision is not given as is satisfactory to the plaintiff. So far as Tennessee is concerned, those who act under the belief that our business has accumulated from temporary causes, are, in the main, mistaken: to a limited extent, no doubt, they are correct. I believe, if our circuit had been one of reasonable extent, and we had had the benefit of our circuit judge, the number of suits on our docket would have been much less. Where a man has a cause which he thinks he ought to gain, if the law is well understood, he will not agree to have that cause tried before any one man, when there is another of a higher legal character. It is a very unpleasant thing to have to settle disputes between man and man; and when it comes to the last stage, there are few men who would not like to be eased of a portion of the responsibility of the decision. If a reasonable excuse can be made to defer it to another term, the district judge will fall in with it, because his associate will then be with him, and he will have the benefit of his opinion, and be better satisfied, if they agree, that he is right, than if there was none with him; and, if he should disagree in opinion with him, by certifying that there was a difference of opinion, it could be carried into the Supreme Court, and no mischief would arise. It is to their credit that they have this disposition. I do not make unnecessary complaints against the district judge of the State in which I live. He is entitled to as much character as any other judicial officer on the score of integrity; and, if he ever does make mistakes, which, I think, is but seldom, it is in endeavoring to attain that which he thinks the justice of particular cases. The people of Tennessee have as much right as the people of any other State in the Union, to have the opinions of two men, who will concur, as to which is right in their disputes. It is vain to tell me we are placed on an equal footing with the other States, while they have one measure of justice meted to their citizens, and the citizens of Tennessee have a different measure meted to them. I would rather you should lop off one of our Senators, or three of our Representatives—reduce us as to the power we have in the Executive and Legislative business of this Government, but let us have, when you come to the practical operations of this Government, that are to take away a man's life, liberty, or property, let our citizens have an equal opportunity, for the administration of justice, with any portion of the good people of the United States.

Rescinding Rules.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and said: Some time ago, I gave notice to the Senate I would, unless the subject should be taken up by some other member of this body more able, but not more willing, to vindicate its privileges than myself, move for the rescission of so much of the new rules of this House, which give to the presiding officer of this body the appointment of its committees, and the control over the Journal of its proceedings. I did give notice on both points, although, the debate being broken off abruptly, for reasons beyond my ken or control, notice appeared in the public papers on the first of these points only—the appointment of committees. I now rise to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, unless the subject be taken out of my hands by some one more capable of doing justice to it, move, and support with reasons for that measure, the restoration to this body of its ancient and accustomed privileges. This body exhibits a memorable, I will not say a lamentable, instance of the tendency of human affairs towards servitude and abuse. To get rid of the trouble of balloting for committees, the subject was placed in the hands of your most lamented and venerable predecessor, who was a member of this House, who was responsible to us for his situation, and who exercised that trust under that responsibility; but who, by my vote, never should have been invested with it, or any other human being, unless, as Jefferson said, we could find angels in the shape of men. In consequence of a fact, as notorious as it was disgusting, the Journal was put under the control of the same presiding officer—a fact to which I allude no further than by the words which I uttered, because it was notorious and disgusting: that fact, with which other facts led to a state of things in this country unexampled, but not unexampled elsewhere; one set of officers to do the duty, and another set to receive the salary. There was a time when these two expressions had their meaning: “sober as a judge,” “as good as the bank;” but they have both lost their meaning. If our officers cannot do their duty, let us put persons in their places that can do it. I rose to give notice only. I shall go back and say, that the Secretary of this House being a sworn officer—being supposed to be competent—being supposed to be faithful—being supposed to be willing to do his duty—to him, and to him only, under the supervision of ourselves, can be safely trusted the control over the Journal, for reasons which I shall humbly submit to this House to-morrow.

FRIDAY, April 14.

Judicial System.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of the bill, and the motion to recommit—

Mr. HARPER, of South Carolina, rose and said, it seems to me, Mr. President, that there are objections to the remedy proposed by the bill on the table, which will occasion danger and inconvenience to the rest of the United States, including the Western States, greater than the inconveniences which they complain of. A better remedy, it seems to me, has been devised in the plan which was proposed by the gentleman from Georgia yesterday. Some of the objections which exist against the bill which lies on the table, have been stated by the committee of this House. They consist in these principally: that it will make the Supreme Court too numerous, perhaps it is too much so already—in the necessary course and progress of affairs, it must become more numerous still; and, what is worse than this, it will render it subject to fluctuation, and make it so to be considered by the public at large. There are few who dissent from the proposition, that too numerous a judicial body is an evil, and then the question recurs, what number is too great for a judicial body? Some of the evils attending, are these—It is unfavorable to dispassionate consultation: very numerous assemblies are less capable of it than those which are limited; and as you extend the body, so is it less capable of deliberating without excitement. In a judiciary body, consisting of more than seven, their consultations are not properly consultations, but debates; they are a deliberative body, and the individuals composing it, instead of interchanging ideas, make speeches to influence the rest. There are other inconveniences attending too numerous a Judiciary—they are liable to be divided into knots and cabals. If men of a superior character are found, they will have their followers; and this is more likely to be the case in a large, than in a small body. If the body is too numerous to allow them to consult in the way of free intercourse of thought and conversation, you make it a deliberative body, you assimilate it to a legislative body, and you have the spirit of competition and opposition. What number is the proper one? Why is it that an appellate tribunal must consist of more than one individual? Because you require the lights of various understandings; because one man, be his talents and acquirements what they may, will not look at the case in every point of view; another reason is, that any casual bias in the individual may be corrected. How many understandings brought into consultation, are likely to throw light on the subject? The consultations of a judicial body are different in character from those of a legislative one. In this, or other legislative assemblies, it is not expected that every member should be conversant with every subject brought before him; it is not expected that he should understand every question. But this is expected of every member of a judicial body. He must be conversant with every question that comes before the court, and know all its bearings upon the whole system. As regards the light thrown on the subject by various understandings, I should say that, in general, it is not advantageous to go beyond four or six: circumstances may render it necessary to go beyond that; yet, if that is as large a number as can consult advantageously, exceed it no further than is requisite: have no more evil than that which you cannot avoid. We find it practically even in our deliberative and other bodies. Subjects are brought before us—a few have investigated them, and they have to form our opinions for us, and indicate how we are to act in the particular point brought under consideration.

When we do desire to get exact and detailed information, such as is necessary for a judge to have on every question, the matter is referred to a committee; nor would it be possible for this body, acting as a whole, to get the full information which would be considered as necessary for a judge. A general holding a formal council of war, collects a numerous assembly; but when was a formal council of war known to give useful, practical advice? Wanting such advice, he will resort to, at most, three or four of his most intelligent and best informed officers.

It is said there are other numerous judicial tribunals, from which no inconvenience is found: that there are twelve judges in England who consult each other, and that many cases are decided by the House of Lords. With regard to the twelve judges, they consult, but do not decide; the decision is with the court which has requested the consultation; although, perhaps, it has never happened that the judgment of that particular court has been contrary to the opinion of the twelve judges. It is not expected in the House of Lords, that every lord should be conversant with the subject brought before the House. The judges decide it. The lords may be termed the law jury, and the judges point out, if they can, the error on a particular point that has occurred in the adjudication below. It is but rarely that cases are brought before them; the institution would not answer if appeals were numerous, if the lords were to consider the hearings and operations of the whole system, and the effect every decision must have on the whole system. They may be considered as discharging political functions even in the exercise of their legal jurisdiction. They guard against the political effects which might be produced by the decisions. The court will not only be too numerous for dispassionate consultation, but its composition will, in all probability, be inferior to what it is at present.

Perhaps it would be well to consider for a moment, what the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be, and what ought to be the qualifications of its judges. It has been observed that the Supreme Court of the United States has more important functions to perform than any other tribunal that exists on the face of the earth. It decides in the last resort cases of common law jurisdiction, of admiralty, of equity, and is required to be in some degree conversant with the systems of twenty-four States. It has still more important functions to perform, important political functions. It is made, by our constitution, the arbiter between the conflicting elements of our very complicated system. It is among its functions to restrain every department within its proper orbit. It has offices of immense difficulty and delicacy to perform; it has not only to restrain the power of the States, but also those exercised by the General Government. It may have this important duty to perform, to declare the solemn act of the confederated legislature void, to resist the voice of a majority of this whole country. This has been delegated to it by the constitution, and in some cases it will unquestionably be incumbent on it to discharge it. To what sort of a body should the discharge of these important functions be committed? Every one will say, its members ought to possess, in a high degree, talent, firmness, and integrity: and more than these; the individuals discharging duties on that bench should possess qualifications beyond those; they should all be statesmen. They should be capable of combining the complicated relations and parts of our system; our home relations to our foreign relations; they should be conversant with international law; they should be without the manner, party, or passions and views, of politicians: they should be perfectly acquainted with men, with the workings of human passions without being subject to the influence of those passions. These are some qualifications, and such as are not likely to be met with very often. Are they more likely to be found in a larger judiciary than in a small one, in a body of ten, than in one of seven? It may seem like a very insignificant proposition to say, that it is easier to find four such men than ten; yet the proposition is true. It might seem at first view that, by selecting a numerous court, the chance is increased of finding among them a certain number possessing the requisite qualifications, but such is not the fact. Hitherto it has been the case, and it will be again, that a few individuals will be distinguished, will be designated by the public voice as being peculiarly adapted for this, as well as other situations, and but a few. There is one instance to which everybody refers: to the gentleman who now fills the highest seat on our judicial bench. He is recognized by the public voice as having, in a peculiar degree, the qualifications that fit him for that situation. It is reasonable to expect that there will always be a few individuals, who will be thus pointed out by the public voice, as appropriate for such situations; and as you mix them with inferior material, you detract from their value. In a court of ten, the voice of Marshall might not be heard. You diminish the general weight of such men, by putting them in a numerous body. Genius may operate in a crowd; her voice may be heard in a popular assembly, but the calm dispassionate wisdom which peculiarly befits a man for a judicial station, is not so likely to be attended to as in a small body.

If individuals are thus indicated by the public voice as fit for such situations, are they likely to be selected by the administration of the day? Is there any security for that? Yes, there is. There is a feeling that will operate on every administration—that this department of Government is sacred: however, in making other appointments, petty views may operate; yet in this they will not. This has been the feeling of all the administrations we have hitherto had, and it is probable it will be the feeling of all future administrations; and if it should not be, public opinion will impose on them the necessity of this course. Nothing could excite louder clamor; nothing would draw down public execration more strongly, than that any administration of this country should select a judicial officer for any purpose of political management.

Are we not more likely also, to get individuals qualified for the situation by selecting them from large districts? Perhaps the present number of judges is greater than is necessary; perhaps the whole of the United States might be advantageously divided into six circuits, six being one of the most convenient numbers to form a quorum. If you have a large circuit from which to select, the judge of the circuit must in general be selected from the circuit. You have a better chance of getting an individual qualified from three or four States, than from one or two. But this is not all; the selection is less likely to be influenced by partial views, or oblique motives. In a single State a man may make himself of consequence by his party zeal, by subserving some purpose of temporary interest; and an individual may be chosen, having an ephemeral reputation founded on other causes than his merit. It is more difficult when you require him to have a reputation over three or four States. He must have something substantial in his character and mind to sustain this extended reputation.

But all of these considerations are of less importance with me than that to which I am about to refer. The judiciary should not be put on a footing that will render it liable to fluctuation; if it is, we have, in effect, no judiciary; we have, in effect, no constitution, so far as the judiciary are the guardians of it. If the judiciary is liable to fluctuation, to be diminished three or four to-day, or to be augmented fifteen or twenty to-morrow, we might as well have no judiciary, so far as it is requisite the judiciary should be, from the consistency of its views and decisions, the guarantee of the constitution.

The idea of judicial representation is on all hands disclaimed in this House, and is admitted to be absurd. We cannot be ignorant, however, of the language which has been used out of doors in the United States. It has been said in the newspapers, and the doctrine has been the subject of discussion, that the particular views and feelings of particular sections of the country, on particular subjects, and those perhaps of temporary interest, should be represented on the bench of the Supreme Court. All admit here that this doctrine is detestable. It is impossible to have impartiality, if those views are carried into effect. Do you adopt this doctrine by adopting the bill on your table? If individual judges are appointed, believing that they were selected with these views, they will be likely to give effect to those views. It is a part of human nature for a man to act up to the character which is attributed to him. If you expect firmness, moderation, and wisdom, he will endeavor to sustain the character which the world has given him. If you take it for granted that he is to act under the impulses of intemperance and passion, there is no motive for him to attempt to preserve a better character than that which the world has given him; and if individuals are placed on the bench with these views, they will be likely to act in conformity with them.

It has been said that the increase of the number of the judges in the Supreme Court will have a tendency to set afloat all the decisions which have been made in constitutional questions. Whether this is true or not, I do not pretend to say, but certainly it may have that effect. It was intended that the three departments of the Government should be perfectly independent of each other; it was not intended that the individual judges of the Supreme Court, or their decisions, should be under the control of the other branches of the Government; but if, in time of excitement, the majority, having become a faction, is not satisfied with the decisions of the constitutional court, will it not at any time be in the power of the other branches of the Government to overrule those decisions? In England, much alarm was once taken at the creation of many new lords. It was regarded as a dangerous innovation, and an attempt was made to restrain the power of the crown in this respect, though that restraint would have been a change of one of the fundamental principles of their constitution. Yet the check of that branch of their legislature is perhaps less important and essential than that of the judiciary with us. The independence of the judiciary is at the very basis of our institutions. With regard to the act of 1802, whatever may be said of it in other respects, none doubt it was a hazardous precedent, and every individual will join with me in wishing that it may not be necessary to follow in these times. It is in times of faction, when party spirit runs high, that dissatisfaction is most likely to be occasioned by the decisions of the Supreme Court. I do not believe that the Supreme Court or the constitution itself, will ever be able to stand against the decided current of public opinion. It is a very different thing from the temporary opinion of a majority; for a majority acting unjustly and unconstitutionally, under the influence of excitement, a majority though it be, is nothing more than a faction, and it was the object of our constitution to control it. The constitution has laid down the fundamental and immutable laws of justice for our Government, and the majority that constitutes the Government should not violate these. The constitution is made to control the Government; it has no other object; and though the Supreme Court cannot resist public opinion, it may resist a temporary majority, and may change that majority. However high the tempest may blow, individuals may hear the calm and steady voice of the judiciary warning them of their danger; they will shrink away; they will leave that majority a minority; and that is the security the constitution intended by the judiciary. These are the motives that prevent me from voting for the bill on the table.

It may be asked, do you secure this fixedness and permanency of the judiciary, by rejecting the bill? If you confine them to the present number, or reduce them to six, do you provide that they shall be a permanent, unf fluctuating body? will you not stand on the same footing as before? It will still be in the power of Congress to add to or diminish its numbers. My object is to place it on such a footing, as that there may be no temptation, no necessity to innovate; that its organization may continue permanent, for so long a time, that public opinion may settle on it as the common law of our constitution. By adopting a scheme similar to that proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, alteration may be unnecessary for half a century to come. It is not merely what is written on the parchment, that is to be considered constitution. The composition of the English courts is not fixed by any positive law, yet the English Parliament would as soon think of changing the succession to the throne, as of changing the constitution of the courts at Westminster. It may become so with us, and I wish to put it on such a footing that it may become so.

Does the project of the gentleman from Georgia provide a remedy for the grievances complained of by the Western country? Those evils are, that there has been a great accumulation of business in the courts of the Western country; and this objection is the less insisted on because it is admitted that this accumulation is owing to temporary causes. The most important grievance that is complained of is, that incorrect decisions are given, for want of ability in the local courts; and a want of information as respects the local laws in the Supreme Court.

According to the plan of the Senator from Georgia, the number of the judges of the Supreme Court, and the number and distribution of the district judges, are to remain as at present. I would throw out for consideration, whether the judges of the Supreme Court may not be conveniently reduced to six. The quorum of that court will be four, and the majority of the quorum three.

Instead of associating three district judges to form a Circuit Court, I would propose that the District Courts should exercise an unlimited jurisdiction, as the Circuit Courts at present. Let each circuit judge hold a single court of original and appellate jurisdiction, annually, in each district of his circuit. Where the amount in controversy is less than two thousand dollars, let there be an appeal, as at present, from the District to the Circuit Court, and let the determination of that court be final. When the amount exceeds two thousand dollars, let it be at the option of the party to take an appeal either to the Circuit or Supreme Court; but, in either case, let the decision be final. Where causes are brought originally in the Circuit Court, let the appeal be as at present. It seems to me, that this plan is not liable to any serious objections; that it will provide an effectual remedy for the grievances which are complained of; and that it contains as little innovation as any effectual and unobjectionable plan that can be devised.

The Judicial System.

It will provide for the transaction of business. There is no ground to apprehend that the district judges will find any difficulty in transacting the business of their districts, as at present arranged, for a century to come; and if, by any possibility, the business of a district should accumulate beyond the power of a judge to discharge it, it may be divided. It will likewise render the duties of the Supreme and Circuit Courts less burdensome, and enable the present number of judges to discharge them for an indefinite period of time. Many cases in which appeals are now taken to the Supreme Court, will be finally decided in the Circuit Court. It is plain that the circuit duty will be lessened at least one-half. The judges of the Supreme Court are now tasked to the utmost extent of their powers. As business increases in the natural progress of society and population, it is plain that they will be unable to perform it. Almost the whole year is divided between the circuit and the session of the Supreme Court. The appointment of additional judges will rather add to the difficulty than palliate it; for a numerous court must of course get along with its business more heavily than a limited one. The proposed system will, in some measure, accommodate itself to the exigency of affairs. If the district judge is a competent one, almost all the business will, in the first instance, be carried into that court. If otherwise, much of it will be commenced in the Circuit Court. The original jurisdiction of the Circuit Court will, for some time, answer a valuable purpose, where the district judges are at present incompetent, in consequence of having been appointed to small salaries, and duties comparatively unimportant. If the Supreme Court is burdened with business, and confidence is reposed in the circuit judge, many appeals will be carried from the District Court to him. There is no reason to doubt, that, on the proposed plan, the whole business of the country may be transacted without difficulty, or an increase of judges, to as distant a period as it is necessary for us to look forward.

Complaints are also made, that the district judges are incompetent, and that there is a deficiency of information in the Supreme Court, with respect to local law. The source of the incompetency of the district judges, every one traces to their having been appointed with a view to limited duties, and their salaries being too small to command the services of individuals properly qualified. It is obvious that the only remedy, is to enlarge their salaries and their jurisdiction. I have no great opinion of the benefits to be derived from the judges travelling into the several States to acquire a knowledge of local law, and communicating their acquisitions to their brethren. There are serious objections to allowing an appeal from a judge to a court of which he is a member. His opinions are seldom weighed with an entirely impartial scrutiny. But, how infinitely is the objection increased when he is supposed to possess exclusive information with respect to the subject on which he has decided. The court will infallibly run into the habit of referring the case to the judge who is supposed to have peculiar qualifications for determining it; and the rest of the members will become careless of understanding it for themselves. No method has been devised for the investigation of a question as to have an able advocate on each side, interested to bring forward every thing that can favor his own view of the subject. You are much more likely to inform the Supreme Court on the subject of local laws, by rendering the district judges able and enlightened, than by sending its members on a circuit into the several States. The district judge should understand the laws of his own State thoroughly. By sound reasoning—by an enlightened opinion, he may inform the Supreme Court—this is the legitimate mode by which a judge, in the first instance, should influence the appellate tribunal. It is to be observed, too, that all the States, with a single exception, have the same general system of common law. When the case arises under the statute of a State, the statute itself will be before the Supreme Court, and, in general, the decisions of the State tribunals giving construction to it. Whatever benefit, however, is to be derived from the information which the judges of the Supreme Court are to acquire by travelling into the States, will be obtained in about an equal degree under either system—that proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, or by the bill on your table. The only difference will be, that the judges will go into three or four States instead of two or three.

The plan proposed by the amendment will also be free from the objections which have been urged against the system which would give the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction exclusively, and locate it at the seat of Government. It is said that an appellate judge should not be out of the habit of transacting business at nisi prius. That this is necessary by way of discipline and as a test of his talent—that confined to an appellate court, judges are likely to become indolent—some will rely on the judgment, and obtain a reputation by the aid of the talents of others. If there is some truth in these remarks, they are to be taken with much qualification. It may fairly be taken for granted, that no judge will be appointed to the Supreme bench, whose talents have not been well ascertained. He will have the stimulus, which alone (besides the sense of duty) can operate on any judge—the desire of personal reputation—and not only reputation with the public, but the desire to maintain his weight and consideration with his brethren of the bench. The benefits to be derived from the intellectual discipline of presiding at nisi prius are, in my apprehension, very limited. It is said that a judge, exercising appellate jurisdiction, is likely to become abstracted and impracticable. It is not easy to conceive how this should happen in any injurious degree, when he is daily conversant with the details of business, and the practical operation of human affairs. The nisi prius discipline may render a judge more prompt and acute, and teach him to rely on his own resources. He may be a better judge of men, and more able to detect the perjury of a shuffling witness. But I am not aware that these qualifications will render him more fit to discharge the duties of a judge in the last resort. An Old Bailey solicitor is likely to be prompt, acute, and dextrous, but I should not expect from him a very profound or correct judgment on a difficult or intricate subject. A judge who employs all the intervals from his appellate duties in presiding at nisi prius, must come to the discharge of those duties with a mind exhausted, with habits unsuited to deliberate investigation. Perhaps an appellate judge ought to be, in some degree, abstracted and impracticable—at all events, not so practical and dextrous as to accommodate his rule to what he conceives fitting in every particular case. Under the system proposed by the amendment, the judges of the Supreme Court will discharge a portion of nisi prius duty—as much as can be serviceable by way of discipline, without overburdening them, or giving the peculiar and exclusive character of nisi prius judges.

It is said the judges should not be shut up at Washington; that they are likely to have an improper devotion to the power of the Government in whose service they are, and from which they derive their support; that this is to be corrected by the judges residing in the various States, and having intercourse with the people; that, having political functions to discharge, they should be conversant with public opinion, and imbibe the spirit of the times; that this is not only necessary to fit the court for discharging its duties ably and with safety to the rights of the States, but to command that public confidence in the court which is necessary to support it. By the amendment we propose, the judges will, in general, reside within the limits of their circuits, and, consequently, be dispersed over the United States. They will have a wider intercourse with the people than at present, and, consequently, more ample means of ascertaining public opinion. It is difficult to foresee the operation of any new system beforehand. There may be something in the plan we propose, to prevent its working successfully. Yet it seems that it is necessary to do something, and we must adopt what seems least objectionable. The plan proposed by the amendment, seems likely to remedy the inconveniences of the present system, without being liable to the objections which exist with respect to the system of the bill on your table.

Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Senate for upwards of an hour in opposition to the bill.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommit, and was decided in the negative, by yeas, and nays,—yeas 8, nays 84.

The bill was then reported to the House, and the amendment made in Committee of the Whole concurred in.

SATURDAY, April 15.

The bill "further to amend the Judicial System of the United States," was read a third time, passed by yeas and nays, and returned to the House for concurrence in the amendments.

Land for the Indiana Wabash and Lake Erie Canal.

The Senate then proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Indiana, for the purpose of aiding said State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Wabash River with those of Lake Erie.

[This bill grants for this purpose a quantity of land, equal to six sections in width, embracing the land on both sides of, and most contiguous to, the canal, from one end to the other, subject to the disposal of the State Legislature.]

A short debate took place on this bill. It was opposed by Messrs. CHANDLER, HOLMES, COBB, and FINDLAY, as a wild project in attempting to carry a canal through such a wilderness, nor was the length of the canal specified, and all the land which would be improved or rendered valuable by it, would be reserved to the State. Mr. FINDLAY expressed his willingness to assist it by subscribing for stock as they had done for other canals.

The bill was supported and defended by Messrs. HENDRICKS, HARRISON, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, who urged the practicability and importance of the canal, and the incapacity of the State of Indiana to effect it without the aid of Congress.

The following observations of one of the latter gentlemen, will serve to explain the grounds on which the bill was advocated.

Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, said, it would be unpardonable in him, at this late period of the session, to detain the Senate by a speech of any considerable length. On this subject, however, it is perhaps unnecessary for me, said Mr. HENDRICKS, to give any assurances, for it has not been my practice to obtrude myself upon the attention of this body in frequent or long debates. On the bill now before you, it was my intention, had it met the consideration of the Senate at an earlier day, to have said much more than I now shall. I feel myself indebted to the comity of the Senate, for resuming its consideration at this late hour of the session, and of the day, and will endeavor to repay that comity, by closing the discussion on my part in a very short time.

Sir, a moment at a time like this, when the members are starting and preparing to go, may be all-important to a measure. The Illinois Canal bill, which, about three hours ago, was defeated by an equal division of the Senate, would, in all probability, if on its passage at this moment, obtain a different result. One member from Maryland is gone home, one from Delaware is sick, and another, from Kentucky, leaves us in the morning. These, with one or two others believed to be friendly to the cause of internal improvements, being absent, diminish our prospects in the present case.

A report of the Committee on Roads and Canals accompanied this bill. It has been printed and laid on the tables of members almost three months. It has been read, and contains all the information which is most obviously connected with the subject. But, as inquiries have been made, and objections started, I will endeavor to answer them. It is said that the country is yet a wilderness, inhabited by Indians, and that it is idle to talk of improvements of this kind, which belong to advanced periods of the improvement of a country. Gentlemen talk of twenty years to come, of another generation, as time enough for such improvements as these. Suggestions of this kind are serious, inasmuch as they create difficulties in the minds of those who know nothing about our country, and operate unfavorably to the present question. In all other views, they would only show us from the West, how little gentlemen from the East and South know about our country, and could only excite a smile. On this subject, I refer gentlemen to the history of our country. In 1800, the Northwestern Territory, now the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, contained only a few thousand inhabitants, confined to the Connecticut Reserve, Vincennes, Kaskaskia, and Detroit, and a few settlements on the Ohio. That Territory now sustains a population of perhaps one million and a half; sends twenty members and one delegate to the other House; and, if an apportionment could be based on the present population, it would be entitled to six or eight more. Let me tell the gentleman from Maine, who has made this objection, that the fertile regions of the Western country, as the Indian title becomes extinguished, change instantaneously, as if by magic, from a dense forest to a highly cultivated country; and let me further tell the gentleman, that his own citizens and constituents, from the Penobscot and Kennebec, aid in producing this state of things. Sir, of all regions of the West which have been settled within the last four-and-twenty years, none has progressed with more rapidity than will this Wabash country. The canals of New York, the navigation of Lake Erie and of the Miami, to Fort Wayne, afford facilities, in arriving at this country, which never, until very recently, had any existence. Heretofore the approaches to that country from the East, were by land, in many instances a distance of a thousand miles; or else by water, from some navigable point on the Ohio, or its tributary streams. The exposures and fatigues of families in this removal well prepared the northern constitution for the diseases of the country, and inflicted, in many instances, innumerable calamities on the unfortunate emigrant. The reputation of the country for health was injured, and emigration discouraged. All this is now removed. The Western country of the Wabash is also better adapted to the northern emigrant than any district heretofore settled west of the State of Ohio. The situation of this district, then, in all respects, justifies the belief, that it will settle with a rapidity heretofore unknown.

Sir, the very fact that the country is unsettled, is the strongest reason for passing this bill. Why? the land is now your own. You have it yet to give, but the moment you put it into market, that ceases to be the case. You sell the best lands for one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and not only put it out of your power to aid the State in this way, but you produce this state of things. If ever the State should be able to make this canal, she will have to operate in a highly cultivated country, and have to pay five, ten, and twenty dollars per acre for the land through which it must pass. In this way, by not passing the bill before the lands are put in market, you not only refuse to do the State a positive good, but really inflict a positive injury.

It has also been objected that there has been no survey of the route; no estimates; that there may be various routes for this canal, and on this subject we have no information. Sir, the report just read, gives you, I believe, reasons which ought to be satisfactory on these points. Two years ago, you passed a law authorizing the State of Indiana to survey this route through your public lands, and gave the very liberal donation of land for the bed of the canal, and ninety feet on each side thereof; and you reserved, also, from sale, the sections through which this route might pass. The subject of this survey has been before the Legislature of the State. They refused to appropriate money to make the survey. They were, perhaps, correct in this. For, being destitute of the means of making the canal, it was deemed bad policy to expend money in its location. The location of the canal would only have attracted attention to the public land in that quarter; would have given a nominal and fictitious value to it, which for many years cannot be realized, without the aid of the General Government in constructing the canal. It would have insured the sale of the lands contiguous, and have created new difficulties for the State whensoever she might determine to engage in the work. The State of Indiana will not authorize the survey at her own expense, unless she has your aid in this, or some other form, to enable her to progress with the work.

There can be but one route for this canal. It must follow the stream from the western termination of the portage. It must keep the valley of the Wabash. This portage connects the river St. Mary's three miles above its junction with the St. Joseph's, with the waters of the Wabash. It is less than seven miles between the points, and so low is the summit level, that small water craft has frequently, in times of high water, passed from the one to the other. It is believed that a feeder of a few miles in length from the St. Joseph's will supply this summit with any quantity of water, or that the St. Mary's may be used for this purpose, by damming it in the vicinity of Fort Wayne. The fact, however, that the waters of the east and the west mingle at that point, proves the summit level to be very inconsiderable. As to the length of this canal, opinions are somewhat different. Some opinions say that a cut across this summit level will be sufficient; others, that the cut must be extended to the Little Wabash, a distance of twenty-five miles; and others, that it must be extended still further. The lowest point named is the mouth of Tippecanoe River. This is believed to be distant from Fort Wayne about one hundred miles. My own opinion is, that the canal should terminate below the mouth of the Mississinaway, and this would require a cut of perhaps fifty miles. Its length, however, is not so great a consideration. It is a matter of principle. Will you give lands for this purpose? If you will, its magnitude, though it should go to the Tippecanoe, ought not to deter you. You cannot doubt of the expediency of the measure, whether you look at the importance of the country contiguous, or the vast and fertile regions with which, and between which, it will open a communication. If the canal be a long one, it will be the more expensive, and the more will we require your aid. If it be a short one, the bill will give us less. As the bill is drawn, the appropriation will be in proportion to the length of the canal.

Executive Powers.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BRANCH, relative to the extent of the power of the Executive in appointing foreign Ministers.

And the question being on the indefinite postponement of the resolution,

Mr. HARPER, of South Carolina, spoke for an hour in support of the resolution.

He was followed by Mr. LLOYD, in opposition to the resolution.

Mr. TAKEWELL said the question for the consideration of the Senate is, whether the Constitution of the United States confers upon the President that power, which in his message of the 26th of December last, to this body, he asserts to be within his exclusive "constitutional competency."

I concur, entirely, said Mr. T. with the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. CHAMBERS,) in the opinion which he has expressed, that it is necessary to understand distinctly, in the first instance, what is the true nature and precise extent of the power the President has so asserted, before we can properly decide whether this power be within his "constitutional competency" or not. But I differ very widely from that Senator as to the correctness of the rule to which he refers, for the purpose of learning what the true nature and precise extent of his power is.

According to all received opinions upon the subject of interpretation, which have ever come under my observation, the meaning of language is to be sought for, first, in the obvious signification of the word used. If this be certain, the intention of him who used them is fixed and determined, but if doubt still remains, this doubt must be removed, by a reference to their context. And if certainty is not there found, then resort must be had to other words used contemporaneously by the same author, in reference to the same, or even similar subjects. It is by these rules the President must judge of the meaning of our language, used in bills sent to him for his approbation; and by the same rules, therefore, we must judge of the meaning of his language, used in messages sent by him to this body.

Tried by any of these well-approved standards, the true nature and precise extent of the power asserted by the President upon this occasion, is clear and confessed. The "measure" which he deems to be within his constitutional competency, he expressly declares to be that mentioned by him in his message to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the present session. In that message this "measure" is pronounced to be, "the commissioning of Ministers on the part of the United States to attend at the deliberations of the Congress of Panama, and to take part in them." So that the obvious signification of the words used to denote the true nature and precise extent of the power asserted by the President, upon this occasion, is, that the authority to appoint and commission such ministers, is within his exclusive constitutional competency; and this, without any limitation or qualification whatever.

If, however, any doubt could yet remain, as to the nature and extent of the power thus claimed, without stint or limit, that doubt must yield to the explanation of the words used by the President, given by himself, in their context. His language is, that "although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it, before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the legislature." Hence, it plainly appears, that the power asserted by the President, was a power not then (viz. December 26) executed, but remaining yet to be executed—a power which, although deemed to be within his constitutional competency, was one, in the execution of which he had not then (December 26) thought proper to take any step. A power, in the execution of which he needed no aid from the concurring act of the Senate, whom he had consulted, not as to the power, but as to the expediency of exerting it in the particular case. So that, if this assertion be correct, the Senate are indebted for the privilege of giving any opinion in relation to the "measure," not to the constitution, but to the gracious good will of the President alone, within whose exclusive "constitutional competency" the power of creating and of consummating this new political relation is deemed by him to reside.

But, sir, some meaning must be annexed to the President's words, and what is the rule of interpretation by which the Senator from Maryland contends we ought to try them, for the purpose of ascertaining their true signification? He admits that the power is asserted in terms general and unqualified; but tells us that an intended limitation and restriction of the terms used may be found elsewhere, if we will but search for it. And where, sir, does he search for this intended limitation? In the context? No. In the contemporaneous exposition given by the President himself? No. But he says, we must take these general and unqualified terms in connection with other language, to be found in other documents which came to us covered by the same envelope that enclosed this message, and to which other documents we are referred by the message itself. That is to say, sir, to learn the true meaning of plain words used by the President upon one occasion, in a confidential message to this body, and in relation to one subject, we must resort to other words, used by the Secretary of State upon another occasion, in letters to foreign Ministers, relating to a different subject! If this rule of interpretation be correct, the Senator from Maryland, so far as I know, is certainly entitled to all the merit of an invention so novel, and, as it seems to me, so singular also.

I do not think, however, that even this newly invented rule of construction will stand the Senator from Maryland in much stead, at least upon this occasion. For, if you refer to these letters of the Secretary of State, which it is proposed to connect with this message, in order to understand the true meaning of the words used in the latter, you will discover that Mr. Clay, in referring to the consent of the Senate, as a preliminary to the appointment of Ministers to Panama, does not intend to inform the foreign Ministers to whom he was writing, what was the nature and extent of the power which the President claimed to be his, but merely to state to them as a fact the mode in which that power would be employed, in this particular case. Whereas, in this message, the President refers, not to the power he meant to employ, but to that which he deemed to be within his "constitutional competency," although he did not mean to exert it upon that occasion. The President claims a right, avowing in his claim itself, that he did not intend to exert it at that time, although it was his; while the Secretary refers to the manner in which a supposed existing power would be then employed.

Every one must see, immediately, that it would have been as great an assumption on the part of the Secretary if he had undertaken to communicate to any foreign Minister, the extent of what he deemed to be the rights of the mere abstract authority of the President, which it was not intended to exert, as it is admitted to be on the part of the President, to assert such an authority without limitation or restriction. It is inconceivable by me, then, in what way the statement of Mr. Clay, made to a foreign Minister, as to the manner in which the power of the President would be employed by him, in a particular case, can assist us in discovering what is the true nature and precise extent of a general and unlimited authority, claimed by the President, but which is expressly declared by him not to be intended to be used on that occasion. And yet, this is the sole source from whence the Senator from Maryland has derived his opinion, that the President, by the broad and unqualified terms he has employed in this message, meant to assert nothing more than the right of appointing Ministers to Panama, during the recess of the Senate.

And here, Mr. President, I cannot avoid again noticing the unkindness to the President, of those who wish to interpolate in his message these words, "during the recess of the Senate," which are not to be found even in the documents accompanying it. To defend him from the charge of claiming an authority, which it is conceded on all sides that the constitution never conferred upon him, they would not only convict him of the grossest ignorance of his mother tongue, but now seek to fix upon him the imputation of the miserable, puerile, childish vanity, of asserting unnecessarily, and "ex cathedra," to the Senate in session, what would have been his power if they had not been in session! If, sir, I could once bring myself to the belief that such was his real purpose, I would advise my friend from North Carolina (Mr. BRANCH) to withdraw his resolution, and in its stead propose to the Senate to return as an answer to this message, the only proper reply it would, I think, merit, by sending him the contemptuous Spartan IF, engrossed in capital letters, upon the largest skin of parchment which could be found.

But, sir, I stand not here to prosecute philological inquiries, or to adjust with the President the terms which courtesy and good manners prescribe as proper to be attended to, in his intercourse with the co-ordinate departments of this Government. I have risen to defend the privileges of the Senate, and the rights of the sovereign State whose representative I am, both of which I deem to have been assailed, by the covert assertion of a dangerous power, the exertion of which is insidiously waived, in the very claim wherein the authority is declared to exist. And, therefore, as it has been distinctly conceded on all hands, that the power which I have contended to be asserted, and which I still believe to have been intentionally asserted, by the President, in this message of December 26th, does not belong to him, I will now proceed to examine that, which the Senator from Maryland, and he from Massachusetts, (Mr. MILLA,) admit to be claimed by the President, and which they both strenuously contend, does of right belong to him.

What is that power? It is the very same in kind, although not in degree, with that which they have admitted not to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive. Limiting its exercise to the recess of the Senate, they contend that, during such a recess, the President has the uncontrolled power to send any Ministers, to any nation, or to any people under the sun, at his mere will and pleasure. Yes, sir, that he has authority, the moment we adjourn, to send a Minister to Greece, or to Hayti, if he shall choose to do so. Not only may he do this, but that, during the recess of the Senate, he may send any Minister he thinks proper, to any congress of any nations, or of any people, (whether assembled at Panama, or at Verona, or Vienna,) with which he in his unrestrained discretion may see fit to connect us; and that he may clothe these his Ministers, when so sent, with any powers, functions, or authorities he may choose, even to contract alliances offensive and defensive, or to pledge the faith of the United States, for any purpose whatever.

Such, sir, is the position these Senators take. And how have they supported the assertion of this enormous prerogative, which they claim to appertain to the President as of right? Have they sought support for it in the written precepts of the constitution? No. Do they deduce it from any principle derived from the general theory of our Government, or the genius and spirit of our institutions? No. But they support this extravagant pretension, horribly portentous as it is to the best interests and dearest rights of this people, by a few PRECEDENTS, which their industry has enabled them to pick up, in the obscurity where they lay hid, sparsely scattered here and there in the secret history of our diplomatic intercourse, "ab urbe condita." Yes, sir, they find in our archives examples such as our sacred history records of angel visits, "but few and far between," and because they have discovered a few cases, in which a power supposed to be somewhat analogous to that for which they contend, has been exercised by some

Presidents, under circumstances altogether new and very peculiar, they think they argue fairly and logically from such premises, when they conclude that, because some former Presidents have exerted some such power, under some special circumstances, that therefore the present and future Presidents may exert, as of right, a similar power, in all cases whatsoever. They contend, that because, during the recess of the Senate, a Consul has been appointed by one President, to supervise the interests of our sailors in the port of some nation with which we had long carried on commerce, ergo, during a like recess, all Presidents may of right appoint Ministers to any other nation, with which we have never had connection of any kind, even China, Japan, or the Grand Turk. They contend, that because, during the recess of the Senate, one President, in time of flagrant war, has appointed a Minister to negotiate a peace with a barbarian tribe, ergo, during the like recess, all Presidents, in time of peace, may of right appoint Envoys Extraordinary, to recognize the independence of any people, struggling to free themselves from the domination of their former Sovereign, our approved friend. And they contend, that because, during the recess of the Senate, one President, in a time of universal peace, has appointed a Minister to an ancient and acknowledged Sovereign, merely to maintain with him the customary relations of courtesy, amity, and commerce, ergo, during the like recess, all Presidents may appoint so many deputies as they think proper, to a Congress, to be composed of they know not whom, or for what purpose assembled.

Such, sir, is the nature and effect of the sole argument which has been urged upon this subject. An argument, the error of which is stamped so strongly and plainly upon its very face, that I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate in answering it, was it not for the awfully important consequences to which it unavoidably leads. As these consequences, however, involve the very existence of this Government, and the liberties of the people, I hope I shall be excused if I detain you longer than perhaps I ought, while I examine in detail the various cases to which we have been referred, and upon which alone this argument is made to rest.

Before I do this, Mr. President, I must be permitted to premise some general remarks in which (if they be correct) the Senate will find a satisfactory answer to all these precedents, were they even more numerous, and more strictly applicable, than those to which we have been referred.

And first, sir, I utterly deny the correctness of this doctrine, which seeks to create a new, substantive, and fruitful source of power, in existing or future Presidents, from the past practices of their predecessors. And I deny more strongly, if I may do so, the authority to enlarge the volume of power, issuing from this newly discovered fountain by the process of induction and reasoning by analogy. Let it be once granted that the practice of one President gives a legitimate authority to his successor, and that this authority may be enlarged by analogies, and it must be obvious to all, that the power granted by the people to the Executive, although made by the constitution but a school-boy's snowball, in a few turns would become a monstrous avalanche, that must one day crush themselves. Under a Government founded upon a written constitution, by which none other than limited power is granted, and in which all powers not granted are expressly reserved; in the nature of things there can be no other legitimate source of authority, than the written constitution itself. Any department of such a government, therefore, which exerts a power that cannot be deduced directly from this constitution, is guilty of usurpation.

It is true, that where the language of the constitution in its grants of power is doubtful, the constant practice under it, regularly and invariably pursued, whenever a case has arisen within the scope of the doubtful grant, and in which practice all have acquiesced, and for a long time, is entitled to very high respect; and perhaps I might even go further, and say, ought to be considered as conclusive, to show that such a practice was of right. And why is this? It is because, in a doubtful case, such constant and regular practices, so uniformly and invariably acquiesced in, amount to the highest evidence, to prove the correctness of the original construction of the grant, from which grant the power is directly deduced. But where the constitution is not doubtful, or where cases are found of mere occasional departure from the principles on which the constitution itself is founded, although the parchment rolls should reach high as Pelion piled on Ossa, and Olympus upon Pelion, the precedents they may furnish ought not to weigh even as "the dust in the balance."

If this be so, it follows necessarily, that before any case furnished by our archives can be considered as entitled to the slightest respect, as a precedent of rightful power, it must be clearly shown to be in accordance with the principles of our institutions, not contrariant to the expressed precepts of the constitution, and to have been adopted as a rule regularly and invariably observed in all other cases of the same kind, which preceded or followed it. I say regularly and invariably observed: for liberty can have none but negative precedents in its favor. It exists only in the exemption from the oppression and usurpation of power. And as even the successful resistance of attempted usurpation merely dams up the stream, leaving no trace of its intended course but in the dry and vacant channel, which, if unobstructed, it might perhaps have occupied—so the want of precedent, in cases where precedents of power might be found, if it had been supposed to exist, is the highest authority to show that it has never been granted, even where the words of the grant are doubtful, and the power claimed is in accordance with the principles of our institutions.

Again, sir, let it not be forgotten, that it is not the practice of the Government, but the long and quiet acquiescence of the people, under that practice, which gives a tacit assent to the power exerted, in a doubtful case. It is their tacit assent, to be inferred from such acquiescence, that sanctifies the claims, and approves the construction of the doubtful grant, from which the power asserted is directly deduced. Therefore, before any case furnished can be considered as entitled to the slightest respect as a precedent of rightful power, it must be shown to be one of sufficient importance to have attracted general observation, and of sufficient publicity to have been generally known and understood: for none can be supposed to approve that which they never observed, or observing, did not understand.

And this, sir, cuts up the argument of analogy at once, by the roots; for, as nothing can be approved, but that which is observed and understood, to contend that, because the fact of power exerted, has been understood, and acquiesced in, that therefore all the inductions which even fair analogy may deduce from this fact are also approved, would be as absurd as to contend that all had approved of the Newtonian theory, who had ever seen a pear fall. All men were capable of noticing and understanding this fact, and most men would see the first and obvious consequences resulting from it; yet, none but a Newton could have traced their analogies, and by the aid of induction, have inferred from thence the law of the Universe. So, too, when a fact of power exerted is shown to have occurred, under circumstances inviting general observation, and permitting general knowledge of its existence, if it has been acquiesced in quietly, it may be fair to argue that the power exerted in that particular case, has been tacitly approved; and so conclude that the same power may be properly again exerted in the same mode, and under the same circumstances. But the inference must go no further; because nothing beyond this can be then known, is then generally understood, or can be fairly supposed to be approved.

Whosoever, then, seeks to derive power from, or to sustain it by precedent merely, must show a precedent agreeing, not in some, but in all essentials, with the case before him. There must be no abstractions in the argument. Principles must not be inferred from one case, by the process of induction, and enlarged and extended by the process of analogy to other cases of a like kind, from whence again new principles are to be deduced, and these again enlarged by new analogies. This may be permitted in physics, because there experiment may be perpetually resorted to, in order to test the truth of the reasoning. But it must not be endured in the politics of a free country, where a written constitution exists, the sole object of which is to prevent such experiments from being made.

This, sir, is a Republican Government, the form of which was dictated by suspicion, and guarded by jealousy, especially of Executive power. To such a Government it is obvious, no more power would be granted, than what was believed to be necessary to attain the objects which its authors, the people, had in view; and that the powers necessary to this end would be checked and balanced, by distributing them between the different departments, each independent of the other, and placed as a sentinel over its acts. That concurrence of opinion between different departments would be requisite in all matters involving great interests; and that the high destinies of the people would never be committed to the unrestrained discretion of any single man. These principles are dictated by the spirit of all our institutions, and exhibited in every part of our constitution itself. Such principles, however, cannot be reconciled with this enormous prerogative claimed for the President, although its exercise be limited only to the period of the recess of the Senate. For it must not escape notice, that, according to this new doctrine, the President is not compelled to act while the Senate is in session, but may forbear to do so, until the recess, without the least disparagement of his asserted power. The office of a foreign Minister, according to this argument, is one created by the public law; is recognized merely, by the constitution, as an office of potential existence, to be filled only, when an exigency arises requiring it to be called into action, and of the occurrence of such an exigency the President is supposed to be the sole judge. So that, if the Executive will but suspend the declaration of its judgment until Congress adjourns, immediately thereupon he may pronounce a vacancy to have happened in any office appertaining to our foreign intercourse, and proceed to fill up the vacancy so produced, as one occurring during the recess of the Senate. All original appointments belonging to our foreign relations are thus placed within the absolute power of the President, by this argument; and as no one has or can deny to him the right of filling up vacancies, actually happening in such offices, during the recess of the Senate, after they have been once filled, the whole power over the foreign relations of the United States is thus virtually transferred to the Executive, without check or limitation. A prerogative so vast and magnificent, which would endow the chief magistrate of a free people with plenary regal power, is not in accordance with the jealous spirit of our Republican institutions.

It is, moreover, sir, directly contrary to the written and expressed precepts of the constitution. To secure the liberties of the people, the constitution created three co-ordinate departments of Government—the Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, each independent of the other; and it distributed between them all the powers it meant to convey. Beginning with the Legislative department, it provides, in the first section of the first article, that all the Legislative power therein granted should be vested in a Congress, to consist of two bodies, the House of Representatives and Senate. Pursuing this division it proceeds, in the three first paragraphs of the second section of this article, to prescribe the manner in which the House of Representatives shall be chosen. And, having thus provided a full and complete House, it then proceeds, in the fourth paragraph, to declare the mode in which vacancies happening therein shall be filled, viz.: “when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.”

Here the term “vacancy” first occurs in the constitution; and here it is most manifest that it must refer to an office once filled, but afterwards becoming vacant, by some occurrence “happening” to the incumbent, during the term for which he had been chosen. And that the only authority here given to the State Executive is, to employ the prescribed means “to fill” this appointment, which, having been once supplied, had so become empty. This construction, called for by the plain signification of the words of the constitution, has received the sanction of this whole people, from the beginning of the Government to this hour; and no example exists, in which the Executive of a State has ever ventured to issue a writ of election, except to supply vacancies in the House of Representatives, produced by some event “happening” after an original election had been made, and during the term for which such election was made. The meaning of the words, as used in this part of the instrument, is therefore fixed and determined.

The same signification is again given to the same words where they are next found. Having directed the manner of creating the House of Representatives, and preserving it complete, throughout its constitutional term of two years, in the second section of the first article; the constitution, in the third section of the same article, takes up the other branch of the legislature, the Senate. In the first paragraph of the third section, it provides how, and by whom, the members of this body shall be at first chosen; and having so provided a full and complete Senate, it proceeds, in the second paragraph, to declare the mode in which future “vacancies” in that body also shall be filled. Its language is, “if vacancies happen, by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.”

Now here it is more clear, if possible, than in the former case, that the “vacancy” which the State Executive is authorized to supply, by a temporary appointment, is not an original vacancy, (if I may so speak,) but a “vacancy” occurring in the Senate, after the appointment of a Senator has been once made by the legislature; and which vacancy has "happened" by resignation or otherwise, not only during the term for which the first senator was appointed, but during the recess of the legislature of any State. And if any confirmation of the correctness of this construction could be required, it would readily be found in the decision of this Senate itself, in the case of Mr. Lanman, the Senator from Connecticut, made in March, 1825. The circumstances of that case are of so recent date, and the decision itself being made by the members now here present, it cannot be necessary to state it more particularly. The meaning of the terms used in the constitution being thus fixed and determined, in the two instances where they first occur, we ought not to doubt that they were employed in the same sense where we shall next find them.

Executive Powers.

Having disposed of the Legislative department in its first article, the constitution proceeds, in the second, to provide for the Executive, to prescribe the mode of its appointment, and to endow it with its appropriate powers. In describing these powers, the subject of appointment to offices constitutes the matter of the second paragraph of the second section of this article; and this power is therein delineated by these words: "He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

Had the constitution stopped here, none could doubt that the power of appointment, even of the lowest officer under the Government, could not have been rightfully exercised by the President alone, at any time whatever, unless in pursuance of some law providing that this might be done. In all other cases, this power is expressly granted to him in conjunction with the Senate, without whose advice and consent it could not be rightfully exercised. But the constitution does not stop here. Having, as in the former cases, prescribed the general mode in which all original appointments were to be made, it proceeds, in the next paragraph of the same section, to provide for "vacancies." Its language is, "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session." And it is under this clause that gentlemen derive the prerogative, which they claim for the President, of calling into existence, during the recess of the Senate, new offices, never before filled, and of filling them at his pleasure.

According to their theory, the office, like original sin, has existed throughout all time. Aware, however, of the difficulties to which this proposition would lead, when it should be replied, that, if the office did so exist, it must always have been vacant; and of course that the vacancy did not "happen during the recess of the Senate," they have resorted to the distinction between potential and actual existence, making vacancy apply only to the latter state — of the occurrence of which the President is, in their opinion, the sole judge. To this subtle argument, I answer, first, that the same words here used have been shown to be employed in two preceding clauses of the constitution, in reference to the same subject of vacancies. That their signification has been there fixed beyond all doubt; and has been shown to refer not to potential but to actual office, in which, being once filled, a vacancy has happened, by reason of some occurrence to the former incumbent. And that the same interpretation must therefore be given to the same words when they occur here for the third time in the same instrument.

My opinion has ever been, Mr. President, that, as the constitution has expressly declared "the Executive power shall be vested in a President," this power of appointment to office would have necessarily belonged to him, as an incident of the general Executive authority with which he was thus clothed, but for the other provision, to which I have already referred, by which the advice and consent of the Senate is made necessary to give effect to this power. Thinking thus, I have ever regarded this clause, which authorizes the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint to office, not as a donation, but as a limitation of the power of the Executive. But for this clause, the whole power would have been his; and this as well during the session, as during the recess of the Senate. That jealousy and dread of Executive power, however, which is manifested in so many other parts of this instrument, induced the framers of the constitution to check and limit it, by requiring the concurrence of the Senate in its exercise, in all cases. Foreseeing, then, that even after the appointments had been originally made, in the mode prescribed, that vacancies might nevertheless occur in the offices which had been so supplied, and that the vacancies might happen during the recess of the Senate, the framers of the constitution made an exception to the general rule they had so previously declared; and by the clause, before referred to, gave to the President the full power to fill up all such vacancies. In doing this, they merely gave to him a power similar to that which they had before given to the Executive of each of the States, in relation to the like vacancies occurring in this body, and no more. The construction now contended for, however, would make the exception even larger than the rule itself; and not only so, but, by the force of the proviso, would render nugatory the rule, to which it is an exception merely, and which rule was intended to limit and restrain a power of the President, that without it would be unqualified.

If, sir, I have been successful in the attempts I have thus made, to show that the power claimed for the President upon this occasion is opposed to the principles of our institutions, and forbidden by the precepts and limitations of the constitution, it would not be necessary, probably, to notice the cases, in which such unauthorized power is supposed to have been exerted. But, sir, the name and fame of the wise and good men, under whose administration these supposed acts of lawless usurpation are said to have occurred, is dear to this people. Their well-earned reputation is public property of great and inestimable value, and of no one particle of which am I willing to be deprived, until the right to commit the waste is clearly made out. I ask your indulgence, and that of the Senate, a while longer, therefore, while I shall endeavor to prove, that neither Washington, or Jefferson, or Madison, have ever claimed or used any such power, as that which the existing President asserts to be within his "constitutional competency," and which the cases referred to are supposed to sanction.

The first of these cases is that of John Paul Jones, who, according to the document read by the Senator from Massachusetts, was appointed by President Washington, in May, 1792, during the recess of the Senate, as a Minister to Algiers, to negotiate a treaty of peace and of commerce with that power.

This is the first case which industry has been enabled to discover, of any supposed original appointment, made by the President, without the advice of the Senate. And as it seems in some of its features to bear resemblance to other cases which afterwards appear, I shall examine it with more minuteness than I think it is entitled to, in order to relieve myself from the necessity of again touching the same topic.

The first remark I shall make upon it is, that it occurred in May, 1792, more than three years after this constitution had been in full operation. Now, if the ideas which Senators have announced during this debate be correct, the moment this constitution went into operation, on the 4th of March, 1789, it called into potential existence every office which is therein recognized. The very creation of this new Government, terminated the official existence of every foreign diplomatic functionary of the United States, and so produced the necessity of re-establishing all the foreign relations which it had been desirable to create. The whole field of vacant offices was thus thrown open to President Washington; and a policy which, in many instances, must have been dictated by almost necessity, required of him to fill up these potential vacancies. But yet this great and good man, although placed in such circumstances, never ventured to make a single original appointment, of any kind, without the advice and consent of the Senate. Here then is not one, but a body of precedents, occurring continuously throughout more than three years of time, during almost every hour of which, occasion not only existed, but invited to exercise the power which is now asserted, and in no one instance was it claimed or used. This, sir, is not only strong proof that both Washington and the wise counsellors by whom he was then surrounded, believed that the power now claimed had not been granted; but ought to have induced those who rely upon this case of Commodore Jones to have examined it more attentively, before they brought it here as evidence to show the change in such an opinion.

The next remark I shall make upon it is, that even according to the representation given of it, it was the case of an agent sent to a barbarian people, who were not then, and have never since been recognized, as forming any component part of the family of civilized nations. Let me not be told, that the constitutional power of the President is the same, whether exerted in reference to a savage or a civilized nation. We all know that this is not so. No appointment of a minister who has ever been employed to negotiate for peace, or for any thing else, with any Indian tribe, whether dwelling within or without our territory, whether Osage or Seminole, has ever been laid before the Senate for their consent. They are all considered as agents of the President, and not public ministers of the people; and all our intercourse with barbarians must, of necessity, present anomalies, from which no principles can be inferred. I will not go into reasoning to show why this must and ought to be so, although it would be easy to show it. I merely state the fact, which is conclusive to prove that the case of a mission to Algiers or to the Choctaws, can never be a precedent to justify a mission to Panama.

The next remark I shall make upon this case is, that when it occurred, flagrant war existed between Algiers and the United States; and war, all know, justified, by the very necessities it creates, the exertion of powers that ought not to be endured in peace. He who would infer the principles of peace from the precedents of war, reasons falsely. He might as well deduce precepts of morality from the practices of vice, or seek to learn from the atheist the doctrines of Christianity.

And here, Mr. President, let me develop more fully an idea I suggested upon a former occasion, and upon which the Senator from Maryland has made some remarks. I then said, and I repeat it, that, war existing, the President of the United States is authorized by the constitution to send a Minister to negotiate for peace, not under his general power of appointment, but under his special authority to direct the operations of the existing war. I prove it thus: Peace is the sole legitimate object of all war. To attain this desirable end, the moment war exists, every man, woman, and child, of the one belligerent, is made the enemy of every man, woman, and child, of the other; each at liberty to do the other all the harm in its power, in order to constrain it to sue for peace. The President of the United States is, by the constitution, made the commander in chief of their army and navy: and in that character is authorized, nay bound, to direct the military force of the country in time of war, so as to accomplish the great object of war, which is peace, in the most speedy and effectual manner his discretion may suggest. And that which he may do in person, if not forbidden by law, he may do by his Minister or agent. Now, sir, can I be wrong when I conclude from such premises, that he who may negotiate for peace by the roar of artillery, by the conflagration of cities, by the desolation of a country, by the wailings of widows, the shrieks of orphans, and the groans of dying men—that he who may negotiate for a peace by blood and carnage, may do so with pen, ink, and paper, also?

The Senator from Maryland tells us, however, and refers to Vattel as his authority, that the commander of an army cannot conclude a peace; that the power of concluding peace is a high attribute of sovereignty, which can be exercised by none other than those to whom this sovereign right belongs. No one doubts this. I have never contended that the commander of an army could, as such, even negotiate for a peace. But I have contended that the Chief Executive Magistrate of the United States, created by the constitution the commander and director of all their military and naval force, may depute either his commanding General, or Admiral, or anybody else, to negotiate for a peace. Mark, sir, I say to negotiate for a peace, and do not say to conclude a peace. Should the President depute his General to do this, the negotiation will be conducted by such commander, not in virtue of the powers incident to him as a commander, but in pursuance of the authority delegated to him as a Minister or agent. Should such negotiation eventuate in a treaty, the treaty will not be obligatory until it has received the consent of those to whom this portion of the sovereign authority belongs. Nor will the peace be concluded by it until the ratifications of the treaty, so approved, have been interchanged by the high contracting sovereignties who are parties to it.

Then, as the United States and Algiers were at war, when this appointment of John Paul Jones as minister to the latter, to treat of peace, took place, President Washington had the clear right, under the constitution, to make such appointment. But the Senator from Massachusetts here remarks, that this appointment constituted Commodore Jones a Minister to treat not only of peace but of commerce also. And, as commerce has nothing to do with war, he asks how this can be justified; except by referring it to the power of appointment, to be exercised by the President, during the recess of the Senate? This reminds me of a question which used to be mooted in the schools, whether, according to the theory of the British law, which does not acknowledge a moment of interregnum, Charles the First was beheaded in his own reign, or in that of his successor. When this question was once discussed, a gentleman present remarked that, as this event must have occurred either during the one epoch or the other, if it ever did occur, and as great doubts seemed to exist whether either proposition was true, a preliminary question ought to be settled, viz., was King Charles the First ever beheaded? So too, here, before we inquire as to the functions with which the Minister might properly be charged, we had better previously settle the right of the President to send him: for in deciding the one question, we must necessarily determine the other.

If the Senator from Massachusetts will condescend (and his inquiries seem to do so) that the existence of war justifies the President, during the recess of the Senate, to despatch a minister to treat of peace; then, as peace must be concluded before any negotiation concerning commerce could commence—and as, before peace could be concluded, a treaty must have been ratified, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, which advice and consent necessarily presupposes their approbation of the appointment of the Minister who negotiated the treaty—the conclusion cannot be avoided, that the appointment of the Minister, as a Minister to treat of commerce, was not made without, but must have been made with, the approbation of the Senate. If gentlemen will deal in abstractions, and seek to puzzle us by such subtleties of distinction, I beg of them to recollect, that, although the authority to treat of commerce may have been inscribed on the same parchment whereon was written the authority to treat of peace; yet, in the nature of things, the former appointment must have been (to use their own phrase) a mere potential appointment, having neither salary nor duty attached to it, until it was approved by the Senate, in their consent to the latter, given by their approbation of a treaty of peace; that, until this assent was had, and peace actually concluded, the authority to treat of commerce was a mere contingent instruction, and created no office; and that, before it could become an office, the nomination which would make it such, must have received the advice and consent of the Senate; without which, no original appointment, except to treat of peace, ever has been made or ever can constitutionally be made.

If I be right, Mr. President, in the view which I have thus taken of this case, it results that President Washington would have had the clear right to make the appointment of John Paul Jones, at the time, and under the circumstances existing, when he is supposed to have done so; and that case therefore constitutes no precedent to support the high prerogative claimed by President Adams now. But, sir, understanding the character of President Washington, as I think I do, foreseeing the probable consequences (which must have been seen by him also) that may result from ever sending a Minister to any barbarian people, who scorn to acknowledge themselves bound by the wise provisions of the public law; and finding the strongest evidence of his opinion, as to his constitutional authority in relation to original appointments, in his absolute abstinence from making any such, during the recess of the Senate, throughout the whole of his administration, except in this single instance—when this case of John Paul Jones was first exhibited, I was induced by these considerations, to suspect very strongly, that there was some mistake about it; and therefore have looked into its facts with more solicitude than I should otherwise have felt. The result of this research has confirmed my suspicions. John Paul Jones never was appointed a minister to Algiers for any purpose. Nor did President Washington take a single step, in reference to the new relation which he wished to establish with that power, that was not previously advised and approved by the Senate.

The history of the transaction, [the appointment of John Paul Jones,] as it stands recorded on the secret journals of the Senate, since made public, and now to be found in the 10th volume of Wait's state papers, pages 254, et seq. is this: it was the custom of President Washington, (would to God, sir, it was the custom of the present President also!) whenever any new case of importance arose, in which it was necessary for him to act, to consult with the Senate, as his sworn constitutional advisers, and to ask their advice as to the course which he ought to adopt. In pursuance of this custom, when he saw that war existed with Algiers; that many of our citizens had been made captives, and were then held in bondage by that power; and that our then defenceless commerce was daily exposed to injury while this war continued; President Washington sent a message to the Senate, stating to them these facts, informing them that a prospect then appeared of making a peace, and communicating the terms upon which he believed this desirable object might be accomplished. In this message he asked the advice of the Senate, whether he should enter into negotiation with Algiers for this object or not; and, if so, what ought to be the terms upon which the peace ought to be made. In reply to this message, the Senate, on the 8th of May, 1792, advised him to enter into the proposed negotiation, and to conclude the peace if he could, upon the terms proposed. And, to enable the accomplishment of this object, an act was passed by Congress on the same day, appropriating fifty thousand dollars; and the celebrated Paul Jones, (who was then in Europe,) was selected by the President, as the agent most proper to carry these views into effect, and commissioned in June of the same year.

At the time this transaction occurred, some reasons existed to apprehend, that, if the plan of the United States was known, some European power would endeavor to embarrass its execution, and defeat its object. It was therefore kept a profound secret. Mr. Jefferson, the then Secretary of State, in the instructions intended for Commodore Jones, uses this remarkable language:—"Supposing that there exists a disposition to thwart our negotiations with the Algerines, and that this would be very practicable, we have thought it advisable that the knowledge of this appointment should rest with the President, Mr. Pinckney, and myself; for which reason you will perceive that the commissions are all in my own handwriting; for the same reason, entire secrecy is recommended to you; and that you so cover from the public your departure and destination, as that they may not be conjectured or noticed." Now the idea of a secret minister was one much too absurd ever to have entered such a head as that of either Washington or Jefferson. Jones was never, therefore, appointed a "public minister," but a mere secret agent of the President; and is expressly styled in the instructions intended for him a "commissioner." He never acted under this appointment, however, but died soon after it was made. Upon his death, Mr. Barclay was appointed to the same situation, and with the same instructions. He too died "re infectis;" and then Mr. Humphries, our Minister Plenipotentiary resident at Madrid, was directed to perform this duty, which he accordingly accomplished.

Such, sir, is the history of the case of John Paul Jones, who was secretly deputed by the President to execute a measure previously advised by the Senate, and who never accepted or acted under this appointment, as a secret agent to a barbarian tribe, the object of which was to terminate a dreadful war, then raging. If such a case can be made to support the enormous prerogative now asserted by, and claimed for the Executive, my faculties are much too obtuse to enable me to discern the mode in which this can be done.

The next case to which we have been referred is that of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, in 1806. And here let it be remarked by the Senate, that no other case of any original appointment of a minister to any foreign state, made during the recess of the Senate, except that of John Paul Jones, has been referred to as occurring throughout the whole administration of President Washington; that no case of any such appointment, made throughout the whole administration of his successor, President Adams, has been produced; and that no such case has been supposed to exist during the first five years of the administration of his successor, President Jefferson; seventeen successive years from the creation of this Government had then passed by, during each of which, frequent occasions must have existed for the exercise of the power now asserted by the President; and yet no single case can be found of any claim being preferred to, or any exertions of such a power; such forbearance makes a body of evidence to show that no such power was believed to exist, too strong, I think, to be resisted. But let us see if even this case be an anomaly, or the commencement of a new practice.

The Senator from Maryland produces extracts from two commissions bearing even date in May, 1806, during the recess of the Senate; and states that he has been informed at the State Department, that these appointments were then made. One of these commissions constituted Mr. Pinkney our minister resident at the Court of St. James; and the other appoints that gentleman and Mr. Monroe Envoys Extraordinary, to negotiate a treaty with that court. Now, sir, as to the first of these commissions, it shows upon its face that it constituted Mr. Pinkney the successor of Mr. Monroe. This minister having asked his recall, and his wish being granted by the President, a vacancy so happened in this office then actually pre-existing, and once supplied with an incumbent. And this vacancy occurring during the recess of the Senate, no one can doubt that the President had then the clear right, under the constitution, to fill up such a vacancy as he did.

Executive Powers.

As to the other commission, the Senator from Maryland has been misinformed at the Department of State; and the mistake in that department has most probably been produced, in this and in many other cases, by confounding the date of the appointment with the date of the commission. A reference to the journals of the Senate will show, that the nomination of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, as Envoys Extraordinary, to negotiate a treaty with Great Britain, was regularly made by President Jefferson to the Senate, on the 19th day of April, 1806, and their appointment regularly advised and consented to by that body on the 21st day of the same month. So that this case, too, is nothing more than an example of the regular exercise by the President, of a clear right, placed within his competency by the constitution itself.

The next case to which we have been referred is that of Mr. Short, who was appointed by President Jefferson, Minister to St. Petersburg, during the recess of the Senate, in 1808, nineteen years after this Government had been in operation, during all which time no such power had ever been before claimed or exercised.

The facts of this case are as follow: Under the old Confederation, Mr. Dana had been appointed by the old Congress a minister to this court, in 1780, but was never received or accredited there. In 1808, "the Emperor of Russia having on several occasions indicated sentiments particularly friendly to the United States, and having expressed a wish through different channels, that a diplomatic intercourse should be established between the two countries," President Jefferson believing, "in the then extraordinary state of the world, and under the constant possibility of sudden negotiations for peace, that the friendly dispositions of such a power might be advantageously cherished by a mission which should manifest our willingness to meet his good will," appointed Mr. Short, during the recess of the Senate, as Minister to Russia. Such is the account given of this appointment by the President himself, in his message of the 24th February, 1809, to the Senate. Notwithstanding the extraordinary emergency which was then said to exist, however, and which alone, as has been stated, was relied upon by President Jefferson, to excuse for the exertion of this then unprecedented exercise of power, the Senate, on the 27th of February, rejected the nomination by a unanimous vote.

The Senator from Massachusetts was aware of this, and seeks to obviate the conclusion to which it necessarily and directly leads, by the suggestion, that the rejection proceeded from the opinion entertained by the Senate, as to the mere inexpediency of the mission. The facts, however, do not support such a suggestion: for, although a resolution had been previously offered by one of the Senators, expressive of such an opinion, this resolution was withdrawn by the mover, and the vote of the Senate was upon the naked nomination contained in the message to which I have just referred. While, therefore, the case may show the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, that, in an extraordinary emergency, the President may make an appointment of a Minister, during the recess of the Senate, to an ancient sovereign, to whom the United States had previously sent one Minister, it shows nothing more. And in showing this as the opinion of President Jefferson, it also shows the positive and unanimous decision of the Senate, that no such power was within the constitutional competency of the Executive, even in the case supposed. What bearing, then, this case can have upon the present question, I own I cannot conceive.

This decision of the Senate seems to have settled the question, for a long time at least: for to no other case of Ministers appointed during the recess of the Senate have we been referred, until that of Messieurs Adams, Gallatin, and Bayard, in 1818, twenty-four years after the commencement of this Government. These Ministers were then appointed by President Madison, to negotiate treaties of peace and of commerce with Great Britain, and a treaty of commerce with Russia also. Now, sir, so far as this appointment relates to Great Britain, I believe I have already shewn, while examining the case of John Paul Jones, that the President was authorized to make it; because flagrant war then existed between that power and the United States, the object of which war it was the duty of the President to attain as speedily and effectually as possible, by negotiating for a peace, to be subject, when made, to the consent and approbation of the Senate. And so far as this appointment related to Russia, it must be recollected by the Senate, that Mr. Adams, one of the three Ministers then appointed, had been previously and regularly commissioned, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as Minister Plenipotentiary to that power; and it was, therefore, within the clear constitutional competency of the President, to have instructed this Minister to negotiate a treaty of commerce with Russia, if he had thought proper so to do, without consulting any other department of this Government upon that subject; so that the whole case resolves itself at last into this question: Was it within the power of the President to appoint two Ministers, whom he had the authority to send to Russia for one purpose, to co-operate, while they were at St. Petersburg, with a third, already previously and properly there, for the attainment of another object, the attainment of which object was within the clear constitutional competency of the President? Gentlemen must be more astute than I believe man can be, if they can make more of this case than what I have stated; and, if not, they will find it difficult to bend it to suit their purpose upon this occasion.

But suppose it was a case even stronger than I have shown it to be: it is a solitary case, the like of which had then for the first time occurred, and has never since appeared. It cannot, properly, therefore, be a sufficient foundation for the vast prerogative asserted by the President upon this occasion. And here, Mr. President, it must not escape observation, that when this case was subsequently submitted to the Senate for its approbation, although it was such as I have represented it to be, yet the immediate predecessor of the Senator from Massachusetts, who has now relied upon it as a precedent, submitted a string of resolutions to the Senate, the expressed objects of which were to deny the power of the President to make such an appointment, and to protest against the exercise of such a power, even in such a case. These resolutions, it is true, were postponed from time to time, and do not appear ever to have been acted upon definitively by the Senate; but they remain upon our Journals as a perpetual memorial to disprove the opinion of general acquiescence in a practice well known and long pursued; to support which opinion and its supposed consequences, this case has been referred to.

I have now gone through all the cases of Ministers said to have been appointed by any President during the recess of the Senate, to which we have been referred. In some of these cases I have shown, that the facts had been misconceived; in others, that the power exerted, although, under circumstances very different from what now exist, was met by a decided negation of its constitutional exercise, even in such cases; and that from none can any principle be extracted to justify the assumption of authority now contended to be within the "constitutional competency" of the Executive. The remaining cases I shall speedily despatch.

The first of these presents a group, said to consist of eighteen Consuls, who are supposed to have been appointed, during the recess of the Senate, by different Presidents, at different periods. No names have been stated, and, therefore, I have not been supplied with the necessary information to enable me to trace these cases to their proper sources. I am strongly inclined to think, however, that a similar mistake has very probably been committed as to the appointments of these Consuls, which I have shown to have occurred in the case of Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney. The time of the appointment has been erroneously taken from the date of the Commission merely, and not from that of the Senate's act. But, be this as it may, they are all cases of mere Consuls—officers who draw no single cent from the Treasury, nor are authorized to pledge or commit the United States in any way whatsoever—officers of so little importance, that few, except the special friends of the incumbents, ever know of their actual existence even; and, therefore, too insignificant ever to have attracted general observation.

The same remark will also apply to the last case to which we have been referred, that of Mr. Sumter, who was appointed Secretary of Legation by President Jefferson, in 1801. To this I will also add, that, from the beginning of this Government, and even under the old Confederation, this place of Secretary to a mission had always existed, and been annexed to every mission ever instituted, as an incident as necessary to the legation as its cipher or paper. The officer was not called at first a Secretary of Legation, but merely a Secretary of the Minister, and was usually appointed by the Minister himself, although I know well in one case he was appointed immediately by President Washington. When President Jefferson came into power, regarding this appointment as one of more consequence than it had ever before been considered, he took the power of making it into his own hands, and appointed Mr. Sumter as the private Secretary of the Minister to France, "to act as Secretary of Legation." Having thus made the appointment during the recess of the Senate, he, at the next session of that body, submitted it of course to them for their advice and consent. And thus it occurs that this mere appendage of the mission, came to be considered as an office at all.

These, sir, are all the cases which are supposed to exist, that have been even said to bear any affinity to that which is now under consideration. In examining them I have already shown that not one justifies the assertion made, that the President, in time of peace, during the recess of the Senate, can of right make any original appointment whatsoever, even of a Minister to an ancient nation, to which no Minister had before been sent. But even if this were so, it surely does not follow, that he might therefore appoint Ministers to a Congress of nations, such as that assembled at Panama. And here, sir, I differ "toto orlo," from the Senator from Massachusetts, who has affirmed that there is no difference between sending a Minister to a sovereign, and to a Congress of sovereignties assembled by their Ministers.

And here, Mr. President, let me recall the attention of the Senate to an argument which I used upon another occasion, and to which neither the Senator from Maryland, nor he from Massachusetts, have, I think, given any satisfactory reply. I then stated, that before the United States could be authorized to intrude any thing appertaining to them within the territory of a foreign State, whether at Panama or elsewhere, and whether that thing was a bale of cotton or a Minister, the authority to do so must be derived from the previous assent of the foreign power to which such place belonged. That their municipal authority could not communicate any such right to the United States, because all municipal authority must, of necessity, be territorial; its exercise was limited to the boundaries of the sovereignty from whence it proceeded, and it could not run within the territories of a foreign State, without the consent of such foreign State, previously had. That, although this assent might be inferred, as to all acts customarily practised and done by nations, in their usual intercourse with each other, under the international law, which derived its obligation from the comity and customs of States; yet, that such assent could not be inferred as to any unusual act, unknown to that law; but must be sought for only in special compacts or conventions existing between the parties. That, therefore, the sending a Minister to a Congress of States, assembled for special purposes, such as this at Panama, which was an assemblage unknown to the general, customary law of nations, was an act that could not be justified or sanctioned by this law; and, if permissible at all, the right could only be claimed, under some previous pact, authorizing it to be done: for, that, if the United States had the right to send Ministers to this Congress, and could derive it from the general customary law of nations, as the provisions of that law were not peculiar to the United States, but extended equally to every other civilized nation under the sun, the right of every other such nation was equal to our own; and, therefore, every European sovereign might do the same act. As this, however, was an absurdity, for which, as I then supposed, none would contend, it must be conceded, that our right to send Ministers to this Congress, could only be traced to some previous pact, under which, alone, it might properly be exercised.

Arrived at this conclusion, I then contended, that there was a pact existing in this case, which, when properly ratified and concluded, would give to the United States the right, and impose upon them the duty, of sending Ministers to this Congress; and which, at the same time, would give and impose correlative duties and rights to and upon the States there to be assembled, authorizing them to expect, and binding them to receive, such Ministers. That this pact existed in the written invitations given and accepted upon this occasion, which if duly sanctioned would be as obligatory upon the faith of the parties giving and accepting, as though this pact was sculptured on marble, engraved on brass, or evidenced by all the wax and engrossed parchment rolls in the world. But, that before this pact could be duly sanctioned, it must, according to the requirements of our constitution, have been advised and consented to by two-thirds of the Senate; without which assent it could impose no obligation upon, and, therefore, give no right to us. As illustrative of this, I then referred to the treaties and conventions already concluded between the several Southern American nations, creating and providing for this Congress at Panama; and I might have referred to all the cases now produced by the Senator from Massachusetts, and to the history of every other assemblage of States, by their Ministers, which ever yet convened, either in the ancient or modern world.

If this be so; if a previous solemn pact be necessary, to authorize any State to send a Minister to meet those of other States, assembled at a Congress, (by which other Ministers, of course, so sent cannot be accredited,) and if such pact cannot be concluded without the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, whence is it, I beg to be informed, that the President, can derive the right of sending Ministers to Panama during the recess of this Senate? Gentlemen, surely, must perceive, that, in asserting such a power for the President, they are contending in effect, if not in words, that, during the recess of the Senate, the President may, of right, not only negotiate for, but conclude and execute a treaty, whereby new rights and obligations are created; a power much greater than even that vast prerogative with which they are disposed to clothe the Executive, in the matter of appointment to office; a power which at once authorizes the President to create and to consummate whatever political relations he may think proper to establish—nay, to make a supreme law by his mere "fiat."

I have here done, sir, with the merits of this question. In discussing it, I have endeavored to establish these three great propositions: First, that the power claimed by the President, according to the natural signification of the terms he has employed to communicate his claim, and according to the explanation given of these terms by himself, not only in their context, but in other cotemporaneous communications made to the Senate, was a broad, strong, and unqualified assertion of power, acknowledged, even by his advocates here, to have been never before made, and against the use of which this people ought to revolt. Secondly, that this claim of power, even if limited and circumscribed, as these advocates would qualify it, still asserts a power denied to the Executive by the principles of all our Republican institutions, by the positive commandments of the constitution itself, and of the exertion of which no fair example has ever existed throughout the whole history of this Government, from its very creation. And, lastly, that, even if any precedent of the claim or exertion of a similar power could be produced, such precedent could not justify it in this case of Ministers to the Congress at Panama; inasmuch as the agreement to send such Ministers, (without which agreement they could not rightfully be sent,) was a compact, creating rights and obligations; which compact, under the Constitution of the United States, could not be concluded without the previous advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, and that in this case such advice and consent never had been granted, but was positively refused.

FRIDAY, April 21.

Louisville Canal.

The Senate then proceeded to consider the bill to authorize a subscription for stock, on the part of the United States, in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company. [Falls of Ohio.]

[This bill authorizes the purchase of 1,000 shares of the stock in the above company, provided they can be procured for a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars each.]

Messrs. JOHNSON, of Ken., RUGGLES, and ROWAN, each spoke in support of the bill; the latter gentleman argued that it was a proposition for the United States to invest their money with benefit to themselves; they were not bound to keep their money in the Treasury unproductive, when they could lay it out to advantage; and urged that this stock was believed to be the best in the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER was opposed to the bill, on principle, and called for some information, with respect to the charter, and the present state of the canal; which information was given by Mr. BENTON, who demonstrated, at some length, the advantages which were expected to be derived from this canal, and explained its present situation, &c.

Mr. MACON offered a few remarks in opposition to the bill, being unwilling to increase the power of the General Government, directly or indirectly.

Mr. LLOYD said no doubt this was to be a precedent for other applications; he was willing the United States should go with the other stockholders, pari passu, but no faster; he he therefore proposed to amend the bill, so that it should read "to pay for the same, at such times, and in such proportions, as may be required and paid by other stockholders;" which amendment was agreed to.

After some further discussion between Messrs. WOODBURY, BENTON, and HOLMES, relative to the manner in which the stock was to be purchased,

Mr. VAN BUREN said the aid of this Government could only be afforded to these objects of improvement, in three ways: by making a road or canal, and assuming jurisdiction—by making a road or canal, without assuming jurisdiction, leaving it to the States; or by making an appropriation, without doing either. In his opinion, the Government had no right to do either, and at some future time he should offer his reasons in support of this opinion.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading,—ayes 23, noes 15.

SATURDAY, April 22.

Executive Powers.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. BRANCH, relative to the power of the Executive to appoint public Ministers.

Mr. CHAMBERS said, the first important consideration, is to ascertain exactly what we are called on by this resolution to affirm.

It was unnecessary, Mr. C. said, for the purpose of his remarks, to go into a philological argument, to prove what it is the President has intended to claim as within the constitutional competency of the Executive: a plain statement of the facts will place the question clearly before the Senate. The letters of the Secretary of State to the Ministers of Mexico, Colombia, and Central America, distinctly refer to the advice and consent of the Senate, as the condition on which alone they could expect this Government to be represented at the Congress of Panama. These letters are the official declaration of the President's views, made through the only organ by which they could be communicated, and are anterior to the date of the message to Congress. The message to Congress, alluding to the Congress of Panama, says "the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, and Central America, have invited the United States to be also represented there. The invitation has been accepted, and Ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned, &c." Is any thing more rational than to ask gentlemen who wish to know how, and by what authority, these invitations are accepted, and the appointment of Ministers proposed, than to direct their attention to the precise words of the acceptance and proposition for appointment? By reference to the language of the acceptance and proposition to appoint, you find it expressly placed upon the condition of the Senate's concurrence. It is true, as the recital to the resolution adds, the nominations to the Senate were not submitted with the "opening message to Congress," and, Mr. C. said, he believed it was equally true, that no instance had occurred in which a nomination has been submitted with an opening message.

Subsequently the President has sent in the nominations to the Senate, and in his communication on that occasion he has referred to his notice, in the message to Congress, of the invitation received by this Government to be represented at Panama, and adds, "Although this measure was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature: first, by the decision of the Senate upon the nominations to be laid before them; and, secondly, by the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations, without which it cannot be carried into effect."

It is this paragraph which is said, in the recital of the resolution, to "maintain the right previously announced in his opening message, that he possesses an authority to make such appointments, and to commission them, without the advice and consent of the Senate."

If by this language it is intended to assert that the President has claimed the constitutional right to grant commissions, in the recess of Congress, to Ministers deputed to represent the United States at the proposed Congress of Panama, which commissions shall continue in force until the close of the succeeding session of Congress; the assertion is admitted to be strictly according to the fact, and the only question presented is, whether the assertion of such a power is such an act of the President as calls for a protest on the part of the Senate: If, on the contrary, the language used is intended to import that the President has claimed a right to commission such Ministers, and, to clothe them with authority beyond the session of Congress next succeeding their appointment, without submitting their nomination to the Senate; it is denied that such a right has been "avowed" or "maintained" by the President; and it is believed that a reference to the language of the documents themselves, and to the concluding part of the very paragraph and sentence which is referred to as "maintaining" the right, will fully demonstrate that the President, so far from excluding the Senate from their undeniable right to advise and consent to, or to reject, the appointments, has distinctly affirmed it, and in express words has recognized two contingencies: first, "the decision of the Senate upon the nominations;" and, secondly, "the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations," "without which the measure proposed could not be carried into effect."

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TAZEWELL) has said the President has claimed the authority to make a compact in virtue of which he could oblige this Government to send Ministers to Panama. The gentleman's argument is, that, by the law of nations, no power can of right send Ministers to a Congress of Ministers; it can only be effected by previous compact between the several powers; that there being no right in other powers to send, there was, ex consequenti, no correlative duty on the part of the Spanish American States to receive such Ministers; that a compact of this kind was accompanied with all the obligation of a treaty; and that the President's power to commission Ministers to the Congress at Panama, necessarily included a power to create and consummate the previous pact, which pact is a treaty, which treaty is the supreme law of the land.

Mr. C. considered this to be the substance of the gentleman's doctrine. He believed it had never before been urged that the various subjects of arrangement between the Secretaries of our own Government and the Ministers of other Governments resident here, or those of our Ministers abroad, with the Secretaries or Officers of the respective Governments to which they were accredited, in reference to the time, place, or objects, of negotiation, constituted treaties or compacts of so formal a character, as to require the confirmation of the Senate before they could be acted on. He contended that the principles of national law authorized any Government, which had acknowledged the independence of the Spanish American States, to send Ministers to that country to treat with all or any of them. It required no previous pact. It was a subject very proper for the consideration of the State or States to which the Minister was sent, whether he should be indulged with a hearing at the precise time and place at which the Congress should be assembled. The Minister at the court of a particular sovereign cannot select the time, and place, and company for the discussion of his measures. Take the case of the Court of St. Petersburg. The Ministers of several powers, say France, Spain, and Austria, propose to confer with the Russian Government on a subject of great and common interest, and in the discussion of which, they do not desire to have the Ministers of the United States, Great Britain, and other powers, to participate; can it be doubted that they have the right to execute such a purpose? Could it ever be made a subject of complaint that the Ministers of the powers who have united in the Holy Alliance should hold sessions to which they did not invite Ministers of other nations, who look upon it as a most wicked conspiracy against the rights of man—not only did not invite them, but would not receive them if they would wish to be present? While, therefore, he admitted the right of other powers to be represented at all, or any of the Spanish American Governments, he asserted also the right of these Governments to select such as they pleased to meet at Panama, on a particular occasion, to negotiate on particular subjects, and to decline receiving all others at that particular time and place.

The constitution regards the President as an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government; not independent as to the responsibility which every officer of the Government assumes, but independent in reference to the necessity of any previous assent of any other branch of the Government to render certain acts lawful and obligatory. There are high and important duties to be performed by the President, especially directed by the constitution, for the faithful and judicious performance of which the country has, and can have, no other security than the responsibility under which he acts, but which cannot be controlled by the previous interposition of any other department of the Government; and, in the exercise of these duties, he is as much an independent branch of the Government as the Judicial department is in its sphere, or the Congress in its sphere.

This general proposition, he was assured, would not be disputed; but the immediate matter of inquiry was, whether the case, now the subject of consideration, the "appointment of Ministers in the recess," was amongst the duties, and within the authority, of the President, by the terms of the constitution.

The gentlemen opposed to us say that he has no such authority, except where the commission is directed to the successor of an individual, who had previously filled the same station, and whose death, resignation, or removal, had occurred since the last session of Congress. For the converse of this opinion, the second article of the constitution is relied on, and is believed to embrace the case. It is thereby provided, "that" the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

It was not his good fortune, Mr. C. said, to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. MILLS,) who had collected, he understood, a variety of cases, running through all the period of the Government, from the adoption of the constitution. To these instances he referred, generally, and should particularly mention one or two others. The first was the case of the mission to Great Britain, in 1806. Mr. Monroe was the resident Minister at St. James. The relations between this country and Great Britain required, in the opinion of the President, the agency of an adjunct Minister. Such a proceeding was not provided for by any statute of this country. Mr. Pinkney, however, was sent abroad during the recess of the Senate, and in a time of profound peace, with a commission, dated in May, 1806, which constituted him adjunct Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James. It is well known that Mr. Monroe and Mr. Pinkney concluded a treaty in virtue of this commission, which was sent home, and which Mr. Jefferson, the then President, did not approve, and did not submit to the Senate. This case, it is believed, is not subject to any of the exceptions which have been applied to the instances enumerated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. MILLS.)

The proceeding in this case can only be justified by reference to the power of the President to commission a Minister in the recess of the Senate, if, in his discretion, the exigencies of the country demand it, although no resignation, removal, death, or disqualification of a predecessor in the same office had occurred. If there was such an office existing under the law or constitution, it was the office of a single Minister to Great Britain. A second or adjunct Minister did not before exist. It was, therefore, a new mission. It was originated in the recess of the Senate. The Minister executed the duty incident to his appointment by concluding a treaty, and yet, in no one department of the Government, and by no one individual, was it suggested that Mr. Jefferson had transcended his constitutional powers.

Mr. C. also referred the Senate to the case of the appointment of Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Adams, and Mr. Bayard. These gentlemen were commissioned by the President in the recess of the Senate, and sent to Russia, with powers enumerated in their three several commissions, as "Envoys Extraordinary, and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain," "a treaty of commerce with Great Britain," and "a treaty of commerce with Russia."

The circumstances connected with this case are important in the consideration of its influence on the question now in discussion. This nation was involved in war with Great Britain, which it was the interest of the country and the duty of those who conducted its concerns to terminate as soon as the objects for which it was declared could be effected. The friendly mediation of the Emperor of Russia, it was supposed, could be usefully brought to operate in aid of such a result, and these Ministers were sent to Russia, not to Great Britain, with a commission, dated 17th of April, 1813, which contained authority to "agree, treat, consult, and negotiate of and concerning, the general commerce between the United States and Great Britain, and all matters and subjects connected therewith, and to conclude and sign a treaty or treaties touching the premises." It is true they did not treat in virtue of this commission, the treaty subsequently formed having been concluded under a commission to five Ministers, of whom these were three.

Much effort has been made by the gentlemen from Virginia and South Carolina, Mr. TAZEWELL and Mr. HARPER, to lessen the effect of the cases as authority, because the appointment was made during war. The last gentleman, with much ingenuity, has also attempted to make this a case of filling a vacancy. The war, he says, produced the vacancy, and the filling that vacancy was in obedience to the express language of the constitution. That this doctrine will not meet the case will appear evident, first, because according to all the authors on the subject, a war not only suspends the commercial or friendly relations of the belligerent powers, but totally puts an end to and destroys them, and those relations which are the result of negotiations subsequent to the war, are as perfectly independent of those which existed previously as if no intercourse had ever subsisted between them prior to that period. Nations, therefore, between whom amicable relations have subsisted, and who have afterwards become belligerent, assume towards each other the same attitude as if such amicable relation had never subsisted, and the cessation of the war would give to each the same claims upon the other, and in all respects, entitle each to the same consideration which could be claimed by any other independent nation with whom no correspondence or interchange by Ministers had been had. The office, therefore, created by the commission to these three gentlemen, was as perfectly a new one as would be that of a Minister to Hayti, if one were now to be commissioned to that Government.

But, if this were not an efficient objection to the gentleman's position, it may be remarked that the case cannot be brought within the exact letter of the constitution for a second reason, which is, that the vacancy did not occur in the recess. The war, in this case, caused the ministerial office of the predecessor of these gentlemen to cease. The war was declared by Congress, and of course the cessation of ministerial power occurred "sedento senatu." Not only was Congress in session when the vacancy, as it is termed, happened, but the whole session of 1812-'13 had commenced and terminated, the office still remaining unoccupied. This transaction was at a period of party excitement unparalleled in the history of this country, when every angry feeling was aroused, and when many of the political men of the day were induced, by prejudiced views of the policy, if not of the integrity of the dominant party, to allege against the measures of the administration every cause of exception which had the semblance of truth, reason or principle for its foundation. In this state of feeling, with the bitterest party animosities to quicken the inventive power of the sagacious politicians, who were straining every nerve to direct popular opinion against the authors of this measure—feelings which led to violent inflammatory resolutions in town meetings, and in several of the State Legislatures, and to all the usual means of bringing odium on the individuals by whom the destinies of the nation are wielded—we find a feeble effort made in this body to pronounce the act of the President unconstitutional—feeble it is intended to say in point of effect, for it does not appear that Mr. Gore's resolution had friends enough to encourage them to an exhibition of their strength by yeas and nays. Indeed, the resolution itself takes exception to one only of the commissions, that which gave authority to make a treaty of peace, and says nothing of the other of the same date, which gave authority to conclude a treaty of peace. But assuming it to impeach the principle on which the President had acted, in granting each of the commissions, it was not sustained in the Senate. The proceeding, with this exception only, was submitted to without complaint, by every department of the Government. It was submitted to in Congress, and out of Congress; it was submitted to by the people of the country, amongst whom are individuals perfectly competent to form an opinion on the subject, and as sensibly alive to any violation of that charter of their liberties as any man holding a seat on the floor of Congress.

With regard to the appointment of Mr. Pinkney, in 1806, it did not appear to be affected by any of the arguments urged against the other cases. It was in time of profound peace. To the introduction of the other cases as an authority, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. T.) had urged objections which, notwithstanding the eloquence with which he had advocated them, had failed to leave on his mind the impression they had made on the gentleman. He had treated the cases as a class, and has told us that the authority by which the appointments were made, can be resolved into the fair exercise of the powers of the President in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and, inasmuch as the President, in that character, could rightfully do what was done, it is a sufficient answer to these cases to show that the authority is incident to that particular capacity of the President, and cannot be exerted but in time of war. The gentleman has made great effort to sustain the authority of the President, as Commander-in-Chief, to make these appointments: he could have made these treaties, said he, in person, as any other commanding General could, and he could depute another to do the same thing in his place.

Mr. C. denied this doctrine in toto, and affirmed on the authority of the writers on the laws of nations, that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, or the commander of any other Army or Navy, had not competent authority to make and conclude a treaty of commerce—no, not even a general truce. A Commander-in-Chief can rightfully exercise all the powers necessary for the prosecution of the war, and the President, who is clothed with all the attributes with which the constitution has surrounded him, can claim, perhaps, all the powers of Commander-in-Chief, because the constitution has so created them. He has, by the constitution, several other offices and duties, some Executive, some Legislative; but it has never been asserted or intimated that the President has the sovereign power of the United States. The only postulate the argument requires is, that the sovereign power resides elsewhere. Gentlemen may place it in relation to this particular in the hands of the President and Senate, who, by the express words of the constitution, are declared to be the treaty-making power; or, in the hands of the people or States of the Union, and then are bound to admit that this attribute of their general sovereignty has been delegated to the President and Senate by the unequivocal grant of that instrument, the object of which was to define the particular portions of sovereignty parted with, and to whom, and the particular portions retained by the people of the States. The sovereign power alone, or the delegate of the sovereign power of a nation, is competent to make and conclude a treaty. The sovereign of the country may at the same time be the military commander, and such is the fact in despotic governments; but the legitimate exercise of this power can only be referrible to the character or capacity of sovereign.

That the power to conclude treaties is not incident to the capacity of the President, as the chief Executive officer of the Government, or as a component part of the legislative branch of the Government, is distinctly asserted in the Federalist, No. 75, before referred to.

MONDAY, April 24.

The Senate having resumed the consideration of Mr. BRANCH's motion relative to the power of the Executive to appoint public ministers,

Mr. CHANDLER said this was a case altogether unknown to the framers of the constitution, as coming within the law of nations, which provides for the appointment of foreign Ministers and Ambassadors. This was a Congress got up by treaty by several different nations, in which they combine and agree with each other in alliances offensive and defensive; and this Congress, for these purposes, was to meet at Panama. The President said, in his opening message, that we should take part in the deliberations of that Congress, and this was the purpose for which the commissioners were to be appointed. This was, Mr. C. said, appointing Ministers to a Congress of a number of Governments not known to the constitution. The President considered it to be within his constitutional competency to have done this. It was not within his constitutional competency to have done it during the recess, because it was not an individual Government, to which alone the constitution contemplated sending Ambassadors or Ministers. The President having claimed this right, if it had passed unnoticed by the Senate, it would have been brought forward as a precedent hereafter. Mr. C. said he did not think that President Adams would ever attempt to propose another mission to Panama, under any circumstances, but, at a future time, other men might feel inclined to make use of this as an authority. He therefore should vote against the indefinite postponement of the resolution.

Mr. MACON said that no President had ever before claimed the right that had been claimed in this message. On this question he doubted, as he did on all others. The reason why no mission had been made exactly like this, was, that no claim had ever been made before. He agreed it was never worth while to make new Ministers unless there were new occasions. The occasion was as new as the Minister, and something was necessary to be done. How did this power come from one department to another, formed as this Government is? It was useless to look back in history, because there was no Government to look at. What, said Mr. M., had been the constant practice in our own Government? Had it not been a constant increase of Executive power? There was hardly a session of Congress passed but what some power, some patronage was gained by the Executive. We had a very recent and memorable example before us. President Monroe had said that the United States "owed it to candor, and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers, to declare, that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety;" and that "we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner, their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. In the war between these new Governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered, and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur, which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change, on the part of the United States, indispensable to their security." It was hardly noticed at the time; and now what had it become? He should like to see the letter addressed to the Mexican Government. Now they were told that this was a pledge, and the United States were to take the front of the battle. If every department of this Government, the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President, did not watch the power which the constitution has given them, but let it be taken from them by piecemeal, who could tell where it would end? In the reign of George the First the same arguments were used in England, in regard to the Executive power. Mr. M. said he had heard the debates in Congress before he had the opportunity of reading those of the British Parliament, and it appeared impossible they could be so much alike, without having seen them. This was not the first mission of the kind. Gore's mission was of the same kind. This mission was deemed within the competency of the Executive. Why did he do it? Not on account of the doubt of the power, but it was put on the expediency of the mission, and not on the power of the Executive. It was expedient for them to wait: hence they waited. Much had been said about the character of the Panama mission, in this discussion. They must be Ministers, Ambassadors, or consuls, and if the President could appoint them without a law, what was to prevent him from appointing the Judges of the Supreme Court? for they were all in the same article of the constitution. The gentleman had said there could be no appropriation without a law; so he would say there could be no Minister without an appropriation. Mr. M. said he suspected, if this appropriation bill was to be lost, there would be no mission to Panama. What would become of the office created? After passing a law there was an obligation. After passing a law to establish a Supreme Court, there was a moral obligation to make judges and salaries. But in this instance there was no obligation; it had nothing to do with it.

It had often been said, that in this Government, the departments were to balance each other. How was this balance to be kept up? Not by constantly increasing the power of one department of this Government; but the House of Representatives should take care of the portion committed to them, the Senate theirs, and the President his. Was this House, when their rights were, as they supposed, infringed, to wait for the interference of the House of Representatives? There was, Mr. M. said, a tendency in every Government to create power. The constitution had given the courts power to declare what was unconstitutional, and why so? Because the Government would go beyond the limits. Governments were made on the suspicion that all those who had power would go wrong. He would go further, and suppose it a doubtful question whether the Executive, in his message, had claimed this power or not. Most of the gentlemen who contended that he did not, had contended that he had the right to do so. If the majority of the Senate thought differently, was it not prudent in them to express their opinion? Had they not the same right to express their opinion on their powers, and was it not as much their duty to do so as for the President to declare his? A law had been passed which the Supreme Court declared to be unconstitutional, but it was never enforced.

There was no analogy, Mr. M. said, in the cases cited, between European Governments and this Government. There, even in the most limited monarchy in Europe, the appointment of Ministers was in the crown alone. He meant England. How was it here? Every thing was divided and carved out, this to one, that to another, and that to a third. But, in all those cases in Europe, there was an understanding that those Ministers were to meet, and what they were to do. How was it in the present instance? They were to do any thing or nothing; they were to talk of matters and things in general. Was it ever doubted that the British Executive could not appoint a man to be an Ambassador to do any thing? That is not the case here, and all this reasoning, derived from the practice of European Governments, had no analogy at all with our Government. Balance any thing—get a rail and place it on a fence, and play at see-saw; give one a little more than the other, and away he would go: so it was with these powers; give one of them only a hair's breadth more than it ought to have, and the balance would be destroyed. First the power was denied absolutely; then a little was done, then a little more, and now, Mr. M. said, it had become a matter of course, and his objections were considered as much out of fashion as his boots, to say the least of them. They had a strong impression, in coming here, that this was to be a meeting of Republics, and that the United States claimed to go as the oldest republic. They were to settle the public law for America. As well as sisters there were to be brothers there. Brazil, Britain, and probably France, were invited, and all this was to settle the public law for America.

On the subject of our going to advise, Mr. M. said they had the right of advising the President, and he had never heard of a nation that wanted the advice of another. He never knew a single individual who wanted the advice of another.

If there was one man that did, there were 100,000 that did not; the advice might be given, but the man would go his own way.

Mr. M. said it had been stated, in the course of debate, that there was no stir among the people. In the mess in which he boarded, he did not recollect having received one letter, from a man that attended at all to the public business, but what it mentioned this claim of power. Since the publication of the documents, he had received two letters in which it was asked whether they meant to let the resolution sleep? In every State of the Union there were as clever men as any here, who watched this body and commanded them to take care of the constitution and their rights. If any thing was wrong, it must be put down; but if truth was on the side of the administration, they never need mind any investigation. Mr. M. said he wished the administration would so act that he might vote for all their measures. Judging from the letters he received, he should suppose this subject was much agitated in the country. As he said some time ago, it seemed to him, from reading the message, as coming to Congress on the expediency: if it applied to the acceptance it was a little remarkable it had not been put in the same sentence: for, at the next paragraph, it made a new start. It was like going to a new section. He could not discover the connection.

The Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 8.

Judiciary Bill.

The Senate proceeded to the re-consideration of their amendment to the bill "further to extend the Judicial System of the United States," which had been disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. VAN BUREN said that he would state, in a few words, the points of difference between the two Houses. One related to the arrangement of the circuits, the other to the provision requiring the judges to reside within their respective circuits. He had not particularly adverted to the latter when the bill was under consideration, because, at that time, he had entertained the belief that no objection would be urged against it. Its rejection, therefore, by the House of Representatives, was as unexpected as the reasons assigned for it were, in his opinion, untenable.

By the Judiciary Act of 1793, it was left to the Judges of the Supreme Court to allot themselves to the different circuits of the United States, once a year, at their discretion. By the act of 1802, it was thought proper to allot them, by law, to certain circuits, within which they were required to reside. He would not consume the time of the Senate by reading the act. It will readily be perceived, by a reference to it, that this is the effect of the provision, although somewhat ambiguous in its phraseology. The act of 1802 also provided that, in the event of a new appointment, a new allotment might take place; but, whatever might be the allotment, it still required that, in the old circuits, the courts should be held by a resident judge. There was but one exception. This was the circuit composed of the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware. It became necessary, either to make the exception, or to drive from his residence, at Mount Vernon, or from the bench, one of the most estimable members of the court—an act which no former Congress had been willing to commit, and of which, he hoped, no future Congress would be capable. In consequence of this, however, the State of Pennsylvania has been subjected to what her citizens consider a great inconvenience. That reason still exists. The State of Virginia has two Judges of the Supreme Court, and both cannot be assigned to the Circuit, of which it forms a part. In 1807, when an additional circuit was established, composed of the States of Ohio and Tennessee, it was expressly enacted, that the judge should reside within the circuit for which he was to be appointed. The amendment of the Senate, now so strongly opposed, is a mere extension of the same principle—a principle not only sanctioned by authority, but recommended by its manifest utility.

Among the objections urged against this point of the amendment of the Senate, there was one, he said, not merely fallacious, but reprehensible. It had been alleged, elsewhere, that it was the design of the amendment to place the Western States on a footing inferior to that of the old States. This objection was unsupported by facts, and was made, he had charity enough to believe, without due examination. It was, on the contrary, the object of the amendment, to place the Western States on the same footing with the old States; to secure to them the advantages enjoyed by a residence of the judges within the circuits, and protect them from the inconveniences experienced by Pennsylvania and Delaware. Mr. VAN BUREN expressed his belief that there was great injustice in this attempt to excite sectional prejudice without the least foundation. There was nothing in the facts to warrant the inference; and he could appeal with confidence to the Senators from those States, to sustain him in his position. They had witnessed the untiring zeal with which gentlemen, from different and remote portions of the Union, had supported the just claims of the West; and, from whatever motive misrepresentation might proceed, he had the satisfaction to believe that, in that body, the subject was well understood, and every thing belonging to it justly appreciated. Mr. VAN BUREN thought that the frequency with which appeals had been made to local prejudices, was an evil which deserved the utmost severity of reprehension.

An objection, he said, had been taken to the form of the amendment, which, though plausible, was not solid. The amendment speaks of the three additional judges, as judges appoint- ed for the three new circuits: and it is supposed that this gives to the offices of the additional judges, the character of "circuit judges only." Mr. VAN BUREN said that he had, in his opening observations, had occasion to remark, that he was prevented, by indisposition, from attending the committee, the morning when the amendment was first agreed upon and reported. Its phraseology had not, on that account, attracted his particular attention. If it had, he would have preferred a different form, in expressing the object of the amendment. At the same time, the objection, he said, was only technical, and the true sense of the amendment was sufficiently expressed, to leave neither doubt nor difficulty in its execution. The first section of the bill provides that the judges to be appointed shall, to all intents and purposes, be Judges of the Supreme Court, and the second is only descriptive of the objects for which their appointment was authorized. Even, upon the ground assumed by those, who, instead of looking at the substance, have chosen to criticize the form of the amendment, the description is accurate. The Judges of the Supreme Court are, under the law and constitution, circuit judges, as well as Judges of the Supreme Court. Sitting in the circuit court, they have powers and duties distinct from the powers and duties of the Supreme Court, and with which, when sitting on the latter court, they have nothing to do. But he would not detain the Senate longer on that point. If the House of Representatives were in favor of the principle of the amendment, but thought its form objectionable, why did they not amend it? It would have been in order to have done so. This, however, they have omitted, preferring to rest their opposition upon an objection which it was in their power to have removed. Nothing but his habitual respect for the other branch of the Legislature, restrained the conviction that it was the sole object of the first objection to the amendment, urged, indeed, as it was, with so much seeming earnestness, to cover the real ground of dissatisfaction—the arrangement of the circuits.

The other point of disagreement relates to the separation or connection of Ohio and Kentucky. On that subject he had only to say, that it is a question of a purely local character, in which the Western States, alone, are interested. The object of the bill, itself, is to make provision for nine Western or North-western States. They are embraced in the three circuits provided for. Of the eighteen Senators representing these States in this body, fifteen are in favor of the amendment of the Senate. He would venture to say, that, on questions of a character so exclusively local, on which any difference of opinion has existed, there have been few, if any, instances, characterized by such uncommon unanimity. To bring the subject into a narrow compass—in the two circuits which are directly affected by the question, there are five States, and of the ten Senators by whom they are represented, seven are in favor of the amendment of the Senate. This unanimity of sentiment, among those, too, who do not usually concur in opinion on other subjects, had a strong tendency to confirm his previous impression, that the amendment was correct. If, upon subjects of this character, we are not to rely upon the representations and opinions of those who are most familiar with their operation, and most concerned in their results, where, and on whom, let me ask, are we to repose our confidence?

Mr. VAN BUREN said there was one view of the subject which he was anxious to impress upon the minds of gentlemen, and which ought, in his opinion, to silence the opposition, at least in the quarter from whence it chiefly proceeded. Is it objected that two judges are too many for the five States of Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana? No, sir. Those who advocate the bill as it came from the House, have, throughout, contended for two additional judges to hold their circuits within those States. And can one judge transact the business in Kentucky and Ohio? No one could doubt it. He would have to attend the term of the Supreme Court, which could not employ him more than three months, including travel; this would leave him nine months, in each year, to hold the circuits in Kentucky and Ohio, at places not more than one hundred miles apart, with excellent roads, and every other facility for travelling. It is only necessary to state the case, to show, incontrovertibly, that, whoever else may have cause to complain, Kentucky and Ohio will not—at least on the supposition that they have no other views than the administration of justice among their citizens. Why, then, do they object? Why should they complain that a judge is also given to Missouri, Indiana, and Illinois? It is true that, by the amendment of the Senate, Kentucky and Ohio cannot each have a judge. But, ought not the idea to be spurned, that it is the judges and not the court, the administrators and not the administration of justice, which have been so earnestly and loudly called for by these patriotic States? He would not, for a moment, entertain an idea so degrading to these respectable members of our Confederacy. The Representatives from Ohio and Kentucky will recede. Their known intelligence will discern the danger of this ground. Should this bill fail, they cannot but be aware of the difficulty which would attend any subsequent effort to induce the Representatives of other States to act upon the subject, especially if an impression should exist that a scramble for office was at the bottom of all the movements which have taken place.

The just rights of Kentucky and Ohio being thus satisfied, he would say a few words as to the other States. He could not but express his surprise, that the objection that too much had been done for them, had proceeded from Ohio and Kentucky. That they had an equal right, with others, to urge this objection, there can be no doubt: but he still thought that there were some circumstances in the case which would have rendered its emanation from the old States more appropriate. He was free to admit that it was an act of liberal legislation in favor of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri. An application for an additional judge in any other of the States, would not be listened to for a moment. If justifiable at all, it was only so in consequence of their forming three sovereign, independent States, and, if not leading, certainly prominent members of our Union. It was this view of the subject, and the consideration of their rapidly increasing population, which had induced him to yield his assent to a measure by which the administration of justice would be placed on a more perfect and permanent footing. This would be effected by the amendment proposed by the Senate, in conformity with the views expressed by the representation from these States, in both branches of the Legislature, without a dissenting voice. Why should Ohio and Kentucky, having their own claims satisfied, desire to impose on these States a plan to which their Representatives are decidedly opposed? I cannot but persuade myself that, upon reflection, they will abandon a ground, which, to my judgment, appears alike ungracious and untenable.

The question arises, what will now be the decision of the Senate? Shall we insist, and ask a conference, or adhere, and thus avow, at once, frankly and explicitly, the course which we mean to pursue? On the score of respect, there could be no objection to either course. If the Senate are disposed to yield either of the points, it would be advisable to insist, and ask a conference. If, however, they have formed the deliberate conclusion not to yield, it appeared to him best to adhere: and, in order to test the sense of the Senate, he moved that they do adhere to their amendment.

The motion was further sustained by Messrs. BENTON, BRANCH, HOLMES, ROWAN, and WHITE, and was opposed by Messrs. RUGGLES, HARRISON, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and was finally carried by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Harper, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Kane, King, Lloyd, Macon, Noble, Randolph, Robbins, Rowan, Smith, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury.—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bouigny, Chase, Harrison, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnston of Louisiana, Knight, Marks, Reed, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Willey.—12.

[The effect of the vote of adherence is to preclude, on the part of the body adopting it, all compromise on the question.]

THURSDAY, May 4.

Reduction of Executive Patronage.

Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee to whom was referred the subject of inquiring into the expediency of reducing the patronage of the Executive Government, made a report, which was read. The report was accompanied by the six following bills:

A bill to regulate the publication of the Laws of the United States, and the public advertisements;

A bill to secure in office faithful collectors and disbursers of the revenue, and the displacement of defaulters;

A bill to regulate the appointment of Postmasters;

A bill to regulate the appointment of Cadets;

A bill to regulate the appointment of Midshipmen;

A bill to prevent military and naval officers from being dismissed the service at the pleasure of the President; which were severally read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. TAKEWELL then moved that an extra number of the report and bills be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped that the largest number would be printed that had been printed of any document during the present session, whether that document was any message sent to this body, or an attempt to answer, which they could not do, the argument of his friend to the right; or under color of a message to the House to announce an electioneering arrangement, what in Maryland was known by the name and appellation of a stump speech. Though he had little faith in the strength of the virus of the Executive poison which was attempted to be instilled into the public mind, he wished the antidote to proceed with it, passu.

Mr. TAKEWELL said, his ignorance of what that number was, occasioned his leaving the blank.

It was then moved to fill the blank with 6,000, which was carried.

MONDAY, May 8.

Mr. VAN BUREN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the message from the House, requesting a conference on the subject of the Judiciary bill, made the following report:

"The Judiciary Committee, on the message from the House of Representatives, proposing a conference on the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled 'An act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States,' report:

"That, in the opinion of the committee, the condition of the question, and the circumstances of the case, render a concurrence in the proposed conference inexpedient. They will, in deference to the high source from which the invitation has proceeded, make a brief explanation of the reasons which have led to this conclusion. The amendment proposed by the Senate was freely discussed, and adopted with but four dissenting voices. Upon being advised of the disagreement of the House of Representatives, the question was distinctly presented to the Senate, whether it would insist, and ask a conference, or whether it would at once adhere, and thus, probably, although not necessarily, avoid one. Upon full discussion, and careful consideration of the subject, the Senate, with but twelve dissenting voices, decided to adhere, and thereby prevent the unprofitable formality of a conference, at this advanced period of the session. That decision was within the rules established for the government of the two Houses, consistent with usage, on other, and important occasions, (and it cannot be necessary to say) was made without the slightest disrespect to the House of Representatives. The committee believe that the same unanimity with which the question of adherence was originally determined in the Senate, still exists. The appointment of conferees would be a virtual waiver of the vote of adherence, or, if otherwise considered, would manifest a disposition to meet the conferees of the other House upon unequal terms. Assuming that the Senate is opposed to a waiver of the vote of adherence; and believing that the appointment of conferees, without it, might justly be considered objectionable by the House of Representatives, the committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, no good will result from a conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled 'An act further to amend the Judicial System of the United States,' and that the Senate does, therefore, decline the same; and, further, that a copy of the annexed report be sent to the House of Representatives, as explanatory of the views of the Senate."

The report was read, and ordered to be printed.

Amendment to the Constitution.

The Senate then took up the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. DICKERSON said he did not rise to enter into an argument upon the resolution, but to offer an amendment. He believed that the plan of a second election by the people, as proposed in the resolution, was inexpedient and impracticable: that he could perceive no well-grounded objection to the choice of electors, provided they are chosen in single districts; that electors never have abused their power, nor could it be feared that they would; that the object to be gained by the change proposed was not such as to warrant an alteration of the constitution; although he would have been satisfied with the mode proposed, if it had been originally adopted and found to be safe in practice; that the amendment he offered proposed to elect the President, in the last resort, by a joint ballot of the two Houses of Congress, voting per capita—a body which would be precisely analogous to the whole body of electors, should they be brought together; that the strong objection to a choice by the House of Representatives, voting by States, did not apply to a joint meeting of the two Houses; that there could be no danger in trusting them with this important duty.

Mr. BENTON said it was very well understood throughout the Senate, that this resolution was not to be acted on during the present session. The reason would be apparent to every one. The resolution was reported in the Senate at an early day, and was put off from day to day, and from week to week, upon the request of gentlemen, until the same subject had been taken up and discussed in the other branch of the Legislature. It was not, Mr. B. said, deemed advisable to carry on a duplicate debate at the same time; and the issue of the discussion in the House had been such, that it was not deemed advisable to take any further step to get a definitive vote on it this session; but it was deemed advisable to keep the subject in a situation for being acted upon at the earliest possible day at the next session, earnestly and vigorously, and to have it decided one way or the other. It was with a view to this resolution, and some other subjects of importance, which it was probable would not be finished at this session, that he had conceived the idea of continuing over all the subjects remaining for discussion to the next session, that they might then be taken up, without loss of time. Mr. B. said, should not this rule pass, he pledged himself to the Senate, and to the American people, that he would again move the reference of the subject to a committee, and have it disposed of as early as possible. It was here, Mr. B. said, as it was with their great prototype the British Parliament—the greatest difficulty in getting any thing done, was to find the right time for doing it. When the great question of reforming the British House of Commons was brought up, it was agreed all round that the representation ought to be reformed, but the difficulty was as to the right time of accomplishing it. During the American war it was the wrong time, and after the French Revolution broke out, it was the wrong time still. This resolution, Mr. B. said, was introduced two years ago, and it was then deemed an improper time, because the Presidential election would soon come on. It was again introduced soon after, and then it was an improper time—it was too soon after the election, and it might have a bearing on the events of that election, and be considered as personally offensive; therefore, as it was impossible to find a time which should be free from objection, Mr. B. said he would pledge himself to the Senate and to the American people, to continue the subject with all the energy he was master of, till he brought it to a conclusion. He would endeavor to get a decisive vote on the principle which the resolution contained; he did not do it from a spirit of reckless perseverance, but from a conviction that the principle itself was correct, and one which was approved by an immense majority of the American people, so far as he had any opportunity of learning their sentiments, and if they could get a chance of voting on it, it was one which they would carry. Mr. B. concluded by saying, that if he could not get it before the people, upon a proposition submitted by Congress, he would transfer his exertions to a different theatre—to the theatre of the people themselves, and urge the call of a national convention.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, that, being a member of the committee by whom the resolution, under consideration, had been reported, he would add a few words to the observations made by the Chairman. He concurred in the propriety of the disposition of the resolution proposed by the Chairman. The advanced period of the session, would alone furnish a sufficient inducement for the adoption of that course, but he had further reasons. The progress which had been made in the subject in the other House, was well known to the Senate. The result of its deliberation satisfied him, that, if there was time sufficient to act definitively upon the subject here, nothing efficient could be done at the present session. He would, if his life was spared, unite his exertions with those of the Chairman, to press the matter to a favorable conclusion early in the next session; and, notwithstanding that the question would have to be decided by the same House of Representatives, he would do so in full confidence, that their labors would be crowned with complete success. He would briefly state his reasons for that belief. He was satisfied that there was no one point on which the people of the United States were more perfectly united, than upon the propriety, not to say, indispensable necessity, of taking the election of President from the House of Representatives. The experience under the constitution, as it stands, as well formerly as recently, had produced that impression, and he considered the vote of the House of Representatives as the strongest manifestation of its existence. In that respect, it would be of value, but beyond that, it could produce no results. Although it could, he thought, be satisfactorily shown, that the small States would, if nothing more was done, be better off than they are under the constitution, as it stands, still all experience has shown that they do not think so. There is no reason to believe that they will ever consent to give up the power they now have without an equivalent, without a resort to the principle upon which the constitution was founded—that of compromise. The equivalent with which they would be satisfied, with which they ought to be satisfied, is the breaking up of the consolidated strength of the large States, by the establishment of the district system. It is in vain, therefore, for gentlemen to be, or to affect to be, in favor of taking the election from the House, unless they are willing to do that also, without which the leading object cannot be effected—without that, all is empty profession. We must, for the purpose of the election, make all the States of the same size, which would be the effect of the district system, and then, and then only, can we give the election of President and Vice President to the people, preserve the purity of the system, and, in reality, restore the balance of power among the States to the footing on which it stood at the adoption of the constitution. Believing that the desire to take the election from the House had sunk deep in the public mind—knowing the all-powerful agency which public sentiment fortunately had in our Government—he had the strongest hopes that the correct sentiment which now happily existed upon this one point would be able to carry the other with it. He hoped, and believed, that the people of the United States would, in the coming recess, in all constitutional forms, express their opinion upon this subject. If they did so, and if they really desire the election of their Chief Magistrate, and were true to themselves, another session would not pass by without an opportunity being furnished to the States to express their opinion upon this most interesting subject; a subject with which, in his opinion, the future welfare of the country, and the liberties of its citizens, were more closely connected than any other which had been agitated in Congress since the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. MAISON said there was no time now for the discussion of this question. He never wished great questions such as this, to be taken up when the members were exhausted; but he was very willing to take it up at the first day of the next session, and go on with it till it was decided. Mr. M. said he had been uniformly in favor of the district system, but on such a mighty question—and this was one that increased daily in magnitude—it could hardly be expected, that in a Government like this, it could be done at once. The gentleman from Missouri might satisfy himself that this question must be decided by Congress some time or other. The cases he had cited in England were certainly true, but the comparison did not hold with the character of the two Governments, and the power of the people. In England the right of voting was limited to a few, and there were many boroughs which had only a single vote. Here, nothing of that kind existed; here, everybody votes. No person has the power of sending a member here; therefore, the difficulties were not, he thought, so great in this country as in England. The idea of reform is gone in England at present. Though it was known in the earlier part of the Revolutionary war, such is the character of man, such his unwillingness to part with it, that it was not till the year 1781 that the Articles of Confederation were signed; there was no National Government till then. The moment peace came—indeed, before the peace took place—every man in the United States was convinced that the Federal Government could not answer the purpose for which it was intended. It was then the year 1787, before an attempt was made to revise this Government. Still the opinion had progressed that the Federal Government must be altered. Mr. M. said, when they looked back and saw how things progressed, the gentleman should not despair of his measure, but give time for this principle to progress through this extensive country. He did not know whether he could go so far with the gentleman from Kentucky as that gentleman wished. If the thing was right, all that was necessary was perseverance. If the people were capable of self-government, we ought never to despair of carrying measures that were calculated to promote their happiness. No great events were ever brought about but by perseverance. So in these amendments, we ought not to despair, but to persevere.

There seemed to be, Mr. M. said, an opinion prevalent, that the constitution was too sacred to be touched. Certainly it ought not to be amended on slight occasions. The first Congress that met under the Federal Government were so convinced that it wanted amendment, that they proposed several. The faults in the constitution, said Mr. M., will never be discovered till you go into action; you must try it by experiment, and if, on experiment, it does not answer the purpose, then propose to amend it. I am against any amendment on mere theory; but, when an inconvenience is found to result from practice, it is the duty of Congress to provide that remedy which experience has demonstrated; and that is the case in the present instance. The inconvenience has been felt, and under this view of the thing, there is nothing to be alarmed at. Look back to the beginning of this Government, and see how many scenes we have passed through. Only leave the people alone to their good sense, and they will set the thing right themselves. This Government is founded on the principle that the people have sense enough to govern themselves; and if passion should sometimes show itself, it will burn out, and reason will resume her throne, and the thing will come right. It is true there are times that are more favorable than others for getting any thing great done; and next session, or the session after that, will be as favorable a time for getting this done as any that can happen. I mention this because I do not know that I shall be here two years hence. Elections will take place, a new third will come into this body, members will be fresh, and this is a great object which will be agitated in all the elections. I have no objection to laying the resolution on the table.

Mr. BRANCH said, believing as he did that the perpetuation of the liberties of this people depended on the adoption of the amendment proposed; believing that it depended on bestowing on the people the right of choosing their Chief Magistrate; believing, further, that it could not be maintained without yielding an equivalent to the small States; he rose for the purpose of returning his thanks to the gentleman from New York (Mr. VAN BUREN) for the magnanimity he had displayed on the present occasion, as he had done on all others. He said his magnanimity—for having expressed to the Senate his willingness to yield up the present system to adopt the district system, provided that he could get the amendment that was proposed. He trusted the influence of this example would not be lost on the large States of the Union, and that Virginia would follow the example of New York, and display that liberality which was becoming her character.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the resolution was then laid on the table; and Mr. DICKERSON's amendment was ordered to be printed.

TUESDAY, May 9.

The Senate next took up the bill for the relief of Don Carlos Dehault Delassus, (authorizing the payment of one thousand three hundred dollars, with interest from September, 1810; also, six thousand dollars, with interest; being for money taken from him at the capture of Baton Rouge, in West Florida, on the day and year before mentioned.)

The facts of the case were stated by Messrs. BENTON and RUEGLES, and some discussion ensued between Messrs. CHANDLER, BENTON, EATON, RUEGLES, WHITE, JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and HARRISON, as to the propriety of refunding the six thousand dollars to Col. Delassus, as it was the property of the Government of Spain. It was urged, on the one hand, that, if there was any claimant, which was denied, all claim to indemnity having been relinquished by treaty, it was the King of Spain; on the other hand, it was alleged, that it was incumbent on this Government to place him, as nearly as possible, in the situation he was in before the attack took place, at which time he was the officer with whom the money was deposited, and that the treaty alluded to would not embrace this case.

The bill was finally laid on the table for the present.

WEDNESDAY, May 10.

Illinois River and Lake Michigan Canal.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to grant a certain quantity of land to the State of Illinois, for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois River with those of Lake Michigan; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. KANE, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert, "a quantity equal to three sections, on each side of the canal, from one end to the other, reserving to the United States — sections on each side of the same," &c.

Mr. CHANDLER entered into a calculation to prove that the value of the land, at the minimum price, would be between five and six millions of dollars. He therefore moved to fill the blank with 900, so as to reserve half the land for the United States.

Mr. HENDRICKS contended that this would amount to more than the whole grant.

Mr. CHANDLER then moved to insert 150; which was lost.

Mr. KANE moved to insert 10; which was carried, and then the question was taken on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Bouigny, Chase, Edwards, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Marks, Noble, Reed, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Clayton, Dickerson, Findlay, Harper, Hayne, King, Lloyd, Rowan, Sanford, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—17.

The votes being equally divided, the Vice President voted in the negative, and the bill was rejected.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made an unfavorable report on the case of sundry inhabitants of Philadelphia and Baltimore, praying remuneration for claims on the Spanish Government.

Judicial System.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, on the subject of the Judiciary bill.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he would detain the Senate but a few moments. The report spoke the views of the committee; and, in deference to the House of Representatives, the resolution provided for its transmission to that House. The opinion of the committee was founded on two assumptions—first, that the appointment of conferees on the part of the Senate would be a waiver of its vote of adherence; and secondly, that a large majority of the Senate are opposed to such waiver. Although the books of precedents do not say expressly that the appointment of conferees, on the part of the House adhering, in effect rescinds the vote of adherence, yet such is certainly the good sense of the case; and it appears that the other House have asked the conference under that view of the matter. Were it not so, the conferees would meet on unequal terms. Upon the other point, the members of the Senate will speak for themselves. If they have any thing to yield, they will, of course, vote against the resolution; if not, the meeting of the conferees would be an unavailing ceremony. Mr. V. B. said, that he had understood that some objection had been made to the form of the amendment, so far as it relates to the residence of the judges. By the first section of the bill, the appointment of three additional Justices of the Supreme Court is authorized, and they are placed, to all intents and purposes, on the same footing with the present judges. In the amendment, they are described as judges to be appointed for the three new circuits, and required to reside in their respective circuits. The bill from the House authorizes the President, in terms, to designate the circuits in which they are to serve; and the amendment does so by necessary implication. If the amendment of the Senate had been regarded as essentially objectionable, on that ground, it would have been in order for the House of Representatives to have amended the amendment; not having done so, he was satisfied that the objection was not regarded as entitled to as much weight as was by some supposed.

Fully satisfied that no good could be effected by a conference, he was opposed to it. He thought the danger of losing the bill would be increased by the measure. The bill was now in the other House. He could readily conceive that the members of that House, who were opposed to the amendment, might be disposed to send the bill here with a vote of adherence, in the hope that the Senate would yield, who would not vote to adhere if they knew that the success of their votes would certainly lose the bill. Convinced that the Senate would not recede, he thought it most advisable that the other House should act upon the bill with full knowledge upon the point.

Mr. V. B. said, that the committee had thought proper to notice the idea that, in voting to adhere, in the first instance, the Senate had indicated a want of respect for the other House. They had done so, because they had seen, with surprise and regret, that such construction had elsewhere been put upon the act. Nothing, he was certain, was farther from the truth. The Senate is incapable of treating, otherwise than with perfect respect and decorum, any other branch of the Government, and least of all could they be wanting in this respect to the House of Representatives. The temperance, not to say forbearance, which the Senate has, on more than one occasion during the present session, evinced, ought, he thought, to have saved it from the injurious supposition, that such could have been its motive. It is true that, in some of the ancient books of precedents, in the English Parliament, it is so considered; but it is equally true that the course now pursued, had been repeatedly pursued before, and had not heretofore received so unfavorable a construction. There is nothing in the nature of the act that calls for it. The committee had, however, thought it advisable to disclaim it, in behalf of the Senate. Mr. V. B. said, he would very much regret that the difference between the two Houses should cause the loss of the bill. He hoped that such would not be the case. But, if it should be otherwise—if the difference should prove irreconcilable, he saw no reason why the circumstance should occasion the least asperity or heartburnings between the two Houses. The question was one exclusively of a public character, totally disconnected, as far as he knew, from personal considerations of any description. If the two Houses viewed the public interest in different lights, it was their duty to adhere to the course which they respectively believed best calculated to promote it. Differences of that description were incident to all public proceedings, and the consequences, however much to be regretted, should be submitted to with dignity and moderation.

Mr. KING wished to explain the reason why he would vote against the adoption of the report. It would have been preferable, in the first instance, that the Senate should have insisted on the amendment, and have sent to the other House; then, if they thought proper, a Committee of Conference would have followed, as a matter of course: but, as the proposition had been made, to adhere, the other motion could not be made while that was pending; and, not being willing to yield the amendment made by the Senate, he had determined to vote in favor of adhering. That vote had placed the other House in this situation. They must recede, and the amendment would become a law; they must adhere, and the bill would be destroyed, or they must do what they had done—insist, and ask a conference. He would ask, whether it had not always been the case, that, when a conference was asked, it had been given to the other House, to explain their views, and, if there was any new light which could be thrown on the subject, the Senate might receive the benefit of it? Because, in the course of the discussion, reasons had been assigned, was it to be said they were not now prepared to give additional ones? He should vote for the conference, and if they refused to grant it, it might jeopardize the passage of the bill. He was anxious the bill should pass in some way or other; as a Representative, he wished to do, on all occasions, what was right; he deemed it right the amendment should prevail, and that the arrangement of the circuits should be such as the amendment made; yet, he was not willing, on account of some technical difference, or from some little responsibility, to risk the loss of the bill altogether. If the Senate did not show some conciliating spirit, the House might become excited, and adhere on their part; but, by evincing a conciliatory spirit, this body might bring about an arrangement which would be satisfactory to all, and which would allay the fermentation which had been attempted to be got up, and the bill would pass. He should therefore vote against the adoption of the report.

Mr. BENTON said he was pleased with the report, and entirely concurred with it. There was one question which he had advanced, which had never been answered, in the House or out of it: Was not the judge capable of doing the business in Ohio and Kentucky? This was the third time that he had presented the question in this point of view to the Senate; and he would ask some of the gentlemen who advocated the course pursued by the other

House, to say whether or not the judge was capable of doing the business of those two States? That inquiry had never been met, here or elsewhere. With regard to treating the House with disrespect, he was glad the committee had noticed it in their report. It was due to the Senate that it should be repelled. He was not versed—he had no manual—he had access to no book on the subject of etiquette; but if things went on at this rate, it would be necessary to have a manual published, in which they might all learn how they should be respectful, or how not. In his idea, it was a new sense of the term disrespect, to charge the Senate with disrespect for doing a thing which it had a clear right to do, and which it had done in the usual form.

Mr. BARTON said there were but two questions involved in the amendment of the Senate to the Judiciary bill, sent here by the House of Representatives. One was, shall a judge be appointed for a circuit, and permitted to reside out of the circuit, only visiting it occasionally? To this question he answered, No; and had neither conference nor compromise to offer upon such a proposition. The other question was, shall the State of Missouri be subjected to the inconvenient attachment to Kentucky, in the formation of a circuit? To this question he answered, No; and had no compromise to make upon the question. For, although it was true that the north-western angle of Kentucky touched the south-eastern angle of Missouri, yet, for all practical purposes, there were two States lying between Kentucky and Missouri, during the greater part of the year, during which, steamboat transportation and passage were not to be relied on. Besides, there were long distances between the respective seats of Government in Kentucky and Missouri, and the points of embarkation in each, during the season of steamboat navigation on the Ohio; he should, therefore, upon such plain questions as those involved in the Senate's amendment, upon which he had nothing to give up, vote at once for the resolution of the committee, and, he again repeated, without the slightest feeling of disrespect for any individual or public body.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the report of the Judiciary Committee, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Harper, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnson of Kentucky, Kane, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Smith, Tazewell, Thomas, Van Buren, White, Williams, Woodbury—24.

NAYS.—Messrs. Boulogny, Chase, Edwards, Harrison, Johnston of Louisiana, King, Knight, Lloyd, Marks, Reed, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour—13.

THURSDAY, May 11.

The Senate then took up the bill to establish certain Collection Districts in the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. [This bill creates three Collection Districts, Louisville, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, each of which shall be a port of entry, and contains various provisions relative to vessels arriving from foreign parts bound for these ports, and the restrictions under which vessels may break bulk at New Orleans, and transship a part of their cargo to ascend the Mississippi.]

Mr. LLOYD observed, that this bill was reported by the Committee of Commerce in consequence of a memorial from the merchants of St. Louis, which had been referred to that committee. They had consulted with the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, who had concurred with them as to the propriety of granting the prayer of the memorial. The committee, Mr. L. said, were desirous of affording every facility to the trade of the Western country, but it must be considered as an experiment. The introduction of the right of breaking bulk at New Orleans, and shipping part of their cargoes in steamboats on the Mississippi, which would have to stop at a variety of places before arriving at the port of their ultimate destination, must be attended with some hazard to the revenue. If it gave rise to abuses, however, it could be remedied.

Mr. TAZEWELL said there would be a number of collection districts established. The collectors would have the same rights and powers as other collectors, and would be bound by the general collection law. Would there not, therefore, be a certain number of officers called into action, whether there was any thing to do, or not, whose salaries would come out of the Treasury?

Mr. LLOYD replied, that the amount of business to be done would be determined in a very short time. They would have to send in their accounts quarterly, and if abuses arose, they would be stopped. He acknowledged the bill was open to many objections, but if the Senate thought it would be too hazardous, they would not pass it.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the bill was, for the present, laid on the table.

FRIDAY, May 12.

Reduction of Executive Patronage.

The Senate next took up the bill to regulate the publication of the Laws of the United States and of public advertisements.

Mr. BENTON said this bill was one of a series relating to the same general subject, which had been reported under a resolution submitted by a gentleman from North Carolina, whom he saw in his seat, (Mr. MACON.) That gentleman would take an interest in the discussion and passage of this bill, but, Mr. B. said, to his certain knowledge, that gentleman was unable, from indisposition, to take any part in the discussion. Under these circumstances, he, for one, thought it his duty to consult him. He was at the bottom of the whole affair; he had collected a variety of facts; he had matured the subject, and he thought it right that the wishes of that gentleman should prevail.

Mr. MAOON said the subject of diminishing of the patronage of the Executive, was one which he had reflected on for many years, but at this time he was unable to enter into the discussion of it; his health was at present so bad, that he would not be able to speak for ten minutes in succession. He should move, therefore, that the bill be laid-on the table; which motion prevailed, and

The same course was adopted with respect to the other bills relating to the same subject.

MONDAY, May 15.

The Senate then took up the bill from the House for the subscription of stock in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company.

Mr. HENDRICKS (Chairman of the committee which reported the bill) made a general exposition of its object, and briefly advocated its passage.

Mr. CHANDLER said they had entered into every kind of speculation since they had been here, and now they were called on to enter into partnership with lottery venders and subscribers to stock companies, who had sacrificed one-half or two-thirds of their stock, and with the States of North Carolina and Virginia. It was said the report on the subject was too long to be read. If that was the case, he thought it was too late in the session to act on the subject at all. The gentleman from Indiana had called on the gentlemen from North Carolina and Virginia, to make any explanations that should be called for as to the nature and utility of the work; but Mr. C.'s object in rising was, to ask the Chairman of the committee whether the stock had not once been fully subscribed for?

Mr. TAZEWELL said he should vote against this bill. He had done so on a former occasion, and he should continue to do so as long as he lived, and against every other bill of a similar kind, come from what quarter it might. He did not think that this Government possessed the authority, in any form, manner, or shape to expend the public money in furthering this, that, or the other project; and though this money was to be applied at his own door, and in his own State, he must vote against it. It came across his principles, and those he could not sacrifice to promote his interest; but as he had been called on by the Chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, he felt it a duty he owed to the people he represented, and to those who had this business at heart, to eke out the statement which the gentleman from Indiana had made from the documents before him.

Immediately after the Revolutionary war, (said Mr. T.,) the active mind of him who, by common consent, was placed at the head of all the citizens of this country, as soon as he was relieved from the toils of war, employed itself in looking over the map of his own country, and of his own particular State, to devise the ways and means by which its prosperity might be advanced. In this view, he proposed, in a written communication to the State of Virginia, in 1784, to make the Potomac River navigable, from the head of tide water to the utmost point where its navigation was practicable, and the same with James River; and to connect the waters of James River with the waters of Albemarle Sound, by canals. The first subject was accomplished at once: because the whole territory lying in the State of Virginia, required no other aid or concurrence. His recommendation was attended to; and, in pursuance of it, as far back as 1786, laws were passed authorizing the construction of the Potomac and James River canals, which were afterwards carried into effect. The canal now in question extends half its length into North Carolina, and it required, therefore, the co-operation of the two States, and Washington's influence was exerted to procure the enactment of the law out of which it grew. The law authorized a canal of very limited dimensions, to connect the great waters of North Carolina and Virginia; and that law received the concurrence of the Legislatures of both these States. At that time (Mr. T. said) we were in our infancy as it regarded canals. The sum necessary to accomplish this great work, of twenty-two and a half miles, was estimated at $80,000, which was subscribed for in North Carolina and Virginia. There was no such thing as a civil engineer in America, and some military engineer was picked up to cut the canal; a man who had never seen one constructed in his life, and was perfectly ignorant of the subject. He projected it, and they commenced it in utter ignorance of every thing concerning such works. They finished the cut with the $80,000, and the tolls which were received while the canal was in operation. But, when it was finished, they had got a ditch of eleven feet wide, and one foot deep, which foot, in summer time, was frequently diminished, by evaporation, to six inches. They were occupied ten years in cutting this ditch. So soon as it was finished, or before it was finished, it was found, by survey, by some persons who were a little better acquainted with the matter, that, immediately west of the canal, at two miles distance from it, there lay the best feeder in the world, a lake which was seven miles long, five miles broad, and of extraordinary depth. This lake was found to be at an elevation of seven feet above the surface of this canal, and twenty-two feet elevation above the tide water. At this time the money was all expended. Application was again made to the Legislatures of North Carolina and Virginia to authorize an additional subscription to the stock. An additional subscription of $40,000 or more, was, accordingly, made by individuals, and some portion by the State of Virginia itself. He was not sure, however, that that was the case. This money was expended in the repair of some wooden locks which had been constructed in the course of the excavation of the canal, and which rotted once in ten years. Still the canal was only eleven feet wide, and one foot deep. Things remained in this state, until the late war with Great Britain. The Chesapeake was then blocked up, and the only outlet was through this canal, and the whole of the tobacco, and every article of export in Virginia, was carried through it into the waters of North Carolina, which nature has proclaimed shall never be blockaded by any enemy. Vessels, coming from Richmond, and other parts, arrived at Norfolk, discharged their cargoes into open boats, which went through this canal to ports in North Carolina, and thence were shipped to every part of the world. The magnitude of this trade and the importance of this canal, had attracted considerable attention. The original $80,000 were gone; the $40,000 afterwards subscribed were all gone; the new stockholders were not permitted to come in on the same terms with the old ones, and they refused to come in on any other. In this state of things the board of public works, of Virginia, was authorized to take two-fifths of the whole stock, and subscribed the remaining three-fifths of the stock. With this fund they cut a feeder two miles long, giving them the command of the canal; and they opened this canal to a width, on the surface line, of fifty feet, and at the bottom of thirty-two feet, with a depth intended for six feet, but, for some reason, was only made five and a half feet. The tolls received in the mean time had been applied to the erection of stone locks. There were, originally, twelve wooden locks, which are now all done away, and there are three or four stone locks, and finer pieces of masonry I never saw in my life. The money the State subscribed has been applied to widen the canal. There were required stone locks where wooden ones existed at the southern outlet, and a cut of 200 yards, to change the place of disembogement, because a better site for the foundation of a stone lock can be found than now exists. The funds are not provided, and, if they depend upon the tolls of the canal to raise these funds, they would not be forthcoming for some years, owing to the expenses of the canal. This (Mr. T. said) was the history of the origin and progress of the work, as far as he knew any thing about it.

This canal, Mr. T. said, was to be considered in a national point of view. By a reference to the map it would be seen that, from the mouth of the St. Mary's River to the mouth of the Pedee, there is everywhere a chain of islands, leaving soundings which are navigable; a canal made by the hand of nature which is perfectly navigable. At the mouth of the Pedee the island ceases; it there becomes necessary to enter this great river; ascending its southern branch, you come within eight or ten miles of the navigable waters of Cape Fear in North Carolina. This is over a champaign country where there is not a single rock of any kind, and nothing but the roots of trees to produce any difficulty in the excavation; you ascend the nearest mouth of Cape Fear, and there approach within two miles of that chain of sounds which extend northwardly to the State of Virginia. A canal of two miles, Mr. T. said, would connect the waters of Cape Fear with the first of these sounds; and he proceeded to show the facility of effecting a complete interior navigation throughout, to Albemarle Sound, and thence to the mouth of the Dismal Swamp Canal now under consideration, twenty-three miles in length, which connected Albemarle Sound with Hampton Roads in Virginia. You then, continued Mr. T., ascend the Chesapeake Bay and come to the mouth of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; through this you enter the waters of the Delaware, ascend to Trenton, and enter there the Delaware and Raritan Canal; by this means you get to New York; you pass up Long Island Sound to Providence, Rhode Island. Wherever else the canal may go, said Mr. T., I know not, but from there to St. Mary's River, in Georgia, there are only the insignificant obstructions existing which he had described. The high lands which separate the waters which fall into the Hudson from those that fall into the Delaware; those that separate the Chesapeake from the waters of Albemarle Sound; those separating Cape Fear from South Carolina, and on to St. Mary's in Georgia, a distance of one thousand miles, required canals of something less than sixty miles altogether. Of this chain, said Mr. T., the Dismal Swamp Canal is a link, which has already been completed to the extent I before stated. Another link is the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, for the completion of which Congress voted the same sum of money at the last session, as is now proposed for this canal. It will be completed in the course of the ensuing year. The link connecting the Delaware and the Hudson is now in train, but, Mr. T. said, he did not know what progress had been made in it. It was a fact, that, during the last summer, a vessel came from New York, passed through this canal in its present situation to North Carolina, took in her load, and made her return voyage. This, Mr. T. said, was the history and progress of this canal. He had done his duty in submitting it, but, inasmuch, as he conceived that Congress had no authority to exert this power, he could not vote for it.

Mr. BRANCH, of North Carolina, said this work was a most important one, and was connected with a power already exercised by Congress; for without this, efficiency could not be given to the fortifications; it was through this canal supplies were to be furnished which were to give efficiency to the fortresses at the Rip Raps and fortress Monroe, and should he, from a little squeamishness, deny to his people a participation in the feast which had been prepared out of their money? The money of the State of North Carolina had been taken, and often, by those very men, who now tendered him this little bone; for it was nothing but a bone to pick. The State of Virginia was more interested in this work than the State of North Carolina, perhaps more than any State in the Union, and those men who had taken the money of his people, and had applied it to objects of a different character, were now tandering him a small boon by way of return. If he should accept it, should he be compromitted by his vote; should he be bound to acquiesce in any violation of the rights of his people hereafter by the vote he should give now? Mr. B. said he was an advocate for the equal and impartial distribution of the resources of the nation; therefore, it was that he had agreed with zeal to the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey. The State of North Carolina had received no returns for the money she had been pouring into the coffers of the nation. Mr. B. then entered into some further statements in relation to the importance of the canal, and said he could not suffer a morbid sensibility to prevent him from accepting this boon, the first which had been offered by those who had taken his people's money.

Mr. NOBLE, of Indiana, said he labored under some difficulties in relation to this subject, but they were not constitutional ones; for his course had always been uniform on that subject. In relation to the subject of internal improvement, it was an object that ought at all times to be promoted, when it could be done without being burthensome to the people; yet, while he made this avowal, he must be permitted to say he labored under a degree of embarrassment in voting for the appropriation of a sum of money for making canals within the Commonwealth of Virginia when the Senator from that State told them he was opposed to it from principle. Mr. N. said that being raised at the handle of the plough, and not having had it in his power to qualify himself to discriminate so well as many gentlemen could do on the subject of giving constructions to the constitution, he felt somewhat embarrassed by the speech of the gentleman from Virginia. He loved the man who would give him information that should lead him to the path that would promote the interests of the people he represented; but he did not wish to impose on the State of Virginia this appropriation of money against her will. He saw a difference if not a contradiction of sentiment on the subject. I hear it advanced on this floor, said Mr. N., that the Executive officer wished to assume to himself power, and extend his arm over the whole creation, because in his message, while we have ten millions of people, he had recommended an exploration of the Northwest coast of our Continent; yet, when I look back to the time of Jefferson, when we had only half the number of people, I find that he had sent without censure an exploring party to the Pacific Ocean. When I hear and see such contradictions, what, said Mr. N., am I to believe? The constitution was the same then as it is now. Am I to be led into this vortex? When I go back to the forest which gave me birth, what am I to tell the people of that country? I will tell them facts. I came here for that purpose, and I will go back for that purpose. If any man who has administered this Government, has sinned less than another against the Constitution of the United States, it is John Quincy Adams; and if there is embarrassment in our way on the ground of the constitutional question, let truth be our guide, and let it be spoken throughout the country. Mr. N. said he wanted to come to some conclusion; and, as he had said on a former occasion, let the line of demarkation be drawn. Mr. N. then said he should turn to the Journal of the preceding session, and read a passage which the gentleman from Virginia could explain. That gentleman, said Mr. N., has satisfied me; he has taken me along with him like a torrent; he cannot only split hairs, but he can quarter them; his mode of reasoning has such a powerful effect on my mind that I am ready at all times to conform to his views. [Mr. N. then read from the Journal the amendment offered by Mr. TAZEWELL to the bill for the subscription for stock to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, at the last session of Congress, proposing to subscribe for so many shares in the Dismal Swamp Canal Company; which amendment was rejected.]

Mr. TAZEWELL rose to set the gentleman from Indiana right. When the bill for appropriating a sum of money for the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal was up at the last session, it was argued by the Senator from Delaware, (Mr. VAN DYKE,) that this canal was one link of the great chain to connect the Southern with the Eastern country. Therefore, Mr. T. said, he offered the amendment to the bill, stating that this was another link in the chain, and, while they were providing for the chain, they might make two links instead of one. I was asked, said Mr. T., by the Senator from Delaware, if he agreed to the amendment would I vote for the bill? I replied, that I would not, in any shape in the world; take my amendment, and I will vote against the whole bill; reject it, and I will vote against the bill. It was rejected, and if the gentleman will turn over the next leaf of the Journal, he will find my name amongst the nays. I never did vote for a proposition of the kind, and, so help me God, I never will.

Mr. KANE, of Illinois, said it was with reluctance he said any thing on the subject; but he was anxious that the vote he was about to give, should not be viewed in the spirit of retaliation. He had difficulties on this subject of a constitutional nature. Immediately after the vote on the Louisville and Portland Canal bill, the idea occurred to him that he ought to have inquired before he gave his vote as to this fact. Did the act of incorporation authorize the subscription of stock, on the part of the Government of the United States, or any Government, whatever? If the act of incorporation of the State of Kentucky in that case, and of the State of Virginia, in this, did not give the authority to receive the United States subscription, he would ask whether the act on the part of this Government, did not subvert, in a great measure, the power of these States over their corporations? Corporators are under liabilities, as well as individuals; they may do acts which will be a forfeiture of their charter. Supposing, then, the Government of the United States should acquire, by any means, a majority of the stock, and do acts, which, if done by individuals, would subject them to a forfeiture of their charter, what a state of things would be produced between Virginia and the United States! He apprehended that no remedy could, in such a case, be applied by a resort to legal tribunals; and he quoted decisions of the Supreme Court, and argued, at some length, to show the force of this objection. The Government of the United States, he said, would be a partner in this corporation; the Government of the United States could not be sued; one of the individuals composing the corporation not being liable to be sued, no suit could be entered in the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. K. said further, that he did not believe that the Government had the power, except in cases of most evident necessity, of exercising the right of improving within the limits of a State, without the consent of the State. What should be the evidences of that consent, he would judge for himself. If the Representatives of the State, on this floor, advocated the bill; and if from the evidences which history furnished, he believed that the State consented to the measure, his objections would be done away. This was not the case here. The State of Virginia by her Representative, protested against the exercise of this power; and had Congress the power to inflict this canal on her without her consent? It seemed to him they had not.

Mr. VAN BUREN said he rose principally to call for the yeas and nays; but while he was up, he would make one remark on the subject. He could not vote for this bill, for he did not believe that this Government possessed the constitutional power to make these roads and canals, or to grant the money to make them; but, while he entertained this opinion, he did not wish to indulge in feelings of asperity towards those who differed from him. It was a subject not free from excitement, especially so far as the power to grant money was concerned. Different views were taken of this subject, by persons who were pure and honest; and, Mr. V. B. said, he should take the liberty, which, perhaps, he had no right to take, to express his regret, that in the course of the discussion on this question, such feelings had been drawn forth, as had been witnessed on the present as well as on former occasions. There were no two gentlemen on this floor, who placed more unqualified confidence in each other's integrity, than the gentlemen from Maine and North Carolina; still, from the misapprehension of a few words used in debate, these feelings had been drawn forth. It was their duty to avoid such feelings. He acquiesced in the opinion, that there was no State in the Union which had received so little notice, as the State of North Carolina; and, Mr. V. B. said, where he could do it, consistently with his view of the constitution, he would with the utmost cheerfulness contribute his support to any project to assist that State; but on this occasion he could not do it. At the same time he must say, that, if he believed it in the power of the Government to grant money for this purpose, the present mode would be the last one he should think of adopting. If there was any grant of money at all for this purpose, it should be direct. Where aid was granted in the mode now proposed, abuses would creep in, and in nine cases out of ten, deception would be practised. In the State of New York they had had, Mr. V. B. said, full experience of this, in the application for charters for banks; plausible pretences were set up that the State would be thereby benefited, till these practices became so numerous, that in the end public opinion was decidedly against them, and the Legislature, to her honor, at the last session, had refused all applications of this description. So it was with Congress: they would proceed from one thing to another, till many millions of the public money were thrown away on disadvantageous projects, and they would finally come to the same conclusion which the State of New York had arrived at. When an individual subscribed for stock, he had a personal, a direct interest, which induced him to move with caution, and to see that his interests were properly attended to, and he would not embrace any wild scheme. Would any man believe that the United States would be benefited by the Louisville and Portland canal? Every gentleman on this floor believed it to be a useless concern; it was nothing but a cover to give money in this form which could not be given directly; and now they were called on to subscribe for stock in the Dismal Swamp canal, giving to the existing stockholders the money of the United States, to reimburse them for the money they had expended on a bad concern. Did this line of conduct comport with sound policy? He hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would not be discouraged; public opinion on this subject was taking the proper direction, and in the end this assumption of power on the part of the Government, would be put down, or there would be a salutary amendment to the constitution to provide for an equitable and fair distribution of the funds of the Government for this purpose.

[A short explanation then took place between Messrs. CHANDLER and BRANCH, and then]

Mr. ROWAN rose to tell the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) that there was one gentleman on this floor who had been led to believe, that the stock of the Louisville and Portland canal was profitable. Mr. R. said he might be deceived, but he would tell the gentleman that scientific and calculating men from the east and the north had believed it to be profitable, and had sent their money there to be invested. The gentleman from New York had asserted that he did not believe there was a member of the Senate who believed that that stock would be profitable. Mr. R. did believe in his conscience, and from all the information he had been able to procure, that it would be advantageous, and some of the most cautious men in America had invested their money in it. Mr. R. said he thought the gentleman from New York might as well have waited till events should furnish the proof, and not take it for granted that the stock of that canal would be unprofitable.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Maryland, said he thought this was a question on which the Senate of the United States were determined. All departments of the Government had acted on it, and the principle was settled, that the Government had power to appropriate money for internal improvement: the question was also settled as to the particular mode recognized by this bill. Mr. C. said he should beg leave to assert, that he never had, nor never would pursue the policy which gentlemen intimated had been pursued by those who formed the majority on this question. He believed, that in voting on this question, it was for the interest of the United States; if he did not so believe, he would not vote for it. If by the phrase, "important to the interest of the United States," the gentleman from New York alluded to the annual revenue the subscription would produce, he might, perhaps, agree to his proposition that it was not important; but, when they were told that this canal was necessary for the defences of the country, to secure the interests of the agriculturist and merchant, and every part of our population, was it to be said they were not to protect the interests of all these valuable classes of people? Mr. C. said when individual gentlemen from a particular section of the country were appealed to for their knowledge of facts, more especially in their possession; if, in giving the result of their observation and experience, they expressed their conviction that the designed improvements would not be productive of any good, the utmost deference ought to be paid to their opinion; and, if the gentlemen from North Carolina and Virginia would rise from their seats, and say that this appropriation was to accomplish an object which would not be advantageous to the interests of that particular section of the country, or to the United States at large, Mr. C. said he would give a different vote from the one he had intended to give. In this respect, the opinions of the gentlemen were entitled to great weight; but, Mr. C. said, when they differed from the course he meant to pursue on abstract legislation, or constitutional grounds, for the decision of which every man in this body must consider himself bound to himself, the opinions of those gentlemen were not entitled to more weight than those of any other individuals.

Mr. VAN BUREN regretted he was not so fortunate as to make himself understood. It was proposed that the United States should subscribe for a portion of the stock, and so place herself in the same relation as individual stockholders. His objection was, that this was bad stock, and a losing concern. If that was the case, and there were other reasons why the United States should benefit this company, it should be done by voting money directly. The gentleman from Maryland had said, there might be other advantages arising from this canal; it was necessary for the support of the forts, and the general interests of the United States would be promoted by it. Then, Mr. V. B. said, his objection would apply; they should give money directly for these purposes, that their constituents might know, not only the purpose for which it was to be applied, but the extent also; and not go the round-about way of promoting the public interest by becoming stockholders. As to the question being settled, he should protest against the admission of such a doctrine; and he should resist, to all intents and purposes, the idea that the acts of this Congress were to bind him, or his constituents, hereafter.

The question on ordering the bill to a third reading, was finally determined by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Boulogny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, King, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Chandler, Dickerson, Harper, Hayne, Kane, Knight, Macon, Reed, Rowan, Sanford, Tazewell, Van Buren, White, Woodbury—16.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading, and was then read a third time, PASSED, and returned to the House of Representatives.

TUESDAY, May 16.

Graduation of the Price of Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. BENTON, the Senate then took up the bill to graduate the price of the public lands.

The bill having been read, Mr. BENTON rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: This is not a new bill, presented for the first time to the Senate, but one which I have annually brought in for three successive sessions. Circumstances have prevented me heretofore, from discussing its merits before you; but the vote which you have just taken, convinces me that the great majority of this body is willing to hear me, and I shall endeavor to acquit myself worthily of their indulgence, by the plain, brief, and common-sense manner in which I shall treat the subject. It is a subject of great moment to this Confederation, and worthy the most anxious deliberation of this Senate, whether we consider the value of the property to be disposed of, or the political consequences of permitting it to be held and wielded by the Federal Government.

The bill which I have introduced, contains

MAY, 1826.]

Public Lands.

two very plain and distinct principles; the first presenting a proposition to sell off the best of the land for prices adapted to its value; and the second contemplating a plan for the gratuitous donation of the remainder. I think, Mr. President, that these principles, under some modification, ought to be adopted; and I flatter myself that I can demonstrate the propriety of adopting them, whether the lands are to be considered as a source of revenue, or as a means of increasing the wealth and population of the country. The first would be the view of a mere financier, the second would be that of a statesman; and, as I mean to support my bill in both characters, I shall proceed to consider it, in the first place, as a mere revenue measure.

I then lay down the proposition fairly and boldly, that, as a mere scheme for raising money out of the public lands, the first principle of my bill ought to be adopted; and, in proceeding to maintain that proposition, I shall go back to the acquisition of these lands by the Federal Government, show the object for which they were acquired, and shall examine the manner in which that object has been pursued or neglected.

The public lands were acquired from two sources: the cessions of particular States, and purchases from France and Spain. The quantity thus acquired, and now lying within the limits of States and Territories, may be estimated at 240 millions of acres. The cessions from the States were made for the declared object of paying off the debt of the revolution, and with a stipulation to erect the ceded territory into sovereign States, with all the rights and powers which belonged to the original members of the Confederation: and the purchases from France and Spain were made under the stipulation, secured by the faith of treaties, of erecting the purchased territory into like sovereign, equal, and independent States. In both cases the Federal Government was nothing but a trustee, and bound by compacts and treaties to dispose of the lands according to the terms of the trust. The cessions by the States were made at the close of the Revolutionary war; the purchase from France, about a quarter of a century ago; and that from Spain, in the year 1819.

The first acts of the Congress of the Confederation, with respect to these lands, were faithfully directed to the object for which they were intended. The ordinance of '85 fixed their price at one dollar per acre in certificates of the public debt; directed them to be divided, as fast as surveyed, into thirteen portions, according to the quotas of the States in the last requisitions; distributed by lot among the different States, and offered for sale at the courthouse of every county. This ordinance was a faithful exposition of the views of the States, in making the cessions, and a fair acknowledgment of the obligation incurred by the Federal Government in accepting them. The mode of selling the lands was also eminently just and wise; but the intention of the ordinance was defeated by the monopoly which had been effected of the certificates of the public debt. These certificates were no longer in the hands of the soldiers who had fought the battles of the country, or of the farmers who had furnished support to the armies. They were in the hands of speculators, who had purchased them up at an average of two shillings and sixpence in the pound, and wished to convert them into a public debt, at twenty shillings in the pound, drawing an annual interest of six per cent. These speculators resided chiefly in the great cities, and Congress, finding that no sales could be effected at the county court-houses, directed them, by a subsequent ordinance, to be held at Philadelphia, New York, and Boston; but without better success than before. The speculators would not take the lands, but relied upon their interest in Congress, in accomplishing their favorite object of funding their certificates at eight times as much as they had given for them. Thus passed off the time from '85 to '89; Congress endeavoring to pay the public debt with the public land, and the holders of the debt endeavoring to have it funded. The Federal Government, under the new constitution, went into operation in the midst of the struggle, and the Executive Government faithfully pursued the plan of the Congress of the Confederation. The first and second messages of President Washington were directed to this object, and he strongly recommended a sale of the lands to pay off the principal of the debt.

Doubtless it will be agreeable to the Senate to hear the words of that great man, and as I wish to avail myself of his authority in the support of my bill, I will here read the passages to which I have referred.

"Allow me, moreover, to hope that it will be a favorite policy with you, not merely to secure a payment of the interest of the debt funded, but as far and as fast as the growing resources of the country will permit, to exonerate it of the principal itself. The appropriations you have made of the Western lands, explain your dispositions on this subject; and, I am persuaded, that the sooner that valuable fund can be made to contribute, along with other means, to the actual reduction of the public debt, the more salutary will be the measure to every public interest, as well as the more satisfactory to our constituents."

Message of 1791.

"A provision for the sale of the vacant lands of the United States is particularly urged, among other reasons, by the important considerations that they are pledged as a fund for reimbursing the public debt; that, if timely and judiciously applied, they may save the necessity of burdening our citizens with new taxes for the extinguishment of the principal; and that, being free to discharge the principal, but in a limited proportion, no opportunity ought to be lost for availing the public of its right."

These two extracts show the policy of Washington, his policy to reduce the principal of the debt, and to make the public lands subservient to that object, by "timely" and "judicious" sales.

The report of General Hamilton, his Secretary of the Treasury, made at the same time, may be considered as an amplification of the message, and the correct expositor of President Washington's idea of timely and judicious sales. This report recommends the immediate sale of the lands, at their then value, and fixes that value at an average of twenty cents per acre. The following extract conveys his sentiments in his own words:

After reciting that the public creditors are offered one-third of their debt in land, at twenty cents per acre, and an interest of six per cent. on the remaining two-thirds until paid, the report proceeds:

"The creditor is offered the advantage of making his interest principal, and he is asked to facilitate to the Government an effectual provision for his demands, by accepting a third of them in land at a fair valuation.

"The general price at which the Western lands have been heretofore sold, has been a dollar per acre, in public securities; but, at the time the principal purchases were made, these securities were worth, in the market, less than three shillings in the pound. The nominal price, therefore, would not be the proper standard, under present circumstances; nor would the precise specie value then given be a just rule; because, as the payments were to be made by instalments, and the securities were, at the times of the purchases, extremely low, the probability of a moderate rise must be presumed to have been taken into the account. Twenty cents, therefore, seems to bear an equitable proportion to the two considerations of value at the time, and likelihood of increase."

Here, then, is the plan of Washington and Hamilton, a plan which contains the true principle of action for every debtor, whether a nation, or an individual. They proposed to pay the principal, instead of piddling at the annual interest, of the debt, and to sell the land at once, for what it was worth, instead of holding it up for a future and indefinite rise. But the plan of these great men did not succeed. It met a vehement opposition, both in and out of Congress. The speculators in certificates, and the political enemies of General Hamilton, combined to attack it. They represented it as a prodigal waste of the public lands, to sell them at an average of twenty cents an acre, when, by holding them a few years, they would rise to a great price. They urged the advantage of paying the annual interest of the debt, until this great rise should take place. They set up loud and piteous lamentations in favor of the poor, whom they represented as destined to remain forever the tenants and vassals of the speculators who would monopolize the lands at such low rates. They excited the jealousy of the old States, by showing them their population drawn off to the West; and they affected great concern for the injury which would be done former purchasers who had given one dollar per acre. In short, they prevailed. The mass of the people were deceived and imposed upon, and a powerful party in Congress, in favor of converting two and sixpence in the pound, into a national debt at twenty shillings in the pound, obtained the complete ascendancy over the policy of Washington and Hamilton. That party prevailed. They prevented the sale of the land, according to the recommendation of these great men. They procured twenty-five millions of their certificates—certificates which had been got for a song from the people—to be converted into national debt, at twenty shillings in the pound, and six per cent. interest. Having done this, their next object was, to make the debt perpetual, by limiting the sales of lands to as much as would pay the annual interest. To accomplish this purpose, the price of land was raised to two dollars per acre, in gold and silver; the law which permitted evidences of the debt to be taken in payment of land, was repealed altogether; the net proceeds of the lands were pledged, by themselves, to themselves; and the people were unblushingly told, that a national debt was a national blessing, because it would create a powerful moneyed interest, to support the Government.

Such are the facts, Mr. President, relative to the origin of the present system of selling public lands. Such were the actors, such their motives, and such their merits, in the establishment of this system. Having displayed these, let us next look to the fruits of the system—let us see what the people of these States have gained by paying interest upon the debt, and waiting for the rise in the price of their lands. I hold those fruits in my hand (showing a paper), and I will present them to the Senate.

One hundred and thirty-six millions of dollars paid in interest! Twenty-six millions received from the sales of public lands! The debt increased instead of diminished: for it was seventy-six millions at the end of the Revolution, and it is eighty millions now! And the lands which were to rise in ten years to four and eight dollars an acre, are remaining unsold at one dollar twenty-five cents! But even the amount of interest paid, or the greater part of it, had to be collected from other sources. Look to the table. In no one year was more than half enough received from the sales of land to meet the interest of that year; seldom more than one-fourth; at present not one-fifth; and the amount annually decreasing; and still we have advocates for the continuation of this ruinous policy; men who look forward to the rise, and want us to continue, I presume, for another half century, the experiment of a system under which we have already paid the amount of the principal twice over, in annual interest, without diminishing the principal one dollar; under which we see the best of the lands dribbled and piddled away without accomplishing the object for which they were ceded to the Federal Government, or being felt among the resources of the nation. I trust, Mr. President, that we shall not be guilty of this improvidence; I trust, that after fifty years' experience, and the loss of one hundred and thirty-six millions of dollars, we are brought to a condition to listen to the venerated voice of Washington, and to go to work in earnest at selling off the land for what it is now worth, and paying off the principal of the public debt instead of wasting that great fund in the payment of annual interest. It is, indeed, a great fund, and capable, under a judicious administration, in conjunction with the sinking fund, of extinguishing the public debt in eight years. I say eight years! and prove it like a proposition in mathematics. Our debt is eighty millions of dollars, and the sinking fund is ten millions. Now it is just as plain as that two and two makes four, that the sinking fund should extinguish the debt in eight years, if its whole amount could be applied to the principal; but about one-half is absorbed in the payment of interest. Let the interest, then, be raised from the lands, while the duties on imports furnish ten millions for the sinking fund. The lands amount to two hundred and forty millions of acres, and if so disposed of as to raise the interest of the debt for eight years, the sinking fund would extinguish the principal in that time. The amount to be raised, supposing ten millions of the principal to be annually extinguished, would not exceed twenty millions, and surely the sales could be so managed, as to raise that sum in that number of years. Here, then, is a paradox. I maintain that it is better economy to sell the lands, or the best of them, in eight years, for twenty millions, than to sell them in the progress of ages and centuries for three hundred millions. One would enable us to get rid of the debt; the other would not. The lands were ceded to the Federal Government to pay the debt. In fifty years they have paid no part of it, not even the one-fifth part of the interest. In fifty years to come they can do no better if administered in the same way; but in eight years they will extinguish a debt of eighty millions if the present ruinous system is abandoned, and a new and judicious one adopted.

I propose, then, to accelerate the sales, and to raise twenty millions in eight years. How is this to be done? By letting the land go for what it is worth—by selling for the present value—instead of waiting for a future, distant, and uncertain rise. There are several ways to accomplish this object. One of these would be to abolish the minimum price, and sell all the lands off-hand for what they would bring. This mode is not recommended, for reasons too obvious to need enumeration. Another would be, to class and appraise the lands, reserving the two first classes for sale, and surrendering the third to the States. The third mode would consist in letting the lands class themselves, as proposed by the bill now under consideration.

This bill proposes successive annual reductions of twenty-five cents per acre, until the price is reduced to twenty-five cents, when the refuse would be subject to gratuitous donation. Its operation would be to quicken the sales, to infuse new life and animation into them, and to sell more in five years than would be sold, under the present system, in as many ages. A district would be sold out in five years. Each tract would find a bidder, as it fell from one price to another, until it got to its true value. The fear of losing it by the purchase of another person, and the idea of being given away as a donation, would compel those who wanted a tract, to buy it as soon as it got to its real value. At present, people do not purchase the second and third-rate lands, because it is absurd and contradictory to give the same for that kind as for the first rate.

No man will give one dollar twenty-five cents for a quarter section that has but one-half, one-quarter, or one-tenth part of it fit for cultivation; or which is only desirable for the timber upon it, or for a spring, or a quarry, or a place for building, or which might be wanted for the mere purpose of keeping off too close a neighbor. People will not buy such inferior tracts at one dollar twenty-five cents; for that would bring the little good land which it contains, to eight or ten dollars an acre. They will not buy, because they know that nobody else will, and that they can buy it ten or twenty years hence, and, in the mean time, have the use of it without paying taxes. I say, have the use of it; and this refers to the timber it may bear: for it is notorious that the public timber is used as common property, and that no blame or censure attaches to the practice. Statutory enactments are unavailing when unsupported by the moral sense of the community for which they are intended. The Federal Government has its statutes upon this subject; but they are no protection to the land—they are nothing but instruments of revenge in the hands of neighbors, who fall out and quarrel with one another, and commence the "unprofitable contest of trying which can do the other the most harm." But, in general, there are none to inform, or to bear witness. Whole neighborhoods are in the same predicament. By common consent they go and take timber from the public land, and let their own stand for a future occasion. In the level countries they often go five miles; and on the banks of the great rivers, immense numbers make a regular business of cutting large rafts, and floating them off to market, even to New Orleans, at a distance of five hundred or a thousand miles. Thus, those who please have the benefit of the land, without the payment of tax or purchase-money. Thus the inducement to purchase is destroyed. Thus is accounted for the notorious fact, that the sales are declining; that we are receiving less and less every year, and that the Registers and Receivers, in most of the districts, do not receive as much for their commissions as would compensate them for the loss of their time; and yet the system costs the Government upwards of 83½ per cent. on the amount collected. The salaries, commissions, surveys, contingencies, &c., are upwards of $300,000 per annum; the receipts into the Treasury are only about nine hundred thousand; and thus is presented the anomalous fact, that, in the operation of the most enormously expensive system of revenue that ever was heard of, the principal officers who administer it cannot live upon their compensation. Look to the document which has been laid upon your tables. See Registers and Receivers, whose commissions are, in many instances, less than one hundred dollars per annum, and very few exceeding twice or thrice that sum. Look, also, to the table of lands sold, and remaining unsold, in the different States and Territories, and see how slowly the system proceeds. Take, as an example, the oldest and most populous districts of the oldest and richest of the new States, and see how little has been done towards completing the sales.

Thus far, Mr. President, I have considered the bill before you in a mere financial point of view. I have discussed it, as a revenue measure, and, under that aspect, which is not the most favorable which it wears, I have demonstrated the advantage of adopting its principles. But I should be false to myself, and to the place in which I stand—I should be false to the character of Senator, with which I am clothed, and which should include the character of statesman—if I should suffer the bill to go off under this limited and contracted point of view. Far from it. A wider horizon opens before me. Consequences far superior to the accumulation of dollars in the Treasury; consequences even superior to the honor and advantage of paying off the public debt, present themselves to my vision. I see, in the adoption of this great measure, consequences which connect themselves with the durability and prosperity of this Republic—the number of tenants diminished; the class of freeholders increased; the multiplication of that class of population which is to pay taxes, bear arms, defend the country against foreign and domestic enemies, and to furnish the future statesmen and warriors of this Republic. These are the grand advantages which are to result from a distribution of the soil among the children of the country: and, happily, I speak to those who understand and anticipate me. I speak to statesmen, and not to computing clerks; to Senators, and not to Quæstors of provinces; to an assembly of legislators, and not to a keeper of the King's forests. I speak to Senators who know this to be a Republic, not a Monarchy; who know that the public lands belong to the people, and not to the Federal Government; who know that the lands are to be “disposed of” for the common good of all, and not kept for the service of a few; and knowing that I speak to such enlightened men, I feel my labor abridged, and my task anticipated. The American Senate is not the place for the illustration of truisms. Senators who have passed their lives in the administration of the public affairs, whose minds are trained to the induction of truth, need no elaborate discussion of great principles. It is sufficient to state them, and the practical consequences are forthwith comprehended.

I state a proposition, then, of received and universal truth, when I say that the power of a Republic is in its population; that the basis of population is agriculture; and that the agriculture which combines wealth and population, is that of the freeholder. Quotations in support of a truth so plain would be out of place in the Senate; but there is one which I flatter myself they would be willing to hear, one to which it would listen with pleasure, whether it be for the justness of the sentiments, the simplicity and beauty of the language, or for the eminent authority from which it comes. I speak of General Hamilton's report in favor of manufactures, and in the front of which he places the following just and noble encomium upon the agricultural interest:

The Quotation.

“It ought readily to be conceded, that the cultivation of the earth, as the primary and most certain source of national supply—as the immediate and chief source of subsistence to man—as the principal source of those materials which constitute the nutriment of other kinds of labor—as including a state most favorable to the freedom and independence of the human mind—one, perhaps, most conducive to the multiplication of the human species—has, intrinsically, a strong claim to PRE-EMINENCE over every other kind of industry.”

Tenantry is unfavorable to freedom. It lays the foundation for separate orders in society, annihilates the love of country, and weakens the spirit of independence. The tenant has, in fact, no country, no hearth, no domestic altar, no household god. The freeholder, on the contrary, is the natural supporter of a free Government, and it should be the policy of republics to multiply their freeholders, as it is the policy of monarchies to multiply tenants. We are a republic, and we wish to continue so: then multiply the class of freeholders; pass the public lands cheaply and easily into the hands of the people; sell, for a reasonable price, to those who are able to pay; and give, without price, to those who are not. I say give, without price, to those who are not able to pay; and that which is so given, I consider as sold for the best of prices; for a price above gold and silver; a price which cannot be carried away by delinquent officers, nor lost in failing banks, nor stolen by thieves, nor squandered by an improvident and extravagant administration. It brings a price above rubies—a race of virtuous and independent farmers, the true supporters of their country, and the stock from which its best defenders must be drawn.

"What constitutes a State?

Not high rais'd battlements, nor labored mound,
Thick wall, or moated gate;
Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crown'd,
Nor starr'd and spangled courts,
Where low-born baseness wafts perfume to pride:
But MEN! high-minded men,
Who their duties know, but know their rights,
And, knowing, dare maintain them."

What made these States? What constitutes their power? What brought them to their present height of power and freedom? What made them, as they now are, the pride and admiration of the universe, and the sole depository of human liberty? What produced these great results, but the operation of the system, which, with so much more zeal than ability, I now recommend to the Senate? A system of cheap and ready distribution of the soil among the people, by the combined action of sales and donations; sales upon easy terms to those who are able to pay, and gratuitous gifts to those who are not. These Atlantic States were donations from the British crown; and the great proprietors distributed out their possessions with a free and generous hand. A few shillings for a hundred acres, a nominal quit rent, and gifts of a hundred, five hundred, and a thousand acres, to actual settlers: such were the terms on which they dealt out the soil which is now covered by a nation of freemen. Provinces, which now form sovereign States, were sold from hand to hand, for a less sum than the Federal Government now demands for an area of two miles square. I could name instances. I could name the State of Maine; a name, for more reasons than one, familiar and agreeable to Missouri; and which was sold by Sir Ferdinando Gorges to the proprietors of the Massachusetts Bay, for twelve hundred pounds, provincial money. And well it was for Maine that she was so sold; well it was for her that the modern policy of waiting for the rise, and sticking at a minimum of $1 25, was not then in vogue; or else Maine would have been a desert now. Instead of a numerous, intelligent, and virtuous population, we should have had trees and wild beasts. My respectable friend, the Senator from that State, (Gen. CHANDLER,) would not have been here to watch so steadily the interest of the public, and to oppose the bills which I bring in for the relief of the land claimants. And I mention this to have an opportunity to do justice to the integrity of his heart and to the soundness of his understanding—qualities in which he is excelled by no Senator—and to express my belief that we will come together upon the final passage of this bill: for the cardinal points in our policy are the same—economy in the public expenditures, and the prompt extinction of the public debt. I say, well it was for Maine that she was sold for the federal price of four sections of Alabama pine, Louisiana swamp, or Missouri prairie. Well it was for every State in this Union, that their soil was sold for a song, or given as a gift to whomsoever would take it. Happy for them, and for the liberty of the human race, that the kings of England and the "Lords Proprietors," did not conceive the luminous idea of waiting for the rise, and sticking to a minimum of $1 25 per acre. Happy for Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio, that they were settled under States, and not under the Federal Government. To this happy exemption they owe their present greatness and prosperity. When they were settled, the State laws prevailed in the acquisition of lands; and donations, pre-emptions, and settlement rights, and sales at two cents the acre, were the order of the day. I include Ohio, and I do it with a knowledge of what I say; for ten millions of her soil, that which now constitutes her chief wealth and strength, were settled upon the liberal principles which I mention. The Federal system only fell upon fifteen millions of her soil; and, of that quantity, the one-half now lies waste and useless, paying no tax to the State, yielding nothing to agriculture, desert spots in the midst of a smiling garden, "waiting for the rise," and exhibiting, in high and bold relief, the miserable folly of prescribing an arbitrary minimum upon that article which is the gift of God to man, and which no parental Government has ever attempted to convert into a source of revenue and an article of merchandise.

But it is not to the wealth and population of the States alone, that the fatal effects of this Federal dominion over their soil is extended. It reaches and affects a still higher object—the sovereign character of the States themselves. The new States are not equal in sovereignty to the old ones. The points of difference are numerous, striking, and highly material. The old States have a right to make primary disposition of the soil within their limits; the new ones have not. The old States have the right of taxation; the new ones have not. The old States possess the right of eminent domain; the new ones have it not. The Federal Government has no jurisdiction over the soil, timber, grass, and water, of the old States; they assert and exercise jurisdiction over all those in the new States; denouncing penalties of fine and imprisonment against the citizens of the new States who may cut a stick, dig a hole, tread down grass upon the public land, or boil the salt water of the great Federal landlord; and her Federal courts are authorized to punish these offences, and her military force is armed with power to expel with the bayonet, whomsoever her agents may choose to consider as intruders upon any ground that they may please to suppose belongs to the great power before which all must bend. This condition of inequality I hold to be inconsistent with the terms and spirit of the constitution; inconsistent with the terms and spirit of the cession acts, by which the North-western and South-western Territories were ceded to the Federal Government; inconsistent with the terms and spirit of the treaties by which Louisiana and Florida were ceded to the United States; and wholly incompatible with the independence of the States themselves. To remove this inequality, and all its consequent evil; to avoid, especially, the conflict of laws, of jurisdiction, and, perhaps, of arms, to which it is to give rise—immediate steps should be taken to surrender the public lands to the States within which they lie. The bill before you does not contemplate this measure; but the consideration of this bill has turned the minds of eminent statesmen in that direction, and I shall expect to see the proposition distinctly brought before the Senate from a quarter as distinguished for political wisdom, as for the disinterestedness of its action.* It will not do, Mr. President, for gentlemen who come from the great cities, to estimate the wild lands of the West, according to the standard of their own fields and gardens. They must listen to those who come from the West, and have a personal knowledge of what they say. If they do not, they will make this Union a curse to those whose interests are legislated upon by members of Congress from far distant States, ignorant of facts themselves, on account of that distance, and deaf to the voice of those who can state the truth. They must listen to those who speak the general voice of the West, backed, as I am, by memorials from four States, and supported by numerous Senators and Representatives. I speak the voice of seven States and three Territories, Mr. President, when I denounce this doctrine of waiting for the rise, as a policy false in itself—fraught with injustice to these States—involving a breach of the cession acts; a breach of the compact between the Federal Government and the new States; a breach of the constitution; a policy injurious to the public revenue; injurious to the public property in the new States; injurious to the old States, and destructive of the sovereignty and independence of the new ones. These, sir, are not a string of phrases, repeated without consideration, but each a text, upon which a commentary of facts, reasons, and consequences, might be delivered, each as long as the speech which I am now addressing to you. But I will not attempt this commentary. Time forbids it. I will merely indicate the facts which sustain my positions.

I say, then, that the policy of holding up the lands at an arbitrary minimum, and waiting for a rise in the price, is a policy intrinsically false; and I prove it by a reference to the elementary principles of political economy; those principles which forbid a Government to make merchandise of its soil; which forbid it to turn landlord; hold tenants; reserve large tracts of ground in the wilderness state; enact a code of forest law, and maintain a body of officers in pay and authority, to protect its timber, grass, and soil.

I say it is a policy fraught with injustice to the new States; and I prove it by referring to the table of unsold land in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi; covering from one-third to nineteen-twentieths of their soil, paying no tax, helping to open no roads, build no bridges, dig no canals, support no schools, locked up from agriculture, and as useless to the people as so many royal parks in the kingdoms of Europe.

I say it is a policy involving a breach of the cession acts, and I prove it by referring to the terms of these cessions. Here they are:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That it shall and may be lawful for the Delegates of this State, to the Congress of the United States, and they are hereby authorized and empowered, to convey, transfer, &c., to the United States, in Congress assembled, for the benefit of said States, all the right, title, claim, &c., which this State has, as well to the jurisdiction, as soil, to the Territory situate northwest of the Ohio River, and within the chartered limits of Virginia, upon condition, &c., that the Territory, so ceded, shall be formed into Republican States, not less than three, nor more than five in number, with the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States: and that all the land within the Territory, so ceded, and not disposed of in bounties, &c., shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become members of the Confederation, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Such are the terms of the cessions. The lands "to be disposed of," and not to be held up indefinitely; to be disposed of for the "common benefit" of all the States, and not reserved for the use of the Federal Government. Yet they have already been held up fifty years; and, under the present mode of selling, must be held up for centuries to come.

I say that this policy involves a breach of the articles of compact between the new States and the Federal Government; and I prove it by referring to the article by which those States agree not to exercise the right of taxation over the public lands until they are sold; which clearly implies that they are to be sold, and absolves the States from the observance of the article, if its terms or spirit is not complied with.

I say that this policy involves a breach of the constitution; and prove it by referring to that equality of sovereign rights which the constitution guarantees among all the States, and which is not enjoyed in the new States, on account of the Federal dominion over their * Virginia. Mr. Randolph and Mr. Tazewell had each informed me that they would bring forward this proposition. The former being absent, the latter did it.

Public Lands.

soil, and which the continuance of this policy will increase and protract.

I say it is a policy injurious to the public revenue; and prove it by referring to 186,000,000 of dollars paid in interest upon the public debt, while waiting for that rise in the price of land which this policy anticipates, and which has not yet begun. Once in every 16 years the principal of the public debt is sunk in interest: it stands to reason, then, that the land will go just as far in the payment of that debt if sold for twenty-five cents now, as it will do if sold for fifty cents at the end of sixteen years; or at one dollar in thirty-two years; or two dollars in sixty-four years; or four dollars in one hundred and twenty-eight years; and so on, as far as the calculation may be carried.

I say it is injurious to the public property in the new States; and prove it by pointing to the continued destruction of the public timber, and which all the penal laws, and troops of the Federal Government, and all its tribe of forest officers, are unable to prevent.

I say it is a policy injurious to the old States; and prove it by pointing to the enormous taxes which they are now paying, through the custom-houses, to raise money to meet the interest and a fraction of the principal of the public debt, after having given land enough for that object to pay the debt, if faithfully and judiciously applied to that purpose.

I say it is a policy destructive to the sovereignty and independence of the new States; and prove it by recurring to the fact that they are not "equal" to the old States; that they have not the attributes of sovereignty, the right of taxation, of eminent domain, and of primary disposition of the soil; that the Federal Government exercises jurisdiction over the soil and persons of their citizens; denouncing fine, imprisonment, and military chastisement, against those who may cut a stick, or dig a hole, or lift a stone, from Federal ground; and, to sum all up in one degrading word, by showing that the new States are the tenants of the Federal Government.

Connected with this policy of holding up the lands for the rise, is the system of reserving from sale the land that is supposed to contain lead ore, salt water, and iron ore. These the Federal Government has reserved to itself, and has proposed to derive a great revenue from the rents! Officers are actually engaged in this business of renting and leasing, and, according to reports, have organized a body of about two thousand tenants in the State of Missouri! Mr. President, I must be permitted to borrow the language of Edmund Burke, to do justice to the folly of such a system. It was the fate of Burke to attack, and to explode, that system in England; and I trust that his sound political wisdom will not be less availing in the American Senate, than it was in the British House of Commons. He brought in a bill to alienate the crown lands, and supported it in a speech replete with patriotism, and wise maxims of political economy. Listen to what he says:

"A landed estate is certainly the very worst which the Crown can possess. * * * All minute and dispersed possessions—possessions that are often of indeterminate value, and which require a continued personal attendance—are of a nature more proper for private management than for public administration. They are fitter for the care of a frugal land steward, than of an office in the State. * * * If it be objected that these lands, at present, will sell at a low market; this is answered, by showing that money is at a high price. The one balances the other. Lands sell at the current rate, and nothing can sell for more. But be the price what it may, a great object is always answered, whenever any property is transferred from lands which are not fit for that property, to those that are. The buyer and the seller must mutually profit by such a bargain; and, what rarely happens in matters of revenue, the relief of the subject will go hand in hand with the profit of the exchequer. * * The revenue to be derived from the sale of the forest lands will not be so considerable as many have imagined; and I conceive it would be unwise to screw it up to the utmost, or even to suffer bidders to enhance, according to their eagerness, the purchase of objects, wherein the expense of that purchase may weaken the capital to be employed in their cultivation. * * * The principal revenue which I propose to draw from these uncultivated wastes, is to spring from the improvement and population of the kingdom; events infinitely more advantageous to the revenues of the crown than the rents of the best landed estate which it can hold. * * * It is thus I would dispose of the unprofitable landed estates of the crown: throw them into the mass of private property: by which they will come, through the course of circulation, and through the political secretions of the State, into well-regulated revenue. * * * Thus would fall an expensive agency, with all the influence which attends it."

Such were the sentiments of Mr. Burke, and they produced their effect. The King himself, at the ensuing session, recommended the alienation of the crown lands; and the Parliament acted in conformity to his message. The forests and mines, which had been nothing but a source of patronage to the King, and of vexation to the people, were thrown into the mass of private property; an expensive agency and many oppressive laws were got rid of; the lands and mines became infinitely more productive; and, by increasing the wealth and population of the country, increased, at the same time, the annual receipts into the public Treasury. So far from fixing an arbitrary minimum, and holding up for the rise; so far from screwing up purchases to the highest bid; Mr. Burke, the King, and the British Parliament, thought it wise to prevent them from bidding eagerly against one another, and that it was better for the buyers and the kingdom that their money should be reserved for the improvement and cultivation of the land which they might purchase.

The pledge was not made by the donors of the land. It was intended by them that the ceded lands should be applied to the payment of the public debt; but they made no other stipulation with Congress in reference to their use, but that they "should be disposed of for the common benefit." The pledge in question was made long after the cession, and made by the influence of the same interest in Congress which funded the public debt, doubled the price of land, and established the system of paying annual interest until the land should rise to four and eight dollars per acre. Still it was not a pledge of the lands, but only of the net proceeds of the sales; and, each succeeding Congress has felt itself at liberty to make gratuitous donations of the land to any extent that it pleased. Look to the statute book; its pages are filled with these donations, from the year 1785 down to the present session.

[Mr. B. here enumerated many of these donations. The bounty lands to the officers and soldiers of the Revolution; 100,000 acres in the year '87, to actual settlers in Ohio; 24,000 acres to the French of Gallipolis; donations to the Nova Scotia and Canada refugees; 6,000,000 of acres to the soldiers of the late war; 90,000 to French settlers in Alabama; donations to States for seats of Government; to counties for county court-houses; to States for schools and colleges; 24,000 acres to General Lafayette; 24,000 to the Asylum of the Deaf and Dumb in Connecticut; 24,000, at the present session, to the like Asylum in Kentucky.]

Mr. B. continued: These, Mr. President, are only a few instances, by way of example. I think it probable that an accurate examination would show that the United States have given away nearly as much as they have sold; and we all know that we are running down the road of donations at present, with a rapidity which threatens to arrive at the end of the land, by a shorter process than the present system of selling would indicate. This is proof enough of the fallacy of the objection; a fallacious objection, indeed, which would permit the Government to make princely donations to foreigners and refugees, and deny it the capacity of making small donations to its own citizens!

The principle, then, of donations which the bill contains, is entirely free from legal objection, and resolves itself into a question of mere expediency. Is it, then, expedient that Congress should make the donations which the bill contemplates? And, first, what is the amount and value of these proposed gifts? Eighty acres of refuse land, Mr. President, land which remains unsold after the district has been five times picked over, and reduced to the price of twenty-five cents per acre, and which price nobody will give! Far from considering such donations as too great for this Government to make, I feel ashamed of their smallness and insignificance. If I could have followed the suggestions of my own judgment, I should have indicated double the quantity, one hundred and sixty acres, to be taken immediately after the public sales; and I trust that an amendment to that effect will yet succeed. But even the donations contemplated by the bill, as it now stands, would be the means of saving many families from want and vice, and converting many idle citizens into useful members of society. Eighty acres, even of indifferent land, would furnish a home to many that are houseless. If some ten, twenty, or thirty acres, could be found upon it, fit for cultivation, it would make a little farm, on which a small family, a widow with her orphan children, or a young man just married, could subsist in comfort and independence.

[Mr. B. here gave an example of what might be accomplished by industry and economy, and a little home to live at. It was the case of "Granny White." At the age of sixty, she had been left a widow in one of the counties in the tide-water region of North Carolina. Her poverty was so extreme, that when she went to the County Court to get a couple of little orphan grandchildren bound to her, the justices refused to let her have them, because she could not give security to keep them off the parish. This compelled her to remove; and she set off with the two little boys, upon a journey of eight or nine hundred miles, to what was then called "the Cumberland Settlement." Arrived in the neighborhood of Nashville, a generous-hearted Irishman let her have a corner of his land on her own terms, a nominal price and indefinite credit. It was fifty acres in extent, and comprised the two faces of a pair of confronting hills, whose precipitous declivities lacked a few degrees, and but a few, of mathematical perpendicularity. Mr. B. said he knew it well, for he had seen the old lady's pumpkins propped and supported with stakes, to prevent their ponderous weight from tearing up the vine, and rolling to the bottom of the hills. There was just room at their base for a road to run between, and not room for a house, to get a level place for which, a part of the hill had to be dug away. Yet, from this hopeless beginning, with the advantage of a little piece of ground that was her own, this aged widow, and two little grandchildren, of eight or nine years old, advanced herself to comparative wealth: money, slaves, horses, cattle, and her fields extended into the valley below, and her orphan grandchildren raised up to honor and independence, were the fruits of economy and industry, and a noble illustration of the advantage of giving land to the poor. But the Federal Government would have demanded sixty-two dollars and fifty cents for that land, cash in hand, and old Granny White and her grandchildren might have lived in misery and sunk into vice, before the opponents of this bill would have taken less.]

It is to no purpose, Mr. President, said Mr. B., to tell me that eighty acres of land costs

Public Lands.

but $100. I answer, that there are innumerable families in this Union who never saw, and never will see the day, when they can pay down that sum. I answer further, that eighty acres of refuse land is not worth $100. That is the price of a first-rate tract, and a tract that is only one-half, one-third, or one-fourth part fit for cultivation, is only worth the one-half, the one-third, or the one-fourth part of that sum.

It is to the poor alone that these refuse tracts are desirable; a man of property would not waste his time upon them even if he was paid for doing so. Here, then, is the peculiar injustice of fixing a minimum price of $1 25. It operates upon the poor, not upon the rich. It enables the man that has $100, to get a good quarter section; but the man that has but $25, cannot buy at all; for he cannot pay the $100 for a tract which is all good, and the Government will not make an equitable graduation of price, and take $25 for a tract which is three parts bad, and one part good. It wants a dollar and a quarter all round, which would bring the good land to five dollars per acre. But I discard as contemptible, and unworthy of the Government, the policy of gleaning the public lands all over; gleaning of every kind is forbid, whether it applies to the "sheaf," "the grape," "the olive," or "the corners of the land." I repudiate it as a policy abhorred of God and man, condemned by common sense, by patriotism, and by the conduct of all people, in all ages and nations. I contend that the earth is the gift of God to man. I go for donations; and contend that no country under the sun was ever paid for in gold and silver before it could be settled and cultivated. Have we not seen these States settled by donations, and sales at nominal prices? Was not Kentucky, Tennessee, and one-third of Ohio, settled in the same way? Were not Upper and Lower Louisiana and the two Floridas settled by gratuitous donations from the kings of Spain—donations which the Federal Government has labored for five and twenty years to appropriate to itself? Are not the lands of Canada given at this moment to any that will come and take them? And was not £80,000 sterling (about $135,000) appropriated last spring by the British Parliament to defray the expenses of emigrants moving to that province? Look at Texas and Mexico. See land given there in any quantity to any that will come and take it. See our citizens abandoning this land of Liberty, and going there to receive the bounty of a foreign Government, and tell me why it is that those who are afraid of emigration to the West, are not also afraid of emigration to Canada, Texas, and Mexico? In the West Indies, and all over South America, it is the same thing. Here is a decree of the Republic of Colombia, dated June, 1828, for the gratuitous distribution of six millions of acres among emigrants from Europe and America:

The Decree.

"The Senate and House of Representatives of the Republic of Colombia, united in Congress, considering—

"1st. That a population, numerous and proportionate to the territory of a State, is the basis of its prosperity and true greatness:

"2d. That the fertility of the soil, the salubrity of the climate, the extensive unappropriated lands, and the free institutions of the Republic, permit and require a numerous emigration of useful and laboring strangers, who, by improving their own fortunes, may augment the revenues of the nation, have decreed:

"That foreigners emigrating to Colombia, shall receive gratuitous donations of land, in parcels of 200 fanegas, (about 400 acres,) to each family.

"That it may be chosen in the maritime, the middle, or the mountainous districts, in the regions favorable to production of sugar, coffee, cocoa, indigo, rice, cotton, wheat, barley, rye, and all the varieties of fruits, both of tropical and high latitudes.

"That five years' cultivation shall entitle a foreigner to naturalization.

"That one million of dollars be appropriated in aid of agriculture, to be distributed, in loans, to industrious farmers."

Such, Mr. President, is the conduct of the free Republics of the South. I say Republics: for it is the same in all of them, and it would be tedious and monotonous to repeat their numerous decrees. In fact, throughout the New World, from Hudson's Bay to Cape Horn, (with the single exception of these United States,) land, the gift of God to man, is also the gift of the Government to its citizens. Nor is this wise policy confined to the New World. It prevails even in Asia; and the present age has seen—we ourselves have seen—published in the capital of the European world, the proclamation of the King of Persia, inviting Christians to go to Persia and receive gifts of land—first-rate, not refuse—with a total exemption from taxes, and the free enjoyment of their religion. Here is the proclamation: listen to it.

The Proclamation.

"Mirza Mahomed Saul, Ambassador to England, in the name, and by the authority of Abbys Mirza, King of Persia, offers to those who shall emigrate to Persia, gratuitous grants of land, good for the production of wheat, barley, rice, cotton, and fruits, free from taxes or contributions of any kind, and with the free enjoyment of their religion; THE KING'S OBJECT BEING TO IMPROVE HIS COUNTRY.

"London, July 8th, 1828."

"To improve his country—the King's object being to improve his country!" What a noble object! What a lesson of political wisdom to be read, from the despotic regions of Asia, to the American Senate! And how was land disposed of in that country which had the peculiar care of God? It was given, Mr. President, not sold. "God gave the earth to the inhabitants thereof." The promised land was given to the children of Israel, not auctioneered, with a minimum of $1 25 per acre. Land was then the gift of God to man, and to woman also; for the daughters of Manasseh were allowed to inherit, and to share in the bounty of the Giver of all Good.

I have now finished, Mr. President, the view which I proposed to take of the acquisition and administration of the public lands. I have confined myself chiefly to facts, leaving conclusions to the judgment of the Senate. In the rapid view which I have taken of this great subject, it has been clearly shown that the lands were ceded to the Federal Government by a few of the States, for the known and admitted object of paying off the public debt; and that, instead of paying this debt, this great fund has been so mismanaged, that in no one year have the sales yielded one-half, seldom one-fourth, and latterly not one-fifth part of the annual interest of that debt. The fatal policy of waiting for the rise, has cost us more than the lands themselves are worth, or could ever be sold for. It has cost us 186 millions of dollars in interest, leaving the principal of the public debt as large as ever. The public lands have yielded but twenty-six millions of dollars in fifty years, and are now annually yielding less and less. In all probability, it will require a hundred years, under the operation of the present system, to draw twenty-six millions more from them. The expense of administering the system is enormous, amounting fully to thirty-three and a third per centum. With this enormous expense of collection, the most numerous and efficient class of the land officers, the Registers and Receivers, get an inadequate and most insignificant compensation. The document upon our table, shows that the commissions of two-thirds of them for the year 1824, were less than $200 each; many are shown to be less than $100, and several which did not amount to $50. With such compensation the best of officers must quit the service, and let their offices fall into hands less trustworthy. In the meanwhile, the lands are dribbled away upon a thousand objects, foreign to the intention of the States which ceded them. The States are again recurred to to raise money for the same object for which the lands were ceded; and they are heavily taxed through the custom-houses, to raise ten millions per annum, in addition to the current expenses of the Government, to meet the annual interest, and a fraction of the public debt. The knavery and delusion in which the present mode of selling lands had its origin, stands detected and exposed: the necessity of a radical change is demonstrated and admitted. The advantage of returning to the principles of 1790; the advantage of prompt sales at present value; a speedy discharge of the public debt; and the wisdom and justice of passing the lands cheaply and easily into the hands of the people; are measures which can no longer admit of two opinions. Theory and experience combine to demand their fulfilment; and the bill which I have introduced is intended to accomplish them. I do not say that it presents the best mode of disposing of the public lands; I do not even say that I cannot present a better. But I will say that it contains all that I hoped for when it was introduced; and less than I hope for now. A great change in the public mind has lately taken place on this subject, and is continuing to take place; and I am of opinion that a plan will be adopted still more consonant to the rights of the new States and to the interest of the public Treasury. The present system is indefensible and insupportable. Its continuance is impossible. The old and the new States will unite to put it down; all the friends to the State rights will unite against it. The new States are tenants to the Federal Government; their citizens subject to be treated as trespassers (within their own counties) by the Federal Government—dragged before a Federal Judiciary, as true to the Federal Government as the needle is to the pole—and punished for cutting a stick. Even military force may be an accompaniment, or substitute, of Federal Judicial process. Then these States are liable to be exhausted by an incessant drain of money, and, in the sufferance of this evil, Kentucky and Tennessee are joined with the rest: for they are to furnish emigrants to the others, and money to pay for the public lands. The Western States now pay a million of dollars per annum to the custom-house at New Orleans; they pay, besides, a heavy proportion of the customs in Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, and Boston. Then they are subject to the operation of thirty land offices, each a vortex for the absorption of dollars. Will the Congress attempt to continue this system? Is there a Senator present who will say that he will hold up the public lands until they rise to $1 25 per acre—until 800 millions of dollars are received for the 240 millions of acres which the new States and Territories contain? Sir, reflect upon it! Think of the enormity of the sum, the smallness of the population, their remoteness from commerce, the scarcity of gold and silver among them, and the many restrictions under which they are laid by the policy of this Government. Three hundred millions of dollars! And have you no commiseration for the people on whom you intend to levy it? Have you less feeling for the people of the West, than for the inhabitants of France and of India? I say, France and India, because the public feeling has been put to the test with respect to both. The Allies imposed upon France, in the year 1815, seven hundred and fifty millions of francs, ($150,000,000,) and the public voice was everywhere raised against the enormity of the imposition. Yet France had a population of thirty millions, was rich in gold and silver, and bloated with the spoil of conquered Europe. The page of history has given immortality to the sufferings of Indostan, ravaged by Nadir Shah, about the middle of the last century; yet that remorseless conqueror brought off but eighty millions sterling: a.

sum, great to be sure, but comparatively light and trifling, to be taken from the wealth and population of the Mogul Empire, to what three hundred millions of dollars would be, taken from the Western States and Territories. Still the French and the Hindoos had another advantage over our brethren of the West. Their sufferings, though violent, were brief and transient. They lasted but for a few years, and for a few campaigns. The invasions to which they were subjected, were tempests which spent their force, subsided, and left the desolated countries to recover in peace. But the meditated levy upon the West is to last for ages and centuries. At the rate of a million a year, it will take three hundred years to complete it; and, during all that time, nine States (for Kentucky and Tennessee are to furnish most of the money); during all that time, nine States and three Territories are to suffer a drain which would exhaust the mines of Mexico and Peru.

Yet it is only a part of the population of these States which is to furnish this great sum—a single class in society are to be called upon for it, and that class the one which contributes most to the support of the Government, receives the fewest favors from it, and handles the least money. I speak, Mr. President, of the agricultural class. What gives this Government two and twenty millions of revenue per annum? Duties on imports. And what brings in imports? Exports. And on what are they founded? On sixty-six millions of dollars worth of cotton, tobacco, flour, rice, beef, pork, and other productions of agriculture. Surely a wise and paternal Government would cherish, not kill, the goose which lays such golden eggs. Surely the maxims of Edmund Burke ought to prevail; instead of screwing up such bountiful furnishers of revenue to the highest possible price for the land which they are going to cultivate, more for the support of Government than themselves; instead of compelling them to expend in the purchase, the money which should be devoted to its improvement; surely a Republican Government, with hundreds of millions of acres, which it can neither sell nor use, would gratuitously bestow upon every citizen that would work it, as much land as he would take. But such are not the intentions of the opponents of this bill. True to the maxim of "penny wise and pound foolish," they adhere to the project of making revenue out of land. They stick to the minimum of $1 25, and look to the farmers and planters to pay it. I say to the farmers and planters: for merchants and tradesmen do not deal in land. It is the farmers of the West who are looked to for these three hundred millions of dollars, and are required to pay it down in advance. No credit for them. Credit is reserved for the importing merchants. Farmers cannot be trusted, although the Government retains the land for security until the last dollar is paid, with a clause of forfeiture, both of land and money, for non-payment, even in the last instalment; and has, at this moment, many such forfeits in land, which, with the blessing of God, I will endeavor to make it disgorge at the next session. No, sir, farmers cannot be trusted, like importing merchants; although one of these merchants, a great importer at Philadelphia, has defrauded the Treasury of eight hundred thousand dollars since the day that I laid this bill upon your table. But it is not enough that farmers must produce the exports which bring in the imports which furnish the Government with revenue, and that these exports must be raised from the ground which is paid for in advance; even this ground is not to be sold for its fair price—is not to be sold for a price adapted to its quality—but is to be subjected to an odious and arbitrary minimum, which puts all qualities, good and bad, at one uniform rate. If a farmer wants a quarter section, adjoining his farm, either for the sake of the timber it bears, or for a stone quarry upon it, or for a spring of good water, which is running away, or for some ten, twenty, or fifty acres of good land which it contains, and is ready to pay down the actual value of this quarter section, it is in vain that he offers the money, and applies to the Federal Government, for it. The Government has but one price, and is in no necessity to sell. It pays no taxes, and levies as much money as it pleases upon the labor of the farmers, and upon the tools they work with, through the tariff of duties in the custom-house. This frightful picture, Mr. President, seems to be incapable of aggravation. Imagination, indeed, could add nothing to it. Fancy could color it no higher. But look to the reality, and the climax continues to rise. Iron is an article of indispensable necessity to the farmer; he cannot work the ground without it. Well, there is iron ore in the Western country—in Missouri, especially, upon the Federal lands—and surely the Federal Government, which exacts so much of farmers, will place this indispensable article in their hands upon the easiest terms. Not so the fact. The learned eye of this Administration has made discovery of these "ferruginous appearances," and, straightway, the iron ore is locked up from the people's use. The President's proclamation for the reservation of iron ore "is broad upon the face" of the West, and I will undertake to say, that it is the first instance in the history of the human race, in which the people of a country have been interdicted by their own Government from the use of the iron which God had placed among them.

But surely these follies and impositions must have an end. Iron, lead, and salt, must cease to be objects of Governmental monopoly. Land must cease to be treated as an object of revenue. What is sold, must be sold quickly, and at prices adapted to its quality. The refuse should be given to the poor. Gleaning is abhorred of God and man. The Holy Scriptures abound with injunctions against it. We are forbid, "to reap the field twice over"—"to beat the boughs of the olive a second time"—"to pick the vines again"—or, "to make clean riddance throughout the corners of the land." These are commandments of Divine origin, eternal in duration, and universal in their application. They apply to Governments, as well as to individuals; to land, as well as to the fruits of the land. And shall this Government be exempt from their operation? Shall it have no eyes to see, no ears to hear, no heart to feel, no bowels of compassion to yearn over the misfortunes of the naked and houseless? Shall it continue to sell to the last acre? Shall it go on to make "clean riddance" through all the corners of the land? Shall it leave not one "sheaf" in the field, not one "grape" on the vine, not one "olive" on the bough? Shall it stand a solitary exception in the annals of the world? Shall it, alone, be the seller of what every other nation gives? Throughout the globe, in all ages, and among all nations, land, the gift of God to man, has been the subject of gratuitous donation. We may open the page of ancient or of modern history—we may look to the examples of Kingdoms or of Republics—we may go to Christians, Jews, or Mahometans—we may take in the extremes of time, and embrace the entire circumference of the globe—we may traverse this continent, from Hudson's Bay to Tierra del Fuego—we may descend to the antipodes, to the Persians, whose feet stand opposed to our own—we may go to the thrones of Darius and Artaxerxes, to the successors of Tamas Kouli Khan—and everywhere (save in these United States) we shall find LAND, the gift of God to man, bestowed by the Governors of the earth, according to his bountiful intentions, upon those who will work it. But I owe it to my country to vindicate its reputation from the odium of this solitary exception. I owe it to the present generation to tell, that the present land system grew up in unhappy times—times when the funding-system-men were lords of the ascendant—when two and six-pence, by a vote of Congress, was changed into twenty shillings—when three millions of actual debt was converted into five and twenty millions! But the time has gone by for these things to be done, or endured. The day has passed by when speculators in soldiers' certificates are to be the masters of legislation. Selfish calculations can no longer intrude into this Chamber. I address myself to Senators who look to the interests of the States from which they come, and to the welfare of the Confederation, of which they are the Council, I address myself to men who have heads to think, hearts to feel, minds to will, and constitutional power to act. From such I will not despair of success; for I know the minds of many. I know that the principles of this bill, under some modification, will soon prevail; that the public lands will soon either be transferred, upon equitable terms, to the States in which they lie, or divided into classes; the first to be sold out for the payment of the public debt; the second to be given to the States for the promotion of education, the construction of roads and canals, and for gratuitous distribution among the poor. I address myself to Senators who I know to be intent on great objects—upon the release of the new States from their condition of tenants to the Federal Government—on the payment of the public debt—and on the revision of the tariff: a revision to be made, not for the purpose of addition, but of reduction; for the reduction of one-half—the reduction of the ten millions now absorbed in the sinking fund: a revision which will give to the Legislator the grateful task of lifting the duties from necessities, and leaving them upon luxuries, and upon articles which conflict with the pursuits of our own industry.

Mr. BARTON rose, and said: In this remnant of an afternoon, at this protracted period of the session, with such a mass of business, in which so many citizens are interested, still to be acted upon, I will not enter into the discussion of the bill before the Senate, especially as it is the avowed intention of my colleague, and of the Senators, not to act upon this bill at the present session of Congress. But, said Mr. B., it is my intention to make a brief reply to that part of my colleague's speech that does not relate to any business before the Senate, to which he has indulged in such extraordinary and unnecessary denunciations of the Administrations of the General Government, both past and present, especially to that part of the speech respecting the reservations of Salines and Lead Mines, by the Government of the United States, and to the administration of the laws in relation to them, by the Executive branch of this Government.

True, these subjects are not before the Senate at present; but the speech having been originally prepared to cover this ground, has been accordingly delivered. I should have deemed it more fair, however, if the speech, confessedly prepared after the study of many months, and evidently the product of much labor, had been ushered upon us at an earlier period, and not held back until the hurried scene of a closing session of Congress, as if by design to prevent reply, and then sent forth among the people, with certain long reports never called up for consideration, unanswered.

The Committee on Public Lands agreed to report the bill to authorize the sale of the reserved Salt Springs of the United States in Missouri, to be passed, if the Senate should think proper, deeming it wholly unnecessary to continue the laws reserving them from sale as other lands.

After all the declamations which the Senate has just heard about the mysterious virtues, and the indispensable necessity of salt to man, and about the heartless tyranny of making such reservations by the United States, the fact is that the United States in their compact with Missouri, have granted twelve of the best Salt Springs in the State, to be selected by herself; and the remaining ones are not worth being distinguished from the mass of the public lands.

The want of salt can never be felt, in Missouri, on account of the monopoly of Government; but may be rendered as plenty and cheap as the wood in our forests or the grass in our prairies, whenever the people of that country shall find an inducement to manufacture that article.

The country abounds in salt waters, (some of them, my colleague has told you, large enough to turn mills,) and Heaven has given us much better security for the article than the bill upon this subject can do.

With regard to the other bill, not before the Senate, which forms a part of the subject of the speech to authorize the sale of the United States reserved lead mines, the committee entertained a different opinion of the propriety of throwing them into market at the present time, with the present information of their situation and probable value, possessed by the people of the United States, their common owners, and instructed me to move the indefinite postponement of that bill, when it should be taken up for consideration. I concurred with the committee in that opinion. What is the situation of the people of the new Western States? Are they prepared to enter the market to purchase the lead mines of Missouri? Every man knows that those people are immersed in debt, contracted in the purchase, and the over-purchase of the public lands.

From the year 1820 to the present session, applications have been made by them for relief from those embarrassments. That relief has been granted by that Government which we have just heard denounced for its grinding, heartless tyranny, with a lenity and kindness more characteristic of an indulgent parent than of an unfeeling tyrant. Are those people, to whom we have extended relief and remission at this very session, now prepared to compete with the money-holders and speculators, in the purchase of the lead mines? The inevitable consequence of such a competition must be that the mines would be monopolized by a few companies of moneyed speculators, while the body of the country are borne down by the debts contracted for the lands they live on—debts enhanced upon them by the former cupidity of those same moneyed speculators. Were the interests of Missouri alone to be considered, it is surely not the time to urge upon the United States the sale of the lead mines.

But we have a higher duty to perform, and a larger object to consider, than the supposed local advantage of the few people of the United States, who now inhabit Missouri.

Those mines are the common property of all these United States; all are equally interested in them, and equally entitled to full and fair information of their situation, value, and whatever else may conduce to a fair and equal disposition of them. They were purchased with the money of all; and the small number of the common owners who have since migrated to the Mississippi are not alone to be consulted; and, if they were, the inevitable consequence of bringing the mines into market, at present, would be to throw them into the hands of a few United States officers, and other money-holders—especially holders of public money—to the exclusion of the great body of the people of that country. It will be time enough to sell our lead mines hereafter.

These reservations, however, have been made, by my colleague, the subject of the most unqualified denunciation of the Federal Government of the United States, and the pretext for a most disengenuous attempt to disaffect the people of Missouri towards the Executive administration of that Government, both past and present.

I declare, it is my solemn conviction, sir, that whatever of excitement exists in Missouri, or among the people of the West, either upon the subject of our public land system, or of the reservations of our lines and salines, did not originate there among the people themselves, but originated here where most other popular excitements in the United States are got up of late years, in these halls, when they are degraded into, what we have heard so much of at this session, a mere "electioneering stump," from which to harangue, and mislead the public mind, to promote the views of the declaimer.

I too, Mr. President, deprecate the idea of the United States ultimately holding and leasing out, to a band of tenantry, the great mineral district in Missouri.

That is neither their interest nor their intention. I too believe it is as unwise in a Republic as in a Monarchy, for the Government to engage in those schemes of money-making, which should be left to individual enterprise.

The proposition to sell those mines was heretofore before the Senate, and they thought then, as the committee think now, that a more general circulation of information respecting these mining districts should first be had; otherwise, instead of inviting population, industry, and capital, to the country, the mines would fall into the hands of a comparative few, who would be unable to work them to the advantage of the public; and they would lie almost as unknown and unproductive as they were under the Provincial Government of Spain.

At a former session, I submitted a proposition to inquire into the expediency of selling the lead mines; but it was evident that the Senate thought more general information respecting them an indispensable pre-requisite to any legislation upon the subject, and I submitted to that known opinion.

Within a few years past, the two last Administrations have turned their attention to the subject, and much information has been obtained. We have already a valuable report from the agent employed by the United States, in the mineral districts of Illinois and Missouri; and, I presume, the information contained in that report, has been duly circulated by the members of Congress among their constituents. More will be obtained and circulated. And I venture to predict that, by the time the people of the new Western States shall have disembarassed themselves, and prepared to enter the market, the United States will have obtained such information as to enable them to dispose of their lead mines with equal justice to all concerned.

But the State of Missouri has been depicted by my colleague as groaning under a kind of military despotism, because the two last Administrations have employed a scientific gentleman who happens to be an officer in our little army, and served the country through the last war, to explore those mining districts, and give to our citizens incipient leases, subject to ratification by the President of the United States!

This is pronounced an unconstitutional usurpation of power in violation of the rights and sovereignty of the State. Now, the whole matter is simply this: By an act of Congress, of the year 1807, the President is authorized to lease lead mines. That law received a practical construction soon after its adoption, and has been carried into execution, occasionally, by every Administration since that time. No man can suppose that the Chief Magistrate of our country is bound, under that law, to go in person, to Illinois and Missouri—explore the public mineral lands, make contracts with the miners for working them, and execute the necessary writings for those purposes. An agency of some kind must be employed between the resident and the lessees. Under a former Administration, the Recorder of Land Titles, at St. Louis, was so employed.

Such having been the known construction and practice, and years having elapsed without any alteration, amendment, or repeal of the law, the late President Monroe, or the proper Department under him, deemed it a duty to put that law into execution, upon application for such leases, and, accordingly, employed the present agent in that service.

The present Executive has had no other agency in the leasing of the public lead mines, than to continue a system which he found in operation when he came into office.

Although I do not expect much pecuniary advantage to the United States from these leases, yet I do anticipate much advantage from the information to be obtained by the agent. It will give satisfaction to the other States upon the subject of the mines, and it is manifest that they deem that an indispensable pre-requisite to a final disposition of them.

The reservations of salines and lead mines having been made by law, I cannot comprehend how that should be a cause of censure of the Executive officers of our Government. If the law be wrong, repeal it, and not denounce the department bound to observe, and execute it so long as it shall remain in force. If the law be doubtful or defective, explain, or amend it, and not attempt to rouse the feelings of the West against our Government, no matter who may compose the Executive Department for the time being.

So long as the act of 1807, with the practical construction of it by the General Government, shall remain, so long will each successive Administration feel bound to grant leases to any qualified citizen who may apply, whatever may be thought of the wisdom of the law.

The most singular and far-sought topic of denunciation of the present Administration, which my colleague has discovered, is the late proclamation of the President, for the sale of lands, in June next, at Jackson, in the Cape Girardeau District, in Missouri, which my colleague has read to the Senate.

That is a district abounding in iron ore of the best quality. There is a chain of little mountains, perhaps a hundred feet above the surrounding country, running between the waters of St. Francois and those of the Merrimac River, full of this ore. One section of these mountains, popularly denominated "The Iron Mountain," is almost a solid mass of ore, yielding about seventy-five per cent. of iron. There is iron enough in that district to pave it, if men and capital were there to manufacture the ore. The President has thought proper not to place all this district in the market at the same time; but in the exercise of the discretion given him by law, has reserved from immediate sale a number of alternate sections; and this is denounced as a usurpation of power—a reservation without law!

I do not stand here, Mr. President, to defend the Administration, nor do I believe it stands in any need of being propped up. I do not know who has the honor of being the author of the proclamation in question, whether the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, but I will not pay so poor a compliment to the common sense and common candor of the people of Missouri, as to suppose that they can either misunderstand or disapprove of so judicious an exercise of the discretion given by our laws to our Executive, with regard to the time when any particular portion of the public lands, authorized to be sold, shall be exposed to sale. The exercise of this legal discretion has been represented on this floor as a new class of reservations, as absolute as those made by our laws, effected by the usurpation of power.

I possess, sir, no information, from either of the officers mentioned, of the reason for this manner of selling the lands to which the proclamation applies; but it is the manifest interest of Missouri, and right of the other States owning this common property, that an opportunity should be given to their citizens who will hereafter migrate to that country, to become proprietors of that valuable ore, and manufacture. Let a portion of it become private property now, and its value be developed to the Union, and let them have a portion of it within their reach, when they shall be tempted to migrate; and not put in the power of a few capitalists at once to select and monopolize the most valuable beds of ore, and the timber, coal, and water power necessary to its manufacture.

This course, I believe, sir, to be the combined interest of all; and this, I think it reasonable to presume, was one of the motives of the Executive in this exercise of a discretion which we have thought proper to vest in him by law.

My colleague has made the extraordinary declarations to this Senate that the miseries of the West were owing to the mal-administration of the Government of the Union—that the Western Banks were broken down by the partiality and favor of our General Government towards the Banks in the Atlantic States; and in the extravagance of his criminations he has compared the operation of the Federal Administration upon the West to the operation of a steam engine crushing the human body, and still moving on, insensible of the misery it inflicts on the victims and regardless of the agony of his “wife, children, and friends.” Such, sir, are not the feelings of the West. That portion of the Union has certainly felt the common pressures of the times; but the General Government has gone far to alleviate their sufferings, has almost forgiven their debts, and generously saved them from their own extravagance and folly. The West certainly has felt the privation of a new country; but they are substantially rich, procuring all the necessities of life with much less labor than their brethren of the Atlantic States do.

I will speak for the people of Missouri. They are not disaffected towards the Government of the Union; and no one acquainted with my colleague will suppose I mean him, when I say, if we had among us a man endowed by nature with all the great qualities necessary to constitute a successful TRAMP—even he could not disaffect the population of Missouri towards the Government of the United States.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I will observe that hereafter, should a suitable opportunity be presented, I will attempt to show that this bill “to graduate the price of public lands,” or, in other words, to destroy, by indirect means, the sound and salutary land system of the United States, under which such States as Ohio have sprung into existence within our own recollection, with scarcely a dispute about any man’s title to his home, is a compound of electioneering and speculation. At this late hour of the day and of the session, with such a mass of bills before the Senate, upon which the right of so many depend, I will not follow the example set me by inflicting upon this honorable body a studied, popularity-hunting, Senate-distressing harangue.

On motion of Mr. BARTON, the bill was then laid on the table.

The Senate then took up the bill “to provide for erecting a Penitentiary in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.”

Considerable debate ensued on this bill, which was supported by Messrs. EATON, CHAMBERS, ROWAN, and WOODBURY, and opposed by Messrs. RANDOLPH, HOLMES, CHANDLER, HAYNE, and MACON.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to lay the bill on the table; which was decided in the negative—ayes 10, noes 18.

Mr. CHANDLER then moved to strike out all that part which has reference to a Penitentiary. The motion did not prevail.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and was decided, in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

THURSDAY, May 18.

Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House, at the next session, a statement of the quantity of public land, in the State of Louisiana, and the State of Mississippi, distinguished into first, second, and third rate qualities, accompanied by a general estimate of the proportion of pine hills, swamp, prairie, and other lands fit for the cultivation of sugar and cotton; with such plans and topographical and descriptive remarks as he may deem proper to a full explanation of the subject.

Some information being asked for, as to the object of this resolution, and as to the expense and difficulty of obtaining the information required—

Mr. JOHNSTON said, his object in offering the resolution, was, to obtain information relative to the quality of the public lands in Louisiana, in order to be able to exhibit at the next session, a correct view of the interest which the Government had in the soil of that State. It would appear satisfactorily to Congress, that nine-tenths of the land might be surrendered at once to the local Government without any sacrifice; nay, that it would be wise to do so. The other tenth being adapted to cultivation of sugar and cotton, might be surveyed and sold at once upon such terms as Congress might devise, if they should determine not to cede them to the State. This resolution connected itself with the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) relative to graduating the price of the public lands. That bill would in all probability lead to some decisive course on the part of the Government as regarded the public lands. Various views were entertained on this subject, and different plans had been proposed. Some had proposed that they should be given to the States; others, that the price at which they were held should be changed; and others again, that they should be graduated, and that the price should be diminished, after they had been exposed to public sale. Hitherto, Mr. J. said, they had been unable to obtain from the General Government, after the most persevering efforts, any decision on the large claims to land in Louisiana. They had been unable to obtain a survey of the public lands; they were unable, consequently, to bring them to market, or to hasten the settlement of the country, which, Mr. J. said, remained as it did 20 years ago, with the exception of the natural increase of its population. His object was to connect this resolution with the before-mentioned bill. There would be also, he understood, a proposition submitted, to ascertain whether Congress were disposed to surrender the lands to the States or not. Mr. J. said it was important for him, as the Representative of that State, to be able to lay an exact view of the subject before Congress to direct their legislation.

An idea was prevalent that Louisiana contained much valuable land; hence arose the difficulty of procuring a decision on the claims which were set up to portions of them, and hence also arose the difficulty in bringing them to market. The interest of the Government in these lands, Mr. J. said, was very inconsiderable, and he should be able to show by the report, that the whole of the cultivable lands in that region (perhaps including Florida) would not be much more than sufficient to defray the expenses which the Government incurred in the present system of surveying and selling the lands. When, therefore, the information which he had called for, should be obtained, the Government would see the value of these lands, and would be able to decide upon the utility of holding them any longer, or whether it would not be better to surrender them at once. There were many political reasons why this Government should not hold any rights of property or jurisdiction over the soil; but, Mr. J. said, this Government was at too great a distance from the country governed, to govern it wisely or efficiently, either for the interest of this Government, or of that country.

There would be no difficulty at all in making the report; the country divides itself into four parts—the pine district, the low lands, the prairie, and cultivable land. They lie in three great districts, and it would almost be possible to ascertain them on the map; but there were surveyors on the spot, who were acquainted with all the localities, and who could make a good report on the subject. It was very important to have this report. Mr. J. hoped, therefore, the resolution would be concurred in.

Mr. KING objected to the resolution on the ground of the impossibility of effecting the object embraced by it. The Secretary of the Treasury had no possible means of obtaining the information called for. It would cost twenty thousand dollars to employ individuals to examine the country, and make such a report as was required by the resolution; and, even if it could be obtained, it was a question whether any good would be derived from it. It would have no effect on the bill to graduate the price of public lands. Mr. K. said he was not willing, therefore, to embarrass the Department, and to incur an expense in endeavoring to effect an object, which, if it were successful, could not be of any use. Mr. K. expressed his opinion that it would be more advantageous if the public lands were vested in the several States. It would be more beneficial to the country generally. The expenses of surveying, and other expenses, swallowed up the proceeds of the lands, while the States were drained of the little money they had. He was sufficiently acquainted with the nature of the public lands in the Southern States, to come to the conclusion that it was impracticable to get any correct information on the subject embraced by the resolution without very great expense.

Mr. VAN BUREN said, if the resolution contemplated a survey only, it might be a question whether the object would be worth it; but there was no objection to it—as it could be done without expense. The information called for by that resolution might be of essential advantage. The subject of the public lands was becoming daily more and more interesting, and would occupy much time in legislation. It extended the patronage of the Government over these States to a great extent; it subjected the States in which those lands were situated, to an unwise and unprofitable dependence on the Federal Government. Mr. V. B. said he should vote for every call on that subject, to enable them at some future day to act understandingly on it. No man could render the country a greater service than he who should devise some plan by which the United States might be relieved from the ownership of this property, by some equitable mode. He would vote for a proposition to vest the lands in the States in which they stood, on some just and equitable terms, as related to the other States of the Confederacy. He hoped that, after having full information on the subject, they would be able to effect that great object. He believed that if those lands were disposed of at once to the several States, it would be satisfactory to all. In the general view he was willing not only to vote, but he should be solicitous to get information on the subject of the public lands generally, though he should not be willing to encourage additional expense.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TAZEWELL, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RANDOLPH for the residue of the session.

Mr. Monroe's Accounts.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the Senate took up the bill for the relief of James Monroe, and the question being on the amendment proposed by the Committee of the Senate, to strike out the sum allowed by the bill from the House, and insert "$29,518, in full of all demands against the United States,"

Mr. WHITE (Chairman of the Select Committee to whom the bill had been referred) entered at large into the reasons which had induced the committee to propose the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON moved to amend the amendment, so as to include interest on the outfit from the time Mr. Monroe was employed on the mission in 1803, till the time the outfit was paid.

Considerable discussion ensued, in which Messrs. SMITH, CHANDLER, HARRISON, HOLMES, TAZEWELL, HAYNE, and MACON, took part; and Mr. HARRISON having withdrawn his proposition, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the select committee, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

FRIDAY, May 19.

Creek Treaty—Fraudulent Distribution of Money.

On motion of Mr. VAN BUREN, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the managers on the part of the Senate, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendment proposed by the Senate, to the bill making appropriations to carry into effect the Treaty concluded between the United States and the Creek Indians, ratified on the 22d of April, 1826.

The report having been read—

Mr. VAN BUREN said he should state the circumstances of this case, and the views of the Committee of Conference. A treaty was made in this city, in which it was stipulated, on the part of the United States, that $247,000, together with an annuity of $20,000 a year, and other considerations, should be paid to the Creeks, as a consideration for the extinguishment of their title to lands in the State of Georgia, which the United States, under the cession of 1802, were under obligations to extinguish. The bill from the other House to carry this treaty into effect, directed that the money should be paid and distributed among the chiefs and warriors. That bill came to the Senate, and a confidential communication was made to the Senate, from which it appeared that strong suspicions were entertained that a design existed on the part of the chiefs who made the treaty, to practise a fraud on the Creek nation, by dividing the money amongst themselves and associates. An amendment was proposed by the Senate, which provided for the payment of those moneys in the usual way, and the distribution of them in the usual manner, and in the usual proportion to which the Indians were entitled. That amendment was sent to the other House, who, unadvised as to the facts which were known to the Senate, refused to concur in it, and asked a conference. The conferees, on the part of the Senate, communicated their suspicions to the conferees on the part of the House, and asked them to unite in an application to the Department of War, for information on the subject. This was accordingly done, and the documents sent, in answer, were a letter from the Secretary of War, and a report by Mr. McKenney. From that report it appeared clear and satisfactory, that a design thus existed on the part of the Indians by whom the treaty was negotiated, to distribute of the $247,000 to be paid for the cession by the United States, $159,750 among themselves, and a few favorite chiefs at home, and three Cherokee chiefs who had no interest in the property. Ridge and Vann were to receive by the original treaty, $5,000 each. By this agreement of the distribution of the money, each was to receive $15,000 more, making $20,000 for each. Ridge, the father of Ridge who is here, was to receive $10,000. The other $100,000 was to be distributed, $5,000, and, in some instances, $10,000, to the chiefs who negotiated the treaty here—varying from one to ten thousand dollars each.

That this distribution would be a manifest fraud to the Creek nation, Mr. V. B. said, required no argument to elucidate. The conferees of both Houses were well satisfied that this design existed, and of the obligation on the part of the United States, so far as Congress could do so, to defeat so unworthy a scheme. They differed as to the means that Congress ought to use to carry it into effect. [Here Mr. V. B. stated the two modes of distribution proposed by the two Houses.]

The two questions, then, Mr. V. B. said, that presented themselves in this view of the subject, were, had Congress the right to go to the extent proposed in the amendment made by the Senate? and, if they had, was it essential that they should do so? With respect to the right, he was, at first, under some doubt in regard to it; but a more careful examination had removed those doubts, and had satisfied him that the amendment of the Senate was warranted. The treaty directed that two hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars should be paid to the chiefs of the Creek nation, to be distributed among the chiefs and warriors of that nation. By the word chiefs, was it intended the chiefs in the nation, or the chiefs in the city of Washington? Those in this city say it was intended to be paid to them, and they ask of the Department of War that it should be paid to them in sums, counted out according to the distribution which had been stated. There was no difference on this subject between the conferees. They were of opinion that the money was to be paid to the chiefs of the nation in open council: that was the language of the treaty—the good sense of the treaty. The delegation who negotiated the treaty say it is to be paid to them; and that, in that view of the subject, they are warranted in the opinion expressed to them by the Secretary of War and the Superintendent of Indian Affairs. The conferees say, the intention of the treaty was, and its language imports, that this money should be distributed in the usual proportion, according to the just rights of the Indian warriors. There was nothing in the language of the treaty inconsistent with that idea. How ought the money to be distributed? Certainly on principles of justice amongst those Indians, according to their rights. What was asked on the part of the delegation? That it should be distributed among them for their personal advantage, and in conceded injustice to those they represented. They proposed to take one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and to distribute it among themselves and the favored chiefs of the Cherokee nation. The simple statement of the pretence set up, was so against right and justice, that Mr. V. B. said they were bound to presume that such could never have been the intention of our Government. It was unjust and fraudulent. The chiefs say they have a right to do it, and they would abide by the consequence; but it was conceded to be a corrupt design. What was the intention of our Government? If that construction was given to this treaty which was sought for by these chiefs, the conclusion would be, that this Government intended to counenance this fraud. The chiefs say such was the intention. Mr. V. B. said such could not have been the intention; and, as it could not be, the other conclusion is unavoidable. The intention was, that the money should be distributed according to the rights of the Indians constituting the Creek nation. It was fair and just, and not inconsistent with the language of the treaty. Such, Mr. V. B. said, would have been his view of the subject, if this had been a case between a civilized nation and this Government. But when their attention was turned to their rights over Indian property, the case stood upon a different principle. There had been great inconsistency amongst us as to the rights we had exercised over the Indians. At one time they depended on our mere will and pleasure; at another time we had treated them as an individual power. From the time of the formation of this Government, we had assumed the right to legislate, according to our will and pleasure, over their interests and property, so far as to protect them from fraud. On this principle, we had regulated all their trade. We had provided by law that they should not dispose of the lands they owned, unless in a specified form, and to the United States. We had gone further; by law, we had directed that the annuities due to them from us should be, without their consent, used to make remuneration for damages done by the Indians. These three points of legislation, Mr. V. B. said, covered the whole ground. What was the case now before the Senate? There was a fund of $247,000, belonging honestly to the Creek nation. It could not be denied, because it was for their lands. The fact was proved that there was an intention to defraud them of this money. It had been said that we had no right to provide by law to prevent an event of that description, by directing that the money should be thus distributed, according to the principles of justice. Mr. V. B. said it would be sheer squeamishness to hesitate now as to the power.

The amendment proposed by the Senate holds the Secretary of War responsible for this money to these Indians, according to their just rights. The amendment from the House supposes that may be effected, and this money paid, in open council of the chiefs, when summoned in the usual way. The conferees on the part of the Senate believed that measure would fall short of obtaining the desired end; that the amendment of the House did not go far enough, but, under the circumstances of the case, Congress should go farther, and see that the money was properly distributed. They ought to see that this money went actually into the hands of the different chiefs and warriors—then, if they chose to give it to the Cherokees, or to dispose of it in other ways, the United States would have done their duty.

Mr. V. B. said, in his judgment, the character of the Government was involved in this subject, and it would require, under the cir-

Creek Treaty—Fraud.

circumstances of this case, that they should take every step they could rightfully take, to exculpate themselves from having, in any degree or form, concurred in this fraud. The sentiment of the American people where he resided, was, and had been, highly excited on this subject; they had applauded, in the most ardent manner, the zeal manifested by the Government to preserve themselves pure in their negotiations with the Indians; and though he was satisfied—though he deemed it impossible to suppose for a moment that Government could have countenanced the practice of this fraud, yet there were circumstances in this case which required exculpation. Between the negotiation of the treaty and the negotiation of the supplementary article on which the treaty was finally adopted, all these circumstances were communicated to the Department of War by the two Cherokees. Mr. V. B. said it was not his purpose, because the necessity of the case did not require it, to say what the Secretary of War ought to have done, or to censure what he did do, when the information was given to him. He had known him many years, and there was not an honest man, or a man more devoted to his country, than that gentleman was. Mr. V. B. said it was not for him to have said what should have been the course of the President of the United States, if the information had been given to him on the subject. It could not fail to make a mortifying and most injurious impression on the minds of the people of this country, to find that no means whatever were taken for the suppression of this fraud. There was, and there ought to be, an excitement on the subject in the public mind. The members of the Senate had seen it. It had displayed itself strongly and strikingly on the point of this controversy between Georgia, the United States, and the Creeks. The settlement of that controversy was applauded from one end of the Union to the other. So far as the State of Georgia was concerned, she claimed that the title to all the Indian lands within her limits, should be extinguished by the United States, according to the obligation of the cession of 1802. This question had been settled—and how? Every thing that had been done, so far as Georgia was concerned, by the treaty of the Indian Springs, is believed to have been done by this treaty. Every foot of land is believed to have been ceded. It was the understanding of the delegation of the State of Georgia, that this treaty extinguished the Indian title to all the land.

Mr. BERRIEN rose and said, it was not the understanding of the delegation of the State of Georgia, that this treaty ceded all the land. That fact had been stated to the Senate by himself in his place. In a certain event, it was rendered probable that the lines to which the additional article of the treaty extended, would embrace all the land, but, according to the best information, it was his belief that the State of

Mr. VAN BUREN resumed. It was stated to the Senate, when the treaty was under consideration, that the Indians were willing, and designed to cede to Georgia all their lands. The controversy had been settled—and how? According to his view of the subject, every thing, so far as the State of Georgia was concerned, by the treaty of the Indian Springs, had been done by this treaty, with the single addition of a little more money to be distributed among the chiefs. Mr. V. B. said he had not a doubt in his mind, that the same application of these same means might, at any time, have settled the controversy. What was the subject that produced all this excitement? What was the objection to the treaty of the Indian Springs? It was made by an insufficient number of Indian chiefs, and there was reason to suspect that undue influence had been exercised. That there was not a sufficient number of chiefs, was a matter of contestation. On the subject of fraud, what were the evidences? On the face of the treaty, the United States gave to McIntosh an unreasonable amount of compensation. That was the length and breadth and depth of all the allegations of fraud. Compare that with the treaty which was now about to be carried into effect. It was stated in the report of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, that, when the negotiation was opened between the War Department and the Indians, to extinguish their title to the lands, they refused to give all their lands within the State of Georgia; they refused to go beyond the Chatahoochie. On being pressed, they said they were limited by their instructions, and could not go any farther. In the documents communicated to Congress, that fact was stated. The treaty had been finally made to settle this controversy, confessedly without power on the part of the Indians, to go as far as they had gone. Compare the Indian Springs treaty with that. The suspicion of undue influence in negotiating that treaty, Mr. V. B. said, was founded on the unreasonable reservation to McIntosh. Before the present treaty was consummated, the fact was communicated to the Government that a contrivance was on foot to reserve to certain chiefs a large portion of the money to be paid for these lands. The proof on this subject was as had been stated. Mr. V. B. said they must appear before the people of the country with this fact before them, that, under the eye of this Government, the treaty had been negotiated in fraud. He did not state the facts to impeach any one, but to show the Senate the high responsibility that rested on them, to go as far as possible to suppress the contemplated fraud, and entirely extinguish this plan, that the Government might be protected from any future imputation of having had any hand in it. It was in that view he had said, and would repeat, and with that remark dismiss the subject, that the honor of the nation was con-earned. Mr. V. B. said he should not be willing to persist in the amendment of the Senate, to the loss of the bill; but would rather take the next best thing that offered, by taking the amendment of the House, but would wish first to make the attempt to induce the House to adopt the amendment of the Senate.

To bring the subject more distinctly before the Senate, Mr. V. B. then offered a resolution for the Senate to insist on its amendment.

Mr. HARRISON said the proposition of the House not only comported with the treaty, but it met the view of the Senate; the only difference between the two propositions was, that the one directed that the distributions should be made in the usual proportion to the chiefs and warriors; the other, that it should be made in the presence of the chiefs and warriors—in the presence of the great council of the nation. When this subject was first before the Senate, and a confidential communication was made that such a fraud was in contemplation, he was anxious that every measure should be taken to obtain justice. Mr. H. said he thought there was no better way than that of paying the chiefs and warriors in presence of the assembled nation. The only error the Secretary of War had committed, had arisen from his not being acquainted with the usual manner of conducting Indian business. Mr. H. said he regretted, after the declaration which the gentleman from New York (Mr. VAN BUREN) had made of his confidence in the integrity of that officer, that he should say that some stigma would remain on the Government unless something should be done to clear the Government of that stigma. Mr. H. could not conceive that such a thing was necessary. The people of the United States would accord with the opinion given by the gentleman from New York, in relation to the character of that officer, and the arrangement of this affair; and, though an error of judgment might be imputed to him, the nation would determine that it was an error of the head and not of the heart. No better mode could be devised to do justice to the individuals and to the Indian nation, than that proposed by the other House.

The government of the Indian tribes in this country, Mr. H. said, was not well understood. It is not the government of the chiefs—the chiefs are the diplomatic agents, authorized to make treaties, but the consequences of the treaty are always passed in review before the assembled nation, and the nation is present, in every instance, when the proceeds of the treaty are paid. This secures them from any possibility of imposition on the part of the Government, or of any collusion on the part of the chiefs. Mr. H. said he was not present during part of the time that the gentleman from New York was speaking. It might be possible he had misunderstood the object of the amendment proposed by the committee; but there could be no possibility of any error in this matter, if the proposition of the House were adopted; the terms of the treaty would be strictly complied with, and the nation would be satisfied; because, when the money was paid in the presence of the nation, there could be no fraud. Mr. H. objected to the term "usual proportion." It might have been the practice to distribute in particular proportion, but the distribution always took place in a full council of the chiefs. If gentlemen could show there was any possibility that a fraud was likely to be committed in the course which had been pointed out by the House, or that there was any possibility of a stigma attaching to the Government in consequence of pursuing that course, he would accord with them. It appeared there was an injustice meditated; but by whom? Not by this Government. It was a matter of indifference to them to whom the money was paid. Their object was to comply with the stipulations of the treaty—to satisfy the State of Georgia and the Indians. That had been substantially done. In regard to the observation which had been made, of its compromising the character of this Government, that they had made a treaty with the Indians extending the cessions of the Indians beyond what they knew the Indians were authorized to make, Mr. H. would say that such a thing was not uncommon, either with the Indians or diplomatists. If diplomatists entered into a negotiation which they were not strictly authorized to do by their Government, it was their own affair; and it depended afterwards on the acquiescence on the part of the Government who sent them. If the warriors and remaining chiefs would show to this Government, that it was not their intention thus to extend the cession, then, Mr. H. said, much as he valued this treaty, and the good consequences arising from it, he thought the Government would be bound in honor to do that which they would do if they were treating with a civilized nation—to satisfy them for the farther cession, or to expunge this part of the treaty. When the compensation was about to be given to the chiefs assembled, if they protested against that part of the treaty, Mr. H. said, as a man who valued the reputation of his country, he should be one of those who would declare that part of the treaty to be null and void, or rectify the error that had been committed. What could the Secretary of War do? On whom could he rely? He could resort to no book that could show him the power that was given to the Indian chiefs in matters of this kind. It varied amongst the Indians. Mr. H. concluded by expressing his opinion that it would be perfectly safe to follow the recommendation of the committee of the House of Representatives. The money would be paid to those who were authorized to receive it, and the mode in which it was to be paid, would be a sufficient guarantee that no fraud had been committed on them.

Mr. HOLMES said he should accede to the report of the Committee of Conference. They recommended that the committee should be instructed to insist on the amendment. If the proposition made was to recede from the amendment, it would be in order to propose an amendment. If the Senate were to recede from their amendment, and to propose nothing more, then the bill would go to the House as unamended, and they might pass it without any amendment at all. The Senate could act on the bill or on the report of the committee.

As regarded the two propositions for the distribution of the money, it would seem at first view that there were two objections to the mode pointed out in the amendment of the Senate. How was it to be ascertained what was the usual proportion in the nation? If that could be ascertained, it would seem to put it out of their power to make any other distribution. The amendment of the House gives them that power. Mr. H. said he thought the safest way would be to have the distribution made by the nation. Either the one or the other of the amendments ought to prevail, from the facts which had been disclosed. The better way would be to take the amendment of the House, and to pass the bill in that way. If the agent paid the money to the assembled nation, they would have it in their power to decide which way they pleased. It would gratify them more—it would please them better—that the money should be paid to the chiefs and warriors assembled. If they are willing to make such an iniquitous distribution of their property, we have no right to complain; but it is not probable that they will do so. It would be better, Mr. H. said, to have it made in such a way as would satisfy them, and, though he should vote for either amendment, he thought it would be better to recede.

Mr. BENTON said, that, after the explanation of the views of the Committee of Conference which had been given by the Senator from New York, (Mr. VAN BUREN,) he would limit himself to a statement of facts on two or three points, on which references had been made to his personal knowledge.

The Secretary of War had referred to him, in his letter to the committee, as knowing the fact, that the Secretary had refused to give private gratuities to the Creek chiefs to promote the success of the negotiation. The reference was correct. Mr. B. had himself recommended to the Secretary to do so; it was, however, about forty days after the treaty had been signed. He referred to a paper which fixed the date to the 9th or 10th of March, and the treaty had been signed in the month of January preceding. It was done at the time that Mr. B. had offered his services to procure the supplemental article to be adopted. The Secretary entirely condemned the practice of giving these gratuities. Mr. B. said he had recommended it, as the only way of treating with barbarians; that, if not gratified in this way, the chiefs would prolong the negotiation, at a great daily expense to the Government, until they got their gratuity in one way or other, or defeated the treaty altogether. He considered the practice to be sanctioned by the usage of the United States; he believed it to be common in all barbarous nations, and in many that were civilized, and referred to the article in the Federal constitution against receiving "presente" from foreign powers, as a proof that the convention thought such a restriction to be necessary, even among ourselves.

Mr. B. also adverted, in answer to something which had been said in previous debates, to the part he had acted in getting the supplemental article adopted. What he had done was with the knowledge and consent of the Secretary. It amounted to nothing more than producing a conviction in the minds of the Creeks themselves, that it would not be advantageous for them to hold any land in Georgia; this being accomplished, the consideration was left to be adjusted by others. Not a word with respect to its amount had passed between Mr. B. and any one of the Creeks or Cherokees. They agreed, upon the representation of Mr. B., to give up all the land claimed by the Creeks in Georgia; but, when they came to reduce that agreement into the form of an article, a difficulty occurred; the line between Georgia and Alabama had never been ascertained; and the Indians were unwilling to agree to a line, the course and position of which was unknown to them, and which was to be fixed by a power over which they had no control, and which might run, they knew not how deep, into their country. They were willing to agree to the line where it was believed to be; and, accordingly, two points, named by a part of the delegation from Georgia, as those which would include all the land in Georgia, were agreed upon, and inserted in the supplemental article. It was intended to cede all; it was believed that all was ceded; the exact truth could not be known until the line was run. He considered the unwillingness of the Indians to agree to an unknown line as natural and reasonable; and, if any mistake had occurred, there was certainly no blame on either party. The Indians agreed to the points indicated by gentlemen from Georgia, and these gentlemen, to his personal knowledge, had expended great pains in consulting maps, and in referring to the knowledge of individuals to fix the points correctly.

The time at which Mr. B. had offered his services to aid this negotiation, had appeared to him to be eminently critical, and big with consequences which he was anxious to avert. It was after the committee had resolved to report against the new treaty, and before they had made the report to the Senate. The decision, whatsoever it might be, and the consequent discussions, criminations, and recriminations, were calculated to bring on a violent struggle in the Senate itself; between the Senate and the Executive; perhaps between the two Houses, (for a reference of the subject to both would have taken place,) and between one or more States and the Federal Government. Mr. B. had concurred in the report against the new treaty, because it divested Georgia of vested rights; and, though objectionable in many other respects, he was willing, for the sake of peace, to ratify it, provided the vested rights of Georgia were not invaded. The supplemental article had relieved him upon this point. He thought that Georgia had no further cause of dissatisfaction with the treaty; it was Alabama that was injured by the loss of some millions of acres, which she had acquired under the treaty of 1825, and lost under that of 1826. Her case commanded his regrets and sympathy. She had lost the right of jurisdiction over a considerable extent of territory; and the advantages of settling, cultivating, and taxing the same, were postponed, but, he hoped, not indefinitely. But these were consequential advantages, resulting from an act which the Government was not bound to do, and, though the loss of them was an injury, yet this injury could not be considered as a violation of vested rights; but the circumstance certainly increased the strength of her claim to the total extinction of the Indian tribes within her limits; and, he trusted, would have its due effect upon the Government of the United States.

The third and last point on which Mr. B. thought reference to his name had made it proper for him to give a statement, related to the circumstance which had induced the Senate to make the amendment which had become the subject of the conference between the two Houses. He had, himself, come to the knowledge of that circumstance in the last days of April, some weeks after the supplemental article had been ratified. He had deemed it to be his duty to communicate it to the Senate, and do it in a way that would avoid a groundless agitation of the public feeling, or unjust reflections upon any individual, white or red, if, peradventure, his information should turn out to have been untrue. He, therefore, communicated it to the Senate in secret session; and the effect of the information was immediately manifested in the unanimous determination of the Senate to adopt the amendment which was now under consideration. He deemed the amendment, or one that would effect the same object, to be called for by the circumstances of the case, and the relative state of the parties. It was apparent that a few chiefs were to have an undue proportion of the money—they had realized what he had foretold to the Secretary; and it was certain that the knowledge of this, whenever it should be found out by the nation, would occasion disturbances, and, perhaps, bloodshed. He thought that the United States should prevent these consequences, by preventing the cause of them, and, for this purpose, he would concur in any amendment that would effect a fair distribution of the money, or any distribution that was agreeable to the nation in open council.

Mr. TAZEWELL said it seemed to him that the question before them was a question of mere form. The proposition in which they were all agreed, was this: A deputation of the Creek nation had been accredited here, as the representatives of that nation, to make a treaty, and that they had, amongst themselves, confederated to practise a gross fraud on those who sent them here. This fraud was known to the Government of the United States before the treaty was concluded, and, notwithstanding that fact, this treaty was concluded under that form of expression which might authorize the consummation of this fraud. In this state of things, intimation was given to the Senate of the existence of this fraud, and the probable consequences of it. Immediately that the bill came from the other House, making an appropriation to carry the treaty, on one side conceived in fraud, into effect, an amendment was proposed, on the part of the Senate, to prevent the consummation of this iniquitous scheme. This amendment was sent to the House; it was disagreed to there, and a committee of conference took place. The conferees on both sides were satisfied of the existence of this fraud, and of the consequences which would attach to the United States if it could not be prevented, and they recommended different modes of prevention which should be adopted. The amendment proposed by the Senate is, that the sum of money to be paid to the Creek nation should be paid under the direction of the Secretary of War, to the Creek nation, in such proportion, according to the mode in which the annuities to the nation have been in the habit of being paid. This is an answer to the gentleman from Maine, who asked how they were to know in what proportion they were paid. There would be no difficulty on the subject. There is a fixed rule known to this Government and that nation—acquiesced in by that nation—and the Secretary of War, on his responsibility, is directed to carry that fixed rule into operation. On the part of the other House, it is proposed this sum should be paid to the chiefs of the nation by a special agent, and that this special agent shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War, who is to direct the money to be paid in full council of the nation, to be convened on full notice for that purpose. Some gentlemen (Mr. T. said) were of opinion there was no difference between the two modes. He thought there was an important difference. In the one case, the responsibility rests on the Secretary of War, and whom he may choose; in the other, it is mandatory on him to appoint a special agent to carry it into execution. The Senate (Mr. T. said) put the responsibility where it ought to rest—on the Head of the Department—but the House proposed to have an intermediate one. The Senate referred to a fixed rule—the House did not. According to their proposition, all that was to be done was to convene the nation, pay the chiefs in presence of the nation, and the hands of the Government would be washed. The proposition of the Senate was more guarded, and, therefore, ought to be agreed to.

The gentleman from Ohio had said that it was unimportant to whom the money was paid. Mr. T. said it was of much importance to the United States to whom it was paid. It was important that it should be paid to those to whom the land belonged, in the proportion in which their annuities had been heretofore paid. If these chiefs were paid, and the distribution was not effected, the moment the nation were informed of the fraud which had been committed on them by their own chiefs here, and that this fraud was made known to the United States before the treaty was completed, and had not been guarded against by any act of Congress, an Indian war would most probably take place, and it would be difficult to avoid the consequences which naturally result from every Indian war. Therefore, to preserve harmony, we could not be too cautious in distributing the money.

Mr. T. said he could not consider any of these engagements entered into with the Indian tribes, bound us down in the same way as stipulations entered into by a civilized people. We made a treaty—it was law to them; and we agreed it should be law to us. It did not become a law by virtue of an exchanged assent, as among an enlightened people. We are nothing more than the guardians of these people. They had, Mr. T. said, manifested more skill in diplomacy than the United States. They had completed their affairs more dexterously than we had ours; and the time was not far distant when this thing would be disclosed to the world, that these two Cherokee boys sent here, had completed a treaty on better terms for the Creeks, and worse terms for the United States, than all the diplomatic functionaries employed. Our benevolence, our magnanimity, our justice, and any other good quality we might have, required that this fund should be distributed amongst them, according to what we considered to be the principles of justice. The nation owned the land; the money was to be in place of the land; that money, therefore, must go to those who owned the land. When we knew it was going into the hands of a set of people who had laid a plan by which they were to get forty thousand dollars exclusively to themselves, it was important that we should save this forty thousand dollars for the Creek nation, for whom it was intended, and to take care that the Cherokee, who had not ceded one inch of land, should not receive any part of that bounty which was intended for the neighboring nation. We had nothing to do with that affair, except to place the money in the hands of the Creek nation, and let them distribute it according to what they considered justice on their part towards the Cherokees.

In the printed document which was now before the Senate, Mr. T. said, there was matter of fact which appeared to justify a strong inference, that these Indians wished our Government to believe, or were themselves instructed, that they were not at liberty to cede one foot of land beyond the Chatahoochie; yet, by the supplementary article, they had made such a cession. He wished the Senate had more information on this subject. He should not propose any further call on the Department, when the session was drawing so near to a close; but he believed that, within the Department of War, there were, at this moment, documents to show that a treaty, very different from that which had been concluded, might have been concluded, and far more to the benefit of the United States.

It had been bruited abroad, Mr. T. said, for many months past, that this treaty of the Indian Springs was objected to, because it was negotiated in fraud. Though the Senate had not acted directly on that suggestion, that treaty had been dispensed with without a particle of proof of fraud, and this new treaty had been taken up; and the documents went to show that it was signed by a large party to this treaty, with a full knowledge that the negotiators on one part were disposed to practise fraud on those that sent them here; and that this fact was made known to the Government of the United States. On this transaction, Mr. T. said, he should make no comment.

Mr. BRANCH said, that, while he would concur with the gentlemen from New York and Virginia, in any measure to detect fraud, he must dissent from the gentleman from Virginia in the latter part of his observations. That gentleman had said that the first treaty had been set aside without evidence of fraud. Mr. B. said it was not his purpose to enter into an investigation of this point; the reason why they had not that evidence, was because they refused to look at it; the evidence was most ample and abundant in the Department of War; but the Senate had shut their eyes on it. That evidence was taken by men high in the confidence of this country, for integrity, talent, and firmness—evidence which he should not descant upon, but which was to his mind conclusive. If any gentleman thought proper to refuse a call on the Department for it, the fault was his. Mr. B. said he should vote for any proposition which had for its object the detection of fraud, either in this treaty or any other. He was opposed to the treaty of the Indian Springs, because he believed it had been executed in fraud; and the circumstances hovering about this treaty, were sufficiently strong to excite suspicion. He was willing it should be probed to the bottom.

Mr. BERRIEN next addressed the Senate. He said, I touch this subject with extreme reluctance. It throws me back upon recollections to which it is unpleasant to recur. It awakens feelings which I have no disposition to indulge.

But, can I be silent? My colleague and faithful coadjutor in this cause, has been called away by the pressure of domestic calamity. I am the sole representative of Georgia on this floor. The Senate will expect from me, sir—what, with all possible respect for the Senate, is infinitely more important to me, the people of Georgia, my own immediate constituents to whom alone I acknowledge responsibility, they will expect from me, an expression of their feelings on this occasion. I obey.

You have arrived at the last scene in the present act of the great political drama of the Creek controversy. In its progress, you have seen two of the sovereign States of the American Confederation—especially, you have seen one of those States, which has always been faithful and forward in the discharge of her duties to this Union, driven to the wall, by the combined force of the Administration and its allies, consisting of a portion of the Creek nation, and certain Cherokee diplomatists. Hitherto, in the discussions before the Senate on this subject, I have imposed a restraint upon my own feelings under the influence of motives which have now ceased to operate. It was my first duty to obtain an acknowledgment, on this floor, of the rights of Georgia, repressing, for that purpose, even the story of her wrongs. It was my first duty, sir, and I have sacrificed to it every other consideration. As a motive to forbearance, it no longer exists. The rights of Georgia have been prostrated. The Senator from New York deceives himself, when he supposes that she has acquired all the land within her limits. The Senate, too, acted under this impression in the ratification of the new treaty, and were deaf to my solicitation to amend that instrument by an article which should, in express terms, relinquish to Georgia the lands within her boundary. Gentlemen shrunk from an investigation of the treaty of the Indian Springs, and feared to alter the one submitted to them, lest, by its failure, that investigation might become necessary. Yes, sir: the rights of Georgia have been prostrated. They have fallen before the power of the Administration, and the fraud and the insolence of the savages whom they have sustained and cherished—of those savages, by whom the Administration have been made the conscious instruments of the fraud which they themselves have concerted against their own brethren of the forest. The Administration have been passive spectators of the insolence with which, in the official character they have given to them, those savages have beard the Representatives of Georgia, even in the official journal of the Government. Why, then, should I be silent? I have the evidence of oppression and of fraud, and accumulated wrongs prompt to their exposure.

It was a duty scarcely less sacred to protect the friends and followers of that gallant chieftain who had sealed with his blood his devotion to Georgia and to this Union. That also is finished. I invoke the testimony of no man to prove with what fidelity it has been performed. The hour of retribution has come. I will not imitate, I am incapable of imitating, the example of those who have foully calumniated a people whose honor is so justly dear to me; but, under the responsibility of my station—under my personal responsibility, if you will—I am free to speak, and I will speak, of the wrongs of Georgia. I shall be brief, for the occasion requires it; and my own feelings will prompt me to turn as quickly as I may from so disgusting a subject.

Sir, in the progress of that controversy, which has grown out of the treaty of the Indian Springs, the people of Georgia have been grossly and wantonly calumniated, and the acts of the Administration have assisted to give currency to these calumnies. Her Chief Magistrate has been traduced. The solemn act of her Legislature has been set at naught, by a rescript of the Federal Executive. A military force has been quartered on her borders, to coerce her to submission; and, without a trial, without the privilege of being heard, without the semblance of evidence, she has been deprived of rights, secured to her by the solemn stipulations of treaty.

When, in obedience to the will of the Legislature of Georgia, her Chief Magistrate had communicated to the President his determination to survey the ceded territory, his right to do so was admitted. It was declared by the President, that the act would be “wholly” on the responsibility of the Government of Georgia, and that “the Government of the United States would not be in any manner responsible for any consequences which might result from the measure.” When his willingness to encounter this responsibility was announced, it was met by the declaration, that the President would “not permit the survey to be made,” and he was referred to a Major-general of the army of the United States, and one thousand regulars. The trained bands of the Empire were to be employed to coerce him to submission. Why this paltering? Above all, sir, why this menace?

The highest judicial tribunal of the United States had long since decided the right of Georgia to grant and sell the lands, which she was about to survey. Independently then of any title acquired by the treaty of the Indian Springs, unless there is any one prepared to affirm that the right to grant does not involve the right to define the limits of the thing granted, the act which she was about to perform, was manifestly within her competency. When this proposition, thus clear and simple in its principle, shall come to be understood by the people of the United States, by what term of reprobation sufficiently strong, will they designate the menace to employ the military force of this Union to prevent a sovereign State from the exercise of her unquestionable right?

To this lawless mandate, her Chief Magistrate submitted. Unable to repress the feelings, which had been excited by the contumely of the Government and its agents, he nevertheless respected the peace of the Union, and the tyranny was unresisted. The Senate will permit me to say a passing word of this calumniated individual—the friend and companion of my earlier years—whose name has been associated in the journals devoted to the Administration, with the epithets of madness and of treason. Sir, there is no man, however vindictive his feelings, however led astray by the reveries of a malevolent fancy, who, in the moment of retirement, communing with God and his own conscience, had the hardihood to avow to himself a belief of the calumnies which were uttered against the Chief Magistrate of Georgia. Love for his country—indignation against her oppressors—these are the qualities of the patriot—these are the qualities which he has exhibited in this controversy.

The murder of that illustrious chieftain, who, through life, had manifested a generous, gallant devotion to the people of this Union, is another incident in this drama, on which that people will, ere long, affix the seal of their reprobation. It is one of those events which grew out of the countenance given by the Federal Government to the opposition to the treaty of the Indian Springs. It was naked murder. The shallow pretence of a law, and the judgment of a Council, was got up ex post facto. I appeal to those who are conversant with the laws and customs of the Indians, if such a law could have existed without the knowledge of the agent? I appeal to them to say, if Indian Councils are not always open? To those who know the character of the Council which was assembled before the death of McIntosh, how many friends he had in it, I appeal. Let them say, if it would not have been an act of madness for his intended murderers to have made known their object in that Council? Yes, sir, I repeat the declaration, it was naked murder. This gallant chieftain fell, like Alcibiades, by the hands of the midnight assassin; and, like the emissaries of the Persian Satrap, his assassins feared to come within the reach of his valiant arm.

The murder of McIntosh—the defamation of the Chief Magistrate of Georgia—the menace of military force to coerce her to submission—were followed by the traduction of two of her cherished citizens, employed as the agents of the General Government in negotiating the treaty—gentlemen, whose integrity will not shrink from a comparison with that of the proudest and loftiest of their accusers. Then the sympathies of the people of the Union were excited in behalf of “the children of the forest,” who were represented as indignantly spurning the gold, which was offered to entice them from the graves of their fathers, and resolutely determined never to abandon them. The incidents of the plot, being thus prepared, the affair hastens to its consummation. A new treaty is negotiated here—a pure and spotless treaty. The rights of Georgia and of Alabama are sacrificed: the United States obtain a part of the lands, and pay double the amount stipulated by the old treaty; and those pure, and noble, and unsophisticated sons of the forest, having succeeded in imposing on the simplicity of this Government, next concert, under its eye, and with its knowledge, the means of defrauding their own constituents, the Chiefs and warriors of the Creek Nation.

For their agency in exciting the Creeks to resist the former treaty, and in deluding this Government to annul it, three Cherokees, Ridge, Vann, and the father of the former, are to receive FORTY THOUSAND DOLLARS of the money stipulated to be paid by the United States to the chiefs of the Creek nation; and the Government, when informed of the projected fraud, deems itself powerless to avert it. Nay, when apprised by your amendment, that you had also detected it, that Government does not hesitate to interpose, by one of its high functionaries, to resist your proceeding; by a singular fatuity, thus giving its countenance and support to the commission of the fraud. Sir, I speak of what has passed before your eyes, even in this hall.

One-fifth of the whole purchase money is to be given to three Cherokees. TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS reward one of the heroes of Fort Mims—a boon which it so well becomes us to bestow. A few chosen favorites divide among themselves upwards of ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS, leaving a pittance for distribution among the great body of the chiefs and warriors of the nation. But it is the price of blood—of the blood of McIntosh. Shall it not be freely distributed among those who shed it? And think you, the chiefs and warriors against whom this audacious fraud is meditated, will tamely acquiesce in it? Armed with this damning proof of the corruption of their adversaries, will the followers of McIntosh sleep? Sir, if one spark of his gallant spirit yet lingers among them, especially if it burns as it should burn in the bosom of that youthful chieftain, whose high prerogative it is to vindicate a father's memory, the name of the white warrior of Muscogee will again become the terror of his foes.

But the Administration, though it condemns the fraud, thinks that we have no power to prevent its consummation. What, sir, have we no power to see that our own treaty is carried into effect? Have we no interest in doing so? Have we no power? We have stipulated for the payment of two hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars to the chiefs of the Creek Nation, to be distributed among the chiefs and warriors of that nation. Is not the distribution part of the contract as well as the payment? We know that a few of those chiefs, in fraudulent violation of the rights secured by that treaty, are about to appropriate this money to themselves. Are we powerless to prevent it? Nay, must we, too, suffer ourselves to be made the conscious instruments of its consummation? We have made a bargain with a savage tribe, which you choose to dignify with the name of a treaty, concerning whom we legislate with their consent, or without it, as it seems good in our eyes. We know that some ten or twenty of them are about to cheat the remainder. We have the means in our hands, without which their corrupt purpose cannot be effected. Have we not the right to see that our own bargain is honestly fulfilled? Consistently with common honesty, can we put the consideration money of the contract into the hands of those, who we know are about to defraud the people who trusted them? Sir, the proposition is absurd.

But have we no interest in preventing this fraud? What, if the great body of the nation, disclaiming the validity of a treaty, the consideration money for which they have never received, and which you have paid with a knowledge of the fraud about to be practised on them, shall refuse its execution, will you not be in a worse dilemma, than that from which you have endeavored to escape, by annulling the treaty of the Indian Springs?

Will you say it is their own affair; that they have trusted these persons to negotiate the treaty, and therefore they are entitled to receive the money. The answer is plain. They trusted these men, believing them to be honest. Now you know them to be otherwise.

Will you shelter yourselves under the powers granted to the Delegation? and did you not dictate them? Was not the council convened by your order? Did you not require the appointment of the Delegation, draught their commission, and direct its execution? Was it a free-will offering of the Creek Nation? Was it not rather the act of these very men, who had excited the Creeks to resist the old treaty, and who, by means of this corrupt agreement, are now about to enjoy the fruits of their speculation on the simplicity of this Government?

Sir, you have the power, and it is your interest, and it is your duty to exercise it. You legislate for these people as you will—you assume a guardianship over all the Indian tribes, for the preservation of the public peace. This consideration alone is sufficient to authorize and to demand your interference. Suffer this fraud to be consummated—this corrupt distribution to be carried into effect, and the war-whoop will again be heard in the nation, and the tomahawk and the scalping knife will do their office.

It is another miserable suggestion, prominently put forth in the report, that the delegation individually agreed to the distribution. Yes, sir, those who were to share the spoils, consented to the commission of the fraud. But mark the progress of this affair; I refer to the report of the Superintendent. When Ridge was first asked if the members of the delegation were apprised of it, he answered "no; but Opothleyoholo and Charles Cornells knew it, and that was enough." Subsequently their assent was obtained—and how? Look to the agreement. Each member of the delegation, not otherwise provided for, was to receive FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS. Who does not perceive that this was the price of their assent?

And was this intended fraud known to the Administration? Did they negotiate with men thus profligate and corrupt, knowing them to be so? And did they conceal their knowledge of the fact from the Senate, the constitutional advisers of the President? Leaving them to ratify in ignorance, a treaty which had been negotiated in fraud? I refer again to the report. Ridge presented their paper containing this fraudulent agreement, at the time of signing the first treaty, which was on the 24th of January last. The next day it was submitted to the Senate. Afterwards, on the 31st of March, the supplemental article was negotiated and also submitted; and, on the 21st of April, the treaty was ratified. From the 25th of January, then, until the 21st of April, this treaty being before the Senate, the Administration knew, and withheld from that body the knowledge of the fact, that the greater part of the money stipulated by that treaty, to be distributed among the chiefs and warriors of the nation, was to be fraudulently kept from them, and appropriated to some ten or twenty chiefs. In this ignorance the Senate was suffered to ratify this treaty, which, with a knowledge of the fact, they would have spurned. Nay, more. When the Senate had detected the fraud, and guarded against it by the amendment under consideration, the Administration interfered to resist that amendment. The Senator from Missouri, influenced by a desire to terminate this unhappy controversy, in a mode consistent with the rights of Georgia, and least embarrassing to the General Government, suggested the propriety of presents to the chiefs, as a means uniformly resorted to, in negotiating with savage tribes. This the Department "peremptorily refused;" and yet, at the moment of this refusal, knew, and had long known, the projected fraud, which has at length happily been brought to light. I make no comments on this statement; I present it on this floor to the American people: they will determine the character of the transaction.

But I will relieve the Senate, so far as I am concerned, from the further consideration of this disgusting subject. To me it is indifferent which of these amendments shall prevail. I believe that adopted by the Senate will be most efficient, and, as a member of the Committee of Conference, I have not felt authorized to yield an important principle, without its sanction. My chief object has been to expose the fraud, and thus to prevent its consummation, and that purpose has been fulfilled.

I leave to those who have directed this controversy, the cheering reflection, that they have trampled on the rights of Georgia, which they were bound to protect; and calumniated her citizens, their agents, whose honor it was their duty to guard: that they have imputed fraud to the old treaty, and have shrunk from the proof of it; and that the operations which have eventuated in that compact, which we are now called upon to consummate, were commenced in blood, and have terminated in corruption.

Mr. KING said he could not consent to give his vote without saying one word. When this matter was brought before Congress, at an early period of the session, they were taught to believe, from all the documents submitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that great exertions had been used to bring about an accommodation, and to save them from the necessity of going into an examination of the old treaty which was said to be founded in fraud and corruption. The committee had taken the treaty submitted to them into examination, and came to the conclusion that, as it did not cede all the lands within the limits of Georgia, they could not constitutionally ratify it, and returned it to the Senate. A letter was addressed to the War Department, acquainting the Secretary of the disposition of the committee, and the course that would be adopted. It was in this state of things that the chiefs were again assembled, and, though they had informed the War Department that, under no circumstances whatever, could they extend the limits beyond what they were extended by that treaty, yet, after great exertion, they brought out a supplementary treaty, which, we were told, embraced all the lands in Georgia. I stated distinctly, that, if any treaty was to be formed short of that of the Indian Springs, I protested against it. I asked that the whole matter might be submitted to Congress, and that they might determine on the fraud. The former treaty had been ratified; it became the supreme law of the land. Its adversaries say it is founded in fraud. Where is the evidence they have given us of it? They have given none. When they found it would be rejected, and that necessity forced on them to submit to it, or to produce the evidence, they got up this supplementary treaty, which they thought would do away the objections on constitutional grounds. I went further than the Secretary. I knew, from the disposition of the individuals, that there was a great desire to get clear of this investigation, and that they would go great lengths to effect it. I stated to him that, if the usual course was resorted to, and the proper means were adopted to conciliate the chiefs, an arrangement might be made which would be satisfactory to all parties. He refused to resort even to the distribution of the common presents. He said it was bribery and corruption; it was base; he would have nothing to do with it, nor would he delegate the power to another. With a full knowledge of the most infamous frauds ever committed by a set of Indian chiefs, he entered into a treaty. What was this money? It was a consideration for the land sold; to take from the nation at large—the people, who had a right to the occupancy of the lands—the amount that was equivalent to this land, and to put it into the hands of the rascally chiefs, not of the Creeks only, but of the Cherokees, who came here to prevent, as far as any misrepresentation could prevent, any measures by which the treaty of the Indian Springs should be confirmed. What will be said of the head of the Department, who spurned the bribery and corruption, yet, with a knowledge of this fraud, brings forward this treaty, and does not give us this information? Is there a Senator, who, with a full knowledge of the fraud which has been attempted, and which is to be consummated, would not prefer the treaty of the Indian Springs, not thus stained with fraud? The gentleman from Ohio says it is impossible that the Secretary of War should understand the powers given to these chiefs. He had their instructions in his bureau; General Gaines brought them to him. They were to cede all the lands to the east of the Chatahoochie, and with discretion to go as much farther as they thought proper. Their power was ample, and the Secretary knew at the time that they possessed that power: and, therefore, that their assertion to the contrary was false. The constitutional question as regards Georgia, yet remains in force, and though it may not seem to apply to Alabama, I still think our rights were violated in annulling that treaty and adopting another. I wish I could devise any mode of getting that last treaty back again before the Senate, that it might be rejected, because it would defeat a villainous fraud. It would bring about an examination of the original treaty, which was greatly advantageous to the State of Alabama. It would not have been thus advantageous to individuals, nor would it have been found tainted with fraud and corruption, as many gentlemen suppose. I have not had an opportunity of consulting with gentlemen in regard to the course which ought to be pursued where the ratification has not been made by the President, or I should have been induced to have placed a resolution on the table, asking the President to suspend the ratification of the treaty, if it has not yet been ratified. In that I fear I should fail. The distribution of the money is perfectly indifferent to me. It would, I think, be better it should be distributed through the medium of the agent; he is acquainted with the individuals in every town. If you distribute it through the medium of a special agent, in open council, there is and may be a way by which these fraudulent individuals may get possession of a portion of the money. I am disposed to deprive them of the whole. The agent, knowing the chiefs and the towns, would distribute it so that it should be divided among all the Creeks. The very circumstance of your taking the distribution from him has a suspicious appearance, as if he was not to be trusted. I know he has rendered himself odious to this people, in consequence of his arraying himself against this fraud. I shall vote for insisting on the amendment of the Senate.

The question was then taken on Mr. HOLMES'S proposition to amend Mr. VAN BUREN's resolution, and was decided in the affirmative, ayes 19, noes 16; and then the question was taken on agreeing to the resolution as amended, and carried.

Mr. HARRISON then, partly from some circumstances which arose out of the preceding debate, and partly from the quantity of business yet to be acted on, and the little prospect there was, considering the length of the debates, to act on it all by to-morrow night, offered a resolution proposing to extend the session to Thursday next; which, after some discussion between Messrs. HARRISON, HAYNE, BERRIEN, BENTON, BRANCH, CHANDLER, MACON, KING, and ROWAN, was concurred in, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Bouligny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, King, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Pickens, Reed, Robbins, Rugles, Sanford, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Van Buren, Woodbury—26.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Dickerson, Edwards, Harper, Hayne, Holmes, Kane, Knight, Macon, Rowan, Tazewell, White, Williams—14.

SATURDAY, May 20.

Vine and Olive Lands in Alabama.

Mr. PICKENS submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to furnish to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, a copy of the contract made with the agent of the late emigrants from France, in pursuance of an act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive; with a list of the names of the emigrants, and the allotments assigned them respectively; with a statement showing the allotments forfeited for nonperformance of the conditions in the contract: showing, also, the cases wherein the conditions have been performed, and the manner of such performance, by whom, and under what tenure or authority, (in the cases where others than the original allottees may be the occupants;) and that he, at the same time, communicate any other information in his possession affecting the titles derived under the act aforesaid, and the act supplemental thereto, with any circumstances which may furnish equitable grounds of relief from forfeiture, or otherwise.

Mr. CHANDLER asked for some information from the mover, in explanation of the objects of the resolution.

Mr. PICKENS said he supposed the resolution would be sufficiently explanatory of its object. He would, however, offer a few words. In the year 1817, after the last revolution in France, an application was made by a number of emigrants, who had abandoned their country to seek a home here for a place of refuge, where they might congregate together, and be employed in their original occupation of cultivating the vine. The Congress of the United States, with great liberality, passed an act with almost unexampled unanimity in their favor, and four townships of land were granted, and the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to contract with the agent, or agents, employed by those emigrants, for the cultivation of such vegetable productions as might be proper. The Secretary of the Treasury, in consequence of the authority of that act, made contracts with the agents of the emigrants, requiring certain conditions for the cultivation of the vine and olive at certain periods. The last condition of cultivation and improvement, expired on the 8th of January last.

It was understood, Mr. P. said, that the Secretary of the Treasury had it in contemplation, in the next recess of Congress, to send an agent to ascertain how far the fulfilment of the contract had taken place; and the object of the resolution was, that, while that information was collecting, he might collect all other that might be satisfactory to communicate to Congress. Some of those persons might not have fulfilled the contract, but yet might have equitable grounds on which to be relieved from forfeiture. There were others against whom the forfeiture ought to be imposed; and, while this information was collecting, it would be an easy matter for the agent, by having his attention previously directed to it, to get ample information to report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. P. said he thought it was a duty he owed to the Senate to state, that, while there were many persons who were bona fide emigrants from France, there were many others who had, somehow or other, imposed themselves on the Treasury Department, who had never seen France, but who had emigrated from St. Domingo.

Mr. P. said he hoped that when this matter should be finally considered by Congress, that some degree of liberality would be shown. There were some who had bona fide settled down, and had endeavored to fulfil the contract; many of them were good citizens, even though they were not recent emigrants, and that this error would therefore be overlooked. These were the reasons why he wished all the circumstances to be collected by the next session of Congress.

Mr. KING said he did not wish to oppose the resolution offered by his colleague, but he would suggest that it was unnecessary, as all the information had been communicated to Congress at the last session. The Secretary of the Treasury, by a call from the Senate, communicated to Congress a list of all the persons who were entitled to land under the grant of the four townships in Alabama. The names were there, and the quantity of land granted to each. The only difference between that and the present resolution, was the attempt to distinguish between those who were actual emigrants from France and those who were not. That would probably be attended with considerable difficulty. Mr. K. said he had called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the subject: he had addressed a note to him reminding him that the first period had passed, and that the second period, for the cultivation of the vine, had arrived, and it was necessary, if they had not complied with the stipulations, to inquire about the forfeiture. Mr. K. said he had informed the Secretary that there were many emigrants who had disposed of the property to individuals for a valuable consideration, and that it would probably become a matter for equitable consideration. The Secretary had assured him that an agent should be appointed to collect all the information relative to the cultivation of the vine and olive up to January last, where the transfer had been made, by whom made, at what time, and other information. Mr. K. said he made this statement to show his colleague that a portion of the information called for by his resolution, was already before the Senate, and that the residue would be attended to by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER said he was satisfied that the resolution was proper, and would only bring to the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury what had formerly been stated to him by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PICKENS said it was no doubt true, that part of the information might have been communicated, but if any thing more had been communicated, it must have been more than was within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to communicate. His main object was to collect all the facts in relation to the fulfilment of the contract, with such other circumstances as might operate in favor of the occupants, or otherwise, not confining the investigation to those who were recent emigrants. The act of 1822, Mr. P. said, had individualized the contract, by which any one individual could obtain a title. In consequence of this, it would be necessary to point out the particular allotments, and that connected with the other information, would be more complete.

The resolution was then agreed to.

The bill for the relief of the Florida Indians was taken up, and considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

The question being on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senate, appropriating $80,000 for removing the said Indians to the country west of the Missouri and Territory of Arkansas. After a brief explanation by Mr. BENTON, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to a third reading, and was subsequently passed.

Mr. CHAMBERS renewed the motion to take up the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road. The motion was negatived—ayes 15, noes 20.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the other House to the bill from the Senate "regulating process in the States admitted into the Union, since 1798."

A short discussion ensued between Messrs. HARRISON, KANE, ROWAN, and WHITE, in which the amendment was opposed as leaving Missouri, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, and Tennessee, without any system of execution laws, in the Federal Courts.

VOL. VIII.—83

Mr. KANE moved to amend the amendment of the House, by adopting the provisions of the original bill, in the States which had not been provided for by the amendment.

The amendment prevailed.

And then, on motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou., the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WOODBURY then (about 4 o'clock) moved that the Senate take a recess until 6 o'clock; which, having been agreed to—

The VICE PRESIDENT rose and stated that it was his intention now, having reached the last business day of the session, by withdrawing from the chair, to give to the Senate the usual opportunity of appointing a President pro tempore. Before retiring, however, he would take the occasion to return his thanks for the support and courtesy which the Chair had uniformly received, and to congratulate the Senate on the great degree of talent and patriotism that had been evinced in the body during this long and laborious session.

The Senate then adjourned to 6 o'clock, P. M.

The Senate, at 6 o'clock, assembled, and soon after, on motion of Mr. NOBLE, proceeded to elect a President pro tem.

Mr. MACON having, on the 17th ballot, a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared duly elected President pro tempore, of the Senate, and was conducted to the chair by Mr. SMITH, when he delivered a short address, expressive of his thanks for the honor conferred on him, and the assurance that every exertion in his power would be used to despatch all the business as speedily as possible.

Cumberland Road.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved to take up for consideration the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road, and called for the yeas and nays on the question.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. BERRIEN, WOODBURY, and BENTON. It was supported by Messrs. HENDRICKS and HARRISON, who stated that, under the present circumstances, the friends of the bill would be content with that part of it which relates to the appropriation; (discarding the provision for toll gates.)

Mr. HENDRICKS withdrew his motion to take up the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERS then moved that the Senate re-consider their vote on the bill making appropriations for the public buildings in Washington, for the purpose of making an amendment to it, by adding a clause making an appropriation for the repair of the Cumberland Road.

Mr. BENTON said there were other bills which would come up in due course, to which the proposed amendment could be attached.

The motion to re-consider was decided in the negative—ayes 16, noes 17.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the Senate then took up the bill to authorize the surveying and making a road in the Territory of Arkansas.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to add to this bill a section appropriating 45,000 dollars for the repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. EATON moved to lay the bill on the table, as being calculated to involve important principles; and which would give rise to much discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERS withdrew his motion, and the bill was then laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate insisted on their amendment to the bill for the relief of the Florida Indians, but the Senate subsequently receded from it.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the bill from the other House for the relief of invalid pensioners; stating, as a reason, that the bill had been kept back in the other House until so late a day, that there was not time for the committee to investigate the great number of cases embraced by the bill, and that it could not, therefore, be acted on at the present session, having been received only two or three days since.

On motion of Mr. EATON, the Senate proceeded to reconsider the vote on the bill making appropriations for the public buildings in Washington; and Mr. CHAMBERS then offered the amendment relative to the Cumberland road, which had been before offered and withdrawn.

Some discussion ensued, in which Messrs. EATON, CHAMBERS, CHANDLER, BERRIEN, EDWARDS, HAYNE, HARRISON, FINDLAY, and TAZEWELL, took part.

Mr. MARKS moved to amend the amendment by striking out $45,000 and inserting $30,000.

Mr. TAZEWELL inquired of the Chair whether the bill had not passed which the gentleman from Tennessee wished to reconsider? Was not the question which was now pending, whether the vote for passing the bill should be reconsidered or not? And he wished to know, after a bill had passed a third reading, and the question for reconsideration coming on, whether an amendment could be offered to a bill that had passed?

The Chair decided that the bill now stood as it did on its third reading, and an amendment could not be offered—it could only be got at by recommitment.

Mr. CHAMBERS then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report an amendment of 30,000 dollars for the repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. HAYNE moved to lay the bill on the table; stating that the public buildings must suffer the fate of the Cumberland road appropriation, if gentlemen would insist on tacking the one to the other; and the motion was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Chandler, Harper, Hayne, Macon, Tazewell, White—7.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Boulligny, Branch, Chambers, Chase, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, King, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas, Williams, Woodbury—25.

The question was then taken on the recommitment, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Boulligny, Chambers, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Chase, Dickerson, Edwards, Harper, Hayne, King, Macon, Robbins, Tazewell, White, Woodbury—14.

The committee, in a short time, reported the bill, with the aforesaid amendment.

Mr. TAZEWELL inquired whether the bill, having been already once read this day, could be again read?

The Chair decided that the recommitment took the third reading off, and that every thing that regarded the passage of the bill went for nothing when it was recommitted.

The question was then put on considering the report of the committee, (proposing the Cumberland road appropriation,) and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 17.

The question then was on agreeing to the amendment of the bill, reported by the committee.

After some discussion between Messrs. TAZEWELL, SMITH, HOLMES, CHANDLER, CHAMBERS, NOBLE, BERRIEN, and HARRISON—

Mr. WOODBURY offered an amendment to the amendment, "providing that a sum equal in amount to the said appropriation remains unexpended of the two per cent. fund;" which was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Edwards, Harper, Hayne, King, Macon, Rowan, Tazewell, White, Woodbury—13.

NAYS.—Messrs. Boulligny, Chambers, Chase, Eaton, Findlay, Harrison, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Lloyd, Marks, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Thomas—17.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, and was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 17 to 14.

And the bill was then ordered to a third reading, and subsequently passed, as amended, and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence in the amendment.

And then, at 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, the Senate adjourned.

The Senate concurred in the joint resolution to wait on the President of the United States, with the information, that the two Houses, having concluded their Legislative business, were about to adjourn; and Messrs. SMITH and LLOYD were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate. Soon after,

Mr. SMITH reported, from the Joint Committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make.

The President of the Senate, pro tempore, made a short address, wishing the members of the Senate a safe return home, that they might find their families well, and that their days might be many.

And then the Senate adjourned.

JOHN W. CAMPBELL, of Ohio,	41 "

ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia,	17 "
LEWIS CONDIOT, of New Jersey,	6 "

Neither of the candidates having received the requisite number of votes to constitute an election, a second ballot was taken; when the votes stood as follows:

JOHN W. TAYLOR,	99 votes
JOHN W. CAMPBELL,	42 "
LOUIS McLANE,	44 "
ANDREW STEVENSON,	5 "
Scattering,	8 "

JOHN W. TAYLOR, having the constitutional number of votes, was accordingly announced to have been elected Speaker of the House, and was conducted by Mr. NEWTON (the Father of the House) to the chair, whence he delivered the following address:

"GENTLEMEN: When I see around me so many Representatives whose virtues and talents adorn our country—whose services, at home and abroad, in the cabinet and in the field, in Halls of Legislation and Judicial tribunals, have largely contributed to our national prosperity—I am penetrated with gratitude for the favorable opinion which has recalled me to this distinguished station. My brief experience has served rather to assure me that its duties are arduous, than to create confidence in my ability to discharge them to your satisfaction. Every effort, however, of which I am capable, shall be faithfully directed to merit your support.

"In the complex questions frequently presented to the Chair for prompt decision, unerring accuracy is scarcely attainable. When mistakes occur, my best endeavors shall not be wanting to correct them, and to repair whatever injury they may have occasioned.

"With an anxious desire that your countenance and advice will not be withheld, and that the just expectations of your constituents may be fulfilled, in our legislative labors, I enter upon the duties of this important trust."

The members having respectively taken the oath of office,

On motion of Mr. LATHROP, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE, Esq., former Clerk of the House, was appointed Clerk for the present Congress; JOHN OSWALD DUNN, Sergeant-at-Arms; BENJAMIN BURCH, Doorkeeper; and OVERTON CARR, Assistant Doorkeeper.

These officers having been sworn,

The usual resolutions were adopted, continuing the Rules of Order adopted by the last Congress; appointing 12 o'clock as the stated hour of meeting, and directing the Clerk to furnish the members with newspapers.

A message was received from the Senate, that they were assembled, and ready to proceed to business; when,

Messrs. TRIMBLE and LATHROP were appointed a Committee of the House, to join such committee as should be appointed for that par-pose by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses were met, and ready to receive any communication he might have to make.

A farther message was received from the Senate, that they had appointed a similar committee, consisting of Messrs. SMITH and LLOYD, of Massachusetts.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 6.

Mr. TRIMBLE, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had replied that, at 12 o'clock this day, he would send to each House a message in writing.

At twenty minutes past 12, the Message (which will be found in the Senate Debate) was brought in by the President's Secretary, (Mr. JOHN ADAMS, jr.), and read at the Clerk's table. The reading occupied one hour. The message was accompanied by reports to the President from the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, with other documents.

The Message and reports were referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. Six thousand copies of the Message, and six hundred copies of the reports, &c., were ordered to be printed.

Unclaimed Dividends on United States Stock.

The following resolution, yesterday offered by Mr. LIVINGSTON, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a detailed account, containing the names of the several persons to whom the unclaimed dividends of the funded debt of the United States appear to be due; the amount due to each; the species of stock on which they have grown due; and the period since which the dividend has not been claimed. And that he also give a like detailed account of all such dividends as, having been unclaimed for three years or more, have afterwards been paid to any one appearing to represent the stockholder, or his representative, as attorney in fact; together with the name and residence of such attorney."

Mr. LIVINGSTON, on introducing the above resolution, observed that he had done so in consequence of a report made by the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a call by this House, which directed him to state the gross amount only of the dividends referred to in the resolution. The report of that officer was in strict accordance with the terms of the call. It gave the gross amount only, and from that report, it appeared that the Treasurer of the United States had in his hands $226,845 89 of moneys, belonging to individuals, but which remained unclaimed by those to whose credit it stood upon the books; and the simple question was, whether the Government will give to these individuals the knowledge of this fact, in order that they may ask for that which is their due. When, at the last session of Congress, he had presented this subject for consideration, he had done so in the unsuspecting assurance that it would meet with no opposition from any quarter. He had not conceived that opposition was possible. He had presumed that the first rules of probity, which govern nations, as they govern individuals, would, as a matter of course, induce the United States to tell the persons in whose name these sums stood, that their money was ready for them. To his infinite surprise he had since heard such objections as he never could have anticipated. It was most clear that the persons referred to must be ignorant of the rights which they possessed. This was evident from the fact that large sums had been suffered to lie useless and unemployed, some of them for very many years. And it appeared to him quite as clear that they ought to be apprised of their rights. This was the object of the resolution. His desire was, that, so soon as this report shall be received, it shall immediately be made public, for the benefit of all concerned, that every man may apply for, and receive, his due. Let it be remembered by the House that the amounts thus to be published were not amounts of doubtful or unliquidated claims, but the amount of acknowledged and ascertained rights, and that the only effect to the Government would be, that it would cause it to restore property which it could not, with probity, retain. Yet, strange as it might appear, some gentlemen had urged objections to a measure thus palpably equitable. What were they? It had, in the first place, been urged, that, as these sums were unknown to the owners there was no necessity of publishing them. That they were unknown to the owners is undoubtedly true. They must have been unknown or they would have been demanded. But, it was said, if we publish to the world these names and sums, others besides the true owner will get the intelligence, powers of attorney will immediately be forged, the moneys will be drawn by those who have no right to them, and a general scene of fraud and speculation will infallibly ensue. This, perhaps, to a certain extent, might happen; but, which was worse—that the Government should keep money which does not belong to it, or that it should give the rightful owners at least a chance of receiving what was their own? Fraud! On whom? On those who do not know their rights—are not demanding them—and, in the present state of things, will never obtain them. Such persons surely cannot be defrauded; for they cannot be more injured than they are, by keeping their money forever in the Treasury. They do not get it as it is, and they could but lose it in any case. No, sir, the fraud is, that we should be obliged to pay money which is not ours, and which we wish to keep. That is the fraud. But this danger of fraud, of which gentlemen speak, if it exist at all has been greatly magnified, and, instead of being prevented, is greatly favored and increased by the present state of things. The existence of such an amount of unclaimed dividends cannot be an entire secret—that is impossible in the nature of things. The knowledge of it will exist somewhere; somebody will know what these amounts are, and to whose credit they stand. But where is this knowledge now? In the Branch Bank of this city. The president and cashier of that bank know it; all their clerks know it; and through the indiscretion or carelessness of these clerks a few of their friends probably know it. Now, sir, is fraud likely to be prevented by keeping that a secret among some ten or twenty persons, which ought to be known to all the world? If any powers of attorney are likely to be forged, are they not most likely to be so when the secret remains in a few hands? And is there, or can there be any better mode of preventing such frauds than by laying the whole case open to the knowledge of the whole community?

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that he recollected the gentleman's having, at the last session, offered a resolution similar to this, but that, after some discussion, the House refused to adopt it. He had now listened with interest to the arguments the gentleman had urged in support of it, and which were certainly entitled to consideration. He believed, however, that more mischief was likely to arise from the publication of this list of balances, than the gentleman was aware of. The amount of them struck him as very extraordinary to have been suffered to remain thus long uncalled for. He rose, however, not directly to oppose the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana, but merely to ask that it be permitted to lie on the table for a few days. He felt very sure that the publication would cause a vast scene of speculation through the country, by persons buying up the rights of unconscious owners; and before the House consented to the call, he was desirous that further time be allowed for reflection upon it. He then moved that it lie on the table; but withdrew the motion to give an opportunity for reply.

The question being put on this motion it was carried, and the resolution of Mr. LIVINGSTON was accordingly laid upon the table.

Western Armory.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. LATHROP in the chair, and took up the joint resolution offered some days since, by Mr. BLAIR, in the following words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized and required to procure the officers of the Engineer Department, who are now engaged in examining the route for a National Road from the city of Washington to New Orleans, to examine that part of the western waters which lie within East Tennessee, with a view to the selection of a site for an Armory on the western waters; and that report thereof be made to Congress during the present session."

Mr. BLAIR said that he had not intended to have said any thing in commendation of this measure; that the resolution on its face so clearly developed the reasonableness of the proposition, that he did not anticipate any objection to its adoption; but, from a disposition being manifested by some members of the committee to receive an explanation, he took pleasure in affording any information which he might be able to impart. This resolution does not ask for an appropriation of money to fulfil its object, nor does it contemplate the least delay in the erection of the armory to which it has reference; its sole object is to obtain for a component part of the western waters, an equal participation in respectful examination with others which had been examined. It will be recollected that the act of 1821 authorized the survey of the western waters, with a view to the selection of a site for a national armory. That act has not been carried into effect so far as relates to the section of country embraced in the resolution; notwithstanding a report has been made to Congress at its last session, designating the vicinity of Pittsburg as the most eligible site. Mr. B. said he did not pretend to a perfect knowledge of the whole western waters, so as either to applaud or censure the report alluded to; nor was he so conversant with such establishments as to speak with certainty as to what should be the primary inducements in their location. But, Mr. B. said, he did not hazard much when he said, that neither the examining board, nor the committee, were prepared to draw a just comparison between the site which was the object of preference, and one of the many within the scope of country embraced in the resolution. Mr. B. said that he did not wish to be understood as complaining of the selection, so far as the preparatory examinations had been made, although it might with propriety be inquired, whether Pittsburg was within the spirit of the law, when its contiguity to the Harper's Ferry establishment, compared with other parts of the western waters, was taken into consideration; but that the great ground of complaint arose from the total disrespect which had been paid to a section of country about 250 miles in length, and embracing the whole width of the State—a section of country abounding with waterfalls, fuel, and iron ore, to a greater extent than almost any other; as an evidence of which, he would mention that, in the smallest county in Tennessee, there were at that time not less than sixteen iron establishments in successful operation; that in addition to other advantages, East Tennessee was pre-eminently blessed with climate, and the means of living.

But, Mr. B. said, why should he speak of the advantages which were presented to view from the section of country under consideration, when the sole object of the resolution was, the ascertainment of that fact. Had a contemporaneous examination of our claims have been made, with others, and the preference been withheld from us, he could assure the committee that the language of complaint would not have been heard; but what else than just complaint could have been expected from a people ever jealous of their rights? This complaint I now feel it my duty, as one of their representatives, to make, and, on their behalf, to call upon the proper authorities for redress. He was gratified to see that no other section of the western waters could be prejudiced, in extending this act of justice to East Tennessee, as no delay was asked for, nor was it intended that the object of the resolution could be fulfilled by those officers of the Board of Engineers, who were now engaged in examining the country between this city and New Orleans, with a view to the location of the contemplated national road. This opportunity being now afforded, he could not indulge the idea that a member of this committee would be disinclined to afford the general satisfaction which would result, should no higher object be attained. He would further add, that this early application had been made with a view to enable the President to forward the necessary instructions to those officers who were now in the West, so as to meet them on their return route, which would lead through the vicinity of the most prominent objects of inquiry. He hoped the resolution would be adopted without delay, as it must now be attended with despatch, or the object could not be accomplished.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Penn., observed that it was with great reluctance he rose to address the Committee of the Whole, consisting as it did of some of the most distinguished men of the country; but he felt impelled to say a few words upon the subject, with a view to bring fairly before the recollection of the committee, what had taken place on this subject. By the act of the 8d of March, 1823, the President of the United States was directed to appoint commissioners to make a survey of the western waters, with a view of fixing upon the most eligible site for an Armory. These commissioners were accordingly appointed, and it would be seen, from their letter of instruction, dated the 26th of April, 1825, that the widest range was given them. [Here Mr. S. read a part of the letter of instructions.] Here then, (continued Mr. S.,) was a wide range indeed, embracing the whole western country, the whole of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and their tributary waters. To execute this survey, three distinguished men were appointed, viz: Colonel McKee, Colonel Lee, Superintendent of the U. States Armory at Springfield, and Major Talcott, of the Ordnance—men selected with care, who could have no previous commitment, and who were familiar with the nature of the subject referred to them. From such men, said Mr. S., a fair report might be expected—such a one as would enable the faithful Representatives of the people to make a location which would be beneficial to the whole nation, and not to any particular State or section of country. [Here Mr. S. quoted part of the report as published at the last session of Congress.] Now, sir, said he, here were three gentlemen, selected by the President of the United States, whose competency cannot be questioned, and who devoted ample time, and what some supposed more than sufficient, twenty-one months having been devoted to the work; who examined the whole western country, from Alabama to the western bounds of Pennsylvania, through Ohio and Tennessee, as would be seen by reference to the report. Shall we rest the interest of this nation, in this matter, upon the report made by these gentlemen, said Mr. S., or shall we still wait, and compare their report with that of two or three young men, who, though promising, are still but young? Can the report of these young gentlemen be depended upon, in preference to that obtained from such commissioners as have already reported? If the object of the gentleman is to obtain another Armory, beside that already determined on, let him avow it. But, then, it cannot be said, we ought to wait until this examination is made, before we act upon the report which has been already made. I have made these few remarks, (said Mr. S.,) with reference to what has been done, because I know that there are several new members, who are unacquainted with it, and who, perhaps, do not even know that a report has been made upon the subject.

Mr. MARABLE observed, that it was not necessary to go into the details of this subject, or state the claims of the State he had the honor in part to represent, to a preference for this object; but when he heard a proposal to have the State examined, and yet to omit the whole of the lower portion of it, he must be expected to feel sensitive. He therefore should take the liberty of offering an amendment, which went to include that part of Tennessee which the gentleman had omitted—(and which he reduced to writing.)

Mr. COOKE, of Tenn., said, that he had an objection to the amendment. Has not, asked Mr. C., the district included in the amendment been examined already? Surely it has—and after examining it, the commissioners determined that it was not a suitable place for the location of an Armory. Yet the gentleman now wishes another examination—hoping, as it would seem, that, by some turn of the die, he may succeed in accomplishing his object; but had East Tennessee been examined as West Tennessee has been, and then rejected, not an objection should be heard from his lips on the subject. His object was, not to delay the decision, but only to have it made on fair grounds. Those who reside in West Tennessee have had their country examined by the most experienced engineers—while we, who reside in East Tennessee, must be content with the examination of those whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us are but young men. This, to be sure, is a great disadvantage; but we must submit to it. We still wish our country examined, and its claims fairly considered. If the amendment prevails, all the western country will immediately claim to be reexamined, since it all has as great a right as West Tennessee.

Mr. HAMILTON (Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs) then said that, as the subject had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it might be expected that he should offer a brief view of the subject. The question now before the committee, he apprehended to be, not where the Armory should be located, but whether this is the best mode of ascertaining where it is to be located. Now, on the very threshold of the subject, there appeared to him to be something incongruous and incompatible, in assigning to this examination a corps of engineers already employed on the survey of a national road. They have already a task assigned them by Government, and in the midst of it, we superadd this difficult and delicate duty. But for such an object a special commission is requisite. The very argument of the honorable mover of the resolution, from the fact that this section of the country was not considered together with the rest, will certainly bear with double force, if the Board are employed to examine one specific portion of country only; they can form no comparison, and therefore can express no opinion; they may probably report that there is abundance of ore and of fuel, with some other advantages; but this establishes nothing as to the comparative merit of this spot and others. If this section of country has been omitted, it has probably happened because its general situation was known to the commissioners, and they thought there were conclusive objections against its coming in for any competition. He thought it would be highly inconvenient to give the corps a special commission for this examination, when they were already occupied by another and a greater object. Why would it not be best to make the examination and receive the report when Pittsburg and the other sites shall have been examined also? He should vote for the rising of the committee.

Mr. STEWART now renewed the motion that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The committee then rose and reported, but, before it was decided whether they should have leave to sit again.

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 16.

Exploration of the Northwest Coast.

The following resolution, yesterday offered by Mr. BAYLIER, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform this House whether the sloop of war Boston, about to be commissioned, might not be employed in exploring the Northwest coast of America, its rivers and inlets, between the parallels of latitude 42 and 49 North, without detriment to the naval service of the United States; and whether the expense incurred in such service would exceed the ordinary expenses of such vessel while cruising. And, also, whether it would be practicable to transmit more cannon and more of the munitions of war in such vessel, than would be necessary for the use of the vessel."

Exploration of the Northwest Coast.

Mr. SAWYER offered the following as an amendment, to be added to this resolve:

"And thence to proceed into Behring's Straits, and, if practicable, to continue her route into the Polar Seas, and through the openings of Prince Regent's Inlet, or Barrow's Strait, into Davis' or Hudson's Straits, thence, down said Straits, to some port in the United States."

Mr. SAWYER said, that this amendment was predicated upon that part of the President's Message which relates to our contribution of mind, of labor, and expense, to the acquisition of knowledge, and has reference to those numerous voyages for the discovery of a Northwest passage to China, which have been fitted out of late years, particularly by England. In 1818, a ship was sent, under the direction of Captain Ross, who, for the first time, made the circuit of Baffin's Bay, and penetrated to 77 degrees North, which is two degrees beyond the place called Red Head, the highest point reached by the whalers. He not only enlarged the sphere of geographical science, so much as to render our maps of this section of the continent useless, and added many important facts and subjects to natural history, but led his adventurous countrymen through fields and mountains of ice, to new harbors of the whale, where full cargoes of oil are obtained in the shortest time. He invented the deep-sea clam, a machine which brings up large portions of soil from a depth of seven hundred fathoms. He was succeeded, in 1819, by Captain Parry, the fearless champion of science, who, in three successive voyages, has discovered no less than three different passages into the Polar Seas, and thence, through Behring's Straits, to the Pacific. In his first voyage, he discovered the opening which he named after his ships, the Fury and Hecla. In his second and third, he found those which he called Prince Regent's Inlet, and Barrow's Strait. It is but two months since he returned from his third voyage, which failed from the loss of one of his ships that was wrecked by a floe of ice, while passing through Barrow's Strait, with every appearance of success. In his second voyage, Captain Parry obtained the bounty of $10,000, granted by Parliament to the navigator who should reach the 110th degree of West longitude. He also passed directly over the magnetic pole, in latitude about 74, and longitude 100 West, immediately after which his compasses, which before varied 128 degrees, 58 minutes, West, changed to 165 50 East, or, in other words, pointed nearly South. Captain Parry has enriched physical science by many valuable additions. Contemporaneous with these voyages, was a land expedition under Captain John Franklin, along the united British Fur Company's posts, down the Coppermine River, to the Polar Sea. He arrived in the Arctic Sea in August, 1820, and navigated it for several hundred miles in canoes, towards the northeast. He discovered a group of islands, which he named King George the Fourth's Archipelago. He is now performing another expedition in that direction, and contemplated meeting Captain Parry at some given latitude on the Polar Sea. In about latitude 64 degrees North, he passed the zenith of the Aurora Borealis, which, as he proceeded, appeared afterwards in the southern portion of the heavens. He endeavored to ascertain whether this electric fluid emits any noise, as is alleged by the Indians and factors, but that remarkable quality remains to be proved. He made many observations on the intensity of magnetic force in different latitudes, from the oscillations of the needle, and on Meteorology, settled the latitude and longitude of all the remarkable places, immortalized his friends by giving their names to them, and brought home immense spoils from the Zoological, Botanical, and Mineralogical kingdoms. The enterprising King of Great Britain certainly deserves much praise for the lead he has taken, in conjunction with Russia and France, and the perseverance with which he has pursued those disinterested, hazardous, and expensive expeditions, for the common benefit. The time has come when this nation should likewise enter into this glorious career of discovery and human improvement. Are we forever to remain idle spectators of these splendid exertions to trace our own continent? Will none but kings enlist in the cause of science? I had as lief borrow their money without any intention of repaying it, as to borrow their knowledge, which they have been at such great pains to obtain. We ought to feel more pride and independence; we ought to feel that unhappiness which Alexander felt upon learning the conquests of his father Philip, for fear he would leave him nothing to conquer. These views of policy, however, being new to us, I cannot flatter myself that they will be met by a majority of this House, and I shall content myself by proving, that I am willing to go as far, if not farther, than the avowed friends of the President, in this part of his recommendation. Can it be pretended that a mere maritime reconnoissance of seven degrees of latitude, will be received as a discharge on our part of this debt to science, which the President justly pronounces sacred? The ship, according to this resolution, is to cruise between our acknowledged limits, which, from the Spanish boundary of 42 degrees, to the British of 49 degrees of North latitude, includes a space of only 420 miles. It is with a view of making a tender, on the part of my constituents, of their part of this debt, that I have offered this amendment.

Case of Commodore Porter.

Mr. BAYLIS observed, in reply, that if he could have had any apprehension that the simple resolution which he had offered yesterday, would have elicited such a history as had just been given by the gentleman from North Carolina, he certainly should not have offered it. But the President having, in his Message to Congress, recommended a survey of the North-west Coast, it occurred to him that perhaps that object could be effected without an additional expense to the nation, by employing on that duty one of the sloops of war which were already in commission. He wished merely for an inquiry, whether one of those vessels might not be employed for this object, without detriment to other parts of the public service. But, if the amendment now offered was to be appended to the resolution, he hoped that his own motion, thus clogged, would not be adopted.

Mr. WHIPPLE observed, that one great objection to the amendment, arose from its proposing means which were so inadequate to the object which the mover had in view. When the British nation resolved upon the exploring expedition, of which the gentleman from North Carolina had favored the House with such an elaborate account, they had commissioned two ships for the purpose. But the amendment proposes to send into those seas of ice and danger, a single sloop of war. Such a measure would be perfectly futile, and totally inadequate to the object proposed.

Mr. SAWYER replied, that if this voyage proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, was to be confined to our own coast on the northwest, which, from the Spanish boundary of 42 degrees, to the British, of 49 degrees North, included a space of only 420 miles, the conclusion which would be drawn from the premises laid down by the President, must be a most lame and impotent one. Such a discharge of this debt to science, which he admits we owe, would, in that case, be a very poor one. 'Tis true, the President does not conclude by recommending, in express terms, a voyage of circumnavigation; neither do I propose it, except as regards our own quarter of the globe. The hint he has given, however, is sufficient for the wise. As to the increased expenses which the continuation of the voyage would require, it would be too trifling to enter into the calculation with such an enlightened body as this, when weighed with the great importance of the object to be gained—the elevation of the national character in the estimation of the friends of science at home and abroad. The whole additional expense would be the mere provisioning her for two years. The same complement of men would answer as would be required to equip her in the first instance. He, however, did not possess any very sanguine anticipations of the success of his amendment; he did not feel very tenacious of it, inasmuch as he would show that he was willing to go as far as any personal friend of the President, in entering into the spirit of his message on that head.

The question being put on the amendment moved by Mr. SAWYER, it was rejected.

The question was then put on the original proposition of Mr. BAYLIS, and carried.

Case of Commodore Porter.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House took up (not without a number of negative voices) the resolution offered by him the day before yesterday, calling for the Proceedings of the Court Martial and the Court of Inquiry, recently held upon Commodore David Porter.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that when he had the honor of submitting this resolution, he had supposed that it would pass, as a matter of course, and not a word be necessary to be said upon the subject. So firmly was he of that opinion, that he thought it needless to trespass on the attention of the House, to show any reasons for its passage. The unwillingness which had been shown to act upon it, made it his duty now to submit a few observations in reference to it; having done which, he should submit it to the pleasure of the House.

What, asked Mr. B., is the purport of this resolution? It proposes a call on the Secretary of the Navy, for a copy of the Proceedings of the late Court Martial and Court of Inquiry in the case of Commodore Porter. Is this, said he, a novel request? No; it is of a nature of others which have repeatedly met the approbation of this House. Within my own distinct recollection, three cases of this kind occurred during the last session of Congress, in which the calls were granted as matter of course, viz: in the case of Major Babcock, that of Lieutenant Weaver, and that of Lieutenant Conner. And, sir, ought they not to have been granted? The question is not now upon the printing of these documents—though, if it were, he believed he could satisfy the House of the propriety of their being printed, and that an objection to calling for information, because of the contingency, that it might, when obtained, be ordered to be printed, was an argument entitled to no weight at all—the question is, how are we, who want it, to obtain this information, but by availing ourselves of the authority of this House to obtain it? As to applying personally at the Department for it, Mr. B. said, an individual member of this House had no more right to require information from any of the Departments, than any other individual. Was it proper, he asked, that members of this House should go, one after the other, to the Departments, and ask, each for himself, to see papers, and obtain information which concerns the welfare of the whole? Certainly not. The practice, therefore, has been, and he trusted would continue to be, when a member of this House, representing, as each member does, an important portion of this community, calls for a public paper, he shall have it by a vote of this House. It had been suggested yesterday, and with great deference he must say the suggestion was wholly out of order, that these papers had been called for by the Senate, and that, therefore, it was not necessary to call for them here. But, said he, is there any other mode in which the information could be properly in possession of this House, than by calling for it ourselves? Is the head of a department responsible to us if he do not send to the Senate all the documents in any case? Far be it from me to say, that the respectable head of that department would in any case withhold documents proper to be communicated—I have no such opinion of him; but, as an argument, this supposition may serve to show that this House ought itself to call for whatever papers it has occasion for.

It had also been suggested, that this House ought not to call for any documents on any department of the Government, unless the member moving the call will avow that he has a specific object in doing it. Now, Mr. B. said, it was obvious that a member must see and know the contents of a document before he can judge whether or not it be proper to found any measure upon them. In the present case, Mr. B. said, he did not meditate any ulterior proceeding. He had called for these documents, and he had expected that they would have been granted as a matter of course, for the purpose of examining them critically for himself, and whether any ulterior proceeding was to be moved, or not, would depend on the aspect of the documents after they were submitted.

What, then, said Mr. B., is the nature of the question presented by this resolution? There is a gallant officer of our navy, who has been tried by a court-martial, and convicted—whether correctly or not, I do not wish to express an opinion; I cannot, until I see the documents, to enable me to form one. It is an unquestionable fact, that, in regard to that trial and its result, the country is divided in sentiment. The friends of this officer—an officer who has shed lustre on the character of our navy; whose fame is such that our sister Republics vie with one another in offering him inducements to engage in their service—the friends of this officer come forward, and ask that the proceedings of the courts in his case should be laid before the Representative tribunal. Is this an unreasonable request? Is it an argument against complying with such a request, that our impoverished and embarrassed Treasury may be called upon to defray the expense of printing these papers when received? There is, in this country, a tribunal higher than this—which reviews the proceeding of every other, and judges both the accuser and the accused according to their desert—the tribunal of PUBLIC OPINION. Is nothing due to that tribunal? Is it not due to the people that these papers should be laid before them? That, said Mr. B., is all that I ask; and if any one supposes that I had any view, in offering this resolution, but to obtain correct information for myself and others who desire it, they are entirely mistaken. And, Mr. B. said, if he understood rightly, the expense of printing the papers, when received, need not be incurred in this case: for, so proper had the Secretary of the Navy considered it that the proceedings of the Court Martial should be made public, he had already caused them to be printed, and held in readiness to be laid before Congress, if called for.

It had been suggested, yesterday, that this call for papers ought to have been addressed to the President of the United States, with a reservation to that officer of a discretion as to the propriety of communicating the papers called for.

Mr. B. said, on referring to the journal of the last session, he found that, in the case of Major Babcock, the Secretary of War had been called upon to communicate the proceedings of the court; so that there was nothing unusual in the form of the proceeding now proposed. Nor could he believe that there were any documents connected with the trial in the case of Commodore Porter, that it would be improper to communicate to Congress. If the respectable gentleman from Massachusetts thought otherwise, however, he could move an amendment to that effect. Mr. B. concluded by remarking, that he would rather that this resolution should have passed without a word from him in relation to it, and he now submitted it entirely to the pleasure of the House.

The question was then taken on the passage of the resolution, and was decided, without a division, in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, December 20.

Desertion in the Army.

An engrossed bill "making alterations in the present mode of paying the enlisted soldiers of the United States," was read a third time.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he should not, at this late hour, fatigue the House by entering into a discussion on the provisions of the bill under consideration, without, indeed, some gentleman present should state any objections to its passage; as it involved a measure not only advantageous to the service, but (as the Committee on Military Affairs thought) ultimately beneficial to the soldier himself.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, observed, that the bill involved very important principles, and appeared to be calculated to inflict very serious injury upon the soldier and his dependent family. The object it proposed was to prevent desertion—but he did not think it at all calculated to obtain this end. When a man had once determined to forsake his post and desert the standard of his country, it was not one or two dollars consideration which would be likely to detain him. If any measure of this character must be resorted to, he thought it would be better to enhance the present allowance of the soldier by adding two dollars a month, and retain that addition till the expiration of the time of his enlistment. This might have some little effect; but, to deduct two dollars from his present monthly allowance, was to cut off his only means of supporting his little family. The misery of a wife and children thus rendered destitute, would have more influence in producing desertion than almost any other motive which could be brought to bear upon a man. There might too be a lover in the neighborhood, and such considerations, everybody knew, were calculated to exert a strong influence on the uninformed minds of our soldiery. He thought it would be better, instead of passing this bill, to lay it on the table until some better means could be devised for accomplishing the object proposed. Gentlemen should not forget that those who are now enlisted in the public service will not be there forever, and they ought to take care lest, whilst devising means for retaining those whom we have got, they throw obstacles in the way of obtaining others when these are gone. By depriving the soldier of the command of his own purse, a very serious discouragement will be presented to enlistment. But, as to preventing desertion, if no considerations of honor, or even of life, had been found sufficient to prevent it, he felt confident that no two dollar considerations would have greater power.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, that he had risen for the purpose of making an inquiry of the Chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. HAMILTON,) and if the answer to it was such as he expected it would be, he did not see how the House could refuse to pass the bill. By a report submitted a few years since from the Department of War, the House were informed that the number of desertions amounted, if he recollected rightly, to about one-fourth of the entire number of enlistments, and the then Secretary had recommended this measure, for the best possible reasons. He remembered that he had then felt satisfied that such a bill ought to pass, and, if the same fact still existed, he should still retain the same opinion.

Mr. HAMILTON, in reply to Mr. TRIMBLE, said that he had the best authority for believing, that the evil had rather increased than diminished.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that, in his opinion, much weight should be attached to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL.) If death, and the other severe penalties already denounced by your laws against the crime of desertion, were not sufficient to deter the soldiers from committing it, would the distant prospect of receiving the two dollars per month at the end of their term of service, be productive of this desirable result? He thought it very doubtful, particularly as the new recruits under this system would generally be taken from the dregs of society.

Mr. B. observed, that the House had no correct information before them, as to the number of desertions during the last year. He thought this information should be obtained. It was not known whether that crime had increased or diminished. Besides, the measure was one of importance, on which the House should not act hastily. He therefore moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was carried by a large majority.

Treaty of Fort Jackson.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. OWEN, calling for the correspondence of the War Department with Generals Pinckney and Jackson, in relation to a treaty with the Creek Indians at Fort Jackson, was taken up.

Mr. OWEN said, that the resolution which is now under the consideration of the House, is designed by its mover to be used only in the investigation of the rights of certain individuals. He has no other object in presenting it. I am led to believe, that the design of the Government, in asking of the Indian nations to surrender the right of possession (upon the principle that no other right existed in our tribes of Indians—which principle I believe to be a correct one) to the lands obtained by the treaty of Fort Jackson, was to secure to the Government indemnity for the expenditures made in consequence of the infraction of previously existing treaties, by that nation of Indians; to secure to that part of that Indian tribe, which was friendly, indemnity for losses sustained in the destruction of their property; and also to indemnify the inhabitants of the frontier of the then Mississippi Territory, for the losses they had sustained by the ravages of the hostile Indians. For the investigation of the rights of the latter, I wish this information to be used: if it was the design of the Government that their rights should be recognized and provided for by the treaty; and from this design an additional portion of lands taken, besides those expressly provided for in the treaty, to wit: the Government losses, and losses of friendly Indians; then this class demand indemnity as a right; if not, they rely upon your liberality. I am well aware that General Pinckney bore no part in the formation of that treaty; but I have reasons to believe that the correspondence between the Department and Gen. Pinckney disclosed the views and wishes of the Government; and that these views and wishes were designed to be a part of the instruction to the distinguished individual who afterwards formed the Treaty. This is my object for submitting this proposition. I therefore hope the House will adopt it.

The resolution was then agreed to.

And the House adjourned to Tuesday.

TUESDAY, December 27.

Losses in the Collection of Customs.

The resolution offered by Mr. DWIGHT, a few days ago, calling for a statement of losses in the collection of the customs, and amended on the motion of Mr. WURTS, having been read—

DECEMBER, 1826.]

Losses in the Collection of Customs.

Mr. WURTS offered the following modification thereof, which was accepted by the mover:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform this House, whether any, and what, deviations from the instructions given by that Department, or from the course prescribed by law, for securing and collecting the duties on imposts and tonnage, have recently taken place; and whether any, and what, extraordinary losses have been, or are likely to be, sustained by the Government, in consequence of such deviations, or from any other cause: stating particularly the circumstances attending them, so far as they may have come to the knowledge of the Department.

The question being on agreeing to the resolution, as modified—

Mr. FOSYTH said, that he presumed the resolution alluded to the late transaction at Philadelphia. The public rumor on that subject was, he thought, sufficiently definite. It stated that certain property had been removed from the custom-house in that city in a clandestine manner; and, from hearing the resolution once read, he thought its language was not calculated to obtain for the House the information that was most needed. He therefore suggested, as an addition, the following: "And, also, what losses are likely to be sustained by the fraudulent removal of property from any of the custom-houses of the United States." If the mover declined accepting this as a modification of the resolution, he should offer it as an amendment.

Mr. WURTS replied, that it might turn out, on investigation, that the removal of the property alleged to have taken place, was not "fraudulent." He thought it would be improper to use this language, unless the circumstances were more fully known, and the House was certain that the language would apply. He thought that the terms of the resolution were sufficiently definite, as now worded. It goes to inquire what deviations have taken place from the instructions, issued by the Treasury Department, to the Collectors, in reference to this subject, and what losses have happened, or are likely to occur, in consequence of such deviations or neglect on the part of the officers of Government. For himself, he said, he had no personal knowledge that any special instructions whatever had been given on this subject. Public rumor, however, said that there had, and that they were such as would fully exonerate from blame the Collector, in whose office the loss had occurred. Whatever might be the facts of the case, it was no more than justice to all parties, that the truth should be known respecting it.

Mr. WEBSTER expressed a hope, either that the amendment would be withdrawn, or that the House would think the resolution, as originally offered, sufficiently broad. He apprehended that the amendment now proposed, would create a much stronger difficulty than it proposed to remove. Whether property had been illegally removed from the warehouses of the United States, was a question that must be judicially decided. Such an act might be performed legally, as respected third persons, and still the conduct of the officers of Government be very reprehensible. Now, he considered the great points of this inquiry to be, first, whether these officers had done their duty, and, secondly, whether the loss had accrued in consequence of their having done it or not. If the loss had happened without blame to the officer, it must be owing to some defect, either in the statutory provision, or in the instructions issued by the Department. For himself, he apprehended it would turn out that no instructions had been given. By law they could not. Interpretations of statutes had, indeed, sometimes been given by the heads of Departments, but the constitution knew of no such thing as rescripts from the Treasury, declaring in what sense the law should be understood. No commands from the Treasury could make that right which the law had pronounced to be wrong; nor could it make that a crime which the law allows. All that the House, in this case, wanted to know, was substantially reached by the resolution in its present form. It asked whether any deviation had taken place, either from law or from the instructions received from the Treasury; and whether, in consequence of such deviations, if there had been such, any extraordinary losses had been suffered by the United States. This he conceived to be the proper inquiry. If it should even be found that the removal of the goods had been illegal, he did not see that the fact would help the House in any way to reinstate the Treasury. All that the House wanted to know was, whether the loss had been occasioned by a departure from the law, or by a defect in the law. This object would be attained by the original resolution.

The question being then taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. FOSYTH, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. POWELL observed, that, if it were important to get the information in this case, he thought the resolution stopped short of its own object. If the House learned that any extraordinary losses had taken place, it should also be informed what steps had been taken by the Department in consequence. If the losses suffered were, as had been reported, of an extraordinary character, it was to be presumed that some extraordinary steps had been taken to meet the emergency. With a view to ascertain this, he offered the following amendment:

"And whether any, and what, steps have been taken by any officer of the Government, in relation to any such losses, if such have occurred."

Mr. BUCHANAN said he thought it due to the Collector of the port of Philadelphia, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia should pass. If a long life of unsuspected integrity and public usefulness could constitute a claim to the favorable consideration of the House, this amendment should be adopted in justice to that officer. The resolution introduced by his colleague (Mr. WUERTS) embraced not only the inquiry, whether goods had been illegally removed from the stores of the custom-house, but also, what had been the conduct of the officers who had those goods in charge. If it should be ascertained that these goods had been illegally removed, then the case would present an aspect in which the information asked by the amendment might become very important. There was a striking difference between negligence and intentional guilt. If it should eventually appear that the losses sustained by the Government proceeded from the illegal conduct of the Collector, which, however, he did not believe to be the case; then it would be highly important to know, what had been his conduct immediately after the discovery and disclosure of the transaction. If every exertion upon his part had been promptly made to protect the public interest and repair the injury which had been done, it was a circumstance which ought to go far in redeeming his character from the imputation of an intentional violation of the law, and was a fact which, in justice, should be made known. Mr. B. said he concurred in the sentiments expressed by his friend from Delaware, except in the opinion that the object proposed by the amendment ought to be a distinct subject of inquiry. He thought it was one entire transaction, and that justice to the parties concerned required that the whole information should come together from the Department.

The question was then taken on Mr. POWELL's amendment, and it was agreed to withhold a division.

On opening a Message, received from the President, the Speaker announced the same to be of a confidential nature. The galleries were cleared, and the doors closed, and so remained for some time. When they were opened again, it was ascertained that the injunction of secrecy in regard to its proceedings, had been so far removed as to allow the publication of the Message of the President, which was as follows:

WASHINGTON, 27th Dec., 1825.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 20th inst., I now transmit a copy of the Message of President Jefferson, to both Houses of Congress, of 18th January, 1803, recommending an exploring expedition across this continent. It will be perceived, on the perusal of this Message, that it was confidential; for which reason, the copy of it is now communicated in the same manner; leaving to the judgment of the House to determine, whether any adequate reason yet remains for withholding it from publication. I possess no other document or information in relation to the same subject, which I consider as coming within the scope of the resolution of the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The letter of Mr. JEFFERSON, referred to in the Message, is yet concealed under the veil of confidence, which may or may not be removed by a subsequent vote of the House.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Proposed Pension to Mrs. Denny.

On motion of Mr. STORES, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDUCT in the chair, on the bill for the relief of Penelope Denny.

[The bill proposes to allow to Mrs. Denny a half-pay pension, on account of her son, on whom she was dependent for bread, he having been killed in an action with pirates, while serving in the capacity of gunner in the Navy.]

The bill having been read,

Mr. CAMBERLING said, that, when this subject was under discussion at the last Congress, exception was taken to the bill, that Mrs. Denny, in all probability, had other sons surviving, on whom she might rely for support. Mr. C. said he was satisfied at the time that such was not the fact, but, to satisfy the House on this subject, he had procured affidavits from New York, showing that the deceased was her only son.

The affidavits were read.

Mr. STORES (the Chairman of the Naval Committee) explained the views of the committee in reporting this bill. The petitioner, he said, was, as appeared from the documents of the case, the mother of a petty officer in the Navy, who was killed in action with the pirates, (at the same time that Capt. Allen was killed,) who was totally dependent on her son for support. Whilst living, her son had appropriated one-half of his pay for her support, and, when he sailed on his last voyage, left directions to the proper officer, to pay his mother half of all the pay which should become due to him during his absence. She has lost her only prop, in the service of the country, and seeks the same provision which the law would have made to her, had she been the widow, instead of the mother, of the deceased. In the case of the mother of Lieut. Allen, killed at the same time, a bill was pending, and would doubtless have passed, at the time, but for her death, which took place whilst the bill was under discussion. The principle of the bill went no further than this: that, if any person engaged in the Naval service shall be killed in battle, having no wife or child, but leaving behind him a mother, dependent on him for support, the half-pay pension system should be made to embrace the case of the mother. Conceiving this to be a just principle, Mr. S. supported the bill.

Mr. WORTHINGTON observed, that, as he was about to give a vote on the subject now before the House, he conceived it his duty to offer a few reasons in support of the vote he should give. It appeared to him to be a case of the first impression, and we were now about to set a precedent for those who were to follow us. We appeared to be legislating on a hereditary principle. We are now called upon to grant a pension to the mother, in the ascending line, and we might go on ad infinitum on the same principle; we might go on, also, in the descending line, to the son, grandson, and so forth. If we once adopt the principle, we shall know not when to stop. Sir, said Mr. W., we ought not to put our hands into the Treasury on every occasion—we ought to husband our resources. We ought to grant pensions to none but those who have actually been maimed or disabled in the cause of their country, and not to their relations. We ought to take example from other countries in relation to this subject. It had grown to be an immense evil in England, and, at the commencement of the French Revolution, was a crying grievance, which the people of that country brought in accusation against their King. If the man himself, who suffered on the occasion referred to, were living, no person would be more willing to grant relief than himself. But, as the case now stands, he was decidedly against the bill. The committee then rose, and reported the bill without amendment; when

Mr. MALLARY, observing that this case must be new to many members of the House, with a view to allow them time to become better acquainted with it, from a consideration of what had been said, moved that the bill lie on the table. The motion prevailed, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

THURSDAY, December 29.

Cultivation of the Mulberry Tree.

Mr. MINER, of Pennsylvania, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be instructed to inquire whether the cultivation of the mulberry tree, and the breeding of silk-worms, for the purpose of producing silk, be a subject worthy of legislative attention. And should they think it to be so, that they obtain such information as may be in their power, respecting the kind of mulberry tree most preferred: the best soil, climate, and mode of cultivation: the probable value of the culture, taking into view the capital employed: the labor and the product, together with such facts and opinions as they may think useful and proper.

Resolved, That the committee inquire whether any legislative provisions are necessary or proper to promote the production of silk.

On offering this resolution, Mr. MINER wished to say one word, with the hope of obtaining for it a favorable reception. In looking over the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of last year, he had observed that the amount of silks imported into the United States was $7,288,784, whilst the whole amount of bread stuffs exported was but $6,718,595, being more than a million less than the value of imported silks. The amount of tobacco exported was a little over four millions. The value of the whole products of the sea, including the fisheries, was less than a million and a half, and that of all the productions of the forest was not five millions. He stated these facts merely with a view of showing that the cultivation of silk might be an interest worth cherishing. He did not, he confessed, foresee that any legislative provision would grow out of this inquiry, but he wished that the committee should inquire—that they should spread the result of their inquiry before this House and before the nation. Its publication would at all events be useful, and it might happen that farther legislation would be required on the subject, in consequence of the information to be received.

The resolutions were agreed to.

TUESDAY, January 8, 1826.

Sedition Law.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made the following report on the petition of Thomas Cooper:

"The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of Thomas Cooper, report:

"That the petitioners sets forth that, in the year 1800, he was indicted and tried, under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1798, commonly called the Sedition Law, for publishing an alleged libel on the then President of the United States; that he was found guilty, and sentenced to be imprisoned six months, and to pay a fine of four hundred dollars. Having paid this fine, he prays Congress that it may be restored to him, with interest, on the grounds, first, that what he published was no libel, and, secondly, that the act before mentioned was unconstitutional.

"The committee have considered the case, and agree to report that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition."

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he hoped that the gentleman from Massachusetts would add to his report "that the report of the committee, with the petition of the petitioner, be printed." He would much prefer that the motion should come from that gentleman, as it was no more than an act of ordinary comity to the individual concerned, and it, moreover, surely, was little else than an act of bare justice, that the House should be accurately informed, not only of the grounds on which the petitioner's petition had been rejected, but that they should likewise be made acquainted with the character and extent of the claim of the petitioner, the wrongs of which he complained, and the reasons, by his own showing, why redress ought now to be accorded to him. Mr. H. said he would wait, with the hope that the gentleman would make the motion in question before he troubled the House with one of similar import.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that, supposing there was no possible objection to a long argument against the law of 1798 being read, he doubted whether it would be thought worth while to print it. He had no personal objection to that course, if preferred by the gentleman from South Carolina. If that gentleman meant to call up the report for the purpose of controverting the conclusion to which the committee had come, then it might be proper to have all the papers printed. But he was not particularly disposed, for the gratification of individuals merely, to have their disquisitions printed for the use of the House. He had not been instructed by the committee to move the commitment or printing of the report; but, if the memorial was printed, he presumed it would be proper to print the report also.

The question was then taken on printing both the report and the memorial, and decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, January 4.

The resolution offered by Mr. TREZVANT calling on the President for a list of appointments given by the Executive, to Members of Congress, since the foundation of the Government, was taken up.

Mr. McDUFFIE asked that the resolution might be read again; and the resolution having been read accordingly,

Mr. TREZVANT observed, that it was probably recollected by the House, that, about a fortnight before, a resolution had been laid on the table, by an honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. MITCHELL,) the object of which was to prevent the acceptance of appointments from the President, by members of Congress, during their term of service. The intention of the present call was to obtain the information which would be requisite to an enlightened consideration of that resolution. If, as is supposed by many, an evil is to be removed, the House must first know the evil before it can apply the remedy; and how can it proceed more properly in determining on the existence of the evil, than by first getting information from the Executive itself, as to the extent of the practice alluded to? All the appointments to office are made through the President; and on the files of his office, a memorandum of all of them is preserved. This record is the only source from which the information sought by the call can be obtained. Why, then, should the consideration of the resolution be postponed? For what purpose must it lie on the table? What will be the advantage of delay? A considerable time will necessarily be occupied in making the investigation, after it shall be called for: there ought, then, to be as little delay as possible in making the call. If the present resolution is laid on the table, the House will probably be called to act on that of the gentleman from Tennessee, without having this information before them. I do not say (added Mr. T.) that the evil alluded to does exist; but the resolution of that gentleman is of itself sufficient to show that an apprehension is entertained in some directions that it exists, and needs correction. Such an imputation, if not just, ought to be wiped off as soon as possible. If such appointments have not been made to any great extent, the fact will so appear; but if, on the contrary, the evil, as is said, both exists, and is growing, then it is time that a proper remedy should be applied. No possible evil can result from the call; some good possibly may. Mr. T. said he hoped, therefore, that his motion would be adopted.

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that, to oppose any call for information, deemed important by any gentleman, was, at all times, an ungracious task. He had never voted, and should not, at this late hour of his Congressional life, begin to vote, against any such call. He would suggest to the honorable mover of this resolution, whether it would not be much better to give the present call a different direction. The President of the United States is now called on for this information. It was proper to call on that officer for all information of a strictly executive character, and, so far as the appointment of the persons was concerned, the information now required was of that character. But how can the President ascertain whether all the persons who have received such appointments were, or were not, members of Congress at the respective times of their appointment, or for six months before? He would ask, whether it was consistent with that decorum and decency which was due from one branch of the Government to another, to ask the President of the United States to come to the records of this House, and there get certain information, to be immediately handed back by him to the House? All that he wanted from the President was a list of appointments made within the period embraced by the resolve. The House has already a list of its own members. A comparison of these two lists would enable each gentleman to determine for himself the question of fact. This, too, would answer another part of the resolution, by giving the emoluments of the officers respectively, and also the States from which the members came. If, however, the gentleman wished to get this information in a condensed form, the better way would be for him to ask for the appointment of a select committee, to whom the subject might be referred. Such a committee would present all the facts in a report. And here, said Mr. FORSYTH, let me make a remark. The gentleman has stated to us in this Hall that this is a great and growing evil. An evil, sir? What evil? It is a constitutional evil, if it be one at all; it is one which was anticipated and intended by the constitution, and which, in my opinion, has as yet produced no injury to the interests of the country. I know, indeed, that, in some parts of the United States, the opinion is entertained, and no doubt honestly, that this business of appointment of members of Congress to office, has gone to very improper lengths, is liable to an improper use, and productive of undue influence. Sir, this may be so; but I trust that it will not be assumed as a fact, that the power of appointment has been thus improperly used. If the charge is made, let it be brought home against the President, or any other individual, and we have the power to apply the remedy. We can punish both the corrupter and the corrupted. Here is the proper place for such an investigation. If any gentleman is satisfied that there have been improper practices in this respect, he can bring the offender here for punishment. But, said Mr. F., I would suggest, if any inquiry is to be gone into, it must be gone into still deeper. You must inquire, not merely who have obtained offices, but who have obtained contracts from the Government? whose brothers, whose fathers, whose friends, have got advantageous contracts? And, further still—whose fathers, brothers, and friends, have been recommended to, and actually received offices under, the Government. These, said Mr. F., are sources of corruption equally dangerous with that now in question, and, when we begin the inquiry, these, also, should be examined.

Mr. WEBSTER observed that as the honorable member from Virginia seemed to think this inquiry of importance, and as he presumed there were none who wished to exclude the information which he sought—the only objection being as to the mode of obtaining it—he would suggest to that member, that he should move to amend his resolution, so as to refer the inquiry which it proposed to a committee of this House. The records of the Department of State, and those of this House, would be both accessible to the committee, and, from consulting them, the committee would be able to give to the House all the information which could be obtained on this subject.

Mr. FLOYD said, that when an amendment to the constitution had been formerly proposed, to prevent members of Congress from holding any office under the Government of the United States, for a certain length of time, after the term for which they had been elected should have expired, he believed he had voted for it, as he thought it a wise precaution to preserve the liberty they had, and the House free from the imputation of motives; that he would not attribute any thing like motive to the present members, as he believed all to be very just, and perhaps the times very honest. But the time might arrive, when we might see a dove-tailed administration claiming all power, infringing on what some called, and which he believed to be, State rights. He did not wish to fight, as the barons of England had done, to limit the prerogative of the crown, but wished to see so much power exercised as was granted expressly in the constitution, and no more. To take away the hope of office, might be useful at a future day, when office might be more desirable; nor could he conceive why the gentleman from Georgia, who has so much talent, and whom all knew to be so upright, opposed this resolution, as it was only a call for information, which certainly could be better furnished by the President than by a committee of the House, and who has made a speech on the subject much longer than he is accustomed to do on such subjects. If there is difficulty with the President and the departments, there would, in his opinion, be much more with a committee. The gentlemen now called on for information were well paid for little labor, and he did not think it would be a very heavy task to produce the information wanted.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was negatived.

Mr. TREZVANT rose, not to make any further observations on the resolution, but to ask that the question on its adoption might be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was so taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided as follows—yeas, 144, nays 42.

So the resolution of Mr. TREZVANT was agreed to.

The Judiciary System.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill further to amend the Judiciary System of the United States.

[This bill proposes, That the Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of a Chief Justice and nine Associate Justices, and provides for the appointment of three additional Associate Justices of said Court.

That the seventh Judicial Circuit of the United States shall hereafter consist of the Districts of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; the eighth Circuit, of the Districts of Kentucky and Missouri; the ninth Circuit, of the Districts of Tennessee and Alabama; and the tenth Circuit, of the Districts of Louisiana and Mississippi.

It repeals so much of any act or acts of Congress, as vests in the District Courts of the United States in the Districts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, the powers and jurisdiction of Circuit Courts, and provides that there shall be hereafter, Circuit Courts for said Districts, to be composed of the Justice of the Supreme Court, assigned or allotted to the circuit to which such districts may respectively belong, and of the District Judge of such districts.]

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6.

Mr. STEWART offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the erection of a bridge on the National Road, where it crosses the Monongahela, at Brownsville, in Pennsylvania.

Having offered this resolve—

Mr. STEWART rose to make a single remark, in explanation of its object. It would be recollected by the House, that the Committee on Roads and Canals had been instructed, on his motion, a few days since, to devise a permanent system for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road. The erection of this bridge, he said, might very properly constitute a part of this system. Without this bridge, the road was incomplete, and inadequate to the great object of its construction. It was a fact, notorious in the West, that the public mail and the public travel had been frequently interrupted, for days together, during the winter season, by the ice and floods upon this river. By referring to the files of the House, gentlemen would find an official communication from the late Postmaster General, stating the fact that the frequent delays and failures of the great western mail was owing to the impassable condition of this river; and that the only means of preventing them, in future, was the erection of the bridge mentioned in the resolution. Every river and stream upon this road, from one end of it to the other, had been bridged, except the Monongahela, at Brownsville. There was no reason why it should form an exception. Without this bridge, the road itself was incomplete. It was a broken link in the great chain of connection which this road constituted between the Eastern and Western States. It ought to be repaired. He therefore hoped the resolution would be adopted, and the Committee on Roads and Canals authorized to make provision for the erection of this bridge, in the bill providing a permanent system for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

The question being then taken on this resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 70, noes 47.

TUESDAY, January 17.

Florida Wrecking Law.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Judiciary Committee, reported, without amendment, a bill from the Senate, "to annul an act concerning wreckers and wrecked property," passed by the Governor and Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida.

Mr. WEBSTER, in reporting the bill without amendment, explained briefly the facts which had given occasion to it. It appeared that, in consequence of a state of things which existed on the coast of Florida, and its vicinity, in relation to wrecked property, the Governor and Legislative Council of that Territory had passed an act, which was found in practice to be productive of some pretty strange effects—and which had led to evils so great as to attract the attention of Congress. The whole subject, he said, is of a character which requires legislative provision—and there being no court of admiralty near the scene of these wrecks, the Legislative Council of Florida had interfered; but, in doing so, had exhibited a course of pretty wild steering—and, in a word, had exercised their power in a manner not calculated to produce any good effects to the sufferers. The whole subject was before the Committee on the Judiciary, who had it in contemplation to report a bill concerning it: but they were of opinion that, meanwhile, no time should be lost in annulling the act of the Legislative Council of Florida; and they, therefore, reported the present bill from the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WHITT, the delegate from Florida, said he had no objection that the bill should pass to a third reading. He wished, however, to state, that he was convinced the Legislative Council of Florida, in passing the act now to be annulled, had been animated by good intentions only. The losses which were occurring on the reef were of such a character, as needed some legislative interference. The courts, to which the property lost was to be carried for adjudication, were remote—and they thought that the act they passed for the relief of the injured parties, would receive the sanction of Congress. It had, unfortunately, happened that great abuses had grown out of the act. These would, of course, be corrected by Congress, and he presumed some special law would be passed on the subject. He had only risen, at this time, for the purpose of vindicating the Council from any intention to transcend the powers entrusted to them, or to do injustice to the persons whose interests might be brought into question under their act.

The bill was ordered to a third reading tomorrow.

Balances Due from Land Officers.

A resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. SCOTT, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a list of balances due by Receivers of Public Moneys, for the sale of Public Lands, to the 1st January, 1826, was taken up.

The resolution gave occasion to some conversation, between the mover and Mr. SLOANE; the latter asking for an explanation, whether the resolution was aimed at Receivers now in office, or those who had gone out of office. These officers are appointed for four years, and cannot, at the end of that time, be reappointed unless all arrears are paid up. This, Mr. S. conceived a sufficient guarantee for the honest discharge of their duty. Their deposits might have been made by those now in office, on the first of January; but according to the terms of the resolution, these deposits would not appear to their credit; and so an imputation might be cast upon honest men, who did not deserve it. He moved to amend the resolution, by adding the words, "not now in office."

Mr. SCOTT replied. By the existing law, he said, balances which have remained due more than three years, are required to be reported to this House. A list has, accordingly, been returned from the Treasury, but it includes only balances due for three years, on 30th September, 1825. Any balances which may have become due within that period, are not included. Mr. S. said he had heard that one Receiver, who had been out of office for four years, had run off with $68,000 of the public money: and that another, who had been out of office one year, had gone off with $25,000. His object was to inquire into these facts. He thought the House had a right to know them. From the returns required by law, this information could not be obtained; it must, therefore, be demanded by a special order of the House. He saw no reason why those in office should not as well be included, as those who had gone out of office. The object was to get at the amount of moneys received; of moneys receivable, and of moneys embezzled. He thought the public eye should be drawn to these facts. If corrupt men were in office, they ought as much to be exposed, as corrupt men who were out of office.

After some further observations, Mr. SCOTT consented to modify his resolution, by substituting 30th September, 1825, for 1st January, 1826. Upon which,

Mr. SLOANE withdrew his motion for amendment, and the resolution, thus modified, was adopted.

Judiciary System.

• Mr. BUCKNER said, the permanency of the Supreme Court was scarcely more to be desired than that of the inferior tribunals. But it was not within the ken of human foresight to declare either the particular number of those inferior tribunals, which the exigencies of a rapidly increasing nation might require, or the precise principles on which they should be organized. Those matters were of necessity submitted to the wisdom and future experience of Congress. But if stability was important, when that feature of the present bill, which requires the performance of circuit court duties by the Judges of the Supreme Court, had received the approbation of the American people for so many years; when the utility and wisdom of such a requisition had been tested by the experience of upwards of thirty-five years; ought we not to regard it almost in the light of a constitutional provision? Were a proposition made to change the constitution itself, I would not approach it with more caution. In 1789, we are informed, that the first statute was enacted in relation to the judicial power of the United States. In that law you find the same feature which the present bill presents. That statute remained unaltered until 1793, when the subject was again presented to the consideration of Congress. The time was too short to give to it the character of a fixed policy at that period. But let us pursue its course farther. The system was continued without any change, in the principle alluded to, until 1801, when the acts of '89 and '93 were repealed, the Judges of the Supreme Court were separated from the circuits, and Circuit Judges were appointed. In 1802, the act of 1801 was repealed; and thus well nigh did the same year witness the birth and the death of this system of 1801. The act of 1802 brought us back to the principle of the law of 1789 and 1793, so far as they required the Supreme Judges to attend at the circuits; and thus was furnished strong and persuasive evidence of a most decided preference by Congress for that course. I shall not stop here (said Mr. B.) to inquire into the considerations which conducted to the repeal of this law of 1801, from any other source than that which the statute itself furnishes. To attribute its repeal to any other cause, than a conviction on the part of those who voted for it, that the plan of 1802 was superior to that of 1801, would be an uncharitable imputation of corrupt motives to the majority of Congress, which ought not to be indulged. Thus stood the law until 1807, when the matter was again brought before Congress. It began now truly to be entitled to the appellation of a fixed policy. But could any doubt be reasonably entertained on the subject, was it not entirely dissipated, when, in that year, the wisdom of the measure having been fully and completely tested, Congress not only continued, but extended the system? They did in principle then what the advocates of this bill insist ought now to be done. Yet the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. POWELL) considers this as no indication of an intention to ingraft on the system this principle as a matter of permanent policy. He tells us that it was merely an experiment, and one which ought cautiously to be indulged in; and as an evidence that they did not contemplate uniformity, he reminds us that, in Kentucky and Maine, district courts only were established. But did the gentleman recollect that Maine was at that time a part of Massachusetts, and Kentucky a part of Virginia? Every State in the Union had its circuit court, by the provisions of the act of 1802; nor is there the least ground upon which to conclude, from the establishment of district courts in Kentucky and Maine, that uniformity was not within the contemplation of Congress, to be carried into effect on some convenient occasion. Such a conclusion is altogether inadmissible, because the present circuit system has since been extended to them. At this very time, eighteen States out of the twenty-four are enjoying its benefits, not one of them willing to be deprived of it; and yet we hesitate to place the remaining six States upon the same ground that the eighteen States occupy. But, Mr. Chairman, (continued Mr. B.) are we not bound to believe, that, according to this plan, justice in the inferior courts, if not more promptly, is at least more ably and satisfactorily dispensed? I shall not insist that the ability of a judge is always in an exact ratio to the salary which he receives: but talents, like commodities carried to market, have their price; and it is in vain that we may expect to secure an equal degree of legal acquirements and strength of intellect, for the sum of fifteen hundred or a thousand dollars, which is the salary of some of the inferior judges, as we can for four thousand five hundred dollars—the salary of a Supreme Judge. That the Judges of the Supreme Court, by performing circuit duties, obtain a more accurate and thorough knowledge of the municipal laws of each State, than they would otherwise do, is an argument entitled to very considerable weight; but it has been so fully urged by gentlemen who have preceded me, that I shall not dwell upon it. But, sir, if the six States alluded to had no other or stronger ground on which to urge their claims to an equal participation in the benefits of this system than that the other States enjoy its benefits, I should consider the reason as altogether resistless. I know it may be replied to this, that justice is as promptly, and in some cases, perhaps, as correctly administered by a District Court, with Circuit Court powers, as in a Circuit Court. We might, in like manner, tell those States, that they may send delegates to Congress who may present their petitions and explain their grievances, but that they shall be entitled to no vote in this House; that Congress is too large and unwieldy a body; and that, to permit their representatives to appear on this floor with all the rights and privileges of a representative from one of the older States, would be likely to create faction. We know that this cannot constitutionally be done; but who is there, in the least acquainted with the feelings and character of the American people, who does not also know, that, if the constitution even permitted such a course, and it were attempted, nothing short of the power of Heaven could preserve this Union for the space of one year! Such a doctrine is repugnant to the genius of our constitution, and destructive of the best established principles of our liberty. We have, indeed, been told by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) that the people of the West will receive no practical benefits from this measure; that it may be a matter of feeling and of pride, but nothing more. Yes, sir; and permit me to inform that gentleman, that it is a high-minded, honorable pride. It is that kind of pride which swells with patriotic emotions the breast of an American, in whatever clime he may be, when he exclaims that he is an American citizen. They are feelings which ought not, can not, be disregarded with safety.

It is the conviction only which each State of the Union feels, that it is, alike with every other, the object of the paternal regard and protection of this Government, that can give strength and durability to the ligaments which bind us together; that can preserve unimpaired that Union, which, I hope and trust in God, will effect for us in a political, what faith does in a religious point of view—everlasting salvation.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us consider their claims still farther. Do not these six States contribute their due proportion to meet the expenditures of the Government? and have not they, and all the Western States, most valiantly and magnanimously defended the rights of our common country? Behold North Carolina, with business not more than sufficient to detain the Circuit Judge, according to the acknowledgments of the gentleman from that State, (Mr.

MANGUM,) two or three days at a term, receiving the aid of the learning and talents of Chief Justice Marshall, while, in some of the States, a District Court Judge presides with the paltry salary of a thousand or twelve hundred dollars. Is this just—is it fair? Do gentlemen believe that large and respectable portions of the United States intend to submit to this state of things, and to have the system, in its present circumscribed condition, fastened upon them as a course of settled policy? If so, they labor under erroneous impressions; and the sooner they are undeceived, the better.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. B., the provisions of this bill are not exclusively for the benefit of the people of those States who are the most anxious for its success. The rights of the citizens of every State in the Union are affected by them. Why has jurisdiction been conferred on the Federal Courts, in legal controversies between citizens of different States? Because the wise men who formed our constitution, well versed in the volume of human nature, anticipated, and thus intended to guard against, that partiality and State feeling, with which a judge of a State court might sometimes take his seat on the bench. I submit it, therefore, to the gentlemen who are pleased to speak of this as a Western bill, to determine, whether plaintiff or defendant is most likely to be injured by an injudicious organization of the inferior tribunals of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told, that no complaints have been heard from any other parts of the United States, except from Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. I have myself heard the opinion of some of the gentlemen from other Western States, in favor of this bill; and I have no doubt that they will, unanimously, join those three States in demanding, as a matter of right, that their States, respectively, shall be embraced within the arrangement of the Circuit Court system: a demand, not made in a supercilious and arrogant spirit, but with an unhesitating confidence in the intelligence and sense of justice of this honorable committee.

I come now, sir, to speak a few words of the claims of Tennessee, Ohio, and Kentucky; but, more particularly, of the latter. We find on the docket of the Federal Court in Kentucky, nine hundred and fifty suits, many of them of the most complicated character, requiring attention and patient investigation. Those acquainted with the nature of litigation in that court, are aware that there is no reasonable hope of any considerable diminution of it for many years. On this point, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. COOK,) as to the Northwestern States, were alike applicable to Kentucky. The titles to real estate, through the largest and most fertile part of the State, indeed, in all that part of it subjected to location under Treasury warrant claims, issued by the State of Virginia, were derived from that State; and, of course, in every controversy respecting those titles, when coming in conflict with a title derived from the State of Kentucky, the jurisdiction of the Federal Court attaches. The titles to real estate in Ohio and Tennessee, constitute a source of litigation but little, if at all, inferior to those of Kentucky. He would not detain the committee by speaking either of the Occupying Claimant Laws of Kentucky, or the apprehension which Virginia appeared to feel, that this bill was designed by Kentucky, as a prelude to a reversal of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Green and Biddle, upon the constitutionality of these laws. The gentlemen from that State need not fear any such result. The validity of those laws had, to be sure, been tested in the crucible of judicial investigation, in both the inferior and superior courts of that State, and had been uniformly supported, both by the judges of that State, and by a very large majority of its ablest lawyers; and, when decided upon in the Supreme Court of the United States, of the four judges on the bench, one was in favor of them. But the opinion of the three determined the principle, and Kentucky was thus bound to abandon a policy which she regarded as essential to the improvement of the State, and the security and repose of her citizens. Judge Marshall, as we were informed by the gentleman from Virginia, through motives of delicacy, omitted to take his seat on the bench, when that case was decided; but yet, the same gentleman tells us, that his opinion coincided with a majority of the court. The whole difficulty in relation to that subject, had, to be sure, originated in the Legislature of Virginia. That State, through her Legislature, had issued warrants for the location of at least three times the number of acres which were contained in the territorial limits of Kentucky; and had made it necessary, by the law on that subject, to make the entry so special, that subsequent locators might be enabled to locate with certainty the adjacent residuum; a degree of precision, which, in many cases, was absolutely impracticable. But this was irrelevant in the discussion of the principles of the present bill. It is sufficient for my purpose to show, that, such is the number of suits, however they may have originated, now pending in the Federal Court of Kentucky, and such the difficulty of their determination, that there exists an absolute necessity of some redress. It had, indeed, been admitted, that the situation of business in the Federal Court of that State, imperiously demanded legislative interference. But a remedy had been proposed by the gentleman who made the acknowledgment, (Mr. POWELL.) He was willing that a judge should be appointed, with a competent salary, equal even to that of a Judge of the Supreme Court, but that he should not be allowed to take a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. I cannot believe that there was an intention to cast any reflection upon the West, because the gentleman remarked, that he had no doubt, men of great talents, and every way adequate to the discharge of so important and arduous a duty, might be found in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. But, sir, a moment's reflection ought to be sufficient to satisfy the committee, that a proposition to send us a mere land commissioner, would be rejected unhesitatingly and indignantly. The people of the West will not rest satisfied with one single mark of respect less than that which is bestowed on any other portion of the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has been objected, said Mr. B., that, should the bill pass, the number of the judges, for the discharge of ordinary business, would be inconveniently large. Such, if I recollect aright, was the opinion advanced by the gentleman from Massachusetts, in whose judgment, and particularly, in any matter relating to the Judiciary, I have very great confidence indeed—but, on this point, I must beg leave to differ from him. I regret that he did not assign the reasons on which he founded that opinion. No complaint has been made, that the present number of judges is inconveniently large. If ten would be too many, on what point shall we determine to settle, as the precise maximum? The proposed increase may not, indeed, it is very certain that it will not, be calculated to expedite the determination of business in the Supreme Court—but expedition is at best a matter of secondary consequence—correctness is always of primary importance. The supposition, that, by the introduction of three additional judges, a faction may be created on the bench, is utterly visionary—it is any thing short of ridiculous. The history of the world presents no example of such a result. If, indeed, they were an assembly of legislators, chosen for short periods, and of a number as great as that of which Congress is composed, anxiously anticipating the result of an approaching election, willing to flatter popular prejudices to procure a short-lived popularity, faction might rear its head among them; but a judge, who receives a salary of four thousand five hundred dollars per annum—not more secure in the tenure of his office, which he is to hold during good behavior, than in the amount of his salary, cannot be suspected of a disposition to faction: he is above the atmosphere of popular prejudice, or popular excitement:—Vox Populi vox Dei is not the motto of his creed—he is satisfied with the existing state of things: for he could scarcely calculate on a change which would better his condition.

But, Mr. Chairman, comparisons have been instituted between our Judiciary system and that of England; and it was insisted that a smaller number of judges had there been found sufficient to determine all the legal controversies of that unequalled people. Mr. B. said he was willing to leave gentlemen to enjoy their opinions, and to pronounce their eulogiums upon the Judiciary, and if they please, the Government, of England: for his part, he considered neither the one nor the other as presenting fit models for the United States. Yet even there, on appeal, in the last resort, (although he wished to be understood as protesting against the comparison,) causes are decided by the House of Lords, aided by their twelve judges. We have also been told, that in all England, there is but one Lord High Chancellor. But if the gentleman will turn his attention to the Judicial history of England, he will find that such have been the vexatious delays in Chancery, under the English system, that they have amounted to a denial of justice. It has very often happened that one generation witnesses the commencement of a cause, and another, its end. But, sir, it appears that we are not only to regard the English judiciary system as worthy of imitation, but that we are also to admire even its anomalies. Our attention has been called to Wales, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) who informs us that the courts in Wales are as distinct from those of England, as from the courts of the United States. This is, I believe, an error. An appeal lies to the courts of England. But a slight attention to the history of that country will show us, that this anomaly as to the courts of Wales, was not the result of the choice of the English Parliament, but rather of necessity. Wales remained, for several centuries after the Saxon invasion, unconquered, and independent of England. The son of Edward the First, became the first titular Prince of Wales. A statute in the reign of Henry the Eighth, placed them on the footing of English subjects, in most respects, except that they were permitted, as a matter of favor, as we are told by the English writers, to retain their courts independent of process from Westminster Hall. And six States of the Union are now to be permitted, I suppose, as a matter of sheer favor, to retain District Courts with Circuit Court powers, in which a judge, with a salary of $800 or $1,000, presides, while the remaining States are to have Circuit Courts with a Judge of the Supreme Court.

It has also been urged, that an increase of the number of the judges would be calculated to weaken the responsibility of each, and render the Executive careless in his selection of them. The argument is utterly untenable. Will not the judges be compelled to give their opinions in writing as at present, subject to the inspection of the world: and can it be supposed that a judge, occupying so exalted and conspicuous a station, will be willing to hazard his reputation for legal learning, under the hope that his brother judges will share with him in the disgrace? As little is it to be expected, that the Executive will select carelessly, or if even he did, that the Senate would confirm the nomination, because there would be ten instead of seven judges.

But, Mr. Chairman, continued Mr. B., it is principally with an eye to decisions on constitutional questions, that I believe an increase in the number of the judges is most to be desired; and in this point of view, there is not the slightest analogy between our Government and that of England, or any of which I have any knowledge. The English Government is composed of two branches only—the Legislative, composed of the King, the Lords, and Commons; and the Executive, of the King only, who, through his judges, administers justice, and by the proper officers, executes their judgments. The Parliament is, of course, supreme. The English courts have no great constitutional questions to settle; no power of the Government to extend by construction; no will of sovereign States to control. They have nothing to do but to administer justice according to the principles of meum et tuum. But, Mr. Chairman, we have, in my opinion, arrived at a point, at which we are bound either to extend the present system, or to adopt the plan of 1801. Shall we hesitate which to do; when not only reason, but experience, the safest of all guides, points out the path so plainly? Are there not alarming evils to be apprehended by confining the judges to the bench of the Supreme Court only? Let it not be forgotten, that there is an extent of jurisdiction confided to them, unequalled by that of any other court in the world. From the nature of our Government, it is necessary that it should be so. There must be some tribunal, upon whose decisions those matters must depend, and there can be none more safely relied on than the Supreme Court, as it is at present constituted, composed of venerable and learned men, selected from the whole nation for their talents and integrity. I feel no alarm at the encroachments of the Federal Government, yet it is proper and safe to guard against them as cautiously as possible. A blind confidence is unwise. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. POWELL) told us that he thought he could see the point beyond which all was danger. I, too, believe, Mr. Chairman, that I can see that point; but in a very different direction from that alluded to by that gentleman. "I fear no evil from the judges mixing with the people. I fear much more from confining them to the performance of duties within the District of Columbia. If the system of 1801 be adopted, and persevered in for half a century, the principles of this Government, at the end of that time, will, in my opinion, be very little more like that which prevailed in 1798, than the present Government of England is like that which existed in the reign of William the Conqueror. In the decision of all constitutional questions, I wish to see at least ten judges on the bench of the Supreme Court, and the concurrence of seven required to declare a State law invalid, or to determine upon the implied powers of this Government.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said he did not know that he should have troubled the committee with any remarks on a subject already so well discussed, if frequent allusion had not, in the course of debate, have been made to the State he represented, and if his support of the bill were not founded on somewhat different reasons from any he had heard expressed. I do not, said Mr. L., conceive myself bound by Congressional usage—I do not say Parliamentary (for of that I know very little)—to advocate this measure because I had the honor to be a member of the committee which reported it. I am not the counsel for the bill, but one of the judges who are to determine on its merits or faults—on the advantages or evils attending its adoption. In order to perform the task with propriety, we must inquire—

First. What are the evils of the present state of things which it is intended to remove?

Secondly. Does this bill apply a complete remedy to the evil, or, if not complete, is it the best that circumstances permit us to apply?

To determine what are the defects in the present state of the judiciary system, it will be necessary to inquire whether, in every part of the Union, the objects for which it was instituted are carried into effect. These objects were:

1. To secure the execution of the laws and treaties of the United States. The Convention wisely thought that, if the tribunals of the different States were alone relied on for this end, not only would the provisions of these laws and treaties, under various pretences, be evaded, and remain unexecuted, in many instances, but that, when effect was given to them, there would be as many different constructions as there were States in the Union; the law would remain a dead letter, and the country be involved in disputes with foreign nations, for misconstruction or the non-execution of treaties.

2. To give to Ambassadors and other foreign Ministers that prompt relief, for any infraction of their privileges, which is required to secure the free intercourse between nations.

3. To give uniformity to the decision of all questions of international law, and to punish offences against it.

4. To provide a proper tribunal for the decision of all questions arising under the admiralty jurisdiction.

5. To guard the rights of the United States against State prejudices, in the decision of cases in which those rights come in conflict with the interests of a State, or of its citizens.

6. To secure aliens, and citizens of other States, against the operation of unjust laws, or illegal constructions of them. This important object must have been impressed on the minds of the Convention, by the just complaints of Great Britain, for injustice to her subjects, by confiscation and tender laws, and other impediments to the execution of the treaty of peace, as well as by the operation of some of those laws on the citizens of other States.

7. The remaining objects to be effected by the establishment of a Federal Judiciary, which occur to me, were the punishment of all offences against the laws of the United States, and the collection of its revenue.

This enumeration may appear inapplicable to the subject, or useless, to those who must have a perfect recollection of the objects for which the Federal Judiciary was established, and the reasons on which it was founded; but it was necessary to detail to the committee all these objects; to desire the members to supply, by their more perfect knowledge of the subject, any omission I may have made; and then to ask them, whether, of all these functions of the Federal Judiciary, there is one that has for its object any advantage to the State in which it is to be exercised? Whether, on the contrary, they are not all either of a general nature, for the benefit of the Union collectively, or restrictions of State rights, and intended to protect the General Government against State encroachments; to give execution to its laws and treaties; to force the State and its citizens to do justice to the alien and the inhabitants of other States; and to make the local laws bend to the dictates of justice, whenever they contravened the rights of such parties? Should this be the result of the investigation—should it be found that all the advantages proposed by this branch of our Government, and consequently all those to be expected from its extension, are on the side of the States collectively, and their citizens; that no one exclusive benefit is to be derived to the State within which it is established—what must be the conclusion? That the States who ask for the extension of the system, can have no improper or selfish views in making the demand; that, if any other be imputed to them, or charged as resulting from the measure they advocate, it should be clearly proved. In order to carry these great objects of the Federal Judiciary into effect, the First Congress, in which were many of the framers of the constitution, passed the act of 1789, by which the circuit system was adopted, nearly in the form in which it now exists, but on the principle of complete extension to every State in the Union. Maine and Kentucky have been mentioned as exceptions; but they form none. They were then, respectively, portions of Massachusetts and of Virginia, desirous of being considered separate Governments, but not acknowledged as such by the States of which they originally formed parts. Hence, Circuit Courts could not be established in them, without, in some sort, acknowledging them to be States, which would have injured the interests and pride, perhaps the rights, of Virginia and Massachusetts. Nor could they be subjected to the jurisdiction of the circuits in those States, without deciding the questions pending between them and their parent States. A middle course was pursued. They were erected into separate districts, and District Courts, with circuit powers, were given them. The same course was pursued with respect to the Territories; and when, in process of time, they came to be States, the system was not changed with respect to any of them, except Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, for whom a new circuit was made, and an additional Judge of the Supreme Court appointed. The other six Western States, as they successively assumed their places in the Union, did not, in the infancy of their political existence, press to be placed on a footing, in this respect, with the other States. The first moments of a State are generally devoted to the interesting task of internal organization. The energies and talents of the new State are directed to matters of immediate interest, and it is, therefore, not astonishing that this anomaly should not earlier have attracted attention. Nor can the neglect be considered as a reproach, far less urged as an abandonment of the right. The time, however, has at length arrived, when the six States, in which District Courts only are now established, demand that they should be placed on an equality with the other members of the Union, and the three other Western States desire such a modification of the system as will enable the Judges of the Circuit Court to despatch the accumulation of business which obstructs the administration of justice. Why do the six new States require this? In the answer to this question will be found the statement of the first point of our inquiry—the evils to be remedied by this bill. Why do we desire to be placed on a footing with the other States? We desire it, sir, because we are States! entitled to equality! the most perfect equality with the oldest, the most populous, the most influential, the best represented State among the first thirteen of the Union! Rights, privileges, honors, burthens, duties, every thing, by the structure of our Government, must be participated by every member of it, on the broadest principle of equality. I would not, coming as I do from one of the smallest States, in point of population—I could not, without betraying its honor and dignity—receive, in its behalf, even an exemption from any duty, however burthensome, if borne by the other States, if it were conceded as a badge of inferiority; I should be disavowed by those who sent me, and justly disavowed. They ask no exemptions; but they demand! yes, sir, that is the word—they demand an equality of rights. Inattentive to this right when it was not disputed, they are feelingly alive to it when their claim is contested; and, in their behalf, I say with Hotspur, for a disputed right, "I will (do ye mark me) cavil on the ninth part of a hair."

But, again, why do we desire the establishment of a circuit, instead of a District Court? What advantage is to be derived from it? I answer, the first effect will be uniformity. But what are the advantages, says the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) of uniformity? We desire it, simply because it is uniformity. If the circuit system be an advantage to the States in which it is established, it ought to be extended to us: for we are entitled to every political advantage resulting from the Union which they enjoy. If it be, on the contrary, a burthen, it is one of which we ought to support our share. If the system be good, extend it; if it be bad, abolish it; and give us one that shall be equal in its operation. We cannot extricate ourselves from this dilemma, while we acknowledge what nobody has yet ventured to deny, in words—the perfect equality of political rights, in the several States. Uniformity, says the same honorable member, can only, on this subject, be desired as a matter of State pride and State feeling. Yes, sir, it is a question of pride and feeling—of honest pride, and dignified feeling—a pride that ennobles; a feeling that will not permit us to suffer wrong; and which, when we disregard, we lose the best characteristics of freemen. If this bill had no one object of profit, convenience, or utility, in the ordinary acceptation of those terms—if its only end were to place us on an equality with the other States, in a circumstance the most insignificant; if the right to it were denied, I should contend for that right with the same pertinacity. Sir, the privilege of being covered during the debates of this House, is one which, of all others, I hold to be the most worthless; it is one of which I do not frequently avail myself, and which, if it were not sanctioned by such high authority, I should think somewhat indecorous; yet, sir, make a discrimination in this paltry privilege—declare that none but the representatives from the Atlantic States shall be covered; but that those from beyond the mountains shall enter bareheaded—do this, I will not ask how long we shall stay here—how many hats will be seen in this hall—but how many heads will be found to wear them? No, sir, pride, founded on a sense of dignity; feeling, originating in a sense of wrong, ought to be cherished in Governments, as in individuals: lose them, and patriotism is at an end, and the motive to glorious actions is destroyed: for the pure virtue that does not need their aid, has either never appeared upon earth, or is lost in the degeneracy of modern times. Direct them to proper objects, but do not reduce or endeavor to annihilate them. But is this a matter of mere pride? Important as its gratification is, when properly directed—is that the object? There are real disadvantages attending the present state of things, independent of the injury to pride of opinion, or to wounded feelings of dignity. There is risk of fortune, of life, of reputation, to the inhabitants of six of the Western States, which is not incurred by those of the others. We have seen to what objects the powers of the Federal Judiciary extend; that all suits in which an alien or a citizen of other States is plaintiff, comes within its scope, and that accusations for crimes against the United States, are to be decided there. Under these two heads, every judicial question that can affect property, life, liberty, or reputation, may be comprehended.

Now, I ask gentlemen, said Mr. L., who oppose this bill, to give a deliberate answer. If they deign to give any, I am sure it will be a candid one, to this question: whether a defendant, who has these all-important concerns depending on the decision of a single District Judge—not always a man of high legal talents, (for your paltry salaries will not command them,) without the fear of any revision of his sentence, and remote from any superintending control—whether a defendant so circumstanced, can be said to enjoy equal rights with him who cannot suffer either punishment or loss of property, unless the decision of his District Judge is concurred in by a man, selected from among the highest talents, and distinguished for his integrity and learning, and who, in every case of a doubtful nature, even when they concur, may, by a pro forma dissent, have the benefit of a recurrence to the assembled wisdom and justice of the Supreme Court? Are these two parties on the same footing? Can it be said, with the semblance of reason, that they enjoy the same rights? And can it be said that a State, all of whose citizens are subjected to these disadvantages, is placed on an equal footing with other States, whose inhabitants enjoy the privileges I have enumerated? If it cannot, the question is at an end: for the terms of our admission are express. Each of the new States is declared “to be one of the United States, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.” Now, sir, how is this stipulation fulfilled, if the property, lives, and liberty of our citizens, are subject to the will of a single man, while yours can suffer in neither, without the revision of a wise and enlightened tribunal? But we have an appeal from the decision of the District Judge, therefore we have no right to complain! Error, sir! palpable error in fact, as well as fallacy in argument! This right of appeal is limited in cases of property, to those above two thousand dollars in value. But in many instances, the whole fortune of an individual does not exceed that sum. In criminal cases there is no appeal. It is not only property that is concerned, but liberty and life. Both may depend on the construction of law. No innocence can protect a man from accusation. All are liable to be dragged before a court. My life may depend on a correct or false interpretation of a statute of the United States. It is submitted to a District Judge. He decides incorrectly against me, and my life is lost. There is no appeal from his decision, although he may be the man the least qualified, in the district, to pronounce. What would happen, if the case were tried in a Circuit, not in a District Court? First: the concurrence of a Judge of the Supreme Court, in the opinion of the District Judge, would be necessary. Secondly: if they did concur, if the case were one of first impression, a pro forma dissent would be entered, and final judgment could not be passed, until the question had been solemnly debated, and the sentence had received the sanction of the Supreme Court. Now, I again ask gentlemen to say, whether this is no disadvantage? Let them meet this question fairly, and either give a satisfactory answer, or agree to remove the evil by according to us a uniform administration of justice.

A third disadvantage of the want of this extension, is that arising from the knowledge of our laws being less accurate, on the bench of the Supreme Court, than it would be, did one of the judges hold a circuit in the State. I do not enlarge on this head: it has been sufficiently enforced by gentlemen who have preceded me. But I am bound in candor to allow, that if the Judicial system was now to be first established, I do not think this advantage would induce me to prefer the circuit system to that of a stationary appellate court. But it is unnecessary now to balance the advantages of the two systems, because the present courts cannot be abolished without counteracting public opinion; because no such proposition is before the House; and because, however favorably I may think of the system, I am bound to yield to the decided opinion that now exists against it. The sole question now is, Shall we extend the circuit system unto the States that are deprived of it? And on this question there can be no doubt that the measure would bring to the bench of the Supreme Court, a more perfect knowledge of the laws necessary for the decision of questions, in the State I represent, than the judges can now possibly possess. It has been governed successively by the French and Spanish law, and although it has now a written civil code, and one that in time may be extended to commercial and penal cases, yet cases arising before the adoption of those codes, must be decided by the prior laws, and the knowledge of them would undoubtedly be facilitated by the appointment of a person versed in them, to the Supreme Court bench.

The weight of public opinion against the restriction imposed on the Western States, is also a disadvantage attending the present system, which it is desirable to remove. It is powerful, and wherever not unreasonable, must have its effect. Originating in well-founded complaints of the system, it attaches itself at last to the court; its decisions become suspected of partiality; political views are imputed to it; and the most unfounded suspicions are fostered and propagated by the ignorant or designing. Public opinion must, therefore, be consulted. Not, I pray to be understood, in the decision of causes, but in the constitution of courts; and, in proportion as this is consulted, in the formation of any system, will be its efficacy in the administration of justice, and the preservation of union and peace.

Another evil is peculiar to the States of Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee—the only three States to which the system has been extended. The press of business, it appears, is so great in those districts, that one circuit judge cannot get through it. This is not denied; but the remedy offered by the opposers of the bill, is a circuit judge, having no seat on the bench of the Supreme Court. To the other six States they offer nothing; or, if nothing else will satisfy, we shall have a commissioner too: for, call him what you will, he is nothing else. The advocates of the bill ask, whether this is wise legislation? whether it is just? whether it is uniform? and gives equal rights to all the States?

This offer supposes some change necessary: it acknowledges the existence of an evil; others have been shown to exist in all the new States. The next question is, Does the present bill apply a remedy to those which have been enumerated? In my opinion, it offers a complete one to all. It gives uniformity; heals the wounds that have been offered to the rights, to the honest pride and feelings of our sister States; it satisfies public opinion, destroys prejudices, and removes the obstructions to the administration of justice. Is it the best remedy? The best, in my opinion, that can now be applied. I have already hinted my preference for another system; if this were not now established, or could not, with convenience, admit of extension, it may hereafter be necessary to recur to it, but now I do not think it is. The objections that have been urged against it, come next to be considered. I shall do this very briefly, for they have more than once been already brought under the consideration of the committee.

The most prominent is, that a court consisting of ten judges will be too numerous. This has always been urged, as if the mere statement of the fact were sufficient to enforce the objection; but it would have been more convincing, if some reasons had been stated to show why a bench thus composed would be less competent to the administration of justice than one consisting of half the number. The final decision of a cause on an appeal, is made on a cool consideration of the facts contained in the record, and the law applicable to them. Whether the judges be many or few, the arguments at the bar are the same; each of the ten justices hears and considers them at the same time; and each forms his own opinion of the fact and the law; which is corrected or confirmed by a free communication with his brethren, when they meet. This is done in private; there are no long speeches—no warm debate—no pride of opinion to be supported in the presence of a numerous audience. The publicity is as it ought to be in the result. The operation by which it has been produced, is carried on in the calm retirement of the cabinet; and so far from considering the number as an evil, I regard it as one of the best features of the bill. If all the tribunals, whose decisions are to be revised, were governed by the same laws, a less numerous court of appeals might answer the purpose: but when we consider the questions arising on the civil law, and the local laws of France and Spain, in the five States and the two Territories, that were once wholly or in part governed by those codes; when we consider the vast variety of modifications which have been made by the statutes of the other States, whose jurisprudence is based on that of England; we can scarcely fail to arrive at the conclusion, that such a knowledge of this heterogeneous mass as will be necessary to correct the fallacies of ingenious counsel in expounding it, will be much more probably found divided among ten men of learning and experience, taken, as for this purpose they undoubtedly will be, from different parts of the Union, than united in five men of the same description. The instances which have been cited of small judiciary bodies in England, and in the different States, afford no applicable examples; because the law is the same throughout each State, and reasons of economy may have, in many instances, operated to reduce the number; but that practice is not uniform, and I need not repeat the exceptions, which have been shown in the debate. There is, however, a striking one, which has not been adverted to; and yet it comes under our daily observation: an instance in which questions of fact, intricate points of law, combined in every mode that can make them difficult of solution, land titles, contracts, descents founded on law, on equity, on usage, are heard and decided by more than two hundred judges: are, sir, and decided in our opinion so wisely, that we will never permit them to be sent to the tribunal of seven. To all those who have constantly refused this reference, even in the most difficult cases; who have clung to the right of deciding on the justice of private claims in this House; to all such, the proposed augmentation of the Supreme Court can form no objection to the bill. If we believe ten are too numerous to give just decisions, how can we reconcile it to ourselves to sit, as judges in a court of two hundred?

Mr. INGERSOLL observed that, when the debate on this subject opened, it was not his intention to obtrude himself on the indulgence of the committee. Indeed, after the enlightened and expanded views presented to us by the different members of the Judiciary Committee, who reported this bill, he felt as if his friends might fold their arms in security, and wait patiently for the question. The whole ground appeared to be minutely explored, and every avenue guarded by anticipation against attack. But, as we approach the question, the indications around us show, that the passage of the bill will be disputed, inch by inch. New obstacles are thrown across our path: new points are presented; objections of every variety that ingenuity can invent, or eloquence urge, thicken around us. It was with a humble hope that he might be able to answer some of these new objections—which could not have been anticipated by the Judiciary Committee—that he had ventured to rise on the present occasion. If, therefore, his remarks should be principally confined, as they certainly would be, to the dull routine of answering objections that had been urged by others, he hoped an apology would be found in the fact, that the leading topics connected with this subject, had been scrutinized, sifted, and disposed of, by abler hands than his.

Judiciary System.

The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. POWELL,) who last addressed us in opposition to the bill, had struck out a new path: not only different, but essentially different, from the course of either of his friends who preceded him. And although, said Mr. I., I saw him advance his positions with a delicacy and a talented ingenuity that commanded my admiration, yet I must confess, in the cooler moments of reflection, I found my judgment unconvinced, if not undisturbed. He tells us, in the onset, that but three of the nine States which are intended to be reached by the provisions of this bill, have called upon us in a voice loud enough to demand the interference of Congress; that these three States are Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee; while the remaining six have only made known their wants in distant and indistinct "murmurs." And hence an argument is derived, that, if we interfere at all, our aid should be extended to the three States which have thundered their grievances in our ears, whilst the modest murmurs of the remaining six should, for the present, pass us as the idle wind. Sir, if the complaints of the six States alluded to have not been as loud as those of the three States which he designated, they have certainly not been less constant. No, sir, these murmurs are blended in every breeze from the West. And I hope, said Mr. I., that the honorable gentleman from Virginia will excuse me for reminding him, that a skilful pilot will often perceive, in the muttering of a distant cloud, the approaching thunder of a tempest.

The bill before us, said Mr. I., may be regarded, not only as intrinsically important, on account of the conveniences which it will afford the citizens of the new States, in the judicial determination of their rights, but it is doubly important when considered as fixing the policy which is to govern the old thirteen States in regard to the new members of this Union at the West and South. For, disguise this question as you may, it is, after all, nothing more or less than an appeal to the old States from the new States, which have come into the Union since the adoption of the constitution, to participate freely and unshackled in the benefits derived from the judicial branch of the common Government. Gentlemen seem to argue this question as if the extension of the Judiciary System to the new States ought to depend upon the number of cases that were docketed for decision in the District Courts of those States. But, in the view which I take of this question, it is immaterial whether those States have few or many cases in the Federal Courts. If they have any cases contemplated by the constitution, as proper to be adjudicated by the Federal Courts, they had a right to have the benefits of the system extended to them. As was well observed by the learned jurist from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON,) who had just addressed us, there is a pride and a feeling on this subject, applicable to States as well as individuals, which, when based on proper principles, a wise legislator will never lightly regard. If, when the citizens of the West approach the old thirteen, the parent States, and ask—I will not say for favors, but for rights, guaranteed to them by the constitution—you extend to them a grudging hand, you may alienate their attachments to this Union, and lay the foundations for those sectional jealousies, which the Father of his Country warned you to avoid. Sir, it has been said that some of the new States are the children of the General Government, and that they have been so long dandled on the parent knee, that they presume to demand the extension of the Judicial System to them, not as a favor, but as a right. Those States are, indeed, the children, not of this or any other administration, but the children of the original States which formed this Union. But, sir, instead of being favored and caressed by an overweening care, you have given them for their toys the rifle and the bayonet; and the history of the last war tells you, that they learned to use them with effect, and to bring them from the contest with untarnished lustre. These children of the old States have never forgotten the parent stock. When the commercial rights of the United States were invaded—rights, the invasion of which more particularly affected the Atlantic States than those beyond the mountains—the statesmen of the West were among the first to raise their voices in Congress in vindication of the injured honor of the common country; and in a war waged for "free trade and sailors' rights," these children of the West were the first to meet the enemy on the frontiers, and, as we have been eloquently reminded by the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, they were the last to sustain your eagles at New Orleans.

If, however, Mr. Chairman, an extension of the Judiciary System is to depend upon the number of cases that have arisen, or that will arise in the new States, where, it may be asked, will you find so wide a field for judicial labor as in those States? Kentucky, we are told, has six hundred cases annually commenced in the Federal Courts; Ohio has four hundred; Tennessee has now three hundred and twenty suits undecided; and the dockets of the Federal Courts in Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are so lumbered up as to call loudly for relief. Does any thing like this mass of business exist in the Atlantic States, where the Judicial system acts freely and unembarrassed? What, then, is our condition? We have, in the old States, an old and a tried system of administering justice, which has called forth the eulogies of both the friends and the foes of the present bill; and, when we are asked to extend it to the wants of the West, gentlemen pause as if we were legislating for colonies, and not for States equal in sovereignty and equal in rights to the States to which we belong. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, to whom I first alluded, tells us, that he would not extend the Judicial system any farther than it now reaches; because, he says, the evils which now press so heavily on the seventh circuit, are the effects of the existing system; and he warns us not to entail these evils on other portions of the western country. Sir, the embarrassments in the seventh circuit are not the consequences of the Judiciary System, considered as an entire system, but are attributable to other causes. Would you condemn the system which in six out of seven of the circuits, gives, as is admitted on all hands, the most perfect satisfaction, because you find there are evils in a single unwieldy circuit west of the mountains?

Is it correct, is it logical, thus to argue against an entire system, because you can find a single spot that is embarrassed by an accumulation of business? The embarrassments are attributable to the formation of the Western circuit. You have there the three States of Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, thrown into a circuit, when either one of those States produces more causes than an entire circuit on the Atlantic border. It is to remedy this very difficulty that the present bill is, in part, intended. The honorable gentleman says, that he would appoint an additional circuit judge for the new States, but not permit him to take a seat on the bench of the Supreme Court, at Washington; and yet, in the same breath, he informs us that he is, in principle, opposed to a circuit system, unconnected with supreme duties. He would raise a rampart around the present Judicial system of the old thirteen States; he would vote down the system of 1801, if it now existed; and he would have done the same had he been a member of the Congress of 1802. Where, then, does his reasoning bring us? I ask him in candor to say, if he would have us hold on to the present system in the Atlantic States, as the best that can be devised, and, at the same time, offer to the States which have recently come into the Union, a circuit system, which we have once discarded as unfit for ourselves?

THURSDAY, January 19.

Mr. HOLOMBE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish this House with estimates of the probable cost of the following lots of live oak timber, to be distributed in the several navy yards of the United States; together with the cost of erecting permanent sheds for their preservation.

Six Frames of Steam Batteries,
Twelve do. of Ships of the Line,
Fifteen do. of Frigates of the largest class,
Fifteen do. of Sloops of War.

And Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be also directed to report to this House, what further legislation, if any, is necessary for the more effectual preservation of the live oak, and red cedar timber on the Public Lands of the United States.

This resolution lies on the table one day.

Judiciary Bill.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the House again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair, on the bill "further to amend the Judicial system of the United States;" and the question being on the motion offered by Mr. STORRE, for amending the bill so as to appoint nine judges instead of ten—

Mr. WRIGHT rose, and said, that he was very conscious there would be some difficulty, at so late a period in the discussion of this bill, both in obtaining and in holding the attention of the committee to any remarks he might have to offer—nor could he even hope, although rising chiefly with a view of communicating information in relation to the state of facts, to be listened to with any very lively interest. Still, however, his sense of duty to one of the greatest States of the West, which he had the honor, in part, to represent, and which had a peculiar interest in the question, impelled him, under whatever disadvantages, to endeavor to present to the committee his views in opposition to the amendment which was yesterday proposed by the gentleman from New York, directly impairing that interest. In doing this, it would be necessary for him, in the first place, to inquire whether there does exist any important inconveniences in the administration of the laws of the United States, in any part of this Union, which calls for the intervention of Congress; and, in the next place, if such inconveniences do exist, whether the propositions contained in the bill upon the table, are calculated to remove them; and to provide for extending the privileges and facilities enjoyed in one section of the country to those parts of it which are now, and have for a long time been, deprived of them.

It is now, said Mr. W., more than ten years since the attention of Congress was called to this subject by President Madison—it was at that time the opinion not only of that distinguished officer, but of other gentlemen of great intelligence, that the then existing organization of our judicial tribunals was not adapted to the wants and extent of the country. A revision of it was recommended by a succeeding President: it was recommended by the Legislatures of several of the States: it was recommended by the bars of several States, and by various individuals in different parts of the Union. All these recommendations concurred in calling the attention of the National Legislature to this subject.

But, sir, independently of these considerations, supposing none of these evils to have existence at all, the people of the Western States, by the constitution, have a right, yes, sir, a right, to demand that all the privileges and immunities extended to any other State, or to any other citizen, shall be extended equally to them. They enjoy this right not only by an express clause in the constitution to that effect—"the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States"—but by the provision for admitting new States into the Union. They can only be admitted as sovereign States. All the powers of sovereignty pertain to them in a degree as unlimited as to any of the original States of the Confederacy. Dependent on this constitutional right, they have another—that of having a voice in a judicial tribunal of the last resort, where the most important questions of State and Federal laws, and of the constitution, are decided, and their construction settled: to carry there, clothed with power, their views in relation to their own legislation and yours, and to procure, as far as practicable, a correct construction of all. This may be called a mere matter of pride: be it so—they have a right to this constitutional participation, and they claim it as a matter of pride. It is a feeling of just and honorable pride, which urges them to assert this right before you: a feeling which will forever prevent the people of the West from voluntarily submitting to degradation.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown that evils do exist in the Western States, in relation to the administration of justice, and that they are such as to require a remedy at your hands. The next question that occurs, is, are they temporary, or are they permanent in their character? I do not know that I can better answer this question, than by presenting to the committee a view of the existing state of things in the State I have, in part, the honor to represent.

It is known to you, sir, and to all the members of this committee, that the land which constitutes that State, was originally owned by other States, or the inhabitants of other States; and, in consequence of this circumstance, is subject to the action of the Federal Court jurisdiction. On the northern boundary of the State, a large tract, equal in size to the State of Connecticut, familiarly known as the Connecticut Reserve, was formerly the property of that State, and has been mostly granted out by it to various individuals, principally non-residents. This is, of course, subjected to the action of the Federal jurisdiction. On the west of this lies another large tract, granted out to certain sufferers by fire. South of this is another tract appropriated as bounty land to the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war. Another to the refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia. Another, larger tract, and much more fruitful of litigation than either of those I have mentioned, is that extending between the Miami and Scioto rivers, reserved by Virginia for her Revolutionary officers and soldiers. Besides all these, there is a grant to the Ohio Company; the grant to Symmes's Company; and smaller grants to various other land companies, connected with the early sales of public lands at New York and Pittsburg; the whole of which are, from the circumstances of the case, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States Courts. The right in the soil in the Territories over which the sovereignty of Ohio stretches, not being in the State, but in the General Government, and the States and individuals before adverted to, the whole of the soil has been subjected to the controlling legislation of the Union, and been parcelled out by the United States.

If it be true, then, as contended, and has been decided, that the judicial power in this Government is co-existent and co-extensive with the legislative power, all questions relating to the land grants in Ohio are subject to the action of Federal jurisdiction. These circumstances, peculiar to the Western States, and applicable to all of them, except Kentucky and Tennessee, to all whose soil is owned by the United States, or other States, afford abundant reason for the great increase of business in the Federal Courts in the Western States, and why that business must always be great. These reasons do not apply to the States east of the Alleghany Ridge, because in those States the right of soil and jurisdiction is united. The great influx of aliens into the country, a great proportion of whom seat themselves in the West, furnishes an additional reason for increased business in the Federal Courts; because it is the constitutional right of aliens to claim the aid of the United States Courts in all their litigation with citizens. Another source, and a most fertile source, of litigation, common to all new countries, with a new and sparse population, suddenly thrown together from different countries and States, bringing their own peculiar moral and legal notions, discordant, possessing little capacity for harmonious action, will be found in the loose, careless, and oftentimes ignorant method of transacting judicial or other proceedings, when there are no precedents to guide, nor any settled rules of decision. In such cases, the entries and records, if any are kept, are often found so totally defective as to afford no satisfactory evidence of what has been done, and those questions supposed to be settled, are bought up for re-examination and adjudication. Another source of increased litigation in the Federal Courts of the West, which has been adverted to by the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Coox,) will be found, in its interior situation, cut off from direct foreign commercial intercourse, destitute of importers among themselves, and constrained to multiply their engagements with citizens of other States. Need I go further? Have I not sufficiently shown the causes of the accumulation of business? Are these causes permanent, or only temporary? I think, sir, I can show that, if they are not entirely permanent, they may be regarded as nearly so. The great region of the West is only now beginning to develop itself; its population, great as it is, is still thinly scattered, and actually covers but a small portion of its territory. Of the 15,288,082 acres of land in Ohio alone, surveyed for sale by the United States, 7,680,888 now remain unsold. This country has settled and improved with a rapidity that has astonished every one, and its increase at this time is equal to what it has been at any former period. The land litigation we have seen is permanent; the increase of population will naturally multiply contracts and other subjects of litigation, and will make that class of cases permanent also.

I will proceed, sir, to submit, as immediately connected with this subject, a few considerations relative to the existing state of the Seventh Circuit. That circuit comprises the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio. There are now annually commenced in its court, seventeen hundred suits, and the information from gentlemen here, and memorials, advise you they are constantly increasing. The judge assigned to that circuit, has to travel twelve hundred miles in the performance of his circuit duties, and fourteen hundred miles to attend the Supreme Court. Has any other of your judges to perform labor like this? Has any judge, in any country, equal labor to perform? I may safely answer in the negative. This alone will satisfy you, that, from the vast labor required of the judge, it is impossible to remedy the evils complained of in the West, while this circuit retains its present organization. When the circuit was established in 1807, the number of inhabitants comprised within it was about 742,000. In 1820, its population had increased to 1,568,584. A census of free white males has recently been taken in Ohio, and calculating from the data it furnishes, I feel warranted in assuring the committee, the population of that single State now falls little, if any, short of a million. If this fact furnishes any rule by which to estimate the increase of the other two States, the present population of the Seventh Circuit exceeds two millions and a half. In 1807, Ohio, which now has a million of inhabitants, had but one representative on this floor; she now has fourteen. Is it not apparent, then, whether you regard population, extent of territory, or the quantum of litigation, that no one judge is adequate to go through with the judicial duties of this circuit? If Congress, in forming this circuit in 1807, performed its duty faithfully, by adapting it to the then existing wants of its people—if, when the population was less than one-third that it now is, this court was deemed necessary—if its legislation was suited to these three States then, it cannot be adapted to their situation now. Any arrange requiring one judge to perform all the circuit duties of either two of the three States now composing the Seventh Circuit, would fail to afford the desired remedy. No single judge would be able to perform these duties: if, therefore, Kentucky and Ohio are to remain united in the same circuit, the remedy would not be efficacious. As it regarded Ohio, the remedy would be worse than useless—it would hold out to her a pretence of relief, which we knew was unsubstantial—a mere shadow. The memorial from Ohio informs you, the District Judge is unable to attend regularly to business, on account of indisposition, already protracted, and which indicated a long continuance. The Circuit Judge, whose fine constitution has been ruined and broken by the severe labor you have imposed upon him, is in as bad, or even worse, situation—wholly unable to attend the court. The bill proposes to separate these three great States of the West, and to unite with each, one or more, of less population and business. It is predicated on the only correct principle, and is well fitted in its convenient arrangement of circuits, to facilitate the administration of justice. I much fear, sir, no advantage whatever would result to either of these States, from a different arrangement of the circuits, or from any one, predicated on the addition of only two judges to the present number. When gentlemen advert to the vast amount of business in the West, and the prospect of its increase, will they not be satisfied, that if we keep either two of these large States together, we shall frustrate the design of the bill?

I am met here, sir, by the declaration of the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee—a declaration of most extraordinary character—that the three small States lying in the northwestern angle of the Union, (Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri,) might get along as they are, a little while longer, and take a circuit, with a judge of the Supreme Court by and by! What is the situation of those States? Is there no business, there, for the United States Courts? We have seen there is, and that the present system operates, as to them, a denial of justice. Why call on these States for longer forbearance, while you extend the system to other States? We now know their wants, and why not now apply the remedy? If it be important to extend the judicial system into any of the Western States, it is equally important to extend it to the whole. One State has the same right to participate in these privileges as another. The bill provides for the wants of all; and let me ask, on what grounds the three States in the northwest should be excluded? Is it wise to adapt our legislation to the wants of this day only, and to invite the attention of every new Congress to the subject? I think not. The less frequently this subject is brought before Congress the less probable is it that any alarm will be excited throughout the country, as to the stability of our judicial system. What extraordinary claims have Mississippi and Alabama, that they should enjoy the advantages of the system, while Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are excluded? Have the first-named States the greater amount of business? I have taken some pains to collect information, and feel warranted in saying, the largest amount of business is found in the north-western States. The information I possess, derived from memorials and conversations with gentlemen here, and letters, show about 40 causes a year in Indiana; 80 in Illinois; 60 in Alabama; and 40 in Mississippi. We may collect from this information, although it may not be precisely correct, that there is a remarkable equality, as to business, amongst these four States; and when we advert to the memorial so long ago presented from the Legislature of Indiana, and the statements of the gentleman from Illinois, on this floor, we shall be satisfied, if the claim of either is to be preferred, it is that of the northwestern States: but, sir, they are all equally entitled to the benefit of the system now.

An examination of the business in the different circuits, will show how greatly the amount in the Western, exceeds that in the Eastern circuits, and how much more labor the western judges have to perform, and gentlemen will see that it is impossible to impose any new duties on the western judges, if you expect them to be performed. No number less than three will be adequate to do the immense labor of the western circuits.

Sir, what was the situation of the United States in 1789, when the judiciary was first organized under the new constitution? There were then only ten States in the Union—Vermont, Rhode Island, and North Carolina, were not then in. The population of these ten States, at that time, did not exceed three millions; but if we admit that, in adopting the system, the union of these three States was anticipated, and was taken into view, the whole population did not exceed four millions. Six judges were then thought necessary to administer justice to these four millions of people in thirteen States, and they were provided for in that act. Rhode Island and North Carolina, having ratified the constitution, had this judicial system extended to them in June, 1790. Vermont had it extended to her in March, 1791. It is a little extraordinary that gentlemen from two of the three States, who were not present at the wedding, but coming at the eleventh hour, were admitted to a full share of the feast, should be among the first to raise their voices against the extension to other States of that system, which had been so promptly and generously extended to them. Surely the gentleman from Rhode Island—a State, where, he believed, the majority in favor of ratifying the constitution was not very great—should not have been so tenacious of excluding her younger sisters from enjoying the privileges it conferred, or to claim to exclude from the judicial pale these forward children of the West, to let the old thirteen States enjoy their pittance.

In 1807, when the Seventh Circuit was organized, embracing the then three Western States, the population of the country bore a greater disproportion to the number of judges, than in 1789. At the time the seventh judge was added to the Supreme Court, there were about six and a half millions of inhabitants in the Union. Seven judges for six and a half millions, was not equal to six for three, or at most four millions. We have now upwards of twelve millions of people, and we propose to add to the court three new judges, and to make the court consist of ten. I ask, again, if ten judges is a greater number for twelve millions, than six was for four millions, or ten for twenty-four States, more than six was for thirteen? The ratio adopted in 1789, would give eighteen judges now. Yet we are told this trifling extension of the existing system is pressing it beyond its limits, and will produce distraction, instability, and ruin.

When this system was first adopted, and the United States judges were sent into the States, they were looked upon with great jealousy, and all their acts were closely scrutinized by the people. Satisfaction has taken the place of jealousy and distrust, and we are told, the whole people of the States east of the Alleghany ridge, are perfectly satisfied with the court and its decisions. If such beneficial results have followed the sending your judges into the fourteen Atlantic States, why will you still exclude the Western States from participation in these results, and keep them ignorant of the operation of your laws? Why have you afforded your aid to quiet the alarms, and remove the jealousies of the people in the Atlantic States, and refuse to dissipate the fears and disquietudes, said to be so prevalent in the West? If all that had been said against the West were true, that would furnish additional arguments for sending judges to put things right. But the fear is not, that the new judges will injure the West, but that the discontents of the West will injure the new judges, and through them, the old ones. I deny that there is any thing in the habits or temper of the western people, to justify any alarm, and I call on gentlemen who throw out such aspersions, for their proof.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) thinks we had better take only two steps now, and wait a little before we take a third—to appoint two judges now, and another by and by, than, by appointing all three at once, alarm the fears of gentlemen. He seems to admit, the time is rapidly approaching when you cannot avoid taking the third step. If three judges are necessary, why not have them at once? Is it wise to forbear now, and agitate the subject anew, year after year, to quiet the fears some gentlemen have? I see no reason for this timidity. It is said, the Territories will shortly become States, and then you can provide for the third judge. In 1789, the real wants of the people did not require six judges, but it was then thought wise to provide six, to answer the increased population of the States on the Atlantic, and it has been found to answer from that day to this. Why shall we reject this example? Why pass a law so narrow in its operation as to require immediate revision and re-enactment? It is your duty to give some character for permanence to your legislation, as well as your adjudications. The act of 1789 was found to answer its object till 1807—eighteen years—and by adding one judge at that time, and extending its system over the then three Western States, has been continued to the present period—nineteen years longer. With these examples and this policy before us, shall we limit our views in legislation to the present moment, and shut our eyes upon the future? We are told that by increasing the number of judges to ten, you incorporate into the judicial system principles tending to its total destruction—that new judges must be added, from time to time, as new States arise, until you make it too numerous a body for business, and weaken, if not take from it entirely, its responsibility. There is little expectation that any other States, than the present organized Territories, will claim admission into this Union for fifty years, and these Territories, when States, can conveniently be attached to the proposed circuits—Michigan to the Ohio circuit; Florida to that of Alabama, and Arkansas to that of Louisiana. We may, therefore, fairly presume, the circuits now proposed, will answer all the purposes of justice for fifty years.

Sir, what are these fears of gentlemen, and what the cause of alarm at the proposed increase of judges? It seems not denied that there is not, either in the number seven or nine, any magic charm; and we have found, from experience, that no serious inconvenience results from an even number in the court. But gentlemen tell us, the representative principle is carried into the scheme—that the addition of three judges will make the court a political, popularity-hunting tribunal—that the judges coming from the West, and mixing with the people of the West, will imbibe their feelings of hostility to the court, and, to the Atlantic country, their factions principles, their corruption; and, armed with these weapons, will corrupt the court, overturn its previous decisions, and control its future ones—destructive alike of good order, uniformity of decision, and the principles of the constitution. Are not all these apprehensions gratuitous? Does the character of the court of the Western country, or the Western people, furnish any foundation for them? The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) had said, the people of the West are to bring on to the bench of the Supreme Court all their feelings of hostility to the court and its decisions.

The feeling to which I have before adverted, that existed there in relation to a decision of the Supreme Court, was not sufficient to justify any apprehension. This kind of feeling has not been confined to the Western States. Other States have felt it to as great an extent. It had existed in Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, New Hampshire, and Vermont. Georgia and South Carolina submitted with reluctance. Virginia exerted her judicial power to resist. Pennsylvania raised her military arm. Yet we of the West are not found charging the people of these States with being factious, and turbulent, and corrupt. The feeling subsided without generating the passions so ungenerously attributed to the West. Has the Western atmosphere any thing peculiar in it to excite turbulence and faction? Although supposed to possess this taint, gentlemen have showered compliments upon the Western people in great abundance. We are generous and brave, ready to rush into danger, and to repel our country's foes. We are entitled to thanks and confidence, a seat on this floor, and to any thing but a Judge on the Supreme Court bench, or to have a Judge from the Supreme Court sent to us to try our causes. I have no inclination to find fault with the judges, nor disposed to flatter them. It is not congenial to my disposition to do either. They have performed their duties to the satisfaction of the people, and need no praise. Yet these judges, so highly gifted and extolled, exalted so as to be but little lower than the angels, are to surrender their opinions to the three Western judges. The one now in the West having been admitted to have performed his duties satisfactorily, is not obnoxious to the charge. These three new judges are to reverse all the decisions of the Supreme Court. They must be wonderful men, if the three can control and overrule seven. If the argument was predicated on the opinion that the Atlantic judges would neglect their duties in the Supreme Court, and leave the seats for the Western judges, a moment's reflection would show to the contrary. The bad roads, increased distances, and other inconveniences, from which the Eastern judges will be exempt, will retard the Western judge in his arrival, and give those from the East the advantage.

The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PEARCE) has expressed his fears also, that, if new judges are appointed from the West, some of the decisions of the court, which had given so much satisfaction to the Atlantic States, would be reversed: among those enumerated, was one as to the conclusive character of a record of a foreign court of Admiralty, (in accordance with which, he thinks, there was but a bare majority of the court,)—one as to the liability of individual members of a corporation in the Circuit Court, when any one of them lived within the State or district; another denying to that court jurisdiction at common law in criminal cases, in opposition to what he conceives the conclusive argument of Judge Story; and another sustaining the constitutionality of the law imposing circuit duties on the Judges of the Supreme Court. Let me quiet the gentleman's fears in these respects, and assure him there is no danger from our quarter, in relation to either of his cases. In the West, the first decision is not regarded as of much consequence either way: with the second, no dissatisfaction is felt. For myself, I had supposed it indisputable, that one individual, enjoying a personal privilege, could not extend that privilege so as to include or protect others associated with him in contract or tort. As to common law criminal jurisdiction of crimes in the United States, the Western lawyers are only astonished it should have entered into the mind of any man to conceive that court had such jurisdiction. The question as to the constitutional authority of the court, never has been raised in all the litigation in the West, or elsewhere, except in the case alluded to by Judge Parsons. I hazard nothing in asserting, that such a question will not be raised in the West; and if such were raised, the decision there would accord with that of the Supreme Court. The gentleman says, that the common law and constitutional questions were decided wrong. Yet he is much alarmed lest Western judges should reverse them, and decide right. Does the gentleman think it is wrong for Western judges to do right? How are decisions to be reversed? The judges are not to overturn them without a cause. When a case is properly made and presented, and fully argued, is your Supreme Court to be deprived of the power to decide as they think right, through fear of disturbing some former decision—a privilege enjoyed by all other courts, existing in the very nature of things? When error is discovered, is it an act of wisdom or integrity to persist in it?

Mr. KREMER said he should vote not only against this amendment, but against the bill also. There was nothing of which he was more fully convinced, than that the whole Judicial system of this country, as it now stands, is radically wrong; and he was satisfied that the bill would not in practice, answer the end proposed by its friends. This end, it is argued, is to prevent the delay of justice. As to the existence of such delays, there could be no question—there was not any man who could doubt the fact. The evil prevails everywhere through the country: but is multiplying courts a likely way to remedy it? So far from it, it will only be multiplying the evil. It is with courts as it is with banks—the moment you begin to create the want of them, you will have to go on to satisfy that want: so in new countries they cry out that the delay they experience is for want of more courts. The argument is specious, but is it solid? I appeal to all, whether, when the number of judges was once before increased, the same evils did not prevail? Besides, where is the evidence that the delay and expense complained of is so very enormous? What are we told by the friends of the bill? That the bar of Tennessee and the bar of Ohio have come forward and petitioned this House; but, Mr. Chairman, the best evidence should be produced, which the case will admit: and is this the best evidence? Is it not admitted as a principle, that the more interest any party has in that, concerning which he testifies, the less is his testimony worthy to be received? Have we any memorial from the Court? Do the honest suitors come here, and ask you to multiply their evils by increasing the courts? For, what does the present Judicial system amount to? Is it not, in practice, a denial of justice? If you wish to benefit the people, you must remodel the entire system: for, as it is, the suitors have but too much reason to adopt the language of the unfortunate man, who, having succeeded in his cause, after several appeals, said to his friend, "one verdict more in my favor, and I am quite ruined." Notwithstanding all the fine eulogies which have been pronounced on the Judiciary of this country, and the Judiciary of England, the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. PRARCK) tells you that a single suit in the Supreme Court, cost 6,500 dollars, when the whole sum in dispute was less than that. We have heard something said, about the excitement which once existed in Pennsylvania, (I conclude gentlemen allude to Olmstead's case,) and they tell us that the people in Pennsylvania are now quiet, and make no resistance. Mr. Chairman, so should I be, if a robber had met me in the Pennsylvania Avenue, and knocked me down: but nothing can ever erase from my memory, or take out of my heart, the conviction of the oppression and injustice which was done in that case: nor will the people of Pennsylvania ever cease to remember and to feel it too. Sir, you can never reconcile them to that decision. But, sir, I must here enter my solemn protest against the whole doctrine, that the Supreme Court has power to pronounce acts of this House to be unconstitutional. In vain did our armies shed their blood in the field, and our sages toil in the cabinet, to secure our liberty, if it is to be subjected to the arbitrary decision of these judges.

We have heard a great deal about the illustrious talents of the Judges of the Supreme Court; and we have been told a great deal about the incorruptible purity of the English courts; but do gentlemen forget the words of the poet?

"Do parts allure thee? Look how BACON shin'd,
The greatest, wisest, meanest of mankind."

This man was bribed—and about a hundred years after, another of their Chancellors was convicted of enormous crimes. If some judges are corrupt, others may be so too; he believed nothing of the infallibility of men in any station. He again protested against the doctrine that they had power to set aside the acts of this House: and even if he had at first been friendly to the bill, this bold avowal would be sufficient to induce him to pause before he voted for it. He called upon gentlemen to pause before they took a step so important. He would first be well assured that the people wish this change, before he could be persuaded to vote for it.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERRICK then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee that brought it in, with an instruction so to amend it as to discharge the Judges of the Supreme Court from attendance on the Circuit Courts of the United States; to provide for the gradual reduction of their present number to five; and, further, to provide a uniform efficient system for the administration of justice in the inferior courts of the United States.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER now moved that the House adjourn; which motion was carried—ayes 89; noes 84.

FRIDAY, January 20.

The resolutions offered yesterday, by Mr. HOLCOMBE, respecting Navy timber, were taken up.

Mr. STORRS (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) said that he was not aware that the interests of the service called, at this time, for the estimates proposed—that there was nothing in the present state of the country which required the House now to consider the subject. No proposition had been made, to his knowledge, from any quarter, to enlarge the existing naval establishment. It would be in time to examine that subject, when we heard from the Executive Department that it was necessary or expedient to act upon it. The adoption of the first resolution, might lead to inferences altogether unfounded, and actually injurious to the Naval service. He should, therefore, vote against that resolution.

Mr. HOLCOMBE said, that he would briefly explain the reasons which had induced him to submit the resolutions under consideration. From information received from the most respectable sources, he could inform the House that the live-oak timber was rapidly disappearing from the public lands of the United States, and that, unless some decisive measures were speedily adopted for its preservation, the whole supply of this invaluable timber would be entirely cut off in a few years. The law of 1822, Mr. H. said, was totally inoperative; indeed, it was worse than useless. He was assured that more of the live-oak timber had been removed, perhaps thrice as much, in the few years which have followed its enactment than for any same number of years before that period. This was owing, he presumed, to the apprehension of the agents of foreign shipyards, that this law was to be considered as an indication that Congress was determined to preserve its public timber, and hence they had availed themselves of the lax provisions of the existing law, and made every effort to supply themselves abundantly, in anticipation of future wants. And such had been their success in procuring their timber, that he felt warranted in asserting, that there was more good live-oak timber to be found, at this moment, in British shipyards, and in other situations beyond the control of this Government, than was growing on the public lands of the United States, at least in accessible situations. With such facts before him, Mr. H. thought it was a subject of proper inquiry, whether some more effectual measures than the present should not be adopted to secure the timber left; and whether it would not be prudent to provide for the future exigencies of the service, in the manner proposed in the resolutions. The live-oak, if properly secured, instead of deteriorating, grows better—so he was informed—for any indefinite period. Mr. H. said (and the House, he perfectly knew, was aware of the fact) that the supply of live-oak is limited, and is not, like the white-oak, and ordinary timber, scattered over the Union, but confined to the sea-board region of the Southern States, and the margin of the Gulf of Mexico. With such views, Mr. H. had presented the resolutions, and hoped they would be adopted.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 64, noes 60.

The question then being on the second resolution, Mr. STORRS observed that he had no objection to having this information obtained; but he doubted if it was a proper course for this House to call on one of the Heads of Departments to know if legislation is, or is not, necessary on a given subject. It was at all times proper to call on him for facts which were officially within his knowledge; but it was evidently unbecoming for the House of Representatives to ask any Head of Department how they shall perform their duty. He therefore moved to amend the resolution by striking out "the Secretary of the Navy," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "the Committee on Naval Affairs."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Death of Mr. Farrelly.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, rose, and said—

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to announce the unpleasant information of the death of one of my colleagues, Mr. PATRICK FARRELLY, a gentleman known here from having acted as a member of this House for several years, and who had been again returned as one of the members from Pennsylvania. He died at Pittsburg, on the 12th of this month, on his way to take his seat in this body.

Mr. INGHAM said, the annunciation of the death of a fellow member, who had been associated with us, by the voice of his constituents, in our labors for the common good of our country, cannot fail to excite the sympathetic sensibilities of our nature, which I am persuaded would induce the members of this House to accord the customary testimonials of respect to the memory of my venerated colleague. But, with those who had an opportunity of knowing his worth, many of whom I now see around me, there must be additional motives for paying respect to his memory, not only in the exhibition of suitable external forms, but through the indulgence of the best affections of the human heart. Whether in public or private life, the worth of the deceased was of no common order. All who had the happiness of knowing him as well as did the humble individual upon whom has devolved the melancholy duty of addressing you on this occasion, will bear me testimony that his character combined an association of the most estimable qualities of humanity—an amiableness of disposition, unsullied integrity, and inflexible virtue, adorned by a highly cultivated and ingenuous intelligence. But it is not for me to attempt a delineation of the virtues of so excellent a man, so devoted a patriot. I beg permission, therefore, only to add, for the information of the House, that, ever anxious to be where his duty called him, the deceased left his residence about the commencement of the present session, with a view to take his seat among us. He had travelled, on his journey to this Metropolis, as far as the city of Pittsburg, where he was arrested by the hand of a disease which terminated his journey of life, at the time stated by my worthy colleague. He was, therefore, in the way of his duty as a member; he was entitled by the law and the constitution to the privileges of a member; and the case, though not precisely that of a member dying after his arrival at the Seat of Government, is altogether analogous, and in no material circumstance distinguishable from it. There is, however, a class of cases embracing a wider extent, in which the House, with unanimity, accorded the customary testimonials of respect. I allude to the well-known case of the ever-to-be-lamented Mr. LOWDES, and others, which I need only mention to bring to the recollection of the House. But I will not do injustice to the proper sensibilities of any member, by anticipating objections to the resolution which I now submit for the consideration of the House.

[The motion of Mr. INGHAM was, in effect, that, in testimony of respect for the memory of Mr. FARRELLY, the members of this House would wear crape on the left arm for the space of thirty days.]

The resolution was unanimously adopted.
And then the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21.

Mr. STORRS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made the following report:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac Phillips, formerly a Post Captain in the Navy of the United States, respectfully report:

"That the memorialist was appointed a Captain in the Navy, on the third day of July, 1798, and ordered to the command of the sloop of war Baltimore, then employed on the American coast; and, during her cruise, while conveying several American merchantmen to the Havana, she fell in with a British squadron near that port, under the command of Commodore Loring, by whose orders she was boarded by a British lieutenant and party of men, who mustered her crew and took away a number of her seamen. On the return of the memorialist to the United States, he was, by an order addressed to him by the then Secretary of the Navy Department, on the 10th day of January, 1799, dismissed from the Naval service for alleged misconduct on that occasion. He now prays to be restored to his rank of Post Captain in the Navy; and states that his dismissal was not sanctioned by the Executive Department; and that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy was written without the authority or knowledge of the President. That the circumstances under which he was placed, when his command of said sloop was violated, were such, for the reasons alleged by him, that his dismissal was not justified by any misconduct on his part; and that the Executive Department possessed no power to separate him from the Naval service without a trial by Court Martial.

"The committee are of opinion, that it would be wholly unsafe to act upon the suggestion that the order referred to was issued without authority; and that, if the subject of relief to the memorialist was even properly addressed to the Legislative power of Congress, yet the lapse of time since this order was issued, his acquiescence until this period, and the consequent injurious, if not unjust, disturbance of rank which might be produced in the Naval service, present insuperable objections to any examination of the circumstances which, in the opinion of the President, required that exercise of Executive authority in the case of the memorialist.

"The committee, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition."

The report was read, and laid on the table.
The House adjourned.

MONDAY, JANUARY 28.

Mr. POLK presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, praying of Congress a relinquishment of the title of the United States to certain vacant lands within the territory of that State; to be appropriated by the Legislature thereof, to the purposes of education.

Mr. McCoy said he did not see the necessity of referring the memorials alluded to to a select committee. It occurred to him that the Committee on the Public Lands was the one to which they should be referred. He therefore moved their reference to that committee.

Mr. POLK said, that he apprehended the gentleman from Virginia, in moving the reference of the memorials to the standing Committee on Public Lands, did not anticipate the great labor which would devolve upon the committee to whom this subject was referred, in examining the numerous and complex land laws as well of the State of North Carolina as of the State of Tennessee, necessarily connected with the subject-matter of the memorials, and the examination of which it was important to make, in order to enable Congress correctly to understand and decide upon the application made by the State which he had the honor in part to represent. He would, for the information of the House, briefly state the history of those laws, and the nature of the present application to Congress, contained in the memorials. In 1789, the State of North Carolina, as well as some of the other States in the Union, ceded to the Government of the United States a portion of their unsettled territory, with a view to aid the General Government, then embarrassed in its financial concerns, to pay off a portion of the debt contracted in the war of the Revolution. But North Carolina, in her act of cession, reserved to herself the right to issue military warrants, and to satisfy the claims of her Revolutionary soldiers, out of territory thus ceded. In 1796, Tennessee, including within her limits the territory thus ceded by North Carolina, was admitted into the Union as a free and sovereign State, and was placed upon an equal footing with her sister States. In 1804, a compact was entered into between the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, which was subsequently ratified by Congress, whereby Tennessee was authorized and undertook to issue grants and perfect titles, on all the bona fide claims of North Carolina, chargeable upon the territory within her limits by virtue of the cession act of 1789. The Government of the United States being well satisfied of the importance of education among the great body of the people in a Government like this, and that the security and durability of all our Republican institutions must rest upon an intelligent and virtuous yeomanry, had, previous to that time, adopted the policy of making liberal donations to the several States, for the promotion of learning and the diffusion of science. The same policy has been since pursued; and the same liberality was intended to have been extended to Tennessee, that has been to her sister States; and, for this purpose, by an act of Congress, passed in the year 1806, six hundred and forty acres of land were directed to be laid off within every six miles square, in a given territory, within the limits of Tennessee, designated in the act to be appropriated to the use of schools, for the instruction of children, forever. This benevolent donation of Congress, owing to the great number of North Carolina claims chargeable upon the territory within which the school lands were directed to be laid off, and from other causes, had been but partially realized. But few of the school tracts have been laid off, and thus a great deficiency exists in the amount of school lands, intended to be given by the act of Congress of 1806 to the State of Tennessee, for the purposes of education. It was to supply that deficiency that the State of Tennessee, by the memorial of her Legislature, presented at the first session of the Eighteenth Congress, and by the memorial which had just been presented, adopted at a recent session of her Legislature, asked of the Congress of the United States a relinquishment of title to the remaining vacant and unappropriated lands within her limits, provision having been made, as she believed, for the satisfaction of all the bona fide claims of North Carolina. The remaining lands that were vacant, were generally very poor, lay in detached parcels, and would be no object to the United States; but, if put at the disposition of the State of Tennessee, would in part supply the deficiency which existed in the school fund. At the first session of the Eighteenth Congress, when this subject was first presented to Congress, Mr. P. said, he understood some difficulty had existed in consequence of certain claims not having been satisfied, which were issued to the University of North Carolina, predicated upon services rendered by soldiers of the North Carolina line, who were said to be dead, and whose blood was extinct, they having died, as was alleged, without leaving any heirs within the United States. These claims the State of Tennessee had refused to satisfy; believing, as she did, that they were not properly chargeable upon the territory within her limits, by the terms, and the true intent and meaning of the act of cession of 1789. This difficulty, however, he understood had been removed, by a recent act of the Legislature of Tennessee, by which an understanding was likely to take place, between the University of North Carolina and the State of Tennessee. From this brief and imperfect outline of the object of the memorial, and the history of the land titles of the two States, (North Carolina and Tennessee,) as connected with it, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would see the great labor which would be imposed upon the committee to whom the subject should be referred, and hoped he would not further press the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Public Lands. That committee had already much business before it for consideration, and, he feared, if the memorial was referred to that committee, it could not be examined and reported on, consistently with their other duties during the present session. It was a subject of considerable interest to the people of Tennessee, and could not injure either the General Government, or any of the other States of the Union; but, on the contrary, granting the prayer of the memorial, would be promoting the policy pursued ever since the foundation of the Government, of diffusing knowledge, and promoting education in the several States. But it was unnecessary to consider the general question upon a mere motion of reference; that would be more properly the subject of consideration hereafter. A select committee, to whom he proposed to refer the memorial, and who would have no other business before them, could consider it at an early day; and after fully investigating the subject, could report the result of their deliberations, so as to have the subject finally acted on during the present session. He hoped, therefore, that the motion he had made to refer the subject to a select committee, would prevail.

When, the question being taken, the memorial was referred to a Select Committee, and the following gentlemen appointed to compose the same: Messrs. POLK, BRYAN, ROSS, ALLEN, of Tenn., HOLMES, PETER, DAVIS.

JANUARY, 1826.]

Judiciary System.

Judiciary System.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. MERCEUR, to recommit the bill to extend the Judicial System of the United States, with instructions, &c.

Mr. BURGESS, in rising to address the Chair, said: This great question is the entire Judiciary of the United States. It was placed before Congress by the President; has been by this House referred to the appropriate committee; and they have detailed to us the great judicial diseases of the country, and proposed, by this bill, a remedy for them. It therefore concerns the administration of national justice, and our attention is moreover loudly called to it by a great and respectable portion of the American people.

The resolution moved by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERCEUR) proposes a recommitment of the whole subject; to the intent that, the Judiciary, built at several times, and in distinct parcels, may be re-edified into one great whole, and accommodated to the present and future wants of the nation. The system of the bill is a Supreme Court, holding one term only, each year, sitting at Washington only, and beginning that term on the first Monday of February, as now is done; a Circuit Court, according to the present circuits, and four new ones to be formed from the circuit and the districts comprehending the nine States in the Valley of the Mississippi. These ten circuits are to embrace all the districts in the United States, excepting those of West New York, West Pennsylvania, and West Virginia, alone. In every district but these three, district judges alone shall be compelled to sustain district jurisdiction only, hold district rank, and receive district salary; in these three, with the same pay, and the same rank, they shall be obliged to perform circuit duties, and sustain circuit jurisdiction. In each of the other districts, formed into ten circuits, justice shall be administered by a circuit judge, sustaining the jurisdiction, holding the rank, and receiving the salary of a circuit judge, and a supreme judge, at the same time, and these, united together, shall form a Supreme Court of ten judges. These, sir, are the peculiar provisions of the bill.

Throughout the whole debate, the opposers of the system of the resolution misconceive, for they continually misstate, the objections made by the opposers of the system of the bill. They call them, 1st. A denial of justice. 2d. They pronounce them to be the same oppressive measures which originated the war of Independence. 3d. They denounce against them the lex talionis. 4th. They warn them that their Supreme Court will become odious to the people.

Does the present system deny justice to any man? Extra judicial causes may obstruct the course of it; but is that a denial of the right to justice itself? As well may they say, that, because the snags and sawyers of their rivers obstruct the passage of their vessels upon them, Government, unless she remove those obstructions, denies the right of these people to navigate those waters. The opposers of this bill are not answerable for the inconvenient structure and slow movements of the old judiciary machine, or the diminished quantity of work produced by its operations. Neither do they propose to repair it by some two or three additional wheels, or any quantity of supplemental gearing. They do not believe it worth repairing; or that any amount of costs will put it in condition to do the judicial work of the nation even "pretty well," for any thing like "twenty years." They propose to rebuild it on the true constitutional model; and accommodate its structures, speed, and production, to the movements and wants of the present, and probable future, condition of the nation. Adopt the system of the resolution, and you will have no obstruction, no delay, no denial of justice.

What is there, in the opposition to this bill, resembling the unfeeling and oppressive causes of the Revolutionary war? Are the opposers kings? Are the advocates of it their colonists? Do these men, at their own pleasure, appoint, pay, and displace, the judges of those courts? Do they deprive them of the trial by jury: or do they, for trial, transport them out of the vicinage, and beyond sea? These were among the causes which produced the war of the Revolution; and separated these States from the parent nation. What in this procedure resembles those causes? Yet this parallel has been drawn in this House; and the sketch, such as it is, published, sent over our country, and will be spread over Europe. "On eagles' wings, immortal, scandals fly." The next importation of reviews, will bring us a profound discourse on the probable disunion of these States; so, and so grossly, do we abuse "Heaven's first, best gift to man," language—the rich medium, by which alone any portion of the treasured capital of intellectual opulence can be circulated in the world. We debase it to the very offices of the miser's woollen purse, which, elastic in its texture, adheres closely to his thumb and finger, cautiously introduced to extract a four-pence half-penny; or stretches to the extended hand of his heir, thrust in up to his elbow, to clutch, and draw out a fist full of eagles. Well might the lad swear "his sister should have no name; because a name was a word, and a word might be abused: and so his sister's good name might come to be abused by every clown."

Why are the opposers of this bill from the "Old Thirteen" threatened with retaliation, by its advocates, from the New States? Whom, and what, do they menace? Their brethren and the home of their fathers. "They went out from us," not "because they were not of us." They are still children of the great household, though settled upon, and cultivating, different allotments of the common inheritance. Their paternal sepulchres are with us: and will they leave us alone to defend them? The Scythian, though he might not fight for his pasture, his flocks, or his tent, yet, when retreat had brought him back to the grave of his father, would he there, by that consecrated mound, and in defence of it, make the deadly stand, and mortal battle. When, in our sober autumn, they visit us, as they often do, they see the frail memorial yet standing on the green hill-side; and may there read many a holy legend "that teach the rustic moralist to die."

"The time will come," they exclaim, "when the Government shall be agitated to the very centre: and we may want some boon, like that now demanded by them." The perilous day may indeed arrive, when our common country, debased by luxury, agitated by faction, hardened by ambition, arrogant by power, shall not, by piling all the massy and mountainous weight of our laws and institutions, upon this gigantic and bloody brotherhood of crime and slaughter, be able to hold them down subdued. In this tremendous day of national agitation and jeopardy, will these men, or the sons of these men, be found wanting? They will not. We are all embarked in one great national vessel, bound on one great, and, we hope, long and prosperous national voyage. Will they, in the night of storm, throw overboard our share of the cargo, with the vain hope of preserving their own? We know they will not. Will they, on some lee shore, scuttle the ship, to terminate the voyage? Will they, in the hour of assault or battle, pull down the colors, and give up the ship? In God's name, we say, we know they will not. Why, then, these unavailing threats? Brave men should never use them to brave men. Leave them for the accommodation of those who "die many times before their death."

Will the time then come, when our Supreme Court shall be odious, unless the judges of it continue to perform their own, and the additional duties of Circuit Court judges? This doctrine is unknown to the constitution. That projects a Supreme Judicial Court; separate, and supervising all courts of inferior jurisdiction. Will it become odious because it is supreme? Because neither the Executive nor Legislative arm can demolish or diminish its power, or move a finger within the pale of its jurisdiction? Or will it become odious, because it was established to protect, and will probably forever protect, the people from the usurpations of their own national servants? Should it become odious because stationary, and jealousy may lead the nation to suspect that it is influenced by "the powers that be," and that act in this place? Make it then, sir, movable as the resolution proposes. Place it before the nation, in the great departments of our country, that the people may see, and we know they will then reverence, this hallowed ark of our national covenant.

This apprehended odiousness is but an apprehension. Such a court cannot be suspected; it cannot be odious, so long as it is filled by the Marshalls and the Storrs of our country. I do not name these gentlemen, in derogation of other judges of that tribunal, but because I have the honor and pleasure of acquaintance with one of them, and because, not to know the character of the other, would argue myself more unknown, than, humble as I am, I can willingly acknowledge myself to be.

The third great reason, sir, offered in support of the provisions of this bill, is, that they will equalize a knowledge of State laws. This argument is unsound. Because, 1st. No such inequality exists; and, 2d. If it did, the method here proposed, would not afford a remedy for it. Consider, if you please, sir, what, by his oath, a judge of the Supreme Court is fairly presumed to know; the extent and variety of his law learning. Either by original jurisdiction, or appeal, come before him, 1st. All causes of Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls. Here may be, and is, required, extensive knowledge of the laws of nations. 2d. All cases in law or equity. The requirements of these, will spread before him all the principles of the common, and all the principles of the civil law. These two great codes, dividing the empire of almost the whole civilized world, not by perpetual war, like the German and Roman, who originated them, but with a peaceable common, and, in many countries, a concurrent, dominion—remain to nations as a kind of imperishable memorial of the conquests of mind, when those of arms have long since ceased to have place on the earth. They remain to these United States, and to each of them. They were brought to this country by our ancestors; who shared them with their countrymen, as an inalienable portion of their political heritage. They are the great elements of all the laws of all the States. Wherever a drop of Saxon blood circulates in American veins, there, the folks' law, the people's law, the common law, is the citizen's birthright. There, too, the civil law, the controlling and ameliorating principles of equity and good conscience, are found and enjoyed. These mark out, and designate, all the rights of persons, and rights of things, to be cherished and protected; and all the wrongs of persons, and wrongs of things, to be eschewed and punished; and, moreover, cover them all with a great and healing system of protection and remedy. No man can be elevated to the Supreme Judicial tribunal of our country, without comprehensive, minute, and extensive knowledge of these laws. 3d. These cases are to arise under the constitution. This judge must, then, make himself acquainted with every various construction of that instrument; and be, in all respects, a great constitutional lawyer. 4th. Or they are to arise under the laws of the United States; for adjudicating such causes, therefore, he must be equally and profoundly read in the laws and constitution of our country. 5th. All cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction come before him. The principles governing these cases, comprehend the laws of ships, freight, wages, insurance, prize, ransom, salvage; and all the laws of the sea, now extant, originating since the Phœnician mariner first spread his purple pennon to the light breeze of the Levant; or, more adventurous, drove, with oar and sail, his foaming prow out between the pillars of Hercules. 6th. The constitution, laws, and treaties, of the United States, are the supreme law of the land, notwithstanding the constitution and laws of any or all the several States, may conflict with them. Such a judge must, therefore, have studied the laws of every State, so far as they are to be compared with the laws, or treaties, or constitution, of the United States. 7th. Cases where a State is a party, come before the Supreme Court originally; but States may be made parties where citizens of the same State litigate land titles derived from different States; a judge of the Supreme Court is, therefore, bound to know all the land laws of such cases, as well in these Western States, as all others in the Union. 8th. Questions between States are of original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court. A judge of that court must, therefore, know all that relates to original charter, or boundary law of each State, as well as all confirming or conflicting State law, or adjudication, on all such questions as may come before him, on trial between such high contending parties. How, sir, shall he make himself master of all these various, and almost innumerable laws? Why, sir, truly, not so much from the practice of courts, or conversation with men, as from books; from his twenty years' conversation with these great, and, though silent, yet communicative masters of the treasured erudition of past ages. Can he not, then, sir, learn what it may further befit him to know, of other laws, in the same manner, and by the same diligence? Can he not learn this, also, from books? What is it? Why, sir, the statute alteration of the common law in each State, and their court adjudications upon such statutes. These are all contained in their books, or in the records of such decisions. These nine States have no lex non scripta; no local common law: for the oldest of them is not forty, and the youngest not five years of age; and no usage can have grown up among them into the strength and vigor of common law, in any time less than that, "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

This bill proposes to increase the Supreme Court, originally six, but now seven, by adding three new judges, and making the whole number ten. Can this, sir, be constitutionally done? All supreme judicial power is now lodged in the Supreme Court. What judicial power have you, then, sir, to confer on your three new judges? Circuit Court power you certainly have; for all inferior courts are within your control; but all the supreme judicial power is already vested, and no part of it can be taken away. The Supreme Court is a whole, in all its parts, its properties, its extension, its relations. Have you the power to alter it? How, then, can you add to it? Or is it that wonderful entity which addition to it does not increase, or which, multiplied any number of times by itself, would continue to be the same? We shall all acknowledge, sir, that Congress cannot require, by law, the President to select a judge of the Supreme Court from any particular district or part of the United States; but Congress can create a court inferior to the Supreme Court, and, among the legal qualifications of the judge, insert an inhabitancy or residence within his territorial jurisdiction. This may be the Circuit Court. If, sir, you then annex the office of such a circuit judge to that of a judge of the Supreme Court, you require, by law, the President to select a judge of the Supreme Court from a limited and designated district of the United States; that is to say, from the territorial jurisdiction of such circuit judge. The constitutional power of the Supreme Court is vested in the majority of that court; whatever shall change this relative proportion to the whole number of the number creating that majority, must change the vested power of that court, and must, for that reason, be unconstitutional; but four, the majority of six, is two-thirds of that court; whereas, six, the majority of ten, is less than two-thirds of that court. Making the number of judges ten, is, therefore, altering the power of the court, vested in two-thirds thereof, and giving it to a lesser proportionate number.

What, then, sir, the advocates of the system of the bill may ask—What shall be done? The opposers of it are prepared for the interrogatory: Adopt the system recommended by the resolution. Restore the constitution. Trace out, and fill up, the great judiciary map of 1789; revise, and correct, and establish, the constitutional lines of the law of 1801. We are told, sir, by the gentleman from Illinois, that the experience of a single year overthrew that system. Was, then, the system of 1801 overthrown by experience? As well might the honorable gentleman tell us that brick, and granite, and marble, are improper materials for houses, and palaces, and temples; because experience has taught us, that, at some times, and in some places, earthquakes have overthrown and demolished such buildings. "It was," says the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, "repealed in one year in toto." Was it because that, or the law on which it was founded, was "enacted in the hurried session of the summer of 1789?" Because it was built on false analogies, or contained awkward provisions? That session, sir, was begun on the 4th of March, and ended on the 24th of September. In this session, of somewhat more than six months, those illustrious men enacted twenty-seven laws, and passed three resolutions. Was this hurried legislation? Why, sir, many a Congress, since that period, putting no extraordinary vigor or hasty effort to the work, have, in less time, sent into the world a legislative progeny of from two to three hundred laws, great and little. What have we now, sir, valuable, or of probable durability, and which was not produced by that Congress, at that session? The Fiscal, the Foreign, the War, the Naval, and the Judicial Department, were then, and by those men, founded, erected, and finished. These great national edifices have stood, and I trust will continue to stand: for, when the vandalism of faction shall demolish them, we shall cease to be a nation. Later times, it is true, have added, now and then, a piece of tiling, or a patch of paint; and the nation has put itself to costs upon the interior garniture of them, the drapery, and other various ornament and accommodation: but, otherwise, these valuable edifices are nearly as old, as unaltered, and quite as venerable, as the constitution itself. "Awkward provisions and false analogies," do we call any part of the Judiciary act of that session? It was, sir, indited by the Ellsworths and Hamiltons of those times—men, whose political little finger was larger than the loins of politicians in these degenerate days. Why, sir, do not men who know, tell us boldly for what cause the Judiciary law of 1801 was repealed? Men of candor—and I trust, sir, such men are in great numbers here—will all agree that party overthrew that system. Why disguise it? Those unhappy days are past, and we are indeed now all "brothers of the same principle." What was not demolished in those inconsiderate times? The National Bank, the Army, the Navy, Fortifications—almost all that told the understanding, or the eye, that we are one—tumbled into ruins in the shock of that tremendous political earthquake. Coming years brought better feelings and sounder reasonings; and men have profited of their experience, and re-edified all that was most valuable: The Bank, the Army, the Navy, the system of Fortifications; and we are again a nation. Our fortresses on the ocean and on the land, look out from many a hundred iron eye, ready with indignation to blaze annoyance and destruction against hostile approach. Why, sir, do you not follow this enlightened experience in your Judiciary? The very Turk or Tartar, though he demolish the palace and temple of classical antiquity, yet will he draw from the ruins materials for his stable and his seraglio. He who does not profit by that of others, stands in the next rank of fatuity to him who is a fool in spite of his own experience.

The system of the bill, sir, cannot, it is agreed that it cannot, endure: for circuits will become too numerous to add a new judge to the Supreme Judicial Court for each new circuit. We are told in reply, that we should not legislate for posterity: "let posterity take care of itself." In what country, in what house, are we, sir, told this? Did the Pilgrims, the Bradfords, the Williamses, the Penna, the Smiths, migrate to this country, for themselves, and not for posterity? Look out upon our American world: not a Government was instituted; not a forest felled; not a city founded; not a house built; not a tree planted; and not for posterity. Where, and what should we have been, but for those who cared for posterity? This house, sir, the great model of art and taste; the pride and ornament of our country, and of the republican world; the magnificent forum of legislation; the hallowed temple of justice—this house, sir, was it built for us, and for the present generation only? No, sir, it was founded by that man whose name spreads the light of glory over our nation, and whose whole life was but one act for his country—for the world, and for posterity. "Let posterity take care of itself!" To a gentleman who could feel and utter such a sentiment, I would address the words of the bereaved Macduff: "He hath no children."

Mr. KERR, expressing a desire to address the House on the amendment, moved an adjournment.

Mr. WEBSTER hoped he would withdraw the motion, as the discussion had already been so much protracted. But Mr. K. not complying, the question was put and carried—ayes, 83, noes 81. So the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 24.

Judiciary System.

The House proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was, the resolution offered by Mr. MERRICK to recommit the bill "further to amend the Judicial system of the United States," with instructions to report it with certain amendments thereto, as heretofore stated.

The question being taken, without debate, on this motion, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved that the bill be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KERR now entered the House, (having been previously accidentally detained from it,) and addressed the Chair as follows:

He said, that he felt admonished by the vote on the question of adjournment, yesterday, after their latest hour of business had passed away, that he must, with all brief and plain conveniency, express the opinions which he held in relation to the important subject of debate. It had struck him that, if it were important at all, that the discussion should be continued, it was rather an unfavorable opportunity for the delivery of an argument in his plain way, after the delighted attention of the House had been so long enchained by the eloquent illustrations of the gentleman from Rhode Island. He said he had now no other apology to offer, for presenting himself before the House, but of that kind which was adopted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on Saturday; that, on all subjects of general interest, one desires to express his sentiments in his own way, however little he may hope to better the arguments which may have been before used.

Could he flatter himself that he should succeed as well, in giving efficient support to the advocates of the bill, who had preceded him, as that gentleman was believed by many to have done to its opponents, he should proceed with great alacrity. While the bill was discussed in the Committee of the Whole, he felt disposed to listen to others, and more particularly to the proofs and arguments of the members from the West; but, since the resolution last offered by the gentleman from Virginia, for a recommitment of the bill, with the instructions proposed, had been before the House, he had viewed the question which it involved as one of the highest interest to every portion of the country; as a most hazardous experiment to prostrate the whole fabric of the Judiciary, and to build it up in a new form, and of new materials. On these grounds, though with great diffidence, he was induced to offer himself before the House. He approved wholly of the bill upon the table, and would advocate it in all its parts, not only as affording the best remedy for existing evils, but as calculated to confirm and fix what he considered the fit and proper Judicial system for these United States; an establishment which had been raised up by some of the first founders of the Government, and which ought, in his opinion, to be still preserved. He approved the bill as a remedy for existing evils, and as preserving, as he conceived, the vital principles of our Judicial establishment. He would endeavor to maintain the doctrines, by discussing and refuting, as far as he was able, some of the objections which had been offered against the bill.

On the decision of this question, said he, hangs the destiny of that great co-ordinate branch of Government, the Judiciary of the United States. Whatever apprehensions may be felt or affected, in relation to the tendencies which this bill may give to it, in the future exercise of its high functions, if you substitute for it the scheme proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, I venture to assert that you will endanger the constitution and the Judicial system, in the very manner which has been imputed to the operation of this bill. The question is not now between this House and the people of the West, claiming an extension of Judicial means to clear their accumulated dockets; but it is, What shall be, hereafter, our permanent system of judicature, in form and character? We cannot, at this time of day, fulfil the injunctions of the constitution, or the solemn declaration, by the people of the United States, with which it is prefaced, that one of its primary objects was "to establish justice," without extending the system in the manner prescribed by this bill. The question is, therefore, no longer, Whether the interests of the Western States require the passage of the bill—whether they shall have a greater or less share in the benefits of the system given to them? But whether it be not now necessary, and the bounden duty of the Legislature, while calm and composed, and having a view to the immense growth of the country, to fix and establish a permanent system, with a view to the respective rights and interests of all the States, and of every class and denomination of suitors, falling within its jurisdiction? It was with a view to such inquiries he was induced to offer the present remarks.

In the first place, he would inquire if the present system can be so extended as to ensure the objects in view? He had reference now to a particular extension, with a view to meet present exigencies.

In the last short view, taken by the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, his statement was, that, as the States west and south, beyond the mountains, could not be reconciled but by having the Circuit Judges extended to them, the committee had proposed such an entire plan as they thought would suit the convenience of all. Less than ten judges, the honorable Chairman of the committee had said, would not answer the purpose; but by classing the States for circuits, as they had done in the bill, the system would be perfected, and might remain adequate for twenty or even fifty years. With great deference, Mr. K. expressed his conviction that, if the bill should pass now, so as to satisfy the present wants of the country, it would not only answer all purposes for the period supposed; but, by a similar extension, and an addition at some future time—say of two more judges—in any, the most expanded views of our increasing population and legal business, the system would continue to be adequate to its ends for one hundred years. He, therefore, accorded fully with the views of the committee, and considered the plan of extension the true one; because it gives permanency to the system, and recognizes and fixes the vital principle of a union of the courts.

The motion which had been made to recommit, with instructions, had been founded on two objections, which go against the whole system of the bill: it was objected, in the first place, that the Supreme Court would be too numerous; and secondly, that it was inconvenient and dangerous to keep it united with the Circuit Courts, and to require the judges to sit in both. In relation to the first objection, he was aware of the theory, in which it was generally maintained, that the number of judges who were to decide, in any judicial forum, should not be too numerous, because the tumult inseparable from large assemblies, is inconsistent with the patience and attention requisite to judicial investigation; and that when judges were numerous, they divide the shame of an unjust decision, and take shelter from responsibility under the example of each other, and that, therefore, they ought to be so few at most, as that the conduct of each may be conspicuous to public observation. He knew that these were the theoretic grounds of writers on this subject, but he said, if we would apply those theoretic rules to our system, and the provisions of the bill, it would be found that none of them would be contravened. A body of ten or twelve judges, secluded from the world, with all the means of legal light before them, study a subject and form their opinions deliberately, each for himself. They meet and consult together, and compare those opinions, and then deliver their judgments in open court. There is no excitement to passion—no cause of tumult—no agitating contests by open argument with one another, as in larger bodies, differently constituted. When a judge takes up a subject, if it be a sheer point of law, there can be no excitement of passion from it. When the case involves evidence and proof, he attends coolly to that evidence; and he decides, in the one case or in the other, according to the law and the fact. In the exercise of the duties of such a tribunal, there cannot be any greater danger of tumultuary movements, or of intemperance of passion, when the body consists of ten or twelve judges, than when it is reduced to five or six. On a bench of ten or twelve judges, each is as conspicuous in the public eye, and as obnoxious to public scrutiny, as if there were only five or six. If you wish to pin them down to responsibility, you have only to make each judge deliver his opinion; he is then fairly before the public, and will be held responsible for the decision in which he concurs.

There was, he said, no magic number, in which only, wisdom and discretion reside. The only objection is, that a tumultuary body is not favorable to calm investigation, and that passion or party feeling would be likely to enter into a court composed of ten individuals. Try this question by the test of reason, and by the touchstone of common sense, and you will find that each member may as deliberately give his opinion and be as well made responsible for it, on a bench of ten or twelve, as in one of any less number of judges. There was really, he said, no danger in the increase. Conjure with the numbers three, five, seven, or twelve, and you will find the largest equally favorable with the rest to cool discussion and deliberate judgment.

On the other hand, we shall derive evident advantages from an increase of judges. We have occasion to concentrate as much learning and talent upon the bench as possible. As reason forbids the apprehension of tumultuary feeling in a body of ten or twelve judges, let experience teach us where we may be obliged to stop, and let us not, from imaginary fears or notions, forego the advantages of the increase of number contemplated and secured by the bill, which is calculated to establish a permanent system. He said the experience of other countries came in aid. In England, the twelve judges adjourn into the Exchequer Chamber, discuss and decide important points, or such as have created a division in either of the Superior Courts; they deliberate and discuss those points, but no inconvenience results from their number; no danger of passion was ever apprehended, and their Judicial establishment has stood on the firmest foundation. On writs of error to the House of Lords, when summoned there, on important questions, they give their opinions seriatim, and settle the law; for the Lords abide by their decision, and affirm or reverse accordingly. The twelve judges thus decide with as much expedition and convenience as five or six would do. He had understood, too, that the Judicial system of Scotland was entitled to high consideration. It was said they had a celebrated bench of judges, and that the system was an object of admiration; and yet, on the Scotch bench, there were fifteen judges. When we are asked, then, where we are to stop? He would answer, at the point where danger commences. The vast power conferred by the constitution on the Supreme Court, of deciding on the constitutionality of the laws of Congress, and of the States, was, he thought, a fair reason for making them more numerous, than for the mere purposes of decisions in Bank in the other cases within their jurisdiction.

If, then, in theory, ten or twelve judges are not too many, nor inconsistent with sound deliberation, and since that number will be necessary and sufficient to carry into effect all the purposes of judicature, you ought not to regard the suggestions of imaginary dangers when such great objects are to be secured. In relation to our Judicial establishment, he considered the itinerary character of the judges the life-blood of the system, as it gives them opportunities of intercourse with the people, the judges, and the bar, in different States. Their connection with the inferior tribunals affords them the most effective means of improvement and experience, and, at the same time will best preserve them pure and upright. It qualifies them with a more enlightened understanding of many important objects of their jurisdiction. By their circuit duties they are enabled to understand the local laws, and their mental faculties are kept in continual exercise. The practical construction of local laws is difficult to acquire; it is necessary, to that end, to acquire a knowledge of French and Spanish laws, and of the civil law, to enable him who presumes to take a seat in the Supreme Court, to acquaint himself to the public satisfaction. How is this kind of knowledge to be acquired? Not merely in the closet, but by attending the circuits, and deciding causes in different sections of the Union. Without the performance of these practical duties, it is scarcely possible for a judge to acquire the information that is necessary.

Judiciary System.

There is, however, another advantage, and that of no little moment. In a Government founded on opinion, it is necessary that the people should be satisfied with judicial decisions. In the course of performance of their circuit duties, in different States, judges mingle in the society, and get a knowledge of the people, and become alike known to them. Coming from different parts of the Union, the judges bring together a fund of local knowledge, which enables them to decide with confidence, and to the public satisfaction. It is necessary that they should stand pure and upright before the people, if they would have their decisions received with respect. On the circuit, a Judge of the Supreme Court stands conspicuous in the public eye, and is personally responsible for his own judgments; he knows that if he makes odious or corrupt decisions, they will be carried to the Supreme tribunal, where he must answer, no only to his brethren on the bench, but to the whole nation, for his errors. If, on the contrary, he is seen to decide according to just and correct principles, purely and intelligently, he acquires high personal consideration, and the estimation in which his character is held by the people, gives weight to his decisions. It is this kind of intercourse of Judges of the Superior Courts in England, with the bar and the people, on the circuits, which has preserved to them a high reputation for practical learning and prompt decision, and rendered so famous the judicial system of that country. Mr. K. said he had no particular knowledge of the judiciary establishments of other States, though he might have access to them, and see their outlines in the several constitutions; but the changes which they underwent from time to time, rendered them but doubtful authorities. He knew, however, that in Maryland, twenty years ago, the courts were separate and distinct, and there was no union between the appellate and the inferior jurisdiction. They had three distinct judicial tribunals—a County Court, a General Court, and a Court of Appeals, with a small number of judges in each, and without the principle of uniting the Judges of the Supreme Court by circuit duties within the County Courts, in the trial of causes. But the subject was much discussed in the Legislature, and it was determined to be important that the judges should have opportunities of intercourse with one another; that the chief judges of the County Courts, where all causes, civil and criminal, were to be tried, should form the Appellate Court, and thus, by a constant exercise of their faculties in the trial of causes on circuits, as well as by imparting to one another all the lights of their knowledge and experience, when they should sit together in the Supreme Court, the whole community would derive an equal benefit from the Judicial establishment, and uniformity of decision would prevail. This system has borne the test of twenty years' experience, and is still most approved.

Our judges, when they have decided causes below, have opportunities, when they meet in the Supreme Court, of explaining to one another the grounds of their decisions; though any one judge is forbidden to sit on the appeal from his own decision below. It has been remarked by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there was a better chance of justice when the judge who tried the cause did not sit on the appeal. It is, at least, an advantage that he be permitted to explain, in some way, the grounds of his decision. It has been the practice in England for the same judges, from whom the case is adjourned, to re-argue it in the Exchequer Chamber, and give their opinions again seriatim. So, on a writ of error from the Court of King's Bench to the House of Lords, the judges of the court from which the case is brought, give their opinions as well as the rest. This now, I learn, has become the practice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and a judge is not there excused from sitting on an appeal from his own decision below.

A constitutional objection had been raised to the union of the Judges of the Supreme Court with the Circuits. It is said not to have been in the view of the constitution that the Supreme Judges should perform Circuit duties—nay, it is alleged to be contrary to the constitution. He held clearly the opposite opinion: for the Congress of 1789, who framed the Judiciary Act, were contemporary with the constitution, and their interpretation of it, maintained ever since by practice and acquiescence under it, is too strong to be shaken. He would refer to a decision in the Supreme Court in which the question was held to be thus settled, and at rest. It is the case of Stuart against Laird, in 1st Cranch's Reports.

He had no doubt that it was the express view of the men who first carried the constitution into effect, that the system of a connection of the courts should prevail. They took the hint of the itinerary character of the Supreme Judges from the English system, though the gentleman from Massachusetts supposes they mistook the analogy. It is true, as he has stated the difference, the English judges at Nisi Prius had only to try causes, by the aid of a jury, on pleadings and issues settled in the court from whence the record came; whereas, our Circuit Judges take the suit by their original jurisdiction, through all stages, and to final judgment. If it was necessary and advantageous in England, that their judges should exercise Circuit duties, it was still more important in this country. The same reason for it, operates here as in England, but with greater force. It is important to keep them employed. The maxim has been well expressed by a gentleman in the debate: "A judge should be altogether a judge."

The people who have business in the inferior courts, do not desire appeals: nothing but gross injustice, or immense interests, can induce them to go up to the Supreme Court, to incur great costs and expenses. It is, therefore, most important that the Supreme Judges should go to the Circuits, and impart the light of their learning and experience, to settle important cases, and by a constant exercise of their faculties, be kept the more ready to decide the great causes in the Supreme tribunal. He concurred, entirely, in the opinion, that, if those judges were relieved from the circuit duties, and confined to Washington, in the exercise of their functions, where they would never be seen but by lawyers and idle spectators, they would, in a few years, become indolent, and lose their dignity and influence in the eyes of the nation. They will fall into a natural indulgence in the ordinary literary pursuits, or other occupations. Remember, you cannot always enjoy the services of the present Judges of your Supreme Court. A succession of younger men must be placed upon the bench, practised, indeed, in the inferior courts, but having much to learn before they will be fully competent to the arduous duties and responsibility of Supreme Judges—before they will be able to command, for their decisions, the public confidence and satisfaction. It is here, also, that when the judges shall have sunk in indolence, they will become objects of suspicion. While they go abroad amongst the people, in the vigorous exercise of their functions, they are objects of constant admiration and esteem. Under the operation of this system, he believed the present bench had become so illustrious in reputation.

It is said that these judges will form a Governmental Court. How? Are they not independent? Do they not go forth, freed of all shackles from the power by which they are appointed? They will feel that their only chance for happiness and fame is in the preservation of their characters. If a judge will take bribes, there is end of argument on theory: but there are no honors so great as he may obtain by a faithful discharge of his high duties. He can derive no benefit from the power which has appointed him. The moment he receives his patent, and is created a judge, he becomes as great as his creator; and, therefore, needs not to turn, as one gentleman has poetically said, in this debate, like the sunflower to its god.

It has been alleged, by a gentleman from New York, that, by the exercise of this power of increasing the number of judges, we may render them dependent on the Legislature; for, whenever a decision is made that is obnoxious to this House, we have only to create more judges, and thereby subvert the decision. The gentleman forgot that the appointing power was not in this body, but with the other branch of Government. To say, then, that these judges will be influenced by local or sectional views, or feelings, and so get up a faction in the Supreme Court; and, at the same time, to express alarm, lest Executive influence should blast the wholesome character of the court, and lead it into plans of Federal aggrandizement and consorted power, involved an inconsistency, which he could not unravel or understand. To show that the Judiciary Department itself, independently of the influences of different kinds which had been imputed, would not be likely to attempt encroachments on the legislative power or the State sovereignties, he read a paper from the "Federalist," a work, he said, written by men who had a chief hand in raising up this Government; and which, with a prophetic spirit, had foretold the operations of the constitution. This extension of the Judicial system would neither endanger the other co-ordinate branches of Government, nor incur any danger from them. The Judiciary itself, he said, had nothing but a strong moral power to support itself in the exercise of its legitimate functions. Yet it was this part of the system, which would secure and save the rest. He likened its place in the constitution, to the steerage of a ship. The helm is secured by rudder-bands, admirably contrived. It was only requisite to keep up a succession of skilful and experienced pilots, and there would be no danger from the dashing of the wild-popular wave; and their steady watchfulness would detect and ward off any secret approaches of the decoying fingers of Executive corruption.

Mr. K. professed not to be, at this time, enlightened enough to know how far, since the period of their meeting there, gentlemen had permitted themselves to be classed as the partisans or opponents of this administration. Old parties (he thanked God!) were done away, and the caution, which had been attributed by the gentleman from North Carolina, to the gentleman from Massachusetts—if, indeed, the coiled adder lay in the ashes of the act of 1801—had been prudently observed by him. This case had been fairly and properly discussed. He expressed his hope that the bitter feeling of former conflicts would be allowed to repose forever; and he should be equally happy, in seeing that the turbulence of new party feelings should be long repressed. It surely would not comport with the dignity of the House—because the ancient feuds of the Montagues, and the Capulets, had subsided—that they should manifest an impatience to place themselves in the humble attitude of the retainers, or sworn enemies of the New Prince upon the throne, (as gentlemen have been pleased to express it.)

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, one of the champions of the old Federal faith, in his calm and dignified manner, had given out to them the proper view of their duty, in this new political crisis, as it was called, and of the fair ground of mutual conciliation; and that simply was, when the measures of Government conform to the true interests of the nation, we should give it a cordial and steadfast support.

Congress of Panama.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. K. did not see the occasion for the direful forebodings thrown out the other day in debate, that this nation must, ere long, be shaken to its centre! He thought that no nation had ever arrived at a period of so high and well-founded anticipations of glorious prosperity and permanent happiness, as the present generation have before them. They had every thing to hope, and, if they were true to themselves, but little to fear. To the Judiciary, Mr. K. looked, for restraining every branch of this Government, as well as the State sovereignties, within those orbits which, by the common agreement and mutual concessions of the whole people, had been assigned to them. He prayed that it might be permitted to remain on that solid foundation on which the noble fabric had so long rested. By the provisions of the bill upon the table, no demolition of it was intended. It would be preserved entire, in its general plan and elevation, and a new arrangement only, of some of its apartments, was designed, to suit the increase of the great family. Its symmetry, and the solidity of its foundations, would be neither defaced nor disturbed. He begged, then, that the House would reject the scheme of any fanciful architect, who would raze it to the ground and erect it anew. Mr. K. concluded, by thanking the House for their polite attention, being sensible that, from the embarrassment incidental to his novel situation, he must have delivered a very disjointed argument.

WEDNESDAY, January 25.

Judiciary System.

The House then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the bill "further to extend the Judicial system of the United States."

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the bill be ordered to a third reading—when

Mr. BARTLETT renewed the motion which he had yesterday made and withdrawn, to recommit the bill to the Judiciary Committee, with the following instructions:

"So as to provide that the several District Courts of the United States shall be required to perform such part of the duties which are now devolved upon the Circuit Courts, as shall render but one term of the Circuit Court necessary in each District annually, and that a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall be required to hold one term of the Circuit Court in each District, in each year."

On this motion, he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Before the yeas and nays were taken—

Mr. MERCER moved that the further consideration of the said bill be postponed to the second Monday in December next.

The yeas and nays were taken on Mr. MERCER's motion to postpone, and were, yeas 45; nays 151.

So the House refused to postpone the bill.

The yeas and nays were next taken on the motion of Mr. BARTLETT to recommit the bill with instructions, as before stated, and were, yeas 46; nays 144.

The question was at length taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. Mr. EDWARDS, of N. C., called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and taken accordingly, yeas 132; nays 59.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 31.

Congress of Panama.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. METCALFE, calling on the President of the United States for the correspondence inviting this Government to take part in the Congress of Panama, was taken up.

Mr. FORSYTH asked whether this resolution was strictly in order; inasmuch as it appeared to be the same in substance with one which had been offered some days ago, on this subject, by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER said he could not decide, until the other resolution should be read.

The resolution of Mr. HAMILTON was then read, together with that of Mr. METCALFE.

Mr. HAMILTON's resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House, copies of all such documents, or parts of correspondence, (not incompatible with the public interest to be communicated,) relating to an invitation which has been extended to the Government of this country 'by the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, to join in the deliberations of the Congress, to be held at the Isthmus of Panama,' and which has induced him to signify to this House that 'Ministers on the part of the United States, will be commissioned to join in those deliberations.'"

The CHAIR decided that the two resolutions were, in substance, the same.

Mr. METCALFE then observed, that he had not been aware that his resolution, from its similarity, would be out of order. He had, however, no partiality to the particular form, provided the subject were brought before the attention of the House. He, therefore, moved to take up the resolution of Mr. Hamilton: and the question of consideration being put, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said, that he had not risen for the purpose of objecting to the resolution, but merely to obtain information. He wished to know what end the mover proposed to attain. He understood that this subject was now before the Senate: [Mr. M. was here called to order by the Chair, it being contrary to rule to refer to business pending in the other branch of the Legislature.] He wanted to know of what use this information would, at present, be to the House? If, at a subsequent period, we shall be called upon to make any appropriations for this mission, it may be proper enough to ask for this correspondence; but, at present, he could see no use in it. He hoped the honorable gentleman would give him some light.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he certainly had no right to find fault with the gentleman from Kentucky, for transferring his affections from his own bantling in favor of his. He owed it to the House, after all that had been said, and after the special reference to himself yesterday, briefly to explain the reasons why he had not, before this time, called up the consideration of this resolution. And here he must be permitted to remark, that when he read, or heard read, in the President's message, that he proposed to send Commissioners to join in the deliberations of the Congress of Panama, he was led to conclude, from the character of our Government, that a measure so new, (he would not call it a startling novelty, as he did not intend to commit himself, at least at this time, by any expression of opinion,) that a proposition so portentously interesting to the foreign relations of the country, would have been contemporaneously communicated to this House with the message which was sent to the Senate, because it was rather to be considered as a national, than an Executive measure; and as it might involve, ultimately, the most important considerations. When, however, he found this was not to be the course of the Executive, he had submitted the resolution, under an impression that the sooner the information could be had the better. On the day on which its consideration was in order, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations was so kind as to seek him, in order to state that he had communicated with the Secretary of State, and that the information desired would come here at the proper time, and in due season.

The gentleman from Georgia, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, advised him not to press the consideration of the resolution, as it might be regarded as a violation of a proper feeling of delicacy to the President. Convinced of the kindness of the counsel of the gentleman, he was induced to suspend the call; and he was not displeased to find, that, among gentlemen supposed to enjoy the confidence of the Executive, the suspension was approved of; and that they considered it above all things, especially injurious, as seriously violating precedent and practice, to call up a consideration of this kind, while an Executive measure was pending in—another building, which shall be nameless—not, however, more than three hundred feet distant from this. He, accordingly, gave notice that the consideration of the resolution was suspended, and that he would probably call it up at some future period. He found, however, some change of sentiment, after the lapse of three weeks. Some of those individuals, having the confidence of the Administration, who had at first supposed that it might be violating the rules of decorum, to the President, to press it at that time, now thought that it might be acted upon with safety: that the measure was now right and proper: that we ought to have this information at once. Intimations of this sort he had, in conversation, received from some of those gentlemen, whom he had reason to believe enjoyed, in an especial manner, the confidence and regard of the Administration: and it was not a little singular that they were communicated to him precisely at that time when the gazettes of this city had ventured to inform the public that this splendid project had elsewhere encountered serious embarrassment. He appealed to this as a piece of contemporary history, as he would to any fact in Hume, or any other historian, and hoped he would not be considered as violating any rule of order on the subject. To those gentlemen, whose scruples in regard to that comity which is due to the Executive, had been so shortly repressed, he could not but reply, that, if the objection was originally sound, that the passage of the resolution would violate a proper decorum towards the Executive, it came now with redoubled force when the subject was before a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, under auspices to which it was not his province now to refer; but which would, nevertheless, be fully understood by the House: and that, by getting up a popular discussion at this time, in this House, on a subject pending elsewhere, might wear the appearance of our intending to act and re-act, through public opinion, on the deliberations of another body.

These were the reasons which he had avowed in declining to act on suggestions which were unexpected, at least in the quarter from which they came.

Mr. H. said, in making this explanation in regard to the cause of the uninterrupted slumber of his resolution, he candidly confessed he felt indifferent what direction the House might give to it, as they had been pleased to take the resolution out of his own hands. He would not be responsible for it any longer, as the discussion of it at this time was not of his seeking.

Mr. WEBSTER would trouble the House with but a single word. He hoped that this resolution would pass. So far as he knew, the gentleman from South Carolina might have stated very correctly what occurred, but he appeared to him to have given very little explanation of the delay which had taken place; and he now thought, after the lapse of so much time, that the House might, without any imputation of disrespect, ask to be informed in relation to a great public measure, that might make it essential for this House to perform some important act of legislation. An honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MINER,) had laid on the table an affirmative resolution, expressive of the opinion of this House in relation to the policy that ought to be pursued toward the South American States; and particularly as to the contemplated mission to Panama. It was true, that the subject of our foreign relations had a more close connection with the other branch of the Legislature than with this House ; but, in all matters which related to expense growing out of those relations, the House has important duties to perform. It does not, at present, know the facts of this case ; and, therefore, without the least reference to what had been done, or was doing, elsewhere, he thought that this House, as well as the public, might choose to be informed of the true state of facts with regard to this correspondence.

Congress of Panama.

At the request of Mr. POWELL, the resolutions of Mr. MINER were then read, as follows :

"Resolved, That the people of the United States have viewed, with deep and anxious solicitude, the exertions of the people of the several States in the southern part of this continent, to secure the inestimable privileges of independence and self-government : that they have seen the proofs exhibited of their fortitude, patriotism, and valor, with admiration, and beheld the success with which a gracious Providence hath crowned their arms, with gratitude and delight.

"Resolved, That, as it accords alike with the generous and spontaneous wishes of this people, and the soundest maxims of policy, that the most perfect harmony of feeling and intercourse should be cherished among all the American nations, the principles of whose Governments are founded in an acknowledgment of the equal rights of man, the appointment of Ministers to the proposed Congress of Panama, is a measure dictated by wisdom and propriety ; and provision ought to be made, by law, to defray any expenses that may result therefrom."

Mr. FORSYTH (the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations) rose to address a few observations to the Chair on this resolution. By the adoption of a resolution of this sort, it would be ascertained, certainly, that the information called for is believed by the House, to be of a character which the public interest requires to be before it. But, Mr. F. said, a resolution of this sort implies something more than that. Such a resolution is either founded on the belief that the President of the United States does not intend to furnish this information, or on the belief that it is unnecessarily delayed by the President. Apply these observations to the resolution now before us. Gentlemen would recollect the statement that I had the honor to make the other day, that the President of the United States intends to send this information to the House. Do the honorable gentlemen, then, who are pressing this resolution on the House, mean to say that this information has been improperly delayed ? Do they mean to say to the people of the United States, we cannot wait for the decision of the question by the Executive, as to the propriety of the time at which this information ought to be laid before the House ? The obligations of official courtesy, said Mr. F., require that we should not present ourselves in this aspect to the people of the United States, calling in question the disposition of the President of the United States, to lay before this House information which he has declared his intention to lay before them.

Still, Mr. F. said, if this resolution was pressed, he should vote for it ; because he would not, on the ground of courtesy to the Chief Magistrate, vote against a call for any information which members of this House might think necessary to enable them to discharge their public duties. But he trusted that, in this case, the House would do no such thing as to make the call. The information proposed to be called for, is to bear on the great question of an appropriation for Ministers to Panama. Is such an appropriation asked of us ? said Mr. F. Will it be ? Suppose the information be received and discussed, and we resolve to make an appropriation for Ministers—does this affect the object of appointing such Ministers ? That depends on another Department of the Government. The information to be elicited by this resolution may have an indirect influence—it may operate on public opinion, and, through it, on the other branches of the Government. It can be of use in no other way. Now, Mr. F. said, no Commissioners have been appointed : none can be, without the concurrence of another branch of the Executive, and another branch of the Legislature. Why discuss the propriety of an appropriation for this purpose, when no persons had been appointed for whom the appropriation could be intended ? Mr. F. said he had made these observations from a sense of duty. Yet, he said, the pressing this resolution at this time, placed him and the House in an awkward situation. He could hardly suppose that the gentlemen from Kentucky or Massachusetts wished to do anything uncourteous towards the Administration of the country. Believing they had no such wish, he could not vote upon this resolution, without first ascertaining whether it was the sense of the House that it should be pressed to a decision at this time. Wishing to allow to every gentleman an opportunity to express freely his views of the question, he should not now make the motion to try that question, but would do so before a final vote was taken on the resolution.

Mr. MALLARY then observed, that he did not know what policy was likely to be injured by passing the resolution. He was not aware that it would betray a want of the proper decorum which ought always to regulate the acts of co-ordinate branches of the Government towards each other. The President, at the commencement of the session, had stated, in his message to the House, that he had received an invitation to send Ministers to the Congress at Panama. Mr. M. thought that the information now desired was called for by various considerations. None could think that the asking of it would wound the feelings of the Executive. All admitted that the information was of great importance ; and much inquiry had been excited among the members of the House, why the gentleman from South Carolina had not called up his resolution. Everybody was anxious to see the correspondence to which it related. What ulterior measures were to grow out of it, none could, at this moment, so much as prophesy: nor was it certain that the House would act upon it in any way whatever. The gentleman from South Carolina had said that it was to lay the foundation for an appropriation of money for the sending out of a Minister. For his own part, he knew nothing of this: but if the information was important, he wished the House to have it; and, he presumed, if they agreed to this call, that they would get it: unless the President should exert that power which is given him by the constitution to withhold the communication. But ought this House to sit still, and wait till the President shall choose, of his own mere motion, to send them this correspondence? Unless the House expresses its desire to possess it sooner, the President will wait until Executive duty requires him to communicate it. Without, therefore, any regard to what may be going on elsewhere, he should vote for this call, because he believed the information interesting to the country, and that it would be useful to this House as an independent body.

Mr. DWIGHT said, that he should be the last person who would seek to pierce that veil of secrecy which the constitution has thrown around the President and the Senate, when engaged in Executive business. But was the slightest wish to violate that privacy betrayed by this resolution? The President has expressly told us that he has been invited to a great and weighty measure. We ask for information, for the purpose of enlightening our minds with relation to it. With our present knowledge, we are not competent to form any correct judgment on the subject. The resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania commits the House and the nation to an expression of feeling, in relation to this measure: a measure intertwined with some of the best feelings of the American people. We merely ask the President to communicate to us now, that which he has promised to communicate at some time; yet we do not take away from him the exercise of that discretion which the constitution has wisely reserved to the Executive Magistrate.

Mr. CAMBRELENG agreed, entirely, with the gentleman from Massachusetts. He thought the House ought to get all the information on so important a measure, which can be obtained; and when it should be received, he was willing and ready to go as far as any member of this House, in relation to South America. He considered this mission as presenting a great question; and whether they should be called on to decide on the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or to pass an appropriation bill, it was equally important that they should possess the knowledge in question. He had risen for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from South Carolina to strike out that part of the resolution, with which it concludes, in the usual words, "if not incompatible with the public welfare." He thought that, on a question of such vital importance, and one which might possibly involve the future destiny of this country, it was requisite that this House should be put in possession of the whole of the facts on this subject, even to the instructions that might be given to our Commissioner.

Mr. HAMILTON said, before he replied, he wished to know whether the resolution now really belonged to him or to the putative father of it? He consented, however, to the modification proposed by the gentleman from New York, if he had the control of it: and the words were then stricken from the resolution by the Clerk.

Mr. WEBSTER then moved that the words be restored. He said that in all calls for information which is in the possession of the President, it was usual and proper to limit the call, in the first instance, by the insertion of this clause: and it was very obvious that when such a limitation was introduced, the call ought to be made at as early a period in the session as is practicable: and then, if the reply to it does not contain all that gentlemen wish, the residue can be supplied in a confidential communication afterwards: but it was a thing, he believed, entirely without a precedent, to call on the President for all the information in his hands, on a given subject, without leaving it discretionary with him to withhold such part of it as he may suppose the public good forbids to be communicated.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed, in reply, that it was in consequence of a suggestion thrown out from the gentleman from Massachusetts himself, that he had proposed to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) to modify the resolution in the manner which he had done; and he would ask how that gentleman, or any others, could be prepared to vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. MINER,) or how he could tell whether a Minister ought to be sent to Panama, unless he knows what it is intended he shall do when he gets there? If, however, he had rightly understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, he has suggested that the House need not act definitively until it shall have received the whole of the information, by a secret and confidential communication. If such be the understanding between the House and the Executive, he was willing to take the gentleman's amendment. For himself, he was a warm advocate of the South American cause, yet he could not vote understandingly in the present case, until he knew the whole of the grounds on which the nation was to proceed.

Mr. BARNES observed, that it seemed to be conceded on all hands, that the information is to be given, at some time. In his opinion, the time proper for giving it had now arrived, if, indeed, it had not already gone by. The Congress at Panama is already in session. The House may be called upon to make an appropriation for a Minister, and the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means could, he doubted not, bear witness, that bills of appropriation sometimes experience embarrassment and delay.

JANUARY, 1823.]

Congress of Panama.

Hence it was important, that, if we received this information at all, it was desirable we should receive it as early as possible. "If it be well done, 'twere well it were done quickly." All that the House is entitled to ask for, is that which is laid down in the President's Message. [Here he quoted that sentence in the Message which relates to this subject.] He was not of opinion that the House has the right to call for the instructions that may be given to our Minister; having premised this, he would vote for the call.

Mr. WEBSTER wished to say one word, to guard against an inference which appeared to have been drawn from what he had said when last up. He had not spoken of any understanding between the House and the Executive; he had only said, that, if the present call should be made in the ordinary form, and the House, when it receives the answer, shall be of opinion that the President has not communicated all that is desirable, it may make a further call: and if the President shall not have sent a part of the information because he thinks it ought not to be made public, it may then be made the subject of a second and confidential communication.

The amendment, offered by Mr. WEBSTER, was then adopted by the House.

Mr. FLOYD then said, if this was any ordinary call for information, the House would not have been troubled with any remarks of his. He had always consented, and always should consent, to any and every call for information. He had been unwilling to adopt the amendment: he thought that the House ought, at least, to have all the information that can be obtained, if it is to decide on this subject. The question is new to the nation, and to this House; if this amendment shall be sustained in its present form, the President will send us just so much information as he thinks we ought to have; and then, to enable this House to form with dignity, a correct decision, we must conjecture the balance.

But, said Mr. F., I am opposed not only to the amendment, but to the resolution itself. Where is the man, in this whole nation, not excluding the President himself, who can tell what this Congress of Panama will lead to? I, at least, on this subject, shall be allowed to be free from personal feelings towards these people. When, on a former occasion, the whole weight of Executive influence sat (to use the expression of an intelligent gentleman on this floor) like an incubus on the question of acknowledging the independence of the South American States, I was one of those that dared to come in contact with Executive opinion, and vote for the independence of those States. I entertained that opinion then; I entertain the same opinion now, and precisely in the same degree. Sir, I am in favor of this people, and I am in favor of "an American policy." But is this to lead us to all the entangling consequences which may grow out of this Congress? I have understood that this Congress at Panama is intended to be a counterpoise to the Congress at Verona; that, as that Congress has declared that they will bring 1,200,000 bayonets against any people in Europe who shall adopt a set of principles looking towards liberty, this Congress is to declare, that, on the American Continent, no form of Government shall be adopted but a republican form. I will have nothing to do with any such scheme. If you wish to protect the cause of liberty, and of free nations, let us send Ambassadors to these people; let us negotiate treaties with them, as we have begun to do. I have seen the treaties with Mexico, with Guatemala, with Colombia: we all know the provisions of these treaties. This measure was very proper; and, if it is to be extended to the rest, it will be very well. But we, who have enjoyed a free Government for upwards of fifty years, are we to put ourselves, at a Congress, on the same footing with those nations? Are we to engage in a crusade against the Holy Alliance, and plunge ourselves into a war with half Europe, and that, too, on a doubtful question? Are we going to unite ourselves in this alliance, and lend our aid in saying, that, as the tyrants in Europe have declared there shall be no republic on that Continent, we will follow the example, and ordain that no nation on this Continent shall be any thing but a republic? That we will dethrone the Emperor of Brazil, and go to war with any part of the Continent that chooses to have a king to govern it?

Sir, there is another subject which the gentleman from South Carolina ought to have weighed well before he stirred in this matter. Shall we not be told by this Congress that every man on this Continent is entitled to liberty? Shall we not be called on to consult what amount of men and money will be requisite to liberate Porto Rico and Cuba? and to settle what shall be the condition of Hayti? All these subjects will be debated, in full conclave, and will be settled by vote. Does it require the spirit of divination to tell in what situation an American Ambassador will be placed there? One in seven, sir. I suppose, Alta Peru, and the Banda Oriental, for aught I know, will have their Representatives there too. And shall we put the whole happiness of this people at hazard, by committing it to a vote at such a Congress? Yet a gentleman from Maryland tells us that what we do, in this matter, we must do quickly. Yes, sir, "quickly." Sir, is that the way to legislate for ten millions of people, and on such a question as this?

The President tells us he shall send a Minister; and all we have to do, is, to appropriate for his expenses; and when we ask for some little information about it, the gentleman tells us, what we do we must do quickly! Sir, who is here so ignorant as not to know that the Congress of Verona is, in truth, perpetually in session? That the monarchs who compose it are in perpetual correspondence, and have fixed their eyes on the nations of the Southern Continent? Will they shut their eyes to what is done at Panama? Sir, I should like much to know, whether an Ambassador is to be received there.

from the Republic of Hayti? Is this one of the objects in view? Is this Congress to tell the gentleman from South Carolina, and all of us from the Southern States, that "all men are free and equal;" and if you join us to command the Emperor of Brazil to descend from his throne, we shall then turn round to you, and say to the United States, "every man is free; and if you refuse to make them so, we will bring seven republics, in full march, to compel you, in the same manner that, on the other Continent, the Holy Alliance sent their combined armies to march against Naples?"

Sir, I repeat it, I feel as much enthusiasm in the cause of South American liberty, as any man on this floor feels, or can feel; but when I think on the peace and happiness of my own country, I stop short. I would deal out to them the blessing of liberty, and all the other blessings which follow in its train, with a liberal hand—but I am as unwilling that these people should have the control of our interests, as that the King of England should; a gentleman to whom I am not thought to bear any very particular affection. (I bear toward him, however, as much good will as toward the others; and am glad to perceive that, after sixty years of misrule, that Government is beginning to get right in its course of policy.)

Formerly, sir, when a negotiation was proposed by the President of the United States, he first came to this House and ascertained whether the requisite funds would be granted; and then he made the treaty: so Washington did. But, since that day, the treaty-making power has prostrated the constitution; and now, they first make treaties, and then ask us to appropriate the money that is to carry them into effect. Sir, I can see nothing around us but dark, lowering, portentous storms. I am opposed to this whole matter of Panama. But, if we must take the draught, bitter as it is, let us, at least, have light to swallow it; let us have all the information that can be given upon the subject. But, no; we are to go to the President's door, and say, "give us, if you please, what you think it is proper we should have." Sir, are we not fit to be trusted? The language of all these resolutions is the same; and, when I heard the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MINER) read the other day at the Clerk's table, (I was not in the House when it was offered,) it sounded to me like the voice of an old acquaintance. Sir, I have not altered any of my sentiments on the subject of American liberty, and I suppose I may make this open exposition of those sentiments without being exposed to any particular charge of arraying myself against "the administration!" The opinions I oppose, are the squalid and deformed offspring of European politics—let us not adopt them as our children.

Mr. WEBSTER said he hoped the House would discuss this subject in a manner which became the subject. He was unwilling, in this stage of it, to commit himself on the question of the propriety of this mission. If, indeed, he reasoned, as the gentleman from Virginia, who had just taken his seat, appeared to reason, it was very possible he might be led to the same conclusion with him. The gentleman assumes the ground, and then draws his inferences: but this did not appear to him a very conclusive mode of reasoning. It was because he wished to be informed of what the gentleman takes for granted, that he was in favor of the present call for information. The gentleman says there is to be an alliance, offensive and defensive, between all the nations who are to be represented at Panama, and he wishes to know whether we are to be committed to any such alliance? Sir, I wish to know the same thing; and, if it is so, it will be a most material fact as to the judgment I am to form on the whole subject. So the gentleman wishes to know, whether that Congress will acknowledge the Republic of Hayti? I wish to know the same thing; and, therefore, it is that I ask for this information.

As to Hayti, however, I have no hesitation in saying, that I hardly think it can be called independent; nor shall I think so, as long as its present commercial connection with the mother country continues. Sir, the great difference between the gentleman and myself, lies in this: he takes it for granted that these things will happen; I wish to know whether they will happen or not. I feel some doubt on the general question; but it is a question which, after all that has passed, must come before us to be discussed; and I am desirous, that when we discuss it, we shall have as complete a knowledge of facts as circumstances will allow.

Mr. HAMILTON said that nothing could exemplify more strongly the singular relation in which he now stood to the resolution under consideration, than the fact of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) supposing that, in originally offering the resolution, he was impressed with very favorable pre-existing regards for this mission to Panama. He could tell that gentleman that, when he presented the resolution, very different sentiments were imputed to him; and, without committing himself in the slightest degree, he would venture also to tell him that he was as little in love, at first sight, with this proposition, as he was. He would moreover tell him, that, in regard to the peculiar interests, to which he had referred, of that portion of the Union which they represented in common, they would always elicit from him a sensibility and fearless vindication which should not be second even to his own.

That he might not be any longer misunderstood, and his resolution be used by others, as an instrument for their own purposes, if it was in order, he would ask leave to withdraw it.

Mr. DRAYTON observed, that he thought the House should take views of this subject, which were entirely distinct from each other. The first is, what is the object of the resolution? and the next is, what is the time when we are to obtain the information? He should not now undertake to investigate what was the nature, or what were likely to be the effects of the mission to Panama. It was a mission pregnant with important and novel consequences, and unprecedented, as he believed, in the annals of the United States. He did not mean to say, that it was, therefore, an improper mission; he was not inclined to hazard what little reputation he possessed, by attempting, at this time, to say that it was proper or improper; he was without the necessary information, and he could not feel his way in the dark. When he should be able to obtain the requisite knowledge, he should feel himself in circumstances to form a better judgment. The mission, so far as he knew, was without a precedent in the history of this country. Heretofore, Ministers had been sent abroad to settle questions of war, of peace, of navigation, of commerce, or of boundaries and jurisdiction, which had relation to ourselves and the contracting party. But, in this case, from what means we have of determining what is likely to be the consequences of this mission, it may involve us in an alliance in which the United States of North America, and the United Republics of South America, are to be arrayed against the Holy Alliance in Europe. It seems we are expected to interpose in a great contest of liberty against despotism, and that, if we consent to this mission, our doing so will be interpreted into a willingness to sound the tocsin, and declare ourselves prepared to enter the lists against a combined world.

I do not say that these consequences will necessarily result; but I say, when we consider the language of the resolution, which declares that we ought to send Ministers to Panama, it appears probable that some such object is intended; and if so, we ought to be prepared well to consider the consequences.

It may involve us in entangling alliances with a multitude of powers, and presents a number of important and novel considerations. He hoped that we should have all the information which the nature of the case demanded, and that, when we have obtained it, we shall pause and ponder before we act.

To what conclusion we may come, observed Mr. D., I cannot now say; I am not in circumstances to form an opinion; and I have laid down, as a rule to myself, never to form one, until I am in possession of the facts on which it ought to rest. But, because this is a great and a novel question, on which we have to determine, it is peculiarly necessary that we approach its consideration with due caution. This I think we shall not do by attempting, at this time, to press the resolution which has been moved by my colleague. I think, Mr. Speaker, that a due decorum is as necessary to be observed between the several departments of Government, as between private individuals; and that it can never, with propriety, be violated, unless some great occasion should arise, when the liberty and safety of the nation are in jeopardy. That decorum is, in my opinion, violated by the present resolution. The President stated, in his Message to this House, if I recollect his language, (and his language is usually remarkable for its correctness,) that "Ministers would be sent to the Congress at Panama." I understood him as meaning by this, that such was his judgment and desire on this subject; but he qualifies this intimation with the remark that "such Ministers would be instructed to do nothing inconsistent with the neutrality of the United States." Though I am forbidden (and very properly forbidden) by the rules of the House to refer, in debate, to any measure which is pending before the other branch of Congress, I presume I have a right to refer to any Executive act or acts. Now, we all know, that whatever may have been in the contemplation of the Executive, his intention, as to this matter, has not been put into execution. No Ministers have been yet commissioned. We must, however, presume that, in the performance of his high trust, he sent his application, on this subject, to the other branch of the national Legislature, but that it has not yet been acted on there; and we are at liberty to conclude that the reason why it has not there been acted on is, that that body consider it a matter of so much importance, that they require time for deliberation, and have not yet arrived at any conclusion. With these facts before us, I cannot but consider the application which is proposed, as not only uncouth, but as an absolute violation of decorum. On the general object of the resolution, I shall not now enter: I may, or I may not, express an opinion on it, at some future period; but I will, in the mean time, move what appears to me the proper course.

Mr. DRAYTON then moved to lay the resolution on the table, but again withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. TRIMBLE, who said that he saw nothing in the call for information which ought to consume the time of the House. Some questions had formerly been discussed in reference to the South American Republics, and, as well as he could recollect, the calls for information, preceding those discussions, had been made at an early day of each session. Such had been the interest heretofore taken in the welfare of those Republics, that information had, on some occasions, been asked for, without any intention, at the time, to act upon it, or make any further movement. Congress had now been in session nearly two months, and, if he recollected rightly, the House had formerly called for information, and acted upon it at an earlier day. Why delay the call any longer? It is not too soon to make it in the usual and regular course of business. We all wish to see the correspondence; and the nation at large may want to see it as well as ourselves. It is a matter of great public interest, and the will and wishes of the public ought to be consulted. If he was at liberty, on this motion, to con-

ture what the views of the Executive were, as others had done in their remarks, he would not infer, from any thing he had seen, that a mission to the Congress of Panama would lead to any alliances, offensive or defensive. If the object of this mission was to make an offensive alliance, he was free to say that he would unite with his friend from Virginia (Mr. FLOYD) in his opposition to it; but he understood, from the Message, that this Government did not intend that our Ministers should take any part in any of the discussions in that Congress, which might, in any wise, draw our neutrality into question. He was satisfied that no alliance of the sort, alluded to by gentlemen, could have entered into the views of the Executive. Such a mission, upon an occasion so new and extraordinary, must have much higher objects in contemplation, than a mere treaty, offensive and defensive.

If, however, there was any danger in the mission, that in itself was a good reason to hasten the call for information. He had always been of opinion that this House might properly act upon such subjects, either to hasten or retard the movements of the other co-ordinate branches of the Government. It was certainly out of order to refer, as had been done, to what was supposed to be going on in the Senate; but, suppose a case before that body, connected with the highest interests of the country; and suppose that doubts should exist in the minds of some Senators, as to the proper course to be taken, would not such Senators be willing to know the views of this House, before they should act decisively? And, in a case of real, not imaginary danger, would it not be right to understand the wishes of the country, so as to allow the action and reaction of public opinion to have some weight in the determinations of the two Houses? This mission was a question of national policy, upon which public opinion ought to have its full force. It would be useless to call for information after a false step shall be taken, however fatal that step might be. His leaning was decidedly in favor of the mission, and he thought there ought to be but one opinion in this country on the subject; but it was possible he might be mistaken, and would not pre-judge the matter either way, until he should see the correspondence.

If he understood gentlemen rightly, they did not oppose the call as improper in itself, but because it might seem to manifest a want of proper decorum towards the Senate. He saw no disrespect to the Senate in the call for information. What is the character of this thing called comity and decorum? The Senate sit with closed doors upon Executive business. Are we about to open them? Certainly not. Are we about to ask what the Senate is doing? No such thing. They have a right to shut their doors, and it is the usage of that House to do so; but are we forbidden by comity to ask for information, because that body may happen to be sitting with closed doors reading the correspondence which we are asking the President to lay before us? The Houses owe duties to each other; but both owe duties to the nation, and each to itself. He considered it the duty of this House to be well informed upon all subjects brought before the other House by the Executive, for its adoption or rejection; especially where, as in the present case, great national interests are concerned. Comity and etiquette might be very wise in their proper places; but he could not agree that matters of great national concernment should stand aside for such reasons. He could see no propriety in laying the resolution on the table, and he thought it would be as well to delay the discussion on the merits of the question until the House should have the facts before it. Such a mission, in his opinion, ought not to be rejected, unless this House should concur in the rejection. It was a measure involving great questions of public interest, which might influence the destinies of this country for ages to come, and was, therefore, one of the cases in which a high responsibility would rest upon both Houses of Congress as well as upon the Executive. He thought there was much more danger to be apprehended from a refusal, than an acceptance of the invitation to meet our sister republics in the Congress of Panama.

Mr. DRAYTON now renewed his motion, to lay the resolution on the table: and, on this question, Mr. METCALFE asked for the yeas and nays; but, before they were taken, Mr. DRAYTON again withdrew his motion, at the request of Mr. BUCHANAN.

When Mr. ALLEN, of Mass., demanded that the Houses should proceed to the orders of the day.

The Speaker replied, that the hour being elapsed for the presentation of resolutions, it was in order for any member to demand the orders of the day; and the further discussion of Mr. HAMILTON's call was, accordingly, for the present, suspended.

THURSDAY, February 2.

Congress of Panama.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. HAMILTON, on the 16th December, calling on the President of the United States for copies of the invitations given to this Government to send Ministers to the Congress at Panama; when

Mr. WOOD, of New York, observed, that he wished to say one word on this subject. The object of the resolution is to call on the President of the United States to communicate to this House such correspondence as he may have received from any of the South American States in inviting this Government to a co-operation at the Congress to be held at Panama. When it was introduced into the House, he had supposed that there could be but one sentiment on the matter. He took it for granted that the House would instantaneously accord to the proposition; and he was never more astonished than at the course of this debate. A gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DRAYTON) has told us that the measure was unprecedented: but how unprecedented? Was it a thing without a precedent that the feelings of the American people should respond to the hopes, and rejoice in the opening prospects of a people struggling to obtain the blessings of civil liberty? If that was the gentleman's meaning, he denied the fact. He would refer that gentleman to the resolution introduced into this House in 1818, and unanimously adopted in 1820. He would refer him to the acts of this Government in 1816, '17, and '18, when we sent messengers to these nations of South America, without any communication having been addressed to this House by the Executive. A gentleman who preceded these commissioners was called upon for a statement of the facts, within his knowledge, in respect to the condition of the Southern continent, and made one of the most valuable communications which has ever been presented on that subject. He referred to the gentleman who is now our worthy and honorable representative to the Mexican Government. The feelings of this House were then in accordance with those of our Southern brethren, from the Gulf of Mexico to Cape Horn; and the pulse of this nation has beat in sympathy with their hopes and fears, their sufferings and successes, from the year 1795 to the present day. The first moment the germ of liberty fructified in that hemisphere, we sent commissioners, not to interfere with our neutral relations, or to dictate to these infant republics what was the course they ought to pursue, but to inquire into their actual condition: to make themselves acquainted with the political state of the country; to learn what were their wishes, and what their prospects of success; and on their return, and on the ground of their report, this House, in 1822, appropriated one hundred thousand dollars, not because Ministers had been sent and must be paid, but to enable the President to fulfil the wishes of the country, by sending them. They were to be sent, however, to such only of these provinces as were in actual possession of independence; they were sent where their presence and influence might be a means of fostering principles allied to our own. The measure now in prospect was, therefore, not an unprecedented measure, but a measure in perfect accordance with all the rest of our transactions with relation to the South American States. When the resolution for acknowledging their independence was first introduced into this House, I, said Mr. W., was one of those who were opposed to it. I feared the state of society in that country was not ripe for such a measure—that it would be premature: but, in 1820, I became convinced that their condition was sufficiently mature—that they understood, and were prepared to appreciate, the value of liberty; and, in fact, were free. I adopted, and acted on, the principles of a gentleman whom I call the Hortensius of the West, and whose argument, in this House, upon the South American question, eclipsed all the displays of eloquence I ever witnessed; and was read, as I have been informed, to his immortal honor, at the head of the armies of Peru.

The gentleman from South Carolina tells us, we have no right to examine into the propriety of this mission to Panama, because it is entrusted, by the constitution, to another department of the Government. What, sir, is this House, whose very organization was for the purpose that it should contain and express the sentiments and feelings of the American people—shall this House be restrained from the expression of that feeling in relation to a great political measure involving the most important interests of this nation? The President has informed us, in his official communication to both Houses, that he has received an invitation to send messengers to attend in this Congress, to consult with these young and free nations on arrangements to be entered into for mutual accommodation and advantage. Sir, what is to restrain us from asking for the facts of the case, and expressing our opinions on the proper course which ought to be pursued? The constitution says that the President shall have power to appoint ambassadors, by and with the consent of the Senate. But, sir, I deny that the Senate has any priori power. Their right is to concur in the appointments that are made. Is it the Senate who are to prescribe instructions to foreign ministers? No, sir; that is contrary to the constitution. The President, and none but the President, is the organ of communication with foreign powers. He plans the treaties; he nominates the men who are to negotiate them; and the only right of the Senate on the subject is to refuse to consent to their appointment on the ground of unfitness, for want of the requisite qualifications.

[Here Mr. Wood was called to order by the Speaker, on the ground of his taking too great a latitude of debate.

Mr. Wood replied that he had never yet fully violated any of the rules of this House: that he had not conceived that he could be out of order, since he confined himself to a path that had been trodden bare in the progress of this debate.

The Speaker replied, that the gentleman's last observations had not applied to the subject before the House.

Mr. Wood said he would thank the Chair to state what was the subject before the House.

The clerk was ordered to read the resolution.]

Mr. Wood then resumed. The object of this resolution is to obtain certain information to which it refers. Can any gentleman tell me what this information is? Can any one inform me, what will be the answer to this resolution? I do not know, but I have a right to conjecture.

We are told by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) that the most tremendous consequences are to grow out of this mission; that the object of the Congress is to form an alliance of republics to counteract the holy alliance of kings; that freedom is to be arrayed against tyranny, and the cause of representative Government against the arbitrary sway of legitimacy. Admit that this will be the fact, and is it an objection to our embarking in such a cause? Sir, I must have some stronger reason than this before I can believe this mission to be unwise. Are we not Americans? Are not the principles of the South American States conformable to ours? Is it unworthy of us to join with this group of republics, and band ourselves against the tyranny of the world? Have we not presented to the eyes of mankind a fit model for their political reformation? But admit, sir, all that the gentleman fears, as to the intention of those who have called this Congress; admit that Cuba and Porto Rico are to be conquered; the independence of Hayti to be acknowledged; and some new Peter the Hermit to preach a crusade against monarchy—ought we not, on the gentleman's own principles, to send Ministers to this Congress, to warn our brethren against such an undertaking? Shall we not give to these young nations the fruits of our experience, and the benefit of our counsel? We know what the gem of liberty is; they do not so well know. They are yet in their infancy—we are advancing rapidly to manhood. We know that the great principles of liberty consist in an equality of rights and privileges, and a full enjoyment of religious toleration. Suppose they have formed some such Quixotic project as the gentleman from Virginia has hinted at—shall they not be indebted to our principles for a wiser course? They need our counsel. They have solicited it. They will feel indebted to our Ministers for communicating it. Shall we not tell them to beware of forming any such schemes? Shall we not advise them to turn their attention to their own internal prosperity; to the enacting of wise and wholesome laws; to the introduction of the trial by jury; to the erection of seminaries of learning; and to the securing, by wise and liberal institutions, the eternal principles of liberty? In their present state they cannot be free; it is vain to think of it. I challenge all history to produce a single instance of a nation attaining the possession of civil liberty who are under the dominion of priests; yet that is now their condition. The priests hold the land; two-thirds of the people are but tenants to the monasteries. Their property must be liberated from this thralldom. Hitherto they have had nothing there but the civil law. They must be taught to introduce the free and manly spirit of the common law, and the use of the trial by jury. They have had, indeed, the image of a constitution, but it has been an image of iron and lead—of silver and gold—of brass and clay: it is full of heterogeneous and discordant parts. They must be taught to substitute for this, a system of equal rights, and of sober and rational freedom.

They need the presence of our Ministers to warn and instruct them, and to persuade them, if possible, to secure the blessing of liberty to themselves, before they attempt to push the conquest of others. The dangers, therefore, which the gentleman from Virginia has presented in such striking colors, present only an argument of tenfold more power in favor of the mission. Why did we send Ministers in 1818 and in 1822, and from that time to this? It was for purposes like those I have mentioned.

[Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, called Mr. Wood to order, on the ground that his remarks were taking too wide a range.

The Speaker said that, when he had interrupted the gentleman from New York, in the former part of his speech, it had been to suggest to him the inexpediency of discussing the relative powers of this House and of the Senate. He had not expressly pronounced him out of order. The Chair regretted the latitude which the debate had taken, and thought that the whole debate was, in some degree, out of place; though it could not be pronounced, strictly speaking, to be out of order. The gentlemen who opposed this call for information, had endeavored to show that no good consequences could arise from the mission, and that, therefore, it was inexpedient to make the call; the gentleman from New York was now taking the other side, and endeavoring to show what good might arise from that mission as an inducement to make the call. The pertinacity of an argument was one thing, its weight was another. His own opinion was, that it would be much better that the whole debate should be deferred to a different occasion. But, as the point of order had been made, the Chair pronounced the gentleman from New York not to be out of order.]

Mr. Wood resumed. He had, he said, now stated some of the inducements which he thought ought to prevail with the Executive to send Ministers to this Congress. The gentleman from Louisiana had enumerated many inducements. He had endeavored to increase the enumeration. The gentleman from Louisiana had adverted to the benefits which might arise from securing a reciprocity of commercial advantages. It is said, however, that, in our treaty with Colombia, this reciprocity had not been provided for. There certainly could never occur a finer opportunity of securing this valuable object. These South American States contain twenty millions of freemen: they will require the supply of manufactured goods to the amount of one hundred millions of dollars. This country can, at present, supply them with

Congress of Panama.

but five millions. Where must they go for the other ninety-five? It is evident they must receive this from other countries. If this Government had given protecting duties to the amount of one hundred per cent., they would not have given such a stimulus to the manufacturing industry and enterprise of this country. This is the great field which we ought to cultivate: it opens a door beyond the utmost ken of our sight. To Great Britain it is greater than India: to this country it is greater than the world. And there is no gentleman on this floor who feels for his country; who is impressed, as he ought to be, with the importance of giving a proper direction to its capital, but must long ardently to see some arrangement made with these South American nations. On this ground alone, the President would be justified in sending out these Ministers.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, here interposed, and called Mr. Wood to order, on the same ground as had been done by Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina. The Chair decided that the member was in order: from which decision Mr. MITCHELL appealed.

The Speaker having again stated the grounds of his decision, the question was taken, and the decision of the Speaker was affirmed, ayes 109.

Mr. CONDIOT now rose to address the Chair, but was called to order by Mr. FORSYTH, on the ground that Mr. Wood was entitled to the floor.

Mr. Wood declared, that he relinquished his right to the floor, as he never desired to speak if the House appeared unwilling to hear him.

Mr. CONDIOT moved to lay the resolution on the table; and, on this question,

Mr. TRIMBLE called for the yeas and nays. They were taken, and were, yeas 60, nays 115. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Wood now asked, whether it would be in order for him to speak to the resolution.

The SPEAKER decided that it would not be in order, as the hour allotted to resolutions was past.

Mr. MALLARY then moved that the rule of the House, which lays this restriction, should be suspended.

The SPEAKER replied, that no rule of the House could be suspended, unless the proposal to do so remained on the table one day for consideration.

The SPEAKER then announced the orders of the day.

Mr. WEBSTER moved to postpone the orders of the day, until to-morrow; observing that, since this discussion had been entered into, it would be better that the House should proceed with it at once, and bring it to some issue, instead of thus taking it by instalments.

The question being put on Mr. WEBSTER's motion, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 108, noes 49.

So the discussion of the subject proceeded.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that he did not rise to debate this question; but, as the House had now, by a large majority, virtually decided that this call for information should be made, he rose to entreat both the friends and foes of the resolution to desist from further debate, and to take the question at once.

Mr. McDUFFIE now offered the following, to be added by way of amendment to the resolution: "And further to communicate to this House, all the information in the possession of the Executive department, relative to the objects which the Republics of the South propose to accomplish by the Congress of Panama, and the nature and substance of the instructions proposed to be given to the Ministers of the United States to that Congress."

Mr. WEBSTER observed, that the amendment certainly proposed an unusual interference with the Executive power. He believed it was a thing altogether without precedent to call for the instructions proposed to be given by the Executive to a Minister to a foreign power.

Mr. McDUFFIE agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the terms of his proposed amendment were unprecedented: but they were so because such a case had never occurred before, as that presented by the proposed Mission to Panama. He undertook to say, that the whole of the information sought by the resolution, would be wholly unimportant, without the provision of the amendment, to which exception had been taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts. What is the inquiry for this House to make? What do we want to know? Not the moving cause of the determination to nominate Ministers to Panama; not the mere copies of the invitations from the Southern Republics—but the true character of the convention at Panama, and the attitude which our Ministers are to assume there. In what character are we to send Ministers there? As members of an Amphictyonic council; to be bound ourselves, through our Representatives, by the decisions to be made there? What are they to do there? How are they to participate in the deliberations of that Congress? I understand the objects of that Congress of Nations to be, first, to regulate their own internal political affairs: secondly, to resist, effectually, the Spanish Monarchy: and thirdly, perhaps, to accomplish some other vague and indefinite object. I wish to know, then, said Mr. McD., what instructions our Ministers are to take with them? Are they to participate in the deliberations of the Convention, as to the proposed Federative system? Are they to participate in its deliberations, as to resisting the Spanish Monarchy? How are we to know without being apprised of the nature and substance of the instructions to be given to them, how they are to go, what they are to do, what character they are to go in? This was the material information, without which all the other information called for would be wholly unimportant.

Mr. WEBSTER said he thought a little reflection

tion would satisfy the gentleman from South Carolina, that, in his motion, he was leaping before he got to the stile. It was only by means of information which this resolution proposes to call for, that information could be obtained of the terms and conditions upon which this country has been invited to send Ministers to Panama, and upon which the Executive has accepted the invitation. A cardinal principle of this mission, the President had, in his message, informed the House, was, that our Ministers are to do nothing and settle nothing which can compromise the neutrality of the United States. The call for the instructions proposed to be given to those Ministers appeared to Mr. W. to be a most extraordinary one. As to the idea of an Amphictyonic council, it could not be within the reach of possibility that the Convention of Panama could be an Amphictyonic council. It would be like other meetings of diplomatic agents, where each one acted independently of the other, according to the instructions of his own Government. It could not have entered into anybody's contemplation to send Ministers from this country to that Congress, on any other footing. Among other things to be transacted there, it had been suggested that commercial treaties were to be formed; and it was now gravely proposed to call for the instructions to our Ministers relative to the formation of such treaties. Was it ever before heard of, that the graduated instructions to a Minister abroad were called for, previous to their being acted upon, so as to make public, beforehand, what he was required to claim, and what he was authorized to grant or accept? This reminded him of the case of a Minister to a foreign power, having graduated instructions, who exhibited to the opposite party, at once, all his instructions. If we are to send Ministers to Panama, with public despatches, we defeat every object which such a mission could have in view. Instructions given to foreign Ministers are always private, and necessarily so, until they are fulfilled, at least.

We are informed by the President, (said Mr. W.,) that an invitation has been given to us to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama. Does any one suppose the terms of the invitation will not disclose the object of it? We are told, also, that the invitation has been accepted. Does any one suppose we shall not know, from the terms of that acceptance, the purpose for which our Ministers are going? To ask for the instructions proposed to be given to those Ministers, is asking more than has ever been asked before. If ever a case can arise when such a call would be expedient or justifiable, that case certainly does not now exist.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he should be sorry to have the vanity to suppose that he could foresee any thing that could not be foreseen by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but he apprehended the terms of the call proposed by the resolution, merely relating to the circumstances which induced the acceptance of the invitation from the Republics of South America, were not sufficiently comprehensive to elicit all the information which it was important for the House to have on this subject—and he therefore wished to have the call made specific to the point on which he considered the information most important. The gentleman from Massachusetts seemed to suppose that the whole matter communicated was of course to be published to the world; but that did not necessarily follow. We are called to act (said Mr. McD.) upon a measure, respecting which, it is necessary that we should have all the information which can be obtained. We are to decide the question as well as the Executive. The measure proposed is one which ought not to be adopted without the consent of that body in whose hands is the question of peace or war. I have given no opinion, sir, as to what may be the character of this Convention. That is a question to be determined by the information which we may receive respecting it. But if we are to determine here, a delicate question concerning our relations with foreign powers, and which may, in its consequences, involve the question of peace or war, it is necessary that we should have before us all the information bearing on the case. When the gentleman compared the proposition contained in the amendment with the case of a Minister who disclosed at once his graduated instructions, did the gentleman regard this House, in its relation to the Executive, as a foreign power? When we call upon the Executive for information, is he to deal with us as he would in negotiating with a foreign power? If it is important that the proposed instructions should not go to the foreign world, let them be sent here confidentially. The information ought to be so sent, and so used by this House, as not to prejudice the public interest. This much Mr. McD. ventured to say,—that, whatever might be the sagacity of the gentleman from Massachusetts, or of any other member, he would defy any member of this House to decide this measure with the wisdom which its importance demanded, without the information required by his amendment. He did not hesitate to say, that he, for one, would never vote for any measure committing the peace of the United States, such as this mission to Panama, without an entire knowledge of the character which our Ministers were to bear in it. He referred to the articles of the treaty between Colombia and Mexico, in which this mission was indicated. One of the objects of it there stated, was to "form a solemn compact," by which the States composing the Congress "will be bound"—to do what? "To unite in prosecuting war against the common enemy, Old Spain," &c. Now, said Mr. McD., I want to know, specifically, what are the objects of this Congress—I want to know all the objects of it. Some of them, it is perfectly clear, are of such a character as we cannot participate in, without committing the peace of this nation. I wish to know from the Executive whatever he has ascertained of the objects in view, and specifically what is the intention of the Executive in proposing to send Ministers to Panama.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that if he was to be still considered as exercising a control over the resolution, he begged leave to signify to the House, that he accepted, with great and entire satisfaction, the amendment of his friend and colleague, which he thought altogether pertinent, and calculated to give the House that sort of information which might be required. Before he took his seat he would take occasion to say, that he thought his friend from South Carolina had been peculiarly fortunate in calling the Congress of Panama an Amphictyonic League; and the gentleman from Massachusetts very unfortunate in excepting to such an appellation, as it happened that this was the title and designation given to it by the parties in interest—the parties to this Congress. He had read, a few weeks since, a Proclamation put forth (by some public functionary he presumed) in Mexico, calling the Assembly precisely by this name, and invoking its members by the title of Amphictyones of the new world. His friend, therefore, had the best right to infer, that this new Assembly would be governed by a similar polity, and by rules of conduct, in the transaction of business, of analogous import with those of that celebrated League of Antiquity.

The resolution of Mr. HAMILTON, as modified, was then read as follows:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House, copies of all such documents, or parts of correspondence, (not incompatible with the public interest to be communicated,) relating to an invitation which has been extended to the Government of this country ‘by the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and of Central America, to join in the deliberations of the Congress, to be held at the Isthmus of Panama,’ and which has induced him to signify to this House, that ‘Ministers on the part of the United States, will be commissioned to join in those deliberations;’ and further to communicate to this House, all the information in the possession of the Executive Department, relative to the objects which the Republics of the South propose to accomplish by the Congress of Panama, and the nature and substance of the instructions proposed to be given to the Ministers of the United States, to that Congress.”

Mr. POWELL asked if it was in order for the mover to accept this amendment as a modification, after his resolution had been amended.

The CHAIR decided, that, as it was, it did not affect the part of the resolution which had not been modified.

Mr. MALLARY now moved to strike out the following words: “and the nature and substance of the instructions proposed to be given to the Ministers of the United States, to that Congress.”

Mr. FORSYTH observed, that the only question of difficulty in his mind, had been as to the time when the resolution should be acted on. The same reasons which had at first induced him to dissuade the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) from calling up his resolution, did not prevail. The House has determined not to regard those reasons. Sir, I am satisfied; all I wish is, that gentlemen should know, that I perfectly understand in what situation the House is placed, and how I myself, now stand. The question now, is not whether we shall ask for this information, but in what manner we shall ask for it. Gentlemen seem to think that our proceeding, in this case, is to be regulated by ordinary rules: as though the case was one of ordinary occurrence. But is this placing the matter on its true footing? It appears to me, it is not. And why not?

Gentlemen are not to suppose, said Mr. F., that we know nothing about the Congress of Panama. The subject has occupied the attention of politicians in all parts of the world for several years. The proposition originated as long ago as in the year 1822; was reduced to form in October, 1823; and has been gradually matured, until the Congress itself is now in session. The idea originated with that illustrious military man, who possesses also, vast political sagacity, (BOLIVAR,) who pressed it on the powers of South America, and it first took an official shape in the treaty between Colombia and Mexico. If gentlemen would look at that treaty they would see the original object of the Convention at Panama, without waiting for information from the Executive. The object of it, as disclosed by the treaty, was a combination against Spain; to induce other powers to enter into an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Colombia and Mexico against Spain, and all the other powers of the world taking part with her against them. The Congress of Panama was to be held with a view to this object for one. With this object we surely have nothing to do—we cannot have, without violating our duty to the people of the United States, and those interests we have sworn to support.

Looking to the treaty, however, Mr. F. said, another object was proposed to be taken into view, after the parties to the Congress have met, and concerted all their plans in regard to the first and main object. The other States of America were then to meet, as one of the articles of the treaty distinctly stated, to consult on great matters of common interest; to establish a point of union in common danger; to erect a council for settling the meaning of words (in treaties)—Mr. F. stated the substance, not the letter, of the Treaty, it not being at hand—and for the conciliation of differences which might, in the course of time, arise between any of these nations. These were the subjects which were expected to engage the attention of the Congress, so far as it was to be directed to any thing beyond the common defence. We have been invited, said he, to attend this Congress; the invitation has been accepted, and we are to go there. All we know of the objects of this Congress is from this treaty. If we go, we go as a party to the Council of Panama, to settle questions hereafter to arise, and to conciliate differences, among the nations of North and South America: we become in fact a part of this Amphictyonic League. This statement of the fact must show to the House that this is not an ordinary matter of diplomatic intercourse, to be regulated by ordinary means and in the ordinary manner. The gentleman from South Carolina had therefore very justly said, that this House could not act intelligibly in reference to this question, without seeing the substance of the instructions proposed to be given to our Ministers to that Congress—though Mr. F. did not like that phrase, preferring to call for the “extent of the powers” proposed to be given to them, rather than for the instructions. It had been objected, to calling for this information, that we go to Panama to form commercial treaties, and that no such thing had ever been heard of as publishing the instructions given to Ministers in such cases.

Whatever may be the object or the intention of going there, said Mr. F., it is perfectly obvious, from what I have stated, that commercial treaties will not be formed there. Besides, if I have any knowledge of facts on this subject, treaties have been already formed by us with most of those powers. Why should we, then, not have the extent of the powers, or the substance of the instructions, to those Ministers, communicated to us? Do we go there to drive bargains with the Governments of the South—presenting them, first, all we wish to gain, and keeping back what we should be satisfied to receive? Certainly not. Our policy towards those Governments has always been an open one—it has been publicly avowed, and I hope never will be departed from. What is it? We say to them, we ask nothing from you—treat us as you treat all the world—we ask no favor from you, and will accept none.

Mr. F. said he did not intend, at present, to trespass further on the attention of the House. It was certain that the House could not decide on the expediency of the measure of the mission to Panama, without knowing precisely all that is intended by it: the character in which our Ministers are to appear there; the part to be taken by them in the deliberations of the Congress, &c. To enable the House to ascertain these particulars, the information proposed by the resolution, as it had been modified, was indispensable, &c.

Mr. MALLABY observed, that the gentleman from Georgia enjoyed much better opportunity of obtaining information on the subject than he did, and had told the House what is to be the character of this Congress that is to be held at Panama—deriving it from the stipulations of a treaty between two of those powers, Colombia and Mexico; but, I would ask, said Mr. M., whether that treaty expresses the understanding or agreement of the other provinces; and does the gentleman undertake to say that this is all the information we must have?

The argument which the gentleman from Georgia had drawn from the provisions of the treaty, to which he had referred, was the strongest one that could be used to induce the House to call for that information, and not take it by inference from a treaty between two of the parties, and infer the great objects from that—but rather go to the sources of information which present themselves, and see what is the object. Could there not be an object regulated between two of the powers, and also other objects for the decision of the Congress, with which they have no concern?

As respects the question immediately before the House, and the motion just made, it proposed to call on the President for information as to the instructions he intends to give. I should suppose, said Mr. M., it would be proper, when you call on the President for that information, you ought to know that Ministers have been appointed, to whom these instructions are to be confided. It seems to me that the call is of such a character as has never before been made. It is said, this is an extraordinary case; and that, having a knowledge of what the object of the Convention is to be, we have a right, in an extraordinary case, and for extraordinary purposes, to insist on the President's communicating the instructions he intends to give to these Ministers. By what authority are the Ministers appointed? Is it not derived from the same source as that by which the President appoints Ministers to France and England—by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, which confers on him the power of appointing, and to the Senate the power of confirming the appointment? Is there any difference in the source from whence he derives this authority, and that which he exercises on any ordinary occasion? It is the same; and if he is resolved to make the appointment, why should you apply a different rule to this case, from that which is applied in all others?

If, when Ministers are sent abroad, this House has a right to inspect the instructions given to them by the President, it shows a power of interference incompatible with the treaty-making power. If we may say, we will inspect your instructions, and interfere in these instructions, we can, with the same propriety, give instructions ourselves, and demand of the President that he shall give the instructions you prescribe. It is a direct violation of the treaty-making power itself; it is an invasion of the privilege conferred on that power by the constitution. That instrument expressly confers the power on the President of the United States. He sends the instructions, and gives his directions; and, when these negotiations are terminated, whatever has been the result, that is to be submitted to the Senate, for their inspection, and they are to decide on it; and then we have a right, if the President has violated the constitution, or if he has acted corruptly—we have a right to investigate the subject. But while the negotiations are going on, it seems to me that we have no more right to interfere with the instructions he is to give, or require information as to what they are, than we have to impose instructions on him.

Mr. EVERETT said he felt himself called upon to make a remark or two, in consequence of what had dropped from the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH.) That gentleman, both to-day and on a former occasion, had expressed himself as standing in an embarrassed position, in reference to this resolution, in consequence of a statement which he had made in his official relation to the House, that is, (as he understood him to mean,) his situation as the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He has informed the House, said Mr. E., that, in that capacity, he has already waited on the proper Department, and received the information that the papers called for will, in due time, be sent, and that he therefore feels embarrassed in calling for them. As a very humble and subordinate member of the same committee, I feel myself called on to offer the House an explanation of this matter, that they may know precisely how it stands. I have, I believe, sir, attended every meeting of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and been present at nearly every moment when business has been transacted in that committee. I feel, therefore, able to say, that this call for papers on the Panama mission has never been before that committee; that the honorable Chairman has never been instructed to have any special communication with the Department of State on the subject; that he has brought back to the committee no report of the result of such an interview; and, consequently, has been instructed by the committee to make no report on the subject to any individual or to this House. I, therefore, respectfully protest against its being understood, that any such official information, on this subject, is in the possession of the House, or of any member of it. Sir, I need not say that I do not make this remark in the least to impugn the correctness of the statement of my friend from Georgia, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs. I was apprised of his interview with the Department of State by himself, very shortly after it took place. I thought I understood its nature; I did understand that it amounted to this: that, without a call, the papers would be sent, and that when a co-ordinate branch of the Government should have acted on the measure. This, I take it, was the full extent of the intimation made to the gentleman at the Department of State; at least, so I understood it from himself, six or seven weeks ago. But I did not conceive, nor had I any idea, that it was to be understood as the wish or intention of the Department that these papers should, under no other circumstances whatever, be communicated; or that the House was to be bound, in courtesy, to suspend its action, under any and every aspect of things, on that informal or semi-official hint. So far from it, sir, that, had I not supposed that, from day to day, and from week to week, the contingency on which this communication is suspended, would cease to delay it, I would myself, in the Committee of Foreign Affairs, have proposed to instruct the Chairman to move this House to call for the papers.

Before I sit down, sir, allow me also a word of reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) the original mover of this resolution—a remark I should have made the other day, could I have conquered my diffidence at taking this floor. He alluded to a supposed change of opinion and policy, with respect to it, on the part of those whom he calls the confidential friends of the Administration. He did not tell us who he understood by that name. I hope, in the definition given of “confidence,” by his honorable colleague (Mr. McDUFFIE) yesterday, that the number of the confidential friends of the Administration is not small. Sir, when my friend from South Carolina (for such I am proud to be permitted to call him) first moved this resolution, I thought it premature. Not, I assure him, for the reason he intimated, that it was to react on another branch of the Government: for I declare to you, Mr. Speaker, that idea never entered my head, till suggested by another honorable friend. But I did think there was an urgency in the call, at so early a period of the session, that might as well be avoided. I also thought that a point of the phraseology might, perhaps, be mended; as I have no doubt it would have been by my friend, at my request. I did therefore, sir, come to the House determined, when the resolution should be called up, to ask to have it lie awhile upon the table. The gentleman anticipated me by his own act, in stating the result of a communication which he had with the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, already alluded to; in consequence of which he had determined to delay his resolution, reserving to himself the right, if the papers did not come in due season, to call it up again. Sir, he did not tell the House what he understood by due season. A short time after, sir, two or three weeks, (for I have, of course, kept no memorandum of these small statistics,) my friend did announce to the House, that, on the next following day, he should call up this resolution. But the House, on the following day, was pre-occupied with the great Judiciary question; and this, I thought, was the sole reason why my friend from South Carolina did not fulfil his avowed purpose. If this was the reason, then my friend must admit that the time has not only now come to have the papers, but had come a month ago. If there was any further reason, then, in his candor he will grant, that the friends of this mission (if there is any part of the House which ought now to be called by that name) did not set the example, however they may have followed it, of a change of opinion as to the time when these papers ought to be called for.

As to this call, sir, I think the time has come. I will not now discuss the question, nor attempt to prove the expediency of the measure, although I am, even now, very favorably prepossessed in regard to it. But I want more information. I have not been an inattentive observer of what is passing in the new States to the south of us; on the contrary, I have read every thing that has come within my reach from them; but I feel my want of farther light: for several things have, in this discussion, been stated by honorable gentlemen as facts, which were not known to me as such, and which I, even now, have difficulty in admitting. When the information comes, sir, if my impressions remain as they now are, I will seek an opportunity of expressing my views to the House on this great question. Meantime, sir, I think the information ought to be here before us, the people, or at least standing in the place of the people, so that, when we are called to act, we may do it with a full understanding of this important subject.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, then addressed the Chair in some observations, the first part of which were delivered in so low a tone of voice, as not to be distinctly heard by our reporter. When he was heard, we understood him to say, that his objection to the present resolution respected the time and manner of this application. The subject was still before the originating power of the Government, and he thought that considerations of delicacy ought to induce the House to refrain from calling for this information, while the subject remained where it was now understood to be. It might well be conceived that a case might occur in which the other two branches of the Government should be divided in opinion. The Administration might possibly think that one branch of the Legislature was too slow in its movements, and might have resort to the other for the purpose of stimulating them to greater activity. He thought this precedent a most dangerous one. It had been said that the House had two precedents before it to sustain this call, under present circumstances, to show that this department of the Government has been appealed to on extraordinary occasions, as being supposed to speak the voice of the nation. What are these precedents? The first was an occasion when two of the departments of the Government were at issue about the execution of the law of the land, and when the whole burden was thrown on the shoulders of this House. This, however, was but arraying one portion of the Government against the other. The other precedent related to recognizing the independence of the South American republics. The Administration was then considered as slow, and this House was called on to pledge the support of the nation to that measure. The resolution, however, in that case, passed by a bare majority. At the next session, the Administration had set forth its reasons for the delay, and they were unanimously approved.

Mr. A. said he was opposed to acting on the principle of these precedents, and did not wish to add to them. He presumed that, when the subject had gone through its proper course elsewhere, it would be laid before this House. Until which time he was not disposed to act upon it.

Mr. RIVES said, it seemed to him indispensably necessary, to enlighten the judgment of this House, in deciding on the propriety of the mission to Panama, to have some information as to the objects and reasons for instituting: on the part of the Executive of the United States, as well as the information called for by the former part of the resolution, as to the objects contemplated by the republics of South America. It must, he thought, be apparent to every gentleman, that they would proceed in the consideration of the subject with very defective lights, if they should content themselves with information merely as to the objects of the South American republics in organizing this Congress. Some of these objects, Mr. R. said, were not legitimate objects for us, but were such, as it was conceded on all hands, would not be proper for the Government of the United States to accede to in any manner whatever. One of these objects, it had been suggested, was to form a treaty of alliance, for the purpose of defending the independence of South America against attempts of the Spanish monarchy, and against external aggression from any other quarter. As it regarded this object, no gentleman, he thought, would contend, that the United States should send Ministers to Panama to co-operate with the South American States; but there might be other objects there might be motives of policy, (upon which, however, he gave no opinion,) which might render it proper and expedient, on the part of the United States, to be represented in this Congress. He wished, therefore, for himself, and he thought the information would be desirable to others, to know not only what were the objects contemplated by the republics of South America, which he supposed would be disclosed by the correspondence which had passed between them and this Government; but, also, what were the views of our own Government in proposing this mission. As to the particular form in which these views were to be disclosed to the House, there existed, if not difficulty, at least some delicacy. It would not, he thought, comport so well with the nature of the relations subsisting between this branch of the Government and the Executive, to call for the instructions proposed to be given to these Ministers, either in substance or in form. These instructions were an ulterior matter; it could not be supposed, in the present stage of the business, that the Government of the United States had made up its mind as to the specific nature of the instructions themselves; that was to be decided on after the mission had received the necessary sanctions. But it must be presumed that an opinion has been formed as to the objects of policy which, in the estimation of the Executive, render this mission, on the part of the United States, expedient.

Congress of Panama.

If the President came before this House, asking an appropriation to defray the expenses of this mission—for it was only in this point of view that any inquiry into the matter was allowed them—it was not sufficient for the House to know that the mission was thought by him to be desirable, but it was their right and their duty to call on him for an explicit disclosure of his views in instituting it, and the ends which were sought to be attained by it. In relation to all other objects which rendered an appropriation of money necessary to carry them into effect, it was the ordinary practice of the Executive Department of the Government, whenever the suggestion of such a measure originated with that Department, not only to indicate the object to which the appropriation was to be applied, but also to state the considerations and motives which rendered that object a proper one for the patronage of the Department which had the control of the public money. It would not, he thought, be any violation of personal or constitutional decorum towards the Executive, nor would it embarrass the negotiations in the Congress of Panama, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) to call on that Department, as a preliminary to our sanction of this mission, for a general, if not specific, disclosure of the objects sought to be accomplished, and the arrangements intended to be entered into, by sending Ministers to this Congress. Believing information of this nature to be absolutely necessary to guide this House in its ultimate decision on the subject, he thought the form in which he now proposed to ask for it, would not be liable to either of the objections suggested from other quarters of the House.

Mr. R. concluded his observations by moving to amend the resolution, by striking out the following words: "and further to communicate to this House all the information in the possession of the Executive Department, relative to the objects which the republics of the South propose to accomplish by the Congress of Panama, and the nature and substance of the instructions proposed to be given to the Ministers of the United States to that Congress," (the same clause as was moved to be stricken out by Mr. MALLARY,) and to insert, in lieu thereof, the following: "and the objects proposed to be attained by the Executive in sending Ministers to that Congress."

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that he thanked the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. FORSYTH) for having indicated the word which he ought to have used instead of "instructions." He therefore suggested to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) that he should insert, in lieu of his amendment, the following: "And the powers proposed to be given to the Commissioners or Ministers of the United States to that Congress, and the objects to which they are to be directed."

Mr. RIVES accepted the modification.

Mr. WRIGHT said, it appeared to him the proposition of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. MALLARY) ought to be agreed to, and that of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) ought not to be. If I understand the constitution, said Mr. W., the treaty-making power in this Government is vested in the President, who is to act by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This House has no original power to make treaties; in their incipient stages this House cannot act, nor can we interfere in the initiatory steps of a foreign mission. I am confident no gentleman wishes to invade the powers of any other branch of the Government. No, sir, we are all desirous of keeping within the lines prescribed for us in the constitution. Doubting, as I do, the power of the House to determine, in any way, the character of any mission to treat upon our foreign affairs, I am unable to see what is to be effected by a call for the instructions.

[Here Mr. McDUFFIE called the gentleman to order. The proposition now before the House is to change the call for instructions to a call for powers.]

Mr. WRIGHT replied, that he was about to show that there was no material difference between the two terms.

The CHAIR decided that Mr. W. was in order.]

Mr. WRIGHT then resumed. I cannot perceive the difference between these terms. I consider the demand of the instructions to be given to our foreign Ministers, as an attempt to invade the powers the constitution has confided to the Executive; and in asking for the powers of those Ministers, shall we not, in substance, do the same thing? What are the powers of a Minister, but his instructions? And what are his instructions, but his powers to enter upon and to prosecute his negotiations? Even if you seek the general objects of the mission, you may require disclosures tending to defeat those very objects, and highly detrimental and embarrassing to the public service. It would be indecorous in us towards the Executive, to call for the powers or instructions intended to be given to our Ministers. The proposition is new and unprecedented. I repeat it, the House cannot interfere in forming any treaty. It has no right to do so. Its right to judge of treaties is an incidental one. When called on to appropriate money, or to do any other act to carry a treaty into effect, or to comply with its stipulations, then it can judge, then it must judge for itself, and has a right to grant or refuse the funds asked as necessary, or to pay or to do any act stipulated for. I know, sir, we may refuse to appropriate money for the salary and allowance of Ministers, where the appropriation is asked for in anticipation of a mission; but I hope the day is far distant when this House shall feel itself constrained to interfere in this, or in any other manner, to embarrass, impede, or restrain the Executive in the fair exercise of his constitutional functions. Such a course would be beneath the dignity of the House. I will not enter into any discussion of the merits of a mission to the Congress at Panama. In that I will not follow the example of other gentlemen. When those merits come before us, it will be time enough to discuss them. Sir, I hope this proposition to insert will not be agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON observed, that, as he was desirous to give his resolution a wholesome castigation, he would accept the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, as a modification of his motion.

[This superseded Mr. MALLARY's motion; as the words he moved to strike out were thus stricken out by Mr. HAMILTON, without the aid of the House; but the words proposed by Mr. McDUFFIE were, by the same act, inserted in lieu of them.]

Mr. WRIGHT then moved to strike out the words proposed by Mr. McDUFFIE, which Mr. HAMILTON had accepted and incorporated with the resolution.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said, that, after what had taken place to-day, he was in favor of making this call; but his object was to make it as general as propriety would allow. He did not, however, wish to embarrass any department of the Government. He thought that it was comparatively of small moment whether the House should call for the instructions or for the powers of the Ministers, inasmuch as the call in the latter part of the resolution would be modified and controlled by the previous clause, which leaves it discretionary with the President to judge how much shall be communicated to the House. We call on him only for so much as, in his opinion, may be compatible with the public interest to disclose. The amendment can do no harm, because, if the President deems it improper to communicate the powers given to these Ministers, he will, of course, withhold the communication; if not, he will make it. For himself, he had formed no definite opinion of the propriety of the general measure; on that subject he held himself in reserve; he need not say what would be his predilections concerning it. What he wished particularly to observe, was, that he presumed it would be agreeable to the Executive to make the communication. But for what he had heard in the course of this debate, he should not have thought that the President was anxious to do so; because, if he had wished it, he might have sent this correspondence to the House long ago. But, from what he saw and heard, Mr. McL. concluded the call would not be disagreeable to the President: and he took it for granted that he would send all that would be consistent with the public good. He would not say that the debate in this House was intended to react on the President or the Senate; but all must know that it will react somewhere: its reaction will be directed to those very powers who are to meet at Panama. We do not take a step in this affair which they do not observe. Now, sir, I think it one of the soundest maxims of policy, that whenever this Government presents itself to that of another country, it should show an undivided front; that we should not come forward in a crippled and divided state, with one branch of the Government for a measure, and another branch against it; but that we should move in a solid body, and show to others that we are agreed amongst ourselves. As to the call, if this House is to deliberate and to decide on the general propriety of the mission, it seemed to him very obvious that this House should know whatever the Executive knew, that has an important bearing on that measure: if not, the House may come to one decision, and the President and the Senate to another. It does not, however, follow, that we are to adopt this measure.

He thought the House would not adopt: unless it should be clearly shown to be not conducive to the public good. As to the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, calling for the "powers" of these Ministers, if I supposed, said Mr. McL., that their powers meant the same thing as their instructions, I should be disinclined to adopt it; but it does not strike me so. A call for their powers appears to me to mean no more than this: whether they are to go to the Congress as spectators, or as agents, or as representatives! Whether they are to take a part in the deliberations, or whether they are merely to aid them by counsel or friendly supervision? If larger powers are given, and are indiscreetly exercised, they may, by possibility, compromise the neutrality and peace of this country; and as a present instructed, I should not be in favor of granting these powers. The whole resolution, however, is subject to the first clause, and leaves to the President the full exercise of his discretion.

The resolution, as modified, was then read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House copies of all such documents, or parts of correspondence, not incompatible with the public interest to be communicated, relating to an invitation which has been extended to the Government of this country by the Republics of Colombia, of Mexico, and Central America, to join in the deliberations of a Congress to be held at the Isthmus of Panama, and which induced him to signify to this House 'that Ministers, on the part of the United States, will be commissioned to join in those deliberations;' and further to communicate to this House all the information in the possession of the Executive Department, relative to the objects which the republics of the South propose to accomplish by the Congress of Panama; and the powers proposed to be given to the Commissioners or Ministers of the United States to that Congress; and the objects to which they are to be directed."

Congress of Panama.

Mr. FORSYTH rose for the purpose of expressing his dissent from the opinion of the gentleman from Delaware, as to the operation of the first clause of the resolution. The first part of the call relates to the correspondence with foreign powers, and the restrictive clause refers only to this correspondence; but the last part of the call asks for the powers of our Ministers. This, said Mr. F., I cannot vote to leave to the President's discretion. I want the whole. But, if the restrictive clause is to cover the powers of the Ministers as well as the correspondence, what follows? The President may think that the public good requires this mission, and he may also think that if he communicates these powers, the House may defeat the mission, and, in that case, he will, of course, think that it is "incompatible with the public good" that their powers should "be communicated." For myself, said Mr. F., I cannot imagine how a knowledge of these powers is to injure, or any way affect, the public good. We have in this matter nothing to conceal. Our Ministers go to stipulate—but with whom, and to what extent? When we send a Minister abroad, it may often be incompatible with the public good to disclose our correspondence with him, because a publication of that correspondence may put other nations in possession of information respecting our plans and purposes, which ought to be concealed; but no such reason holds in respect to the Congress of these South American States. Whilst he was up, Mr. F. begged to say a few words in reply to what had fallen from an honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) one of the most attentive, and he had no doubt would prove to be one of the most useful members of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not undertake to say, observed Mr. F., in obtaining and in communicating to the gentleman from South Carolina the information to which he alluded, and which induced him to postpone the calling up of his resolution, that I acted by the authority of that committee, because the subject had not been before that committee; I acted, in doing so, as the humble organ of this House, with a desire to enable myself to state to the House, as became proper in the position in which I am placed in reference to the House, whether any evil would be likely to arise or not from delay in the call; whether the Department knew of any motive which might make it advisable not to call for any part of the papers, and whether it was contemplated by the Executive to present the information to the House. I thought, as chairman of that committee, that, if I could obtain this information, it was my duty to present it. I was distinctly told that the information would be presented in time, if an appropriation should be wanted; and my understanding was, that, if no appropriation should be wanted, the papers would not be communicated. In this situation the affair lay for three weeks. I still do not know whether any appropriation will be wanted. The affair remains, so far as I am concerned, precisely as it was. I did vote against acting at all on the subject; but I am entirely willing the information should be had, and that all the information shall be had which is desirable.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that the question now was, whether the House should take the course calculated to effect its own object. The present resolution had been introduced by a gentleman from South Carolina, who seemed to stand in a very convenient relation to it. He repudiates or adopts it, as it suits his purpose. When any proposition is made to amend it, by those who are entirely opposed to the call, the resolution is then his, and he adopts the amendment as a modification. At other times, he has no particular interest in it. Mr. W. thought it was better that the House should dismiss this state of things. It would be better to have a resolution which could be amended by all, and not by those only who are opposed to the motion altogether. As to all the information which can, without impropriety, be disclosed on this subject, I am as anxious to have it as any gentleman. Why should I not be? I am not one of those who can make up my mind, before I have any knowledge of the facts on which it is to be made up; and in the present case, I am still in the dark. I do not pledge myself either to support or to oppose the general measure. And, in making the call, any phraseology, within the usual limits, will meet my approbation. But I object to any call that is without the discretionary clause. Sir, the House tried the experiment when General Washington was President. They applied for the instructions which had been given to Mr. Jay, and they received for answer, that that was a matter which pertained to the treaty-making power. I have prepared, and now beg leave to offer, as an amendment, a substitute for this whole resolution. It is drawn in liberal terms, and will procure, as I believe, all that we have a right to ask for.

The SPEAKER said that this amendment would not be in order while the present motion was pending.

Mr. WRIGHT then withdrew his motion, and the amendment of Mr. WEBSTER was read, as follows:

To strike out all after the word "Resolved," and insert the following:

"That the President be requested to cause to be laid before this House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the new States of America, or their Ministers, respecting the proposed Congress, or meeting of Diplomatic Agents at Panama, and such information respecting the general character of that expected Congress, as may be in his possession, and as may, in his opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; and also to inform the House, so far as, in his opinion, the public interest may allow, in regard to what objects the Agents of the United States are expected to take part, in the deliberations of that Congress."

The amendment of Mr. WEBSTER was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts on his conversion; as the proposition he now offered was precisely the same in substance with his own.

Mr. HOUSTON then rose, and said, he should make some observations on the proposition now before the House, such as he thought he was in duty bound to make, having the misfortune not to concur in opinion with some of the gentlemen who had spoken on this subject. That this House should be in possession of the information required, was, he thought, very desirable. For his own part, he had no objection to receive it at the proper time, when they could receive it either by the voluntary act of the Executive, or when this House should deem it proper, without reference to any particular state of affairs, to call on the Executive for it.

There was, Mr. H. said, something peculiar connected with the history of this resolution. It was introduced at a time when the information was thought desirable to some gentlemen, but, owing to peculiar circumstances, or to suggestions made to the mover of it, it was thought inexpedient at that time to urge it on. Affairs since then had assumed a different aspect. One of the co-ordinate departments of this Government, they were told, and he trusted he did not violate any rule of this House in saying so, had acted, as far as they had power to act, with reference to this subject. Another department of the Government, they were informed, had not acted upon it. When the co-ordinate departments should have acted, and presented the subject to this House, then he thought would be the proper time to call for this information. It seemed to be presumed that, when it came before them in a proper shape and character, they would have to pass upon an appropriation for this object; and if such should be the fact, they would certainly require all the information which it was proper for the Executive to submit. They would require all the information connected with this subject: for, as it was to form a new crisis in the politics of this country, it would be certainly proper to have all the premises before them, that they might act understandingly on it. Mr. H. said he would, in such a contingency, urge to have all the information laid before them; but he could not perceive, from the attitude which the subject at present assumed, that any information was necessary at this particular time, for this House, more than it was at the commencement of the present session. If it was necessary now, why was it not so at the commencement of the session? He could not see that the passage of this resolution was necessary now, unless this House was to be called upon to express an opinion on a subject not officially or properly before it.

Desirable as this information was, Mr. H. said, they had the privilege of conjecturing what it might be. He had no rays of light on this subject but such as were disseminated to all the members of the House. The arguments of some of the gentlemen had appeared to him to be hypothetically urged, presenting the subject in such an enlarged view as indicated a superior knowledge to what he possessed; and as he did not wish to be inferior in knowledge on the subject of this mission, he was not less anxious than other gentlemen to be in possession of all the information in possession of the Executive on the subject. But he wished it to be presented in a proper form, and to come when it was necessary. If it was not necessary on an earlier day, we have now no call for the performance of official duty, that we had not then. When that call was made, then he would himself press the call for the information which had not been submitted to them, and which was necessary on the subject.

The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) had said, let us determine now, if such is our disposition; that we will make no appropriation when this subject comes before us. Mr. H. was not prepared to say that he would make no appropriation: he was not, he thought, called on at this time for the expression of any such sentiment. There had been no call on this House for an appropriation. And, when that call was made, then would be the proper time to determine whether they would grant it or not. But he did not consider the question now essentially involved. When the application for an appropriation was made, it would then be their duty to act: it was not so now; and, inasmuch as it was not, he did not, at this time, feel disposed to vote for a call for information till he found that call necessary. Convince him of the necessity of that call, and he would unite, with much pleasure, in demanding it; but, if they were to have the information, let them have all that was connected with the subject, that they might know what grounds they were to act upon. The subject could not, he thought, be properly determined by this House without other data than what they now possessed.

We have been told, said Mr. H., that an invitation had been given to us, by the South American Republics, to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama, and that an assurance had been returned that Ministers would be sent. This was a gratuitous assurance, and must have been predicated on the belief that the concurrence of the co-ordinate branches of the Government would be certain: for he could not think that the President alone had any right to send these Commissioners, without the concurrence of the Senate. Could gentlemen think that the Senate would have nothing to do but confirm? That the President was the organ by which the whole nation was to speak; that what he said must be abided by; and that the Senate had no power to determine whether or no they would concur in this nomination? This subject he thought one of vast national importance, and ought to be well weighed by each Department of Government having cognizance of it.

We have been told, said Mr. H., that this is no new project. It was denied by the gentleman from New York, in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, that it was a new project. That gentleman had referred to various cases to prove that it was not new; he had said that appropriations had been made in 1818, '19, and almost down to the present time, for similar commissions, and that they formed a precedent to be applied on the present occasion. Mr. H. said, if he understood the subject rightly, (though it might be his misfortune not to do so,) the appropriations referred to were made to send Commissioners to South America, to ascertain what was the state of the Continent; to inquire into the capacity of the people of that country to receive freedom and cherish it; and to determine how far it was expedient for this Government to recognize their independence, and to form treaties of amity, commerce, and navigation, with them.

This was the object of sending Ministers, Mr. H. said, according to his understanding of the matter. But now we are called on to send Ministers, not to make treaties separately with these powers, but to meet deputies from each of the Republics of South America, to determine in what relation we are in future to stand in regard to them; whether we will join in alliances offensive and defensive with them, or in reference to any other subject that may be presented to that body. Have we not, asked Mr. H., already Ministers in South America, to negotiate treaties with those different Republics? Are they not authorized to negotiate treaties? And is not that the customary way in which the United States act as regards other nations? We do not meet them in assemblies of Representatives to negotiate treaties. We send our Ministers to the courts of the different Governments, and they there negotiate our treaties, so far as is conducive to our interests. We have adopted this plan, and steadily pursued it. It is the correct one. And why should we act differently with the powers of South America? But, if we are called on to meet them in Congress at Panama, what is the consequence? Whether this Congress is intended to counteract the influence of the Holy Alliance in Europe, Mr. H. said, was not a question now to be determined. But, if that is the object, it would be reasonable to suppose that propositions would be submitted. We have our Representatives there. The Representatives of other powers all act in accordance; those of the United States stand aloof; we do not choose to concur in their resolutions—and what is the consequence? We have sent our commissioners, agents, or Ministers, to negotiate a treaty, on the presumption of establishing an alliance with those people: for they expect nothing less from us. Should we decline acceding to their propositions, what would be the consequence? They would say, the Republic of the United States do not cherish for us those feelings we anticipated from her. The United States will not accede to our propositions; they endeavor to stand alone; they have withdrawn from our Assembly, and have set up for themselves. Is not this, said Mr. H., better calculated to exasperate these people than if we were not to send Ministers at all? He regarded this invitation, on the part of Bolivar, as an act of courtesy, affording us the opportunity of acceding to or declining the proposition. We could have declined it with courtesy; we could have established with each of these Governments an understanding so as to secure all the advantages we wished, with these people, and every object to be attained by this Government would have been gained. The position we now occupy is different: a pledge has been given; but, said Mr. H., is the nation bound to redeem that pledge? It might have been judiciously given, but we are not sure of that. We have not the information to satisfy us on that point. The House was not yet called on to act upon and redeem that pledge. At this time, therefore, Mr. H. said, the information was not necessary which this resolution proposed to call for. The House had been told that Ministers were to be sent to Panama for the purpose of disseminating our principles amongst the people of the Southern Republics, and of making them acquainted with our institutions; that we are to go there to infuse into them certain principles, and that we are to be the model by which they are to act. Could gentlemen suppose, Mr. H. said, that the deputies from the different Republics of South America would take it as a compliment to be told they were incapable of self-government; that they had not sufficient capacity; that they were not sufficiently enlightened; and that, therefore, the United States had sent their Ministers as special teachers of their doctrines, to give them light on the subject of self-government? Were our Ministers, Mr. H. asked, to be the teachers of politics to them? Did we send them there to enlighten the South Americans—that people who had been lauded, and justly lauded, throughout the world, for throwing off the galling yoke of a despicable tyranny, and proclaiming to the world that they would be free, in imitation of the United States? Shall we send teachers amongst them to infuse our doctrines, and inculcate our political principles amongst them? This, Mr. H. said, was not the way for South America to be free. Unless she wills to be free she never can be so. We might send our teachers to every city, and every village, and establish political colleges throughout South America; but she cannot be free unless she wills it. If she can derive any advantage from the example we set her, let her do so; our ports are open, our houses, our towns, and our assemblies, are all open. Let her citizens come here, and if we disseminate light amongst them, let them return to their fellow-citizens—let them describe the institutions we have in this country, and tell them, "Go ye and do likewise." This is the way, Mr. H. said, that South America is to be benefited by the United States. This will benefit her institutions: if she sends her enlightened citizens amongst us, if she will have our constitution and our laws translated into her own language, this will infuse energy into her Government, and sustain her politics and her arms, so far as it is necessary for her service. This is the way South America is to be benefited, and in which our principles are to operate on her people. It is not by physical influence that we can benefit them: but it is the moral influence that pervades this country, which they must become acquainted with. They must learn it amongst us, and carry to their own country the knowledge of it.

Mr. STEVENSON, of Pennsylvania, then offered the following amendment:

Strike out the words "so much of" where they first occur, and the words "as may, in his opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest:" and also the words, "so far as, in his opinion, the public interests may allow," and add, at the close, these words: "making so much of his communication confidential as he may think proper."

Mr. WEBSTER suggested, that it was not in order to strike out words which have been inserted by a vote of the House.

The CHAIR decided that so much of the resolution as related to striking out was not in order: but that so much of it as went to add to the resolution, was in order.

From this decision Mr. FOSEYTH appealed, and said, with proper deference to the longer experience of the Chair, he could not but deem the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEVENSON) in order. The rule of the House, to which the Speaker referred, is, that words inserted, by way of amendment, cannot be struck out on motion. The propriety of this rule is quite obvious; the House having decided upon the propriety of the words forming part of the proposition, ought not to be called upon again to decide the same question. It does not apply here. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to add words, and to strike out others inconsistent with them, does not bring back the same question that has just been decided. It is perfectly distinct in its character, and has not yet been before the House. Mr. F. did not express any opinion in favor of the amendment itself. The House has decided that it will call on the President for such information as, in his opinion, may be safely communicated. The proposition is, that this discretion may be limited to the manner in which the communication is to be made, whether openly or confidentially. In making it, the gentleman proposes additional words to the resolution, and the necessary erasure of words inconsistent with them. The additional words are decided to be in order. If adopted, the whole resolution becomes nonsensical; to make it sense, the words proposed to be erased, must be removed from the whole sentence. To erase them is out of order.

The conclusion is, that the part of the amendment which does not alter the proposition, except by making it senseless, is in order, and that part of it which makes the amendment itself, and the whole proposition intelligible, is not in order. To this conclusion, Mr. F. could not bring his judgment. He left the subject to the House without further remark. It seemed to him clear, that the whole amendment was in order, or none of it.

The decision of the SPEAKER was sustained; and the question being, on adding to the resolution of Mr. WEBSTER the following words, "making so much of his communication confidential as he may think proper,"

Mr. STEVENSON observed, that he wished to vote for the call, but that he could not vote for it under the discretion and limitation. He wanted to have all the facts before the House. He did not wish to command them against the interests of the nation, nor was it his wish to embarrass the Executive; but he wanted to have full light on the subject—the same light which the Executive has had upon it, and as another branch of the Government is now supposed to have.

If the secrets of the nation have been confided to two branches of the Government, he thought that the Representatives of the people also were entitled to a full knowledge of them; and he, therefore, wished that the President should, in the first instance, communicate in a public manner, as much of this information as he may think proper, and then give to the rest a confidential character, if he prefers it.

Mr. INGHAM rose, to ask his colleague to withdraw the last part of his amendment.

[The only part very important was the former clause of it, and which was prevented from being inserted by a rule of order.]

He wished him to withdraw it, that he (Mr. I.) might be enabled to refer the entire resolution to a Committee of the whole House with instructions to strike out the discretionary clause, where it last occurs; and on this question he should demand the yeas and nays.

Mrs. COOK suggested that this was unnecessary. The President had this discretionary power by the constitution, and will no doubt exercise it, if he considers such to be his duty. He suggested that the object might be attained by a reconsideration, without any reference to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENSON having withdrawn his motion to amend, the question was loudly demanded; when

Mr. INGHAM rose, and observed, that he should not be put down by any call of "question." He considered the subject as of too much importance to be deterred from doing his duty in regard to it, either by an expression of feeling in the House, or by its want of courtesy; and though the hour was late, he thought the opportunity ought to be availed of to have his motion made and a vote taken upon it. He would, however, slightly change its form. He then moved to refer the resolution to a select committee, with instructions to strike out the discretionary clause, where it last occurs. On this motion, the yeas and nays were ordered; and then the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 3.

Congress of Panama.

The House proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the motion of Mr. INGHAM, to commit the resolution of Mr. HAMILTON, as amended by Mr. WEBSTER, to a select committee, with instructions to strike out the clause which leaves it discretionary with the President to communicate the papers called for by the House, so far as relates to the objects in which our Ministers are expected to take part in the discussions at Panama.

Mr. METCALFE said, that the motion he was about to make was not introduced with any desire to prevent the discussion of the general subject, but only that the House may determine at once on the question of making a call for the papers, which ought to be the groundwork of the discussion. All legislation is suspended by a long debate on the propriety of calling on the President for a certain correspondence—a debate which he was far from anticipating when he called up the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, and he thought that this was a proper occasion for taking the previous question, to preclude further debate on a question not before the House: he moved it accordingly.

Mr. FLOYD hoped the gentleman would withdraw this motion; he never liked either it or the sedition law.

The SPEAKER pronounced all debate at present out of order; and proceeded to take the question on Mr. METCALFE's motion, which was negative; ayes 75—noes 90. And the question recurring on Mr. INGHAM's motion to refer Mr. HAMILTON's resolution to a select committee,

Mr. INGHAM then addressed the House. He said he could not but congratulate himself, and the House, and the nation, on the failure of the motion for the previous question. The subject now before the House (said he) is one of deep and vital interest to our country, and deserves all the consideration which, with our most mature reflection and judgment, can be brought to bear upon it. It is a subject, therefore, of real congratulation that an attempt to foreclose every amendment as well as all debate, has met with such a decided negative. The time is not yet come, I trust, when questions of this nature are to be thus disposed of. The previous question was always regarded as a high-handed measure, only to be resorted to in time of great national difficulty.

I shall now proceed to consider the amendment, and, in the course of my remarks, will confine myself as strictly within the line prescribed by the rules of the House as possible, to which I am admonished by the indications of impatience manifested during the tedious debate heretofore. I do not mean to discuss the question of the Mission to Panama: that question is not before the House. The only question is, as to the extent of information we require, before we shall be called on to act in relation to this Mission. Should the amendment prevail, it will open a wider field of inquiry than the resolution as it now stands; which contains two restrictive clauses—an anomaly in calls for information of this nature. One is inserted as a matter of courtesy, because we consider the President as having the right to withhold whatever, in his judgment, the public interest may require to be withheld. It is conceived that, for such a purpose, we have no power to coerce his compliance with our call; but on such occasions as this, is it proper for us to depart from the usual course, and admonish the President, by the second restriction, only to give us what sheer necessity requires? The resolution, without the second clause, would justify an ordinary discretion: but with it, while it purports to ask important information, it admonishes him to forbear: it says to him, don't give us too much: we want very little; therefore, beware that you do not exercise too liberal a discretion in framing your answer. This is not the attitude which this House ought to take on such a question: the consequence of this measure may be too important to have it thus disposed of. But if the motion to amend shall be sustained, it will be a distinct indication to the Executive, that we want ALL the information we can get: that the great interests of the nation demand it. We do this, however, without any feeling of disrespect. I would be among the last to move any proposition, to be sent to another branch of the Government, containing the slightest mark of disrespect. I owe it to myself, to the House, to every consideration which ought to influence my conduct, not to do so. It is admitted on all hands, that we are about to be called upon to act on a great question. How important, then, is it that we should have all the information we can get, to enlighten our judgments in adopting or rejecting the resolution offered by my colleague, which lies on the table. Are we to be compelled to vote in the dark, upon such a question as this? I am free to declare, that I have not finally determined what it would be proper to do in relation to it. The proposition to send Ministers to the Congress of Panama is a measure wholly new in the history of our Government; it may constitute an eventful epoch in our annals: and are we to vote on faith, without the same information which is possessed by the other branches of the Government, merely because it is recommended? I disclaim such doctrine. I must judge for myself and vote upon my own responsibility; not upon faith in any functionary whatever.

I cannot but notice some remarkable incidents in relation to this call for information. Its history has been often adverted to, but it cannot be too well understood. Early in the session, the gentleman from South Carolina moved the resolution. Soon after we were informed, as coming from the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who is understood to be the organ of the House, having the most direct communication with the Department of State, that all the information would be communicated in due time. No contingency was suggested as influencing the intention to send the documents. For one, I waited, anxiously expecting to hear them announced, from day to day. It was not supposed that this communication depended on any contingency. Subsequently, we were told by the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the information would be sent as soon as the Ministers to Panama were appointed, and money was wanted for their salaries. This information excited my surprise. That this great question was to be decided upon by this House, under the very limited restraint of a mere question for appropriating salaries for officers who have been appointed by the proper authorities of the Government. It was not to be expected that the question would be presented in such a shape.

It is pretty well known what kind of argument would then be used to sustain the measure. We should hear lectures upon our duty and moral obligation to vote salaries for all officers lawfully appointed. It did seem that the House was about to be drawn into a snare, though certainly without such intention by the Committee of Foreign Affairs. Their Chairman, as I now understand, only gave the information as he had it from the Department of State. Although this is a new case, and members will feel less of the obligation to vote the salary, yet, were it an ordinary exercise of an ordinary power, I should find great difficulty in resisting that obligation whether I approved of the service or not. The present case is, however, an exception to every other that can arise. But to proceed with the history of this measure: We suddenly found the whole matter taking a new direction. The Department of State had told us, through our Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, that the communication would be made only when the appropriation was wanted. Now a very singular change of position is exhibited; many, if not all of those acting with the Administration, determine not to make their issue on the question of appropriation, but become urgent for the information, in order to discuss the abstract proposition before the Ministers are appointed. Whether the members then acting, have changed their minds, or the Department of State has changed its purpose, I cannot say; one or the other has undergone a very singular change, and they may choose either horn of the dilemma. If the Department of State still thinks it inexpedient to make the communication before the appointment of the Ministers, this movement is certainly a countermarch on that Department; and, if the Department has changed, without notice to the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, it leaves him in a very singular and awkward predicament. In whatever aspect we view these sudden changes, they seem to require some special explanation; but for my own part I like the latter movement best; it matters little how, or for what purpose, it was brought about; and though late, it is better late than never. I care not how many changes and countermarches are made to reach this point. I trust the House will now say, let us have the information with as little restriction as possible, and then act upon the abstract proposition, not trammelled by any question of appropriation for salaries. But how is it possible that we can decide on the policy of this Mission without having all the information that belongs to it—nothing less than the Senate have, or the President himself? Why, then, insist upon this double restriction upon our call? I wish to know who it is that is most desirous of being fully informed on this measure, before we act, and the vote upon the amendment will present a test which cannot be misunderstood. The gentleman from New York (Mr. Wood) asked: Shall this House be restrained from expressing its feelings on this great question? If the gentleman had substituted judgment for feeling, I would have agreed with him. It is not feeling which ought to govern the House on such questions, but an enlightened judgment, seeking to advance the happiness, the honor, and the safety of our country; and in order to enlighten our judgment, we want all the facts, and, also to know what are the intentions of the Executive in relation to the Mission. It has been a long practice of the House to insert a qualifying clause in calls upon the President; but for this I would, so far as my vote would go, have asked for the whole, without limitation of any kind. Shall we go home to our constituents, and tell them that we voted without all the knowledge within our reach? They may well ask us, Why did you not call for it? And we should reply, with an ill grace, that we voted because the President recommended the measure; he knew all about it: but we thought it uncourteous to press him to tell us. We did intimate that we had some curiosity to know a little; but we told him to beware how he communicated too freely. We could not keep a secret; we had made up our minds to vote as he had wished, and we only meant to save appearances by making a call upon him. In fine, the we the Representatives of the people, in this branch of Congress, had agreed to become mere registering assembly for Executive edicts. Such would be our position; but I trust it has not come to this; that no doctrine of confidence in public functionaries will ever be carried to such lengths in this Government. It seems, however, from the debate, that many gentlemen have made up their minds to send Ministers to Panama. We, surely, need not address any arguments to these, to let us have information who have it not. It is to be presumed, they are fully informed as to all the facts necessary to a judgment. But one thing is clear: they must either have information which we have not access to, or have decided without knowledge, unless, indeed, they possess some intuitive faculty; but, in either case, will they refuse our request to be placed on equal terms with them? Our claim must appeal to their candor with stronger force.

I ask, is it fair or generous for them to exclude us from the opportunity of arriving at the same conclusions they have done?

But it has been observed that there is something peculiar in the time for pressing this restricted call. It has been conjectured, and some remarks which have fallen from gentlemen in the course of this debate go to justify the belief, that the singular change of position already adverted to, and the movement upon these resolutions at the particular juncture, was intended to act upon the feelings of the people and of this House, and react upon another branch of the Government, and cause it to "do quickly," what some gentlemen suppose "well done if it were done." Some politicians have supposed that the people feel first, and reflect afterwards; and if this were true, the time chosen for agitating this question, was well chosen for its purpose; there might be time enough to excite feelings, but none for deliberate reflection. But there is no greater mistake than this, as to the people of this nation. In every thing affecting their interest, and those of the nation, they feel, it is true, but with an acumen bordering on the unerring certainty of instinct itself. I have, therefore, no fear of the influence of declamation on their judgment; their good sense is beyond the reach of its power. I do not speak without knowledge on the subject; we have had some experience; I have witnessed the most extraordinary efforts to excite the sensibilities of the people, even on the affairs of South America, but it produced no such influence as was hoped and expected. Love of country, and a knowledge of their true interests, predominated; they saw these safe, and they remained calm. We have, also, had some experience on another question, more recently. Two sessions past, a proposition was made to counteract the Holy Alliance, by sending a mission to Greece; we had, on that occasion, all the declamatory eloquence of the Hortensius of the West, as he has been called in this debate, aided by the more argumentative powers of a gentleman from the East—but no effect produced, no rash feeling excited, either in this House, or elsewhere. The people were not disposed to do any thing that would, for a moment, jeopardize the safety of their country. The object, whatever it was, totally failed; the offspring came into the world still-born; it was put aside, not by the orators of the House, but by the middle men, the common sense—the men, as they are sometimes called, of five feet eight; the dead bantling had not even an undertaker to perform the last offices, nor any funeral ceremony; it was carried down to the bottom of the garden, and there buried. I know that this proposition was thought to be a great movement, having an ulterior purpose very different from its apparent one; and that it was resisted by the then Secretary of State, in a manner that merited the thanks of the country; but now the scene is changed, and projects and crusades are becoming more prevalent. It is well for us to consider whether we will, under any circumstances whatever, abandon, for a moment, the great policy of our country, viz: what has been called the American policy; that is, not interfering with the affairs of other countries; that policy which gained this nation its great moral ascendancy throughout the globe. It is one of the bases of our strength, which I trust will never be undermined by any unwise projects, or desire of exhibiting a splendid spectacle to the world. It would be well, also, to consider, whether, by sending Ministers to Panama, and assuming the relation, at least, of Quasi Allies, we do not, prima facie, abandon our neutral ground, and weaken the power which we might exercise more for the interest of the South American States, in the more commanding relation of mediators, whenever any difficulty should arise between them and other powers. We may honestly differ about the best means of advancing the interests of the South American Republics, but there can be no difference among us as to our wishes for their prosperity and happiness, to the same, and, if possible, to a greater extent than we enjoy these blessings. It is assuming too much, for the projectors and supporters of this Mission to Panama, to claim to be the exclusive benefactors of South America. The only difference is as to the means best adapted to the end; in estimating these means, we should consider whether the preservation of our own happiness and safety are not among the most essential. While this nation remains strong and firm, it will be a nucleus to which all free Governments will be attracted, and imbibe lessons of liberty and peace from our example, more efficacious than from any officious intermeddling with their affairs.

We have heard many conjectures about the objects of the mission to Panama; and unless other than these are intended, I think it more objectionable than at first blush it appeared. We are to make commercial treaties. What! with four or five nations at once, and yet no entangling connection? Could we not treat better separately with each, in the usual way? Do we know that it comes within the scope of their power to enter upon such negotiations? But we must go there to advise them—about what? Their religion! And is this a fit object for a political Minister? We undertake to interfere on matters which, perhaps, of all others, are regarded as the most sacred, and improper to be interfered with by another nation. Should our political missionaries attempt this, they might find a very different reception from that which some are perhaps expecting. It would be well for gentlemen to advert to the dangerous consequences of an order by Peter the Great, for cutting off the beards of his priests. However desirable it may be to see our principles of toleration spread throughout that region, we must wait for the influence of pure religion, and the light of reason, and our example, to dispel, gradually, that cloud which hangs over these republics.

I should be glad to be informed what attitude our Ministers are to assume. It is said, by those who seem to know, (though we cannot tell how they know,) that they are not to be considered as members of the Grand Council. What then? Shall they debate, like our delegates from territories, but not vote? Or will they occupy the lobbies? Would this be a becoming position for the representatives of the first republic in the world? Or shall they figure behind the curtain, and make bargains with the individual delegates? Whatever aspect we can view the mission in, our Ministers will make a very awkward figure there; unless, indeed, we can get some information which shall remove all these difficulties.

Do we know what may be the feelings of those powers who have not invited us to be present? Are we sure that this partial invitation does not contain within it seeds of serious jealousy? I have seen an article, extracted from a South American paper, indicating an anxious apprehension, lest we might interfere too much in their affairs. Suppose that some of the States in this Union had invited our then ally to send a Minister to Annapolis, to be present at our arrangement of internal affairs, and the organization of our Federal system—what would the other States have said? Would it not have set the whole country in a flame, even if the Minister had been the great and the good Lafayette? Another object of this Congress, we are told, is to counteract the influence of the Holy Alliance in Europe. This is one of the most serious aspects in which this question is presented. We condemn the Holy Alliance, as well on account of its organization, as the means employed to effect its objects; not only we, but every friend of freedom throughout the world, condemn this combination of nations to effect the most unholy purposes, which, without such combination, could not be effected. Then let us consider whether our presence among the nations of South America would not so characterize that Congress, as to consecrate the means employed by the Holy Alliance. When means are thus made lawful by such a sanction, who can say they will not be employed for bad ends? It is yielding half the argument with which the Holy Alliance is everywhere so effectually assailed, for us thus to consecrate the means they employ, by participating in a deliberation of nations. But I have trespassed too long on the patience of the House. I trust the amendment will be adopted, and then, I am persuaded, the resolution will be almost unanimously supported.

Mr. STORRS said that he hoped the proposition to commit the resolution would not prevail, and asked the indulgence of the House, to say a few words. He would endeavor to speak, and confine his remarks directly to the question. This, said Mr. S., is a call on a co-ordinate branch of the Government for information. It is upon the Executive, who is charged by the constitution with the management of the foreign negotiations of the country. It has been confided to him, because it would have been unwise to have lodged it here, at least. Now, that comity which should ever characterize our intercourse with the Executive, has settled, long ago, that respectful form which every call for information from that co-equal department has usually assumed. Gentlemen who now press upon us so earnestly a change of this settled, and, certainly, courteous, usage of the House, should come prepared at least with some solitary precedent, from the whole history of Congress, to justify it. If no such example can be found, they should then, in my opinion, at least, clearly show us that the present is an extraordinary or alarming occasion, and calls upon us to adopt some uncommon and vigorous measures to meet its dangers, and that the call, as proposed to be amended, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) was indispensable, to enable us to discharge our proper constitutional duties. Now, sir, what is really the case before us, which has excited so much alarm—which is pressed so earnestly upon us, as a crisis of imminent danger to the country? If we go back but a few steps, and examine what information we already have, we may perhaps find that all these fanciful dangers are chimerical. The resolution now asks for such information, in relation to the Congress of Panama, and the objects of our own Government, in uniting in its deliberations, "as the Executive thinks may be safely and prudently disclosed to us, at this time," by that branch of our Government. If I have understood gentlemen correctly, they wish this reference to the discretion of the Executive expunged. They see in this mission, or believe they see in it, a most alarming probability that we are there to become parties to a confederation, which has for its end and object resistance to the Holy Alliance—an alliance offensive and defensive, against Spain, or Europe, or some of the kings of Europe—that the Executive is about to compromise the peace, happiness, and prosperity of our country, on some wild schemes of interference between these South American States and Spain. In short, that we are to unite our political relations with theirs; that we are to be hurried into a ruinous state of public war with Spain, or some other powers of Europe. We are, for these, among other minor reasons, urged to make an unlimited call for all the information in his possession, without any restriction which may suggest itself to the Executive as growing out of the extreme delicacy which always attends every diplomatic arrangement of the country. Unfortunately for the conclusion which gentlemen have drawn from these imaginary sources of alarm, the Executive has already plainly informed us and the country, in his message at the commencement of the session, that the United States will not become a party in any deliberations or measures at the Congress of Panama, which may compromise our neutrality.

If this be so, we may at once dismiss our fears, and, with them, nearly all the arguments we have heard, unless we are prepared to go a step further, and deny that this information is satisfactory: for we can learn no more than this, after all which we acquire in the end by any resolution. It must come from the Executive at last; and if we cannot rely on this declaration, thus solemnly made to us and the world, will gentlemen profess any greater faith in any thing which he may send to us, in answer to a call from the House? It does appear to me, sir, that, unless we disbelieve the President on his word, we can have nothing more satisfactory. His object is here explicitly declared, and voluntarily placed before us, on the very point which we seem to desire, with the most anxiety, to be satisfied about. I am not disposed, sir, to deny that a state of things may, by possibility, occur, in the history of the country, in which this House may not be justifiable in demanding information; but it is not necessary to express any opinion on that matter. It is enough for us to know, on this occasion, that there is nothing now before us, and nothing in the attitude of the subject, or as connected with it, which should at all discompose our minds, or disturb our tranquillity of feeling. The country will hardly be exposed to any disquietude, nor need we be, after this very explicit assurance of the President as to our strict neutrality between these States and all other powers. What, then, can be the wonderful mysteries of this Congress, so far as it is proposed that we shall be concerned in its deliberations? If it is neither of war, nor alliance, nor interference with other powers, it must necessarily relate chiefly to commercial arrangements; and if we will but look a little after the great interests which our commerce and navigation have in the subjects so likely to come before that Congress, we may, perhaps, find that its deliberations are worth the attention of our own Government, and be able to allay in our minds all the causeless alarms which have been spread out in this debate. If we are satisfied on these points, are there any of us, then, who can regard this question as different from a call for information on any other commercial negotiation about to be instituted? It would, in my opinion, be extremely unwise to call for an absolute development of all the objects which we may have in view at that Congress. No prudent Government could wish to have them disclosed to the world; and as our Ministers cannot, from the very nature of their powers under the constitution, bind us to any thing whatever, even in commercial arrangements, we have a full security, in the supervisory power which both the Executive and the Senate subsequently exercise over all their acts, that there cannot be the remotest danger in the mission. We may, at least, feel some assurance that both these branches of the Government will not lightly compromise the advantages of our neutrality, or expose us to any very imminent dangers whatever. If the Executive were even disposed to hazard any thing, another branch of the treaty-making power still holds them in check; and after all, our own co-operation may be called for to execute the measures which may grow out of any treaties to be made at that Congress. But I will not enter into this branch of the subject, lest I may be considered as digressing from the question. It is only pertinent to the debate, to show how unnecessarily alarms may be excited, and how causeless these alarms may prove to be. We must come to the conclusion thus early on this subject, that we cannot trust the Executive at all in the ordinary exercise of his constitutional duties, or we must take his declaration in the message as satisfactory. Whether he has or has not nominated to the Senate Ministers for this mission, we know not, nor is it necessary for us to know. Of as little importance is it to us to know, on this question, whether, if he has, the nominations are confirmed or not. We may have a plain duty to perform, whether the Senate approve or reject any such nominations. We cannot, and I trust will not, at this time, take into our consideration any thing not directly before the House; and when the time shall come that a proposition shall be presented to us for an appropriation for this mission, we have only to do our duty, and to take upon ourselves our own responsibilities, regardless of the views which others may entertain of it elsewhere.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that he would abstain, he hoped, from indulging in any discussion as to the general merits of the purposed mission to Panama: for he humbly conceived that those gentlemen who had given so wide a range to the debate, had violated the propriety of debate, if they had not the rules of Parliamentary order. He would, therefore, endeavor so to confine himself to the subject matter before the House, as not to furnish his poor example, valueless as it was, as a refutation of his own doctrine.

Indeed, he proposed merely to say a word or two to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORZA,) who certainly had evinced a most extraordinary and instinctive confidence in authority. This gentleman has given us a new reading to the maxim of the British Constitution, "that the King can do no wrong;" and has pushed this doctrine even beyond the limitation which it is safe to urge it in England: for I infer from what he says, that he not only believes the President can do no wrong, but his Cabinet counsellors also. It seems, because the President (with these his chosen advisers) has said that the invitation to join in the deliberations at Panama has been accepted, in such a way as not to affect the neutral relations of the country, we are bound to take this as a matter of implicit uninquiring faith, and to be satisfied it is so, because the President has so assured us. This was, indeed, giving to this distinguished personage, said Mr. H., an infallibility which it does not suit, at least my loyalty, to impute.

For my part, I wish to see the authority on which the President has made this assertion; in what way our neutrality has been guaranteed, and by what nicely adjusted contrivance of diplomatic ingenuity he has made that neutral, which bears on its front a flagrant violation of our pacific relations. The assertion of the President might be consoling enough to the gentleman from New York, but I confess I should like to deduce this security for my country, from the facts incident to the invitation, from the documents and correspondence between the South American Republics and our own Government, and, if possible, from the powers which may be given to our Ministers. In this view, how exceedingly pertinent is the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania. Its peculiar fitness and propriety must be acknowledged by all, except those who are willing to accept a modicum, at best, and to take all the rest upon trust.

But the gentleman from New York obviously entertains the opinion, that, although the primary and leading object of the Congress may be to deliberate on the most effectual means of annoying Old Spain, we can, nevertheless, participate in these most pacific deliberations with perfect safety—if we only make a timely protest of our neutrality! He seems to have forgotten, with all his knowledge of the sessions, the penalty of those who unwittingly keep riotous and bad company. I will propound a case for the professional consideration of the gentleman. Suppose, in the village in which he lives, there should occur one of those things which, in my country, we technically call a row, in which divers breaches of the peace should be made, some hard blows given, and some blood spilt. If, in the midst of this affray, one of the gentleman's clients should come up, and ask him for a legal opinion, "whether he could, with safety, take part in these deliberations?" Would the gentleman reply—"yes, with perfect safety, provided when you get fairly into the thickest of the affray, you lift up your hands and make proclamation of your neutrality." No, the gentleman from New York is too sagacious to give such counsel. He would tell him to "take himself home, and mind his business, if he loved peace and whole bones; that a man caught in the fact of cabaling and confederating among rioters, must take the belaboring a court of justice is apt, in these cases, to decree."

Whether the declared objects of the Congress (in the event of our participation) did not put us in the penal condition of those who associate, after full knowledge, with rioters, was a point altogether aside from his present purpose to discuss, although, he apprehended, if such was his object, the conventions and State papers of the parties would bear him out, not a little way, in deducing such a conclusion.

For my part, said Mr. H., I frankly confess that I wish to see, if, by lending our countenance to a Holy Alliance on this side of the water, we are to be put on worse terms with the Holy Alliance on the other; as it happened that some of the members of the latter owe us money. Our merchants have claims upon them. I wish to ascertain whether this volunteer, in behalf of South America, will coax France and Naples into a better paying humor. Let us, then, have all the information which can tend to show how one Holy Alliance is to be arrayed against the other.

Mr. WEBSTER then rose. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, that the present call on the President for the correspondence in relation to the Congress at Panama, reminds him strongly of a resolution I once had the honor to submit to this House. That case and this, are, in that gentleman's sober, close and tenacious judgment, very closely connected. The gentleman says, that my resolution "was still-born; that it had no funeral, no undertaker; and that it was carried out and buried at the bottom of the garden." But, sir, so far as I recollect, we had not the pleasure at that time, of hearing from the honorable gentleman. The gentleman himself seemed then to be as still as if he himself was dead and laid at the bottom of the garden; and ever since the gentleman has been as much under a cloud as my resolution itself.

As to the gentleman from South Carolina, who has just taken his seat, he embarrasses me exceedingly, as I always am embarrassed when I have to decide between two opposite propositions of one and the same gentleman. Sir, the very clause proposed to be stricken out, was in the gentleman's own proposition, as he presented it himself to the House. In now inserting it, I am but the humble imitator of that gentleman: he put these words in his resolution, and, through all the processes of repudiation or adoption, or both, I have never heard till now that he thinks them wrong. The honorable gentleman must pardon me, therefore, sir, if I take the liberty of thinking that his first opinion was right; nor can he take it as hard that the House should be in favor of his own proposition, and against the amendment. The ground on which the words in question were, and still ought to be inserted, is, that such is the ordinary, and, I believe, the invariable practice. We shall certainly, sir, manifest a most extraordinary want of confidence, indeed, in the Executive, if we send this resolution to a select committee, with instructions to strike out the clause which leaves it to his discretion to judge how much of the correspondence may be communicated without detriment to the public good. Sir, do we doubt? Do gentlemen sincerely feel any doubt, and do they wish publicly to express any doubt, that the President will deal fairly with us? If gentlemen do not wish this, the words of the clause are unquestionably proper, and ought to be inserted.

Congress of Panama.

Mr. Cook said, it struck him, that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, in submitting this motion, did not perceive, what he thought must be most apparent, that it would defeat that part of the resolution which that gentleman was willing to adopt. The object of the first part of the resolution is, that the President of the United States shall communicate to us such correspondence between this Government and the Governments of South America, touching the objects and designs of that Congress, as will not be inconsistent with the public good to communicate. And why had we adopted any discretionary clause in this part of the resolution? First, because it was the usual mode, and because the Congress of the United States, in making calls of this character, look on the President as responsible to the people of the Union, having the same interest at stake, and responsible in the same manner that we are to the people; and that he will, therefore, communicate to us all those circumstances proper for us to have, and which it is not inconsistent with the public welfare to communicate. And, secondly, it is predicated on the supposition that the President will do his duty. We call for information as to the objects and views of this Congress at Panama, and leave it to the President to exercise his discretion, in withholding from the public such parts of the correspondence as had passed between him and those Governments, which could not, in justice to those Republics, be published; they did not suppose, when they corresponded with us as friends, and placed confidence in us, that we would betray any of their secrets entrusted to our keeping, by publishing any thing that it was improper for the world to see. On this second ground, Mr. C. said, the discretionary clause in the resolution must be based. What would be the effect of expunging that part of the resolution which was sought to be expunged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? It would tend to deprive the Executive of the exercise of this sound and wholesome discretion, of withholding from the public such portions of the objects our Ministers are to be instructed to accomplish, as would not be proper to be communicated, and which it would be doing an injustice to those Governments to publish: for, after we had been furnished with all the information touching this subject, in giving the information sought for by the honorable gentleman, if there was any thing in relation to those Governments which ought not to be published, the President must, necessarily, if he felt bound by the resolution, disclose it to us. By this proposed amendment, we say in one breath you may save the secrets of these Governments; and in the next breath you say, they shall come out. There would be, he thought, an inconsistency in the resolution; if any part should be expunged, the whole should be expunged; they were so closely connected, it was impossible to separate them.

But, Mr. C. said, this was a new feature in this resolution, as was said by the gentlemen from Massachusetts and New York. It implied a want of the usual confidence which the people and the Congress of the United States have always placed in the Executive of this country. It implies a belief that he will not do justice to this House, or in good faith discharge his duty. Was there any thing, Mr. C. asked, in the nature of things in the situation of that officer, or in the situation of the country, to justify such an apprehension? Was there any thing in the situation of that officer, either personally or in relation to the people of this country, that would justify it? He thought there was not. What is it that he has informed us? That he has accepted an invitation—not that he is disposed to press into this Congress—but he has accepted a friendly invitation for the appointment of Ministers to join it, and in due time he would call on this House to give its aid; and it was most probable, it was reasonable and just to believe, that, when the President asks us to furnish him this auxiliary aid, to carry his design into execution, he would furnish us with all the information which he might deem necessary to do justice to the subject. He believes that the appointment of these Ministers will have a salutary effect on the public interests of this country; and, in accomplishing that purpose, he knows that he must have the aid of this House, and he will furnish with all the light, with all the information, that he thinks necessary to guide us to a just decision on the subject. Should we not be satisfied, we may withhold the appropriation: for the constitution has placed this defeating power with the Representatives of the people.

There was nothing, Mr. C. said, to justify the opinion that any bad faith was intended; yet this proposition itself implied a belief that the Executive intended to act with bad faith towards us. When this proposition was first made, we were informed that this information would be furnished in due season—and what was its situation then? The Executive, conceding to the invitation, proposed to nominate to the Senate Ministers to this Congress. It appeared from his message, that, having made up his mind on the subject, he intended to make a speedy nomination, and the subject-matter may be depending before the Senate; and, if this is the fact, it might be the reason of his not sending a message to this House. But we are told we are to be called on to act on this subject. The season is advancing, and gentlemen say, on all sides, this is a very important subject; but we don't wish to stay here till January next, to decide this question; we want information on which to act.

Mr. O. said he had reason to entertain the expectation that this communication would be made voluntarily, in due season, by the President; and yet there might now be circumstances, which, in the exercise of that comity which ought always to subsist between him and the other branch of the Executive, would forbid it; and yet those circumstances might not be, as he thought they were not, entitled to any weight here. We have to act, and are entitled, when we desire it, to information. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. O. said, in aid of the argument which he had advanced in the House, to show that there was an intention to operate on the public feeling, had thought proper to refer to a subject of a former date. Mr. O. remarked, on that subject, that he was not aware that it was intended, as the gentleman had intimated, to have some operation on some great political movement. I know of no such design, said Mr. O., but perhaps the gentleman is more fortunate than I am; yet I ought to be supposed to understand the motive of the proposition, seeing that I advocated it. I was not governed by any consideration of that sort. I was governed by my convictions, founded on such information as I had, that the measure was a proper one, and that we were doing in that instance nothing more than had been done to the Governments of the South at a former period. If I was in error, it was an error of judgment and not of intention.

In relation to all this matter, touching the effect it was to have on the Holy Alliance, and on the interests and peace of this country, which had been so much dwelt upon in this debate, on a mere call for information, Mr. O. said he should not venture to form any opinion till he was in possession of the necessary information as to the nature of the Congress, and the objects to be attained by sending our Ministers there; then he would carefully examine the subject, as one determined to act rightfully, and if he found that any pernicious effects were likely to result, then he should vote against making any appropriation. Let them have the information, and then they should proceed to deliberate on the subject fairly and calmly, and free from any other feelings than those which influenced men devoted to the interests of their country. He thought it was not entirely wise to make up an opinion in the dark; it looked like prejudging the matter; and after gentlemen had expressed opinions on the main question, either one way or the other, they were not likely to be so open to the influence of reason as if they remained free and uncommitted. He thought it was due to the subject, and eminently due to themselves, that they should, when all the facts were before them, be free and unprejudiced on the subject. To be so was indispensable, in order to arrive at a just conclusion on the subject.

Mr. SPRAGUE said he did not rise to discuss the subject of the Panama mission, under the present motion, but because the question before the House presented itself to his mind in a different view from that which other gentlemen had taken of it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. INGHAM,) the mover of the amendment, has told us that the question is, "Shall we have more or less information?" Is it? Why do we request the President, instead of directing or commanding him? Is it not because we have no right to command him; because he is as independent in his sphere as we are in ours? He is bound to execute his high trust in the manner which, in his sober judgment, shall best conduce to the interests of the nation. Suppose, then, we request the President, in the most unqualified terms, to send us all the information; and he, with the whole before him, shall firmly believe that, to disclose it, would be of essential injury to the public interests; violate our faith to foreign nations—would he not be bound, in the discharge of his duty, to withhold it? If, then, the President shall perform his duty, and I firmly believe that he will, conscientiously and independently, the same information will be communicated, whether the qualifying clause shall be stricken out or not. The extent of information to be obtained does not depend upon the terms of the resolution. Still I do not consider the phraseology a matter of form only; and if it did appear to be so, it would not be wise unnecessarily to depart from the established forms of official intercourse. Such a deliberate departure, at this time, must indicate something—I need not say what I apprehend that the clause now proposed to be stricken out, was originally adopted by the members of the House, not only because it was respectful to the Chief Magistrate, but, also, out of respect to themselves. They were unwilling to make an improper request. They would not subject themselves to the imputation of asking the President to do that which it might be his duty to refuse; they, therefore, used such language as restricted the request within its proper limits, and left to the Executive the free exercise of his legitimate powers. Why should we now depart from a precedent so long established? It is answered that this is a new case. The same may be said of every question under any new circumstances. If this identical case has not before arisen, there have been many so similar and analogous as to govern the present. This refers only to our foreign relations, and missions deeply affecting those relations have been of frequent recurrence. Again, it is said that we should disregard precedent, because this is a subject of transcendent importance. If the view which I have taken be correct, the importance of the proposed mission has no bearing upon the question, since the extent of our information will not be affected by the amendment. But, is this a matter of such unparalleled importance? Was there never a case of equal magnitude in our history? It is said we were about to change our national policy. Of this I can see no evidence, and do not believe it. If it were so, is the question, whether we shall change our policy, of greater magnitude than was the original question, whether we should first adopt it? When, during the late war, Commissioners were empowered to negotiate for peace, and form a treaty which might affect all the vital interests of the nation, was it a matter of less importance to us than the sending of Ministers to Panama? I cannot consider this a subject of such overwhelming magnitude as gentlemen have represented it. I see nothing in the present conjuncture, of that imperious necessity which disregards all law and all precedent: and believing that the proposed amendment will produce no good, but much evil, I shall vote against it.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, said, that, in some respects, he considered this amendment in the same light with the gentleman from Maine. He held, that each branch of the Government is responsible for its own acts, and each had its own distinct rights and powers. The Executive is possessed of the information which is asked by this House; but, if he does not think proper to communicate it, he has the right of refusing. The amendment, therefore, in its effect, must be perfectly nugatory, and, in that view, he was unwilling to vote for it. But, Mr. M. said, there were two points of view in which he considered the amendment as highly necessary. The first of these had respect to the honorable mover. That gentleman wished that the resolution should be referred to a Select Committee, that the discretionary clause might be stricken out. Now, as it was a matter to Mr. M. of entire indifference, and would, in effect, be the same, whether the clause was stricken out or not, he said he would vote for the reference, out of respect for that gentleman's wishes. But there was another ground, on which it might be proper to strike out this clause. Doing so, might have a tendency more fully to express to the President what are the wishes of this House. It would manifest that the House is desirous of having all the information which pertains to the subject. And for his own part, Mr. M. said, he was free to confess that he would not vote for this mission, unless he was fully convinced that he had all the information respecting it, which the Executive has. What is it (asked Mr. M.) that we require? In the first place we ask for the whole of the correspondence which relates to this invitation; and is there any member of this House, who will be willing to vote an appropriation for the mission, unless he has the whole of this correspondence before him? We ask, in the next place, to be told what are the objects of this Congress: and will any member vote for the mission without knowing them? We ask, what are to be the powers of the Ministers who are sent: and will any gentleman be willing to vote an appropriation to send them, who does not know what is to be the extent of their powers? Whoever may be willing to do so, I am not. It is very true that we have no right to demand these instructions from the President; but it is also true, that I will not vote without them. And this, I think, is the precise limit of the respective powers of these two branches of the Government: that the President of the United States may refuse to communicate to this House, the information it asks respecting this mission, and, if he does, the House of Representatives may refuse to vote for the appropriation for that purpose. Sir, I absolutely disclaim all opposition to this mission. I do not, as yet, know what are its specific objects; and I surely, therefore, cannot be opposed to them. A gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) has represented it as a measure founded in a great and enlightened policy—if it be so, none will be more delighted to see it prevail than I shall be: for I will support any Administration which acts on such policy. But, if it is a measure fraught with all the direful and disastrous consequences predicted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) may God give me power to resist it with my life. I certainly would not wilfully show any disrespect for the President. I should consider it unworthy of my own character, as well as unworthy of this House, to do so: but I wish, from the sincerity of my heart, that the President may send us the whole of the information we desire—and I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH did not attach any consequence to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, so far as it could practically affect the information to be procured. The subject was of such a character, that it must be the duty of the President to give the House the fullest information. In presuming that this would be done, Mr. F. only presumed that the President understood, and would do his duty. While he considered the amendment proposed of no immediate practical consequence, yet, as a matter of principle, he was in favor of it; and he rose chiefly to remove the impression made by the very imposing, but, as he thought, very inaccurate statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) The gentleman presented the subject to the House as if it were precisely the question presented by the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina, in which it is alleged the words referring to the discretion of the President, were introduced. The resolution now before us embraces two distinct calls. The first, like that of the gentleman from South Carolina, for correspondence, or parts of correspondence, in relation to the Congress of Panama. The second, altogether different: for an explanation of the objects the President has in view in accepting the invitation to send Deputies to that Congress. So far as regards the first part, the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts was perfectly accurate. The discretionary words were proper in both, and no motion has been made to strike them from the resolution before the House. The motion is to strike them from the second part of the resolution, into which they had been carefully introduced. The gentleman alleges, as the reason for their introduction, that it is usual, according to ordinary forms, in such cases. This is certainly incorrect. The occasion is extraordinary. The call, like the occasion, is extraordinary. The ordinary rule cannot properly apply to it. Similar words are found in ordinary calls for diplomatic information—not that their introduction is courteous to the Executive Magistrate, but because the House well knows that the correspondence of our Ministers, with their own and foreign Governments, necessarily contain various matters and allusions, the disclosure of which would be injurious to the public interest, and could not be useful to the House. We do not ask for instructions from our Government to our Ministers, because they necessarily contain the details of the manner in which our wishes are to be obtained, and contain also a statement of all that we want to accomplish, and the least that we will be satisfied to obtain. Another reason for not usually asking instructions is, that we cannot, except in extraordinary cases, make any constitutional use of them if they were presented to us. The reference to the discretion of the President, is not matter of courtesy, but of utility, and regulated by the answer to the simple question, can there be any proper motive for withholding any part of the information desired? There is none. There can be no want of courtesy presumed from the omission of the words proposed to be erased. What injury can arise from an explanation of all our objects in going to the proposed Congress? Mr. F. had tasked his imagination in vain, to discover what legitimate object could be contemplated that might not safely, and ought not properly, to be disclosed to the House. He took it for granted, that the invitation to us to attend, explained the objects of the powers who gave it, in desiring us to be represented; and also, that the acceptance explained our objects in consenting to be present. Supposing any thing to be omitted, the first step of our Deputies, on their arrival, would be a disclosure of what we desire to know—the objects of their deputation. The disclosure now cannot be injurious in its effects, since all that will be known to us, is already, or will be, immediately, known to the other powers. If we intend to make commercial treaties—and this occasion is deemed propitious—this might be stated without injury to us or to our neighbors.

Mr. WEBSTER said, that he rose to offer a few remarks in reply to the observations of the gentleman who had just taken his seat; and, in doing so, would endeavor, as nearly as he could, to follow the course of those observations. The gentleman, it would seem, admits that the amendment under consideration, is not likely to be of practical importance in the present case; but he supports it on the ground of pure principle. Well, sir, on the ground of principle, then, I consider it as of importance that this House, when it calls at all for papers should make the call with the usual reference to the constitutional discretion, which belongs to the President of the United States, and subject to the limitation which that discretion may dictate. The gentleman says, that I have not stated the case accurately in respect to the history of this motion and its original shape: and that, although at first, the insertion of the clause might have been very proper, yet now the ground is changed, and it has become improper; and that there is no precedent to support it. And the gentleman bars all inference from cases merely analogous, and calls for a precedent that shall be identical with this case. He forewarns the House against being misled by a lawyer's argument, from analogy. Doubtless, sir, this would be very convenient to the gentleman's argument; especially if it be coupled with his other position, that the case is new. If no precedent deserve regard, but one to be found in precisely such a case, or the same case, and if no such case exists, the inference is very easy, that there is no room for the influence of precedent. And if the premises be true, the inference would hold always, and in all cases: for no two are exactly alike. But that plain rule, which the gentleman calls a lawyer's argument, is somewhat in his way. This teaches us that precedent is applied from one case to another, not where the cases are precisely the same, but where the principle is the same. In other words, that a just and proper analogy is fair ground of argument.

Now, sir, in this case, a resolution has been introduced, requesting certain information, or certain correspondence, on a subject affecting our foreign relations, to be communicated, with the insertion of the usual clause, leaving it to the discretion of the Executive to judge how far such information or correspondence could be communicated, without injury to the public interests. To this resolution, the House has now added, in substance, a new paragraph, requesting other and further information, on precisely the same subject; and, as matter of course, I added to this second call, the usual words of qualification.

Both paragraphs respect our foreign relations: both respect the same branch of those relations: both respect the same identical subject. What reason, then, can there be for striking out the qualifying words in the last paragraph? This is closer than common analogy: it would seem to be, as nearly as possible, the same case; the two calls are but parts of one call, on one subject. My argument is, that, being introduced into the first resolution, (now the first branch of the present resolution,) they are equally proper in the added part, (or that which is now the second branch of the resolution.) How is it shown that the qualification is proper in one part, and not in the other? Suppose this were the case of an ordinary mission, (and, in principle, it is the same thing as if it were any of our missions to Europe,) I ask, would it be constitutional, in this House, to ask the President to disclose, particularly, and without reserve, all the objects he had, at a given time, in view, in that negotiation? Surely not. It cannot be pretended. But the gentleman tells us that, as the latter part of the resolution asks for more than is usual, it is, on that account, not to be made subject to a discretionary clause. Now, sir, to me, this appears to be an argument for directly an opposite inference. I think that, for that very reason, it ought to be subject to, at least, all the usual qualifications. If the call, itself, be for more than is usual, it is a stronger case than usual for the qualifications.

FEBRUARY, 1826.]

Congress of Panama.

I agree, sir, that it is very desirable we should have all the knowledge on this subject which we can properly possess: but the question is, whether we shall not make the same reference to the Executive discretion, in this, that we do in all other cases? It is said, we must not; but that we should call for the entire correspondence, and all the objects, specific and in detail, of the Congress, and all the powers of the Ministers who are to be sent there. Sir, the President may have the best reasons for withholding these, or some of them. It is very probable that, in the progress of events, his own views may change, with changing circumstances. New relations may arise: and whenever any such changes happen, is he expected to come again with his objects, and his details, to this House? The gentleman himself admits, that the omission of the clause will do little or no good, as to obtaining what we want for the present occasion. I hope, then, we shall not set a general precedent of this character. In one respect, I agree entirely with the gentleman: it is when he says, that, after all, it must remain discretionary with the President to make a full communication or not. But, sir, who doubts that the President will make the communication, and that he will make it as full as can be desired? Is it not his interest to do so? Must it not be his desire to do so? Must he not know that in this, as in every thing, he can only stand firmly, while he stands on the enlightened approbation of an enlightened people? Dares any man doubt that the President is as willing to shed light on this subject, as the humblest citizen can be to receive light? The gentleman says, it is recommended to repose implicit confidence in the Executive. Sir, I have not heard it recommended, by anybody here, to repose implicit confidence: I have only heard it said, that we ought to repose the ordinary confidence which we repose on other occasions, and that we ought not to exhibit extraordinary diffidence. I object only to unreasonable jealousy, and premature suspicion. Let us go on, then, with the call, in the ordinary manner. I only repeat what I said early in the debate, that I act, and mean to act, without the least reference whatever to the manner in which others, in another place, may perform their duties. I look only to the duty incumbent on us, on a subject of high interest, and on which this House has a right to the information which may conduct it properly to the end of its deliberations.

Mr. POWELL said he was opposed to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote in opposition; but, from the course which had been adopted by gentlemen, during the discussion of this subject, and the extensive range of argument in which they had indulged, involving the policy of the Panama mission, it might probably be inferred, that, by voting in opposition to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the original resolution, he should be considered as pledged in relation to his final vote on the subject. To rebut any such implication, he now rose to detain the House a few moments, and to assign the reasons for the vote he intended to give.

The original object of the resolution moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAMILTON,) and the object of the amendment proposed, and now adopted, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, was to obtain such information as would enable us to proceed to the investigation of the subject of the proposed mission to Panama, and to act understandingly and correctly on the subject.

Mr. P. considered the whole course of the discussion, as to the policy of this mission to Panama, as premature, and unconnected with the real question which had been submitted to the consideration and determination of this House. The object of the resolution, he repeated, was to procure the necessary information to enable the House to understand the important question as to the policy of the recommended mission to Panama. It is evident, he said, that it was premature to go into such a discussion, without the lights to be calculated upon from the information the resolution asked for. Mr. P. asked what would be the practical effect of the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Would it afford to this House any further information than the House could or would derive from the Executive department, under the resolution as it now stands? By what process of reasoning could the gentleman bring his mind, or the minds of this House, to the conclusion that they would derive more information by giving the resolution a shape such as he contemplated, than by suffering it to remain in its present situation? The proposed alteration is only calculated to be operative as it implied a want of confidence in the President of the United States. It could, in fact, have no useful effect, except in reference to a dereliction of duty in that officer, if it could even have effect in that aspect: and although, Mr. P. said, he was not disposed to yield himself up implicitly, in relation to confidence in the President, or to pin his faith upon the head of any department of the Government, yet he was not disposed to withhold that confidence, unless he was warranted in so doing, by some information, or some fact, calculated to diminish reasonable and proper confidence. Was this House prepared now to say, that, by an official act of the President of the United States, he has justly forfeited that confidence which was due to him, and which ought to subsist between the co-ordinate branches of this Government? If any circumstance had taken place, which would warrant such a conclusion, Mr. P. said it had not reached his ear. So far as the President stands in relation to this House—so far his course had been of that character as not to destroy a reasonable and fair confidence in him. Thus, Mr. P. said, the necessary effect of the proposed amendment would be, to imply a want of proper confidence: because, if the President acts with good faith, the necessary result would be, that he would, upon the call recommended, communicate all the necessary information. It would only be in the event of his acting in bad faith, that he would withhold it—provided the safety and interests of the nation did not require him to do so. Surely such would be his course. If he should not act with good faith, could the House, or the gentleman, by giving his shape, or any other shape, to the resolution, make him observe good faith? No. If he were disposed to withhold the information from the House, or if he were disposed to make it his duty to the House, and its call, or to the nation, they could give no shape, however imperative it might be, to any resolution, to drive him from his course, and to act with good faith.

Mr. P. said he had no apprehensions that the President would not observe good faith to this House, in relation to this matter, and he hoped, sincerely, he should be able to say so hereafter, as it regarded every other great and important interest of the nation. If in this hope he should be mistaken, he should not be silent. Mr. P. repeated, that the proposition, if important, must be based on a want of confidence in the good faith of the President. If he acts with good faith, we shall have all the information he has, if it be safe and proper to communicate it, under the resolution as it now stands. He is a co-ordinate branch of the Government. His power to exercise discretion in this matter, is sanctioned by the example of Washington, and, in the exercise of that power, he will give or withhold information, whatever shape we may give the resolution, or whatever language we may employ. If we give the peremptory aspect to the resolution, that was asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would his object be more certainly attained? Mr. P. said, no. It could not alter the result, in any aspect in which he could view the subject. The President would either give or withhold, in reference to his own judgment, any portion of the information that he may think proper, in the exercise of his constitutional power. If the President, in violation of his high duties, intended to withhold from this House any information in relation to this subject, or any other, he should despair of removing the difficulty by the amendment proposed, or any other amendment that human ingenuity could shape or devise. We shall get the same information precisely, whether we adopt or reject the amendment: and, being worse than useless, he should vote against it.

Mr. DRAYTON observed, that it was certainly a subject of deep regret that so much time should be occupied by the discussion of a question like that which now occupied the House. For himself, he conceived that, as to substance, there was little difference between the resolution, as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and as already amended on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. But, two resolutions might differ very little in substance, and yet greatly vary in their import. The introduction of a single word, though it might not change the sense of a proposition, was often sufficient to present it in a different shape, and, by overloading a resolution with exceptions and provisos, if we do not entirely destroy its substance, we may greatly weaken its effect. Whether provisos were repeated ever so often, or whether they were not inserted at all, the practical result would be the same; because, let us put the call in the most imperative form we can conceive of, and let us insert into it a requisition for every document and paper, and for every species of information which can be imagined, would not the President, when he makes the communication, withhold such documents, papers, and information, as he supposed the public good required should not be communicated? No difference, therefore, as to the authoritative effect of the resolution, would result from agreeing or not agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. But there was another view in which this became of some importance. It is certainly proper that this call should be so framed as to show to the President whether we are anxious for this information or not; and to him it appeared that, if the proviso should be repeated in the resolution, the House would seem to express to the President that they wish him to be particularly careful as to the extent of his communication; and in this it appeared to him that the great difference consisted between the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts and that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If the former prevails, the Executive will perceive, on the face of the resolution, that the House feels lukewarm on the subject, and is disposed to furnish him with pretexts for not fully giving the information. But if the call is to go in the unqualified form desired by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, no such inference can legitimately be drawn.

In the course of this discussion, several remarks had been applied to his honorable friend and colleague, (Mr. HAMILTON,) who was not now in his place, in which he did not think that gentleman had been fairly treated. The resolution had been called his, and the gentleman from Massachusetts had said that his honorable friend had alternately adopted and repudiated his own offspring. But how had his colleague done this? Was it not from the first manifest, that, owing to causes which his friend, with his usual candor and frankness, had stated to the House, he did not think the House ought then to pass the resolution? A similar resolution was afterwards offered by another gentleman, and the question being put whether the two resolutions were not in substance the same, the Chair had decided that they were. And, with the consent of the mover of the latter resolution, the resolution of his colleague was considered before the House. What then was the conduct of his honorable friend? So little desirous had he been of being considered the author of a resolution which he had not pressed, that he wished to withdraw it, and suffer that of the gentleman from Kentucky to take its place. But this course was forbidden by a rule of the House. He was therefore obliged, by circumstances, to consider as his own, a resolution which he did not press, and which he, in fact, desired, should not, at that time, be considered. Now, every gentleman must know, that there was often as much consequence in the time at which a resolution is offered, as in the form which may be given to it. Various amendments were afterwards introduced, and as his friend was not permitted to withdraw his resolution, he consented to those amendments, under the impression that they improved the original resolution. Afterwards a proposition was offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which, though it had the form of an amendment, and by rule could only be received as such, was, in fact and in truth, a substitute for the resolution of his honorable friend. This new resolution contained a duplication of provisos, as to the discretion of the President in making the communication required, and this produced an essential difference in the tone and manner of the call. His friend was, therefore, justly entitled to consider this resolution not as his, though, in point of form and rule, it had to be so considered by the House, and he had an entire right to act toward it as if in fact it had been the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts. When, therefore, the gentleman from Massachusetts, in a vein of pleasantry, talked about his friend's adopting and repudiating his own offspring, he must have forgotten that he was himself the parent of the bantling which he assigned to another father.

Congress of Panama.

Mr. MITCHELL, of Tennessee, said: It is never too late to correct an error. Now, as to precedent, he thought it was impossible, in the annals of the history of this nation, we could get one for the subject now under discussion. They might look back to those annals, and they would not find even the vestige of one. When did ever a case like this present itself to the House? Where was one to be found, bearing a similitude to it? None, he was sure, had ever taken the devious and strange course which this proposition had taken. When it was first introduced, they had no feelings on the subject; but it was laid on the table, and there rested for a while: but it afterwards rose up, foaming, on them like soda-water. What was all this for? What was all this feeling manifested about? A while ago, they did not want the information, and now they do. If it was right formerly, it is right now. Mr. M. said he had asked for a little information on this subject, in the earlier part of this investigation, but he had received none. Why, therefore, was it asked for now? On the other hand, it was said, it was all right; it was quite consistent this information should be furnished; but, whatever you do, don't have too much of it; their eyes were weak, and they might have such a blaze of information as would palsy every exertion of their minds. Mr. M. said he thought he was able to resist this effulgence. But they were not to have it: for, if they did, they would become as wise as the President.

What is it, then, that gentlemen so much fear? Why is the resolution so guarded? In his mind, Mr. M. said, it was a sort of advertisement to the President, which says, we ask you to give information, but we don't want you to give all the information. Why were those words so often used? Why were they so tautological, unless with a view to communicate to him that, though you are asking for information, in truth you do not want it? There could be no other reason that he could see. The gentleman has said there could be no precedent for this mission. Mr. M. would tell him, in reply, that such a case had never occurred, and if it had not occurred, how could they expect to find a precedent for it? The gentleman from New York said, a case might present itself, where this course might probably be thought necessary; but Mr. M. said, if there was any case on this earth that presented itself for the deliberations of freemen, that required a fair investigation of its whole contents, this was one.

What was it they were about to do? Mr. M. said he would take up the President's language, and on that he would view the matter.

[Here Mr. M. quoted that part of the President's Message, which relates to the mission to Panama.]

This was what the President had said, and this was the foundation of all this inquiry, this argument, this expression of feeling, this brawling for the question. Look at it for a moment, and what was it? The President says we are to partake in the deliberations of this Amphio-tyonic council, but we are to take special care not to violate the neutrality which we hold to England, to Spain, and other powers. This, it was said, was not a Holy Alliance; but, if it was not a holy one, it must be unholy.

The President had told us, we were to participate in the deliberations; ergo, in the debates of this Congress; and we must, therefore, have some Nestor, some Socrates there, some philosopher of the old times, whose mind was so trained that he would not deviate a hair's breadth from the line of conduct he ought to pursue. This was a good cause, Mr. M. said, why they should make the inquiry in the most peremptory manner, why he had accepted the invitation. We could not possibly interfere in their concerns and conclusions, without taking part, one way or the other; and he begged leave to call the attention of the House to the language of one, whose spirit perhaps hovered over this assembly, which he was the very means of founding: they ought to reflect and deliberate coolly, agitated by none of those feelings of asperity towards the powers that be; neither were they to enlogize, and place unbounded confidence in the same power; but they should act, as it became Americans to act—as Representatives of a free and enlightened people, to whom they were to give an account of their conduct; as well as to that tribunal, to the bar of which they must all, sooner or later, appear.

[Here Mr. M. quoted that part of Washington's Farewell Address, which relates to the policy to be pursued by America towards foreign powers.]

Let us, said Mr. M., be free from entangling alliances; let us be distinct, as our motto imports: "E Phœbus Unum"—one amongst many; let us be as a towering beacon to man in pursuit of liberty; but never let us mingle in the disputes of other nations, and involve ourselves in their policy. Our distinct situation requires us to take care of our own concerns, and not to meddle with those of other nations.

Why were we to send Ministers there? The President has said it shall be done, and the gentleman from New York has said, we ought to have unbounded faith. Mr. M. said he was no sceptic; he had as much faith as that gentleman could reasonably expect, in the President of the United States, though he had been denounced in some of the little hireling prints, (he did not allude to those in the city of Washington,) as an oppositionist. He repelled the foul charge. He would have taken the same course he had done if he had been raised at the foot of Quincy Hill; but because he was a Tennessean, because he was free, and was not ashamed to speak what he thought right, he was to be set down as an oppositionist. He would, he said, support the Administration where he thought it was in the right, and he would oppose it where he thought it was wrong; and he would have opposed the administration of his friend, General Jackson, had he attained that high station, with the same feeling that he would the present Administration, if he believed they were acting wrong. He believed, in his conscience, and before God, they ought to have all the information on this subject; all that the President is possessed of, they ought to have. They have been forced, prematurely, into this question. They were anticipating the measure, running into the investigation of a subject before them, except as it would operate in the minds of the public, or somewhere else, and there was no use in it; but if they were to have information, he asked for the whole of it, and if this was not a case where the necessity existed of calling on the President, he would ask the gentleman to point out one to him where it would exist. It was one, he thought of the most important character to the liberties of this country; and there was not, he imagined, one that would come within the grasp of the human mind, which would present stronger results.

Hitherto, Mr. M. said, we had remained free from entangling alliances; we stand alone; we have given the nations of the South the recognition of their independence; we have given them the light of our experience; we have extended the right hand of fellowship to them; and what more had they a right to ask or expect at our hands? But now we are to be placed in a different situation. The President has pledged himself that we shall meet them in this council, and we, the Representatives of the people, are asking for the grounds on which this solemn promise was made. Those who have spoken most in his favor, say he is willing to do it, but, at the same time, they put a kind of silent advertisement into the resolution, which says, don't do it. Was it not right, Mr. M. said, standing, as we did, distinct from all the nations of the earth, that we should have all the information on which this solemn pledge had been given? Let it come, said then, he might be one of the first to say that the President had the best reasons for pursuing the course he had done. All the difficulties in his mind might be removed when it was presented; but, in the name of God, let them have the whole, and not a part of it. If the President had the power of withholding it now, he would have the same power in future, and they would not get it. Mr. M. did not intend to commit himself as to the course he should pursue in relation to this measure. It might possibly happen that light might come which would dissipate the mist which was now spread before his eyes, and he should then be enabled to decide on the course he was to take.

Mr. THOMSON, of Pennsylvania, rose, and observed, that he should not detain the House one minute. If he could agree with his colleague (Mr. INGHAM) as to the construction to be given to the restrictive clause in the resolution, he should vote with him; but he was not of opinion that that clause, where it occurs in the first part of the resolution, covers all the residue. This, however, said Mr. T., was not the reason which induced me to take the floor at this late hour. [It was now past four o'clock.] One thought had struck him, which had been suggested by a very weighty remark made yesterday by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) who observed, that it was of the utmost consequence that this Government, when acting towards foreign nations, should present a firm, unbroken front. Now, supposing the amendment of my colleague to prevail, and the restrictive clause, where it last occurs, to be in consequence stricken out; suppose the President, when he receives our unqualified call, as to the objects of the Congress, and the powers of our Ministers, shall refuse to make any communication of them. We shall then have to settle the question, whether this House shall submit to such refusal, or whether it shall repeat its application to the President. Two co-ordinate branches of the Government will then be brought face to face, in open conflict. Sir, said Mr. T., I do not wish to see my country placed in such an attitude before the world; and that I may give no possible pretext for a contest of this sort, I shall, though reluctantly, vote against the amendment of my colleague.

Mr. FLOYD then took the floor. He observed that, as there had been already two calls for the previous question, he was warned to say but little now. He was at a loss, for his part, in what attitude this call for information was now to be considered. He believed that all agreed that the subject was new, when it first came up. One gentleman from Louisiana has made a speech very logically on the subject—he tells us, said Mr. F., that our Ministers are to go to Panama to make a figure; that it will be a great spectacle; that we are to exhibit ourselves to the Spanish provinces, and to all Europe, as a spectacle. On this he would say a little more presently. In the meanwhile, we are admonished that we must be very respectful to the President of the United States. We are not to ask any thing too rudely. We must sit here and take just such information as he pleases to communicate, and no more. We were told yesterday, by one gentleman, a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that he had been present, constantly, during every moment of the session of that committee, and that not one word was said about applying to the President for this information; but that the chairman of that committee had given them to understand—"informally," he believed, he did not know whether that was the exact phrase, "semi-officially," perhaps—that the President had said, as soon as the resolution should pass the Senate, he would then make a communication to the House; and all we good friends of the Administration think it is respectful and proper to wait his good pleasure. How is it, then, that this question has now taken a different turn? A gentleman from Kentucky, who, I suppose, is better acquainted than we, in these matters, has told us that we must whip the Senate, and urge them on, when they do not subserve the proper ends which the President has in view; that we must send these documents abroad to the people, and let public opinion react and coerce the Senate. This is the idea, it seems. The same thing was told us by the gentleman from Louisiana; and that he expected the House of Representatives would have nothing to do with interfering with the treaty-making power. And is it to be expected, said Mr. F., that the House of Representatives is to be arrayed against the Senate? And for what purpose? Because the Senate does not subserve the President's purpose? That is the truth of it. Has the gentleman from Louisiana ascertained that the palace guards have been overthrown? That the Praetorian cohorts have fled? Or, will he, like Cæsar, say to the Senate, if you won't go, I will take the tenth legion, and go alone—to make a spectacle! The gentleman has told us that Mr. Sergeant, the gentleman named for the mission, is a patriot, a great lawyer, and a man of talents. I believe it—at least the two last. We are acquainted with the gentleman here. We knew him as the great champion of the Missouri question, which the Speaker had the honor to introduce into this House, in which he was supported by Mr. KIRK, in the Senate, who is at present our Minister at London. That was a really important question—more so than this. Sir, I thought, then, that if that question had been pressed farther than it was, it would have put an end to this Union; and I still think, that, if these gentlemen had carried their point, the Union would have been gone. We should have made a spectacle no more. A great spectacle! The gentleman tells us a great deal about national gratitude. Twenty-six millions of people are to rise up, and to invite us to come and make a figure. Sir, I am not in favor of sending Ministers there to make a spectacle.

After some observations in reference to the obligations of neutrality, Mr. F. said, that, by the third article of the treaty, among these Spanish provinces, it is proposed to invite all the States of America to assemble in Congress, there to form a union, offensive and defensive—for that is the amount of it, though not the precise words. The gentleman would send Ministers there to make a spectacle—to witness all the burning lava that may issue from that crater. If we are to do this—if we are to enter into a confederacy with these States, what shall we not have reason to apprehend? The constitution has granted to this House the power to make peace and war. But by these arrangements at Panama, we may be brought into war with any power that shall go to war with either of these States of South America. If any one among them break the treaty, forthwith we are at war. That would be another spectacle. Can I consent to that? And do gentlemen expect that I will undertake to decide on this question with less information to guide me than the President has given to the Senate? No, sir. The President must give me the same light he gave to them. But it is said the President does not ask our opinion; and that it is gratuitous, on our part, to interfere. Recollect, sir, the Senators of the United States are not mere machines, and component parts of the Executive. They belong, also, to the States of this Union, and are responsible to them.

I hope some Mason will be found in that body to develop to the people the true design of this mission, which some gentlemen seem to be so anxious to conceal from the nation. No one knows better than the gentleman from Louisiana the effect of such a disclosure.

Mr. F. put it to every gentleman's common sense, whether he can believe that Ministers were to be sent to this Congress for the ordinary purposes of a foreign mission? The South American Governments send to our Secretary of State an invitation to attend this Congress. The Secretary of State is directed, by the President, to reply, that we will attend it. Their Ministers write back, and say, "This is all very well—we shall be happy to see you." Sir, I am as much attached to the cause of Spanish liberty as other gentlemen; yet, with me, my own country is to be preferred before all others. Suppose the famous Congress at Panama shall contemplate the conquest of Cuba or Porto Rico. I put it to the gentleman, whether he would consent to be a party to it? Whatever he may consent to, I certainly shall not. I am not going to compromise the peace of this country, and run all the risks of a foreign alliance. As for the Holy Allies, if they choose to remain quiet, and manage their own affairs in their own way, I have no objection to their doing so. I am not disposed to undertake to force them to be republics. But, it appears by the arguments of the gentleman, that our Ministers are to produce some change in these people's religion—they are to be a sort of missionaries, and to bring them over from the Catholic faith. Now, sir, unlike the gentleman from Louisiana, I would as soon they should be Catholics as any thing else. That is their own affair: it belongs to their own conscience, and we have nothing to do with it. But the gentleman is for teaching them the principles of toleration. Sir, the gentleman had better begin and send his Ministers to Maryland, where men are cut off from the enjoyment of civil rights, on account of their religious faith, (unless some change has been made this winter.) A gentleman near me says the same is the case in North Carolina; and, in Tennessee, unless I am greatly mistaken, no man is allowed to hold any public office, who does not allow the existence of a God, or who disbelieves the authenticity of the Bible. And yet the Representatives of these very States tell us we must go to South America, to teach them toleration and religious liberty, when we don't practise them ourselves.

Another gentleman tells us, that we must go there to give efficacy to the message of the late President Monroe, about not seeing, with indifference, the independence of these States assailed—which sentiment, it is said, everybody approved. Sir, I was then in the House, and recollect, that, amidst all the wild and enthusiastic movements which then took place, although I agreed to the sentiment in the proposition, I rose in my place, and protested against the President's committing the peace of the United States by his declarations. But the case is now quite different: then, the people of Europe had just been successful against the Great Man of the World, and there was reason to suppose that they would be for pushing their triumphs on this side the Atlantic. Here, then, was cause enough why we should be inclined to defend the cause of South American liberty, because it might obviate the necessity of ultimately defending our own. But, even in such a case, I would not rashly commit the peace of my country.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. INGHAM to refer Mr. HAMILTON's resolution to a Select Committee, with instructions to strike out the clause which reserves to the President the discretion of communicating so much of the information called for, as he may judge not consistent with the public interest to be communicated, where that clause applies to the powers to be given to the Ministers, &c.; and was decided by yeas and nays,—71 to 28.

So the motion to recommit was negatived.

The question now recurred on the main resolution, as amended on the motion of Mr. WINSTER, in the following form:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before this House so much of the correspondence between the Government of the United States and the new States of America, or their Ministers, respecting the proposed Congress, or meeting of Diplomatic Agents, at Panama, and such information respecting the general character of that expected Congress, as may be in his possession, and as may, in his opinion, be communicated without prejudice to the public interest; and also to inform the House, so far as in his opinion the public interest may allow, in regard to what objects the Agents of the United States are expected to take part, in the deliberations of that Congress."

After ineffectual motions to adjourn, and for a call of the House, the question on the adoption of the resolution, as amended, was finally taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

MONDAY, February 6.

MR. GEORGE W. CRUMP, a member from Virginia, elected in the place of Mr. RANDOLPH, appeared, was sworn, and took his seat.

Mission to Guatemala.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the bill, by inserting a provision "for the outfit and one year's salary of a Minister to Central America." [The effect of this amendment, if it succeeded, would be to send a Minister, instead of a Chargé des Affaires, to Guatemala.]

Mr. FLOYD said, when our intercourse with the Governments of the South was about commencing, it seemed to be doubted, whether it was not proper, without waiting for Ministers from them, to send a Minister to each of them. This ceremony had, in relation to several of those Governments, been gone through. Last year, appropriations were made for the salaries and outfits of Chargés des Affaires to Guatemala and Peru, and Ministers of the first grade were not sent, because they had not sent Ministers to us. Since that time, however, a Minister had arrived here from Guatemala, and Mr. F. thought we ought to send a Minister there in return. This new Republic had given so many manifestations of a desire for the most friendly intercourse with us, that it was a respect due to her to send to her a Minister of equal grade with the one which she had sent to us. He was not prepared to say how far this rule should be extended, or how far the system of sending Ministers to those Governments should be continued.

He had heretofore had occasion to express to the House his opinion that so many Ministers as we now have abroad would not be always necessary. After diplomatic relations were once established with Guatemala, he did not know that it would be necessary to keep a Minister there. At present, however, justice and courtesy appeared to him to require that we should meet on equal terms the advances made by Guatemala.

Mr. WEBSTER said he wanted information on this subject, which he supposed it was in the power either of the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, or of the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to give. He had heard it said that it was the intention of the Government to reduce the grade of all the missions to South America to that of Chargé des Affaires. He hoped some gentleman would have it in his power to give the House information on this subject.

Mr. McLANE said, that the bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, was in conformity with the views of the Department of State, as understood by the Committee of Ways and Means. At the last session, or the session before, the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations had introduced a resolution, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reducing the expense of foreign intercourse. On that occasion a letter had been addressed by the Committee of Ways and Means to the Department of State, and information had been received, in answer, that it was the intention of the Executive to reduce the grade of these missions as soon as it could be conveniently done—if not in that year, in the next year. Before this bill was reported, Mr. McL. said, he had an interview with the Secretary of State respecting these appropriations. I understood from the Secretary, said Mr. McL., that, according to the views of the Department, two grades of diplomatic agents had been established—that of Minister Plenipotentiary, and that of Chargé des Affaires, and that it was not contemplated to send a Minister of higher grade than the second to any other places than those named in the bill; and, according to this disposition, Peru and Guatemala were placed amongst those Governments to which Ministers of the second grade were to be sent. This was all the information, Mr. McL. said, which he was able to give on this subject.

Mr. FORSTYTH said that the resolution referred to by the gentleman from Delaware, had been offered by him, as a member of this House, and not in his capacity of a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, or in consequence of any communication held by him with the Department of State. He understood, however, that it was supposed to be the intention of the Executive to reduce all our diplomatic functionaries in America to the grade of Chargé des Affaires. He was glad to hear it: for he was perfectly satisfied that now we have Ministers of the higher grade where the maintenance of a Minister of the first grade was perfectly useless. We have had one, for instance, for some time past, at Chili. What he has done, said Mr. F., I know not. I have not heard, however, any thing of a Minister being sent, in return, from that country to this. His own impression was, Mr. F. said, that there are points in South America where Ministers may be necessary; but he did not conceive that they were necessary at all points. Our relations with those Governments were not such as to require diplomatic agents of that grade to be sent to them. The principal argument in favor of sending Ministers was, he believed, founded on the idea of courtesy to the Southern Nations, which some supposed to require agents of that grade to be sent to open diplomatic intercourse with them. After this ceremony had been performed by the Minister to Chili, Mr. F. had supposed that he would be withdrawn, and a Chargé des Affaires sent in his place. Why this had not been done, Mr. F. could not tell.

Mr. FLOYD said, that no Ministers had been received here from Buenos Ayres or Chili, but to these Governments the United States had thought proper to send Ministers; and of course, he should suppose, in a case where a Minister had been actually received from one of those Governments, a Minister would be sent in return. Central America, he thought, was an important State, from its peculiar position, and ought to be treated at least with the same respect which she had tendered to us. How far it would be proper to continue a Minister there, he knew not. What was the intention of the President on the subject, the gentleman from Massachusetts probably knew at least as well as he did. This was a case, however, in which he thought every one might judge for himself.

Mr. TRIMBLE said his individual feeling would induce him to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, but he was not very sure that that would be the wisest course. He was very well satisfied that we ought, at all times, to keep a Minister in Mexico and Colombia, of the first grade. Whether this was necessary at the capitals of the other States, was a matter for consideration. He had heard, not as from the Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, nor at this session of Congress, that some of those Governments thought it advisable not to have Ministers of the highest grade sent to them, from considerations having reference to their own peculiar situation, the state of their finances, &c. He took it for granted that, in cases where the Executive proposed to send to any one of these Governments a Minister of grade inferior to that of the Minister which they sent to us, the Department of State had ascertained, beforehand, what would be acceptable to that Government. He presumed some such communication had taken place in the present case; and he should, therefore, be opposed to the amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. FLOYD's motion, and decided in the negative.

Some conversation then took place on the item of thirty thousand dollars, for contingent expenses of foreign missions abroad, the amount of which, Mr. FORTYTH thought unnecessarily large, in comparison with the appropriations of former years. Mr. McLEAN explained the disparity, as being produced by the increased number of those missions, and the reduced amount of the unexpended balance of that fund in this year. Mr. WOOD, as Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, bore testimony to the satisfactory manner in which those accounts were settled and kept, and to the regularity and precision of the receipts and vouchers, for the four years past that it had been his duty to have personal cognizance of the subject. No motion resulted from this conversation.

Postmaster General's Salary.

The item of four thousand dollars, for the salary of the Postmaster General, next coming under the consideration of the House—

Mr. NEWTON moved to strike out four and insert six thousand dollars, as the amount of salary for the Postmaster General. It is needless for me, said Mr. N., to state that that officer merits this increase of his salary; that, when he took charge of the Post Office, it was chaos—and that he has, by his talents and assiduity, reduced it to order; that he has augmented its income, and paid off its debts, at the same time that its operations have been greatly multiplied and extended.*

Mr. COOK suggested that the compensation of the Postmaster General is fixed, by a permanent law, at four thousand dollars per annum, and that the appropriation proposed by the bill only conformed to the law. He was himself decidedly of opinion that the services of the Postmaster General have been such, and his labor such, as to entitle him to a better compensation than that which the law allows to him. The better way to accomplish this object, however, would be to introduce a bill on the subject. If it could be accomplished in the way proposed, he would cheerfully vote for it: for he had some knowledge, and so had every member of this House, of the importance of the services of the Postmaster General—they were not exceeded in value by those of any other officer under this Government. He was entitled to praise for them, and to the thanks of his country.

Mr. ALSTON said it was certainly improper to attempt to augment the salary of the Postmaster General by an amendment to this bill: and he doubted very much, if the amendment were made, as proposed, whether the Postmaster General would derive any advantage from it: for the law defines the amount of his compensation, and the accounting officers will abide by that law, without reference to the amount of appropriation. Mr. A. said he believed that the present Postmaster General is as good an officer as we have in the Government. That, however, was not to determine the question involved in this amendment. The question was, is the sum now allowed by law, an adequate salary for the office of Postmaster General? If so, let him receive it, and no more. The amount is what he was to receive when he accepted the office; but, because he had done his duty better than those who had gone before him, it was now proposed to increase his salary. Mr. A. did not think this a correct principle to act upon in regard to the compensation of public servants.

Mr. Cook made some further observations, indicative of his desire to vote for this amendment, if it could be properly introduced into this bill. He spoke of the evidence afforded by official reports, and by his own personal observation, of his labors, of the devotion of Mr. McLane to his public duties. He believed, he said, that the Postmaster General performed more labor than any other officer under the Government, and labor as interesting to the country as that of any other officer.

Mr. Newton said he did not wish to embarrass this bill by any proposition likely to be questioned, and he therefore withdrew his motion; but he certainly should introduce it to-morrow, in the form of a distinct proposition.

MONDAY, February 18.

Naval Appropriation Bill—Support of the Liberia Colony Agency.

The House then passed to the orders of the day.

Whereupon, Mr. McLane, of Delaware, moved to postpone all the orders which preceded the Navy Appropriation Bill. The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARKLEY in the chair, on that bill.

On the item appropriating $100,000 "for the agency on the coast of Africa for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, and persons of color, delivered from on board vessels seized in the prosecution of the slave trade, by commanders of the United States armed vessels"—

Mr. McLane observed, that this sum had not been recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, but was the sum required by the Navy Department. In investigating the subject, the committee had been of opinion that a smaller sum would be sufficient. It was not for them to enter into the question of the expediency of the law. That was a question to be considered by the House. As long as it remains in force, it is the duty of the committee to report such a sum as is requisite to carry the law into effect. The bill to which he referred was passed in 1819, in addition to the provisions of a previous act for the suppression of the slave trade. It allowed ships of the United States to capture vessels under the American flag, engaged in that traffic. It gave a bounty on all slaves so captured, and provided that the captives should be returned to their native country, and should be supported in the meanwhile at the public expense. It established an agency on the coast of Africa, where these returned captives were to be received, and to be kept until it should be discovered to what nation they belonged. At the last session of Congress, the President sent a message, in which he informed the House that he had appointed two agents on the coast of Africa, and the agency continued until 1823, when another appropriation of fifty thousand dollars was made for the further execution of the law, and the same system still continued, being based on the law of 1819. The Committee of Ways and Means had supposed that it would be most proper to appropriate at this time for the present year only, leaving it for Congress to say whether the system shall or shall not be continued. Should it even be decided that the system should cease altogether, some appropriation would still be requisite, as the negroes already transported must be supported, and the contracts entered into must be fulfilled. The committee had thought thirty-two thousand dollars would be a sufficient appropriation at this time, that being the amount of a previous balance, which, not being expended within two years after it was appropriated, had been carried, of course, to the surplus fund.

Mr. McLane then stated the data on which the estimate had been made. Eight thousand dollars would be required to support the slaves now on hand, two thousand eight hundred to pay the salaries of the agents, and twenty-one thousand to transport four hundred and twenty negroes to Africa. (Sixty dollars is the average price for transporting a negro on board the slave ships. The above calculation is made at much less.) It was not probable, however, that the whole number would be returned within the present year. He then moved to fill the blank with thirty-two thousand dollars.

Mr. LIVINGSTON asked if any provision was made in this calculation for the eventual capture of other negroes during the year?

Mr. McLane replied, that this contingency would be met by part of the sum for transportation, as it was not probable that the whole of that sum would be used the present year. It was the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy that thirty-two thousand dollars would be sufficient for the year.

Mr. FORSYTH thought that the committee had fallen into a mistake, as to the number of negroes that would have to be transported—only two hundred, and not four hundred and twenty being the true number. But he had not risen for the purpose of making this correction. He thought this might be as good a time as any to call the attention of the House to the law of 1819, and to the extraordinary course of the Government under that law. The law contemplated simply an agency on the coast, to which might be sent the negroes captured, according to its provisions; but, instead of this, the President had sent out agents—had fixed their salaries—had moved the place of settlement two, if not three times; and although only thirty persons had been sent, of whom but twenty-eight were supported by the United States, it had cost the Government seventy thousand dollars. This constituted a state of things which certainly called for the consideration of Congress. By the present estimates, it appeared that the support of the whole four hundred and ninety-four for a year costs but twenty-six thousand dollars, yet here were two agents, at a salary of two thousand eight hundred dollars, to take care of twenty-eight persons. Now, although none can seriously contemplate the repeal of the laws enacted against the slave trade, yet the interference of Congress is certainly required to prevent so great a waste of the public money. As things stand, the expense of the last five years must not only continue but increase. The twenty-eight persons now supported, may, before the year is ended, be augmented to two hundred and twenty-eight. The late President, in his message, laid before Congress his views on the subject of this agency. Congress passed no act on the subject, and hence, the conclusion was drawn, that the construction which the President had put on the act of 1819, was also the construction of Congress. The House did nothing, and it was concluded, of course, that it coincided with the President. If this is to be considered, in all cases, a legitimate inference, Executive messages should be closely scrutinized. But, be this as it may, there has since been a departure from the instructions of the late President. He fixed the salaries of the two agents at one thousand three hundred and one thousand two hundred dollars—they are now one thousand six hundred and one thousand two hundred dollars. He selected a place for the agency, but gave express directions to the agents not to perform any act of colonization. The act of Congress contemplated that our agency should have nothing to do with any of the local Governments of Africa, nor with the soil. I now find, said Mr. F., that we have to do with both. It appears that there is some undefined connection between the agency of this Government and an association of private individuals, called the Colonization Society. The report from the Department says, that the connection has been found mutually beneficial, and, as I understand that report, a part of the expense which has been paid by the Government, is for the support or benefit of persons under the control of the Colonization Society. Now, sir, I should like to know what the nature of this connection is. I wish to understand how far the United States are part owners of the soil of the colony; for it appears to me that, notwithstanding the act of 1819, and the President's instructions under that act, both prohibiting any acts of colonization, then has crept in a practice which, in effect, goes to colonization; and, with the most profound respect for the motives of those individuals who first instituted, and who continue to promote, the Colonization Society, I must be permitted to express a wish to have no connection with it. If any such connection has existed, I wish it immediately dissolved: for, although I believe its founders to be among the most amiable and best men in the country, yet I have no idea that the funds of the United States are to be spent by persons not responsible to the Government.

Mr. McLANE replied, that, on the particular subject of the gentleman's inquiry, he had no information to give. He believed that no connection whatever existed between the agency and the society, except it is to be found in the fact, that the agents of the Colonization Society are also the agents of the United States. The Secretary's report expressly says, that there is no connection between them; but the agents of the Government are authorized to afford to the colony assistance and protection whenever it may be required. As to the number of negroes to be transported to Africa he had received information that there were one or two hundred in Alabama, not included in the Secretary's letter.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Mass., the committee now rose, and, having obtained leave to sit again,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 14.

The Revolutionary Pension System.

Mr. ESTILL offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several laws relating to Revolutionary pensioners, as to allow said pensioners to receive their pensions from the date of their several declarations, made pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress passed on the 18th of March, 1819, entitled an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. ESTILL said he would offer to the House some of the reasons which induced him to introduce the resolution; and in doing so it would be necessary to revert to the course of legislation which had been pursued on the subject of Pensions.

In 1818, Congress passed an act providing pensions for persons who had served during the war. By this act it was directed, that any person claiming the benefit of it must make declaration, in a court of justice, among other things, that he was so poor as to stand in absolute need of the public bounty—from which it appeared evident that the intention of the law was to make a provision for paupers only. By a subsequent act, passed in March, 1819, it was declared that the pension should commence at the time the required declaration should be made. It was soon found that an immense class of persons were receiving pensions who were never contemplated by the Legislature, and, in consequence, another act was passed in 1820, the effect of which was to exclude all but those who proved themselves to be paupers. By this last act, the Secretary of War was made the judge, to determine whether any applicant had, or had not, satisfactorily shown himself entitled to the benefit of the public bounty—and he was required to withhold the payment of the pension, till a certain schedule, accompanied by a prescribed oath, should have been laid before him. In 1822, a farther act was passed, supplemental to those preceding; and according to the construction of this supplemental act, which was adopted as the rule of the War Department, it was determined that (even in the case of those who finally proved themselves to be paupers, and fully entitled) all pensions should be suspended, from the date of the act of 1818, till the time full proof was made according to the new forms required. In consequence of this construction of the law, it happened that those very persons for whose benefit the pension law first passed, and who were admitted to be legitimately entitled to its benefits, lost the amount of their pensions from the passing of the act of 1820 to 1823; and this without having been guilty of any fraud, or attempt to deceive. A case of this kind existed in that part of the country from which he came. An individual applied for a pension in 1818, and, furnishing the proof then required, continued to receive it till 1820. Owing to sabre wounds in his head, his understanding was much impaired, and he neglected to furnish farther evidence, till 1824; in consequence, he was deprived of his pension for those four years, though most clearly one of those persons for whose benefit the law was made. Mr. E. thought this was unjust. He did not believe there were many cases of a similar kind; but the object of his resolution was to embrace this class of persons, whether few or not. He differed from the War Department, in the construction which it had given to the law of 1823. He did not believe it was the intention of Congress to withhold a pension from any of those who were indeed paupers, and had served their country with fidelity. He was not, however, very anxious in the matter. He presumed the act of 1820 had for its object nothing more than to protect the treasury from imposition, and to ascertain whether an applicant was what he pretended to be. The resolution asked that a committee may consider the subject, and report on the expediency of amending the law, unless they should agree with Mr. E. in the opinion that the present construction of the law is erroneous; in which case they would so report; and an expression would be obtained of the opinion of Congress, one way or the other, which was all Mr. E. aimed at.

Mr. McCoy observed, that he did not like to say any thing in opposition to the wishes of a colleague; but the decision of the Secretary of War was now settled, and he thought it would be a pity to disturb it. The law was sufficiently plain—it meant to say that the pension should commence with the date of the proof. It was never the intention of Congress that those who were stricken off the pension roll, should again receive pensions, till they had satisfied the proper officer of the Department that they had a right to them.

Mr. ESTILL said in reply, that he had not expected any objection would be urged against making an inquiry; his resolution contemplated no more; and, when the report should be received from the committee, it would be time enough to discuss the merits of the question.

The question was then put, and the resolution was adopted—ayes 95.

Navy Appropriation Bill—Liberia Agency.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARKLEY in the chair, on the bill "making appropriations for the Naval Service of the United States, for the year 1826."

The question being on filling the blank in the item for an agency, and expenses for captured Africans, on the coast of Africa, with $82,000—

Mr. FORSTH observed, that he was by no means satisfied, either by the information stated yesterday by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or that contained in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, of the propriety of this appropriation. The chairman of the committee had said, that the report of the Secretary expressly states, that there is no connection between the United States Agency and the Colonization Society. For himself, after an attentive perusal of the report, Mr. F. said, he was unable to discover in it any such declaration. There is, indeed, one passage, in which the Secretary says, that the Government Agents have been instructed not to connect their views with those of the Society; but it is most manifest that there is a perfect connection between the Agency and the Society. The Secretary declares that they have a mutual dependence on each other. He goes so far as to say, in so many words, that the Society, the Colony, and the Agency, could not exist independently of each other. The place of both is the same; the officers of both are the same; the same persons act in a double capacity, and are authorized by their appointment and instructions, to incur expenses for the benefit of the Society, whenever required so to do. Mr. F. did not profess to be intimately acquainted with the concerns of the colony; but he believed he might state, with great safety, that there is a fort there. He found, from one item in the report, that, for the defence of the twenty-eight persons whom the United States have to support at the Agency, the Agents had purchased 220 muskets. This seemed a very sufficient armament for twenty-eight men, even with both the Agents at their head. It must be evident, from the whole language of the report, that the entire concern is nothing but a combination of the two interests. The Secretary speaks continually of "the settlement," "the establishment"—and it is evident he includes the Colony and the Agency under this term, "a settlement." The language of the report is, throughout, strangely inaccurate. The Secretary says, the "settlement may be said to have recovered from its embarrassment." In another place he says, that, if the blacks continue there, they will add strength "to the establishment." To him, Mr. F. said, it appeared most evident, that there is a connection between the Agency and the Colonization Society; and that the blacks supported there by this Government, are governed in effect by that Society. He mentioned these facts that the committee might turn their attention more particularly to the subject.

Mr. McLANE said he did not understand the gentleman from Georgia as opposing the motion he had made to fill the blank, but as having rather directed his observations to some proposition which is hereafter to be considered in reference to this subject. If so, he would say nothing in reply.

Mr. FOSBERT replied, that he should not oppose the motion to fill the blank.

Mr. OWEN observed, that, if the sum proposed by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was to be applied as appropriations for this object hitherto had been, he should be opposed to giving even $82,000. But if it was to be expended according to the provision of the law as passed by Congress, he would then support the motion, seeing that such was, at present, the law of the land. But he desired that it might be understood as the will of this House, that these funds are not in future to be applied in the manner they have been, but in such a manner that the House may know and understand their application. If the consequences to grow out of the connection of the Government with this colony were appalling, he was for meeting them and putting them down.

Mr. McLANE said, in reply, that he should not attempt to discuss the expediency either of the law on this subject, or of a connection between the United States Agency and any association of private individuals. He thought that such remarks had no connection with the subject immediately before the House. The gentleman appeared to look forward to evils which might, or might not, ever take place. But he would only observe, that it was from precisely such views, as they entertained, that the Committee of Ways and Means had been desirous of limiting the appropriation for this Agency to the present year. They wished to make the sum so small, that none of those serious evils which the gentleman apprehended could possibly grow out of it. Their desire was to appropriate just enough for the support and transportation of the negroes already captured, and such as might be captured during the present year. If any irregularities had taken place—and he was not prepared to say that they had—they probably grew out of the large sums heretofore appropriated. But if the sum he proposed should be inserted in the bill, they would be prevented by the necessity of the case. If it was proper at this time to enter into this subject, he believed he could show that many of those things which had been represented as abuses, were in reality not so; but he would not now enter upon a discussion which did not belong to the subject in hand. As to the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, and the animal-versions which had been made upon it, he should, for the same reason, abstain from any reply. Of one thing he was entirely satisfied, and that was, if the Agency for captured Africans was to continue at all, the Department could not get along with a less sum than $82,000 for its support.

The question was then put on filling this blank with that sum, and carried, without a division.

Mr. BARNY then moved the following amendment:

"For the purchase of a site for a Navy Yard in the port of Baltimore, and erecting suitable buildings thereon, $20,000."

In support of the amendment, Mr. BARNY observed, that it became his duty to present it, in consequence of the wishes of his constituents, expressed in a memorial addressed to this House, by the City Council of Baltimore, and farther confirmed by resolutions of the Legislature of Maryland, instructing the Senators, and requesting the Representatives, from that State, to bring the subject before the attention of Congress. The House at its last session, had passed an act for the building of ten sloops of war. As soon as this became known in Baltimore, a memorial was prepared and presented to the Secretary of the Navy, praying that one or more of these vessels might be built in that city. The answer returned to this memorial was, that that arrangement was not within the authority of the Secretary; Congress having already designated at what places the vessels of the Navy should be built, by the establishment of the different Navy Yards.

Mr. B. now requested the indulgence of the House, while he presented, in a very brief manner, some of the claims which Baltimore conceived herself to possess, to the location of a Navy Yard there. In the first place, the same depth of water was to be found in that port, as either at Philadelphia or Washington, viz. from eighteen to twenty feet; which, though not sufficient to float a vessel of war to the Ocean, with her full armament on board, furnished as great facility for that purpose as was to be found at either of those places; which had nevertheless been selected as sites for Navy Yards. And, while Baltimore possessed the same advantage in point of water, it had greater advantages in some other respects. The shores of the Chesapeake furnished an abundant supply of cedar, white oak, locust, and white pine. These valuable species of timber were there near at hand, while the other ports at which Navy Yards were established, had to send there to get it. Baltimore had also the advantage of being situated in the centre of an area, of twenty or thirty miles, abounding with greater water privileges and water power, than any other district of the same extent in the United States. It presented the greatest facilities for the manufacture of cordage and canvas, for the rolling of copper, and for the preparation of almost every species of material, required in ship-building. There is, at this moment, building in that port a most splendid ship for the use of a foreign Government—a vessel which would bear comparison with any that had been constructed in the most approved naval establishments. The mechanics of that city were numerous, and as expert in their respective branches of art as any that could be found. Their pride, too, was interested in this measure, and they would exult in an opportunity—it was the height of their ambition—to have their work exhibited and compared with that of others, in contributing to that Navy, which had encircled the stars of the American banner with unfading glory. He appealed to the gentleman from Massachusetts, if when the Constitution floated into the port of Boston, that gentleman and his fellow-citizens did not feel the glow of conscious exultation and delight. What he wished—what he asked was, that his deserted city might be permitted to share in the same feeling.

It might, perhaps, be urged against the claims of Baltimore, that the Java frigate had been built in that port, and had since been pronounced of very inferior quality. But gentlemen, in fairness, ought to remember, that the Java was built under circumstances of the most disadvantageous kind. She was built by contract: she was built for a sum little more than half of what has been paid for other frigates; she was built when the enemy was at the door—when the circumstances of the Government required the utmost despatch, and when the vessel to be completed was intended to be used more for the present necessity, than to be preserved as a lasting monument of the skill of the mechanics. Another frigate was constructed at Philadelphia at double the expense. Both had since been repaired, and it was found that the repairs of the one cost nearly as much as those of the other. But he might appeal to the Erie and the Ontario, which still remain, as evidence of the skill of the Baltimore mechanics, which are allowed to be crack ships, and enjoy a distinguished reputation. Gentlemen, perhaps, were startled at the idea of the expense of a new Navy Yard; but let them recollect that a Navy Yard can be established at Baltimore with less expense to the Government than at any other place. It is already a naval station. Officers of the Navy constantly reside there engaged, it is true, in the recruiting service, but still they are there. Already there exists in that port, buildings erected by Government at the time of the construction of the Constellation frigate. These are, at present, private property, but it will not require more than twenty thousand dollars to restore them to the Government, and to put them on a footing to render benefit to the nation. As to the capacity of Baltimore to its own defence against an enemy, the experience of the last war furnished, of itself, the most conclusive evidence. The city was attacked—attacked by a powerful and successful enemy—attacked at an hour when all hearts were dismayed by their barbarous triumph in the destruction of this city; and the first ray of hope that broke upon the gloom beamed from the triumphant repulse of that enemy at Baltimore. It might be said that there were already two Navy Yards within the Chesapeake; but what is the Chesapeake Bay? It is an inland Ocean, whose wide expanse is able to embrace all the navies in the world. When the extent of this bay was taken into view, and the connection of its various branches, with the most important portions of our country, the argument we had mentioned would be found to possess but little weight.

Having briefly touched on some of the advantages which would result from the establishment of a Navy Yard at Baltimore, Mr. B. said it would be proper that he should state some of the disadvantages under which that city at present labors. Her Representatives might appear before the House, and might also demand a redress of grievance at its hands. It is known to all that Baltimore is a commercial depot, and it must be acknowledged by all to be the true policy of this Government to build up, by every proper means, the interests of commerce. But Baltimore might complain that the United States Navy are continually and sedulously occupied in drawing away her seamen, (of all other things the most important to a commercial city,) even before they can enter the port on their return voyage. It is well known that our seamen are not migratory, as to the ports from which they ship themselves. They do not pass from port to port in search of employment, but commonly ship themselves in the same harbor to which they have returned from their last voyage. This is known to the recruiting officers, and it often happens that seamen, arriving at Baltimore, are engaged for the Naval Service before they set their feet upon the wharf. Commerce is thus crippled by the policy of the Government. And, as to ship-building, no sooner has an enterprising individual collected together a few mechanics, with a view to prosecute that business, on a respectable scale, than his men are immediately tempted away by the prospect of superior prices at the naval stations of the Government. A union of such disadvantages must be sufficient to break down any commercial city whatever. Yet it never had been the habit of Baltimore to indulge in the language of complaint or murmuring. She had submitted quietly to the privations of her situation, and, even in the severest seasons of non-intercourse and embargo, this Government always heard from that city the cheering voice of a friend. She has paid many millions into the Treasury, and now asks only that a small portion of that wealth should be returned to her which she had been the means of collecting for the country at large.

Mr. B. said he had thus, he hoped, brought the subject fully, though feebly, before the view of the House. The whole sum for which he asked was but twenty thousand dollars, and he felt persuaded, if it should be granted, that the result, while it would be eminently beneficial to Baltimore, would be not less conducive to the Naval interests of the United States.

Mr. STOKES (Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs) hoped that the gentleman from Maryland would consent to withdraw the amendment which he had now offered. On the motion of that member the Naval Committee had been directed to inquire into the expediency of establishing the Navy Yard in question, as well as some others, proposed by other gentlemen. These various projects were now before the committee, and under consideration. In relation to this, as well as some of the other propositions, the committee had referred to the Navy Department for information, and he would put it to the gentleman, whether it would not be better to wait, before acting on the subject, until the committee shall have reported to the House. An opposite course might operate to injure the very object the gentleman had in view; and besides, Mr. S. said, he felt some doubt whether the amendment was strictly in order, so long as the same subject was before a committee of the House.

Mr. BARNY, in consequence of this suggestion, withdrew his motion for amendment.

Mr. STOKES then said, that he had been directed by the Naval Committee to move the following amendment:

"For surveying the harbors of Savannah and Brunswick, in Georgia; and Beaufort, in South Carolina, eight thousand dollars."

Mr. S. said, that the views of the committee were, in substance, these: That it might be important at a future day, for the Government to have a Navy Yard at some point south of the Chesapeake; and, if so, it was desirable that a survey should be made of the different harbors on that part of the coast. Such surveys might also be of importance to the commercial and to the navigating interest of the country. The sum of eight thousand dollars would be sufficient to cover the whole expense of the surveys now proposed, and perhaps would prove more than sufficient for the object—in which case the balance would go in the surplus fund.

Mr. BARNY moved to amend this amendment by inserting therein "Baltimore, in Maryland;" and increasing the proposed appropriation from eight thousand dollars to twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. STOKES observed, that the harbors proposed in his resolution had not yet been surveyed at all. Whether the harbor of Baltimore had been surveyed as particularly as was desirable, he did not know—the House would know when they had received the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject. But, with respect to those harbors embraced in his motion, he had had personal communication with the Department, and he knew they had not been surveyed. The Government has a fleet in the West Indies, which needs a rendezvous in one of the Southern States. The necessity, therefore, for these surveys, was pressing—it was immediately pressing. But, as to Baltimore, he did not conceive this to be the case. If it was a fact that the harbor of Baltimore had not been surveyed, the gentleman would state it to the committee.

Mr. BARNY replied, that all he wished to accomplish by the last amendment he had offered, was, that a subject of so much consequence should receive a full examination. He did not know that so large a sum as that he proposed, would be required to authorize the survey, in addition, of the harbor of Baltimore. Perhaps a smaller sum might be sufficient. He hoped that the opposition already manifested to an appropriation towards a Navy Yard at Baltimore, would not be extended to a measure intended merely to obtain information.

Mr. McLANE said he had no disposition to embarrass the proposition—his only difficulty arose from the manner in which these amendments were proposed. He believed it to be a rule of order that no subject referred to one of the committees of the House, could be brought into a Committee of the Whole, in the form of an amendment to a bill. He did not say that the present was precisely such a case; but he thought the reason of the rule equally applied. One committee should not interfere with another. The Committee of Ways and Means had examined the estimates from the Department, and had prepared a bill in conformity with them. Now, another committee, which has had none of those estimates before it, proposes an amendment to the bill. Every other committee of the House may do the same thing, and, if an appropriation bill is to be encountered by every new project, which may have been matured before other committees, but of which the Committee of Ways and Means had had no opportunity to judge, he did not see how that committee was to get along with any of the bills it became its duty to report.

Mr. STOKES said, that the subject of his amendment had not been strictly before the Naval Committee, and no vote had been taken upon it; but, if the House thought the measure was necessary, and the necessity of it was pressing, they would not, on that account, refuse to make provision for it in this bill.

A discussion, as to the point of order, was further prosecuted by Messrs. POWELL, DWIGHT, STORES, and MOLANE, which resulted in Mr. STORES' withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE now renewed the amendment which had been offered by Mr. BAENEY. He said, that, in supporting the proposition of his colleague, he felt it his duty to submit some considerations to the House, which he should do in as brief a manner as possible. He flattered himself they would do him the justice to believe that, in desiring to see this proposition adopted, he was actuated as much by a regard to the interests of the Union at large as to those of his own immediate constituents. At an early period of the Government, Congress had passed a law for the building of a number of vessels of war, and Baltimore had been selected as the place for building one of them, which was now engaged in actual service. The advantage of such an arrangement to the Government must be evident. Facility in the construction of any thing which immediately refers to the defence of the country, always must be important. There were, in Baltimore, a great number of mechanics of all descriptions, especially of naval architects. If a Navy Yard should be established there, and the purposes of Government should at any time require an extra number of mechanics, the population of Baltimore can always furnish them. Whilst, on the other hand, should it be necessary at any time to dismiss a considerable portion of the persons employed, no such inconvenience will result as in places, such, for example, as Washington, where the public mechanics, if dismissed, must be thrown altogether out of employment. In this city, the Government is in some sort bound by humanity to retain workmen in its employ during intervals in which they are not absolutely needed; but there, a mercantile public is always at hand and ready to employ and to reward their industry. It is always an object worth the attention of the Executive, that those points selected as sites for the building of our navy, should, as far as practicable, be secure from exposure to the approach of an enemy. This security is enjoyed by Baltimore in an eminent degree. The events of the recent war put the truth of this position in a very strong point of view. It was known to everybody, that when the enemy approached this city, there was in fact a race between the forces of the enemy and our own Government in the destruction of public property. The Navy Yard was fired by our own officers, and such was their assiduity and success, that one very valuable vessel, then at that place, was entirely destroyed. This would not have happened if the Navy Yard had been stationed at Baltimore. This same enemy did approach that city—

Here Mr. DWIGHT rose to order, insisting, that, as this subject was already before a committee of the House, and had not yet been reported on by that committee, it was not in order to introduce the same subject in the form of an amendment.

The Chair decided the amendment to be in order, from which decision Mr. DWIGHT appealed.

On this appeal a discussion arose, which occupied the House for nearly an hour.

The decision of the chair was opposed by Messrs. DWIGHT, McDUFFIE, MALLARY, McCoy, and CAMPBELL; and advocated by Messrs. LITTLE, BASSET, FORSYTH, and COOK.

The SPEAKER closed this debate, by expressing it as his opinion, that the decision of the Chair was incorrect. The principles of order did not admit of the same subject being referred for consideration at the same time to different committees. If it were so referred, the report of one committee might be made, and the decision of the House taken on it, and then the report of another (perhaps of an adverse tenor) would come in, and a new decision must again be had, and so on as often as the report of any committee should be received. The Committee of the Whole was but a committee of the House, though a large one, and before any subject could be discussed in this committee, which had been referred to any other committee of the House, the committee which had charge of it must first be discharged from its consideration. As this subject was now before the Committee on Naval Affairs, upon a memorial from Baltimore, if gentlemen wished to bring it into Committee of the Whole, they must first move to discharge the naval committee.

Mr. LITTLE, though still retaining his original view of the subject, consented to withdraw his proposal to amend.

Mr. COCKE moved the annexed proviso, to come in after the following item:

"For the pay and subsistence of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, and washerwomen of the Marine Corps, one hundred and seventy-six thousand one hundred and fifty-eight dollars and ten cents:" "Provided, that no brevet officer of the Marine Corps shall receive the pay and emoluments of his brevet grade, unless he be on duty, and have a command according to his brevet rank, and that no allowance shall be made to the Paymaster and Quartermaster of said Corps, beyond the compensation provided by the act of 16th April, 1826, entitled, 'An act authorizing an augmentation of the Marine Corps, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. COCKE observed, that, on examining the act establishing the Pay and Quartermaster Department, it would be found that the officers are entitled to a certain amount of additional pay, besides what they receive in the line of the army. But on comparing the directions of the law with the estimates furnished by the Committee of Ways and Means, it would appear either that the laws had been disregarded, or that those estimates were incorrect.

[Here Mr. C. read the second section of the act of 1814, and observed, that if there was any other act on the subject, he had not been able to find it.]

On looking at the estimates, we find for a

Lieutenant Colonel Commandant, seventy-five dollars per month: for one Lieutenant Colonel, sixty dollars per month: (This latter, he presumed, must be a Brevet Colonel:) and for Paymaster, fifty dollars per month. Now, it would be found that this officer received, in fact, the pay and perquisites allowed to a Major of Infantry, which gives him at least five hundred dollars more than the law will justify. The Quartermaster is a Lieutenant of the Corps, and his pay is estimated at sixty dollars, and the perquisites of his grade, from which it will appear that he receives the same pay as a Major of Cavalry. If this was so, it presented a case which ought certainly to be remedied.

Mr. McLANE observed, that he had no intention to oppose the amendment, provided it did not interfere with the third section of the same act.

Mr. COOK replied, that his amendment went a little further, and was intended to prevent the officers of this corps from receiving the pay of their brevet rank, unless their command is the same.

Mr. BARTLETT said, that, though not opposed to the principle of the amendment, he should vote against it, as appended to the present bill. He hoped that the gentleman would bring it up by a distinct resolution, and would recommend a revision of this whole subject, by a committee of the House. He had long been of opinion that some such revision was necessary; for, any man who would look at the statutes, and compare their provisions with the pay which the officers actually received, would find himself involved in a wilderness of inextricable difficulty. His own objection was not to the pay which the officers received, but to the manner in which the amount of it is determined. He was in favor of giving them a direct allowance in money, but of striking out all discretion in the Department, as to perquisites and other means of emolument. By this latter system, it had come to pass, that, while an officer of the Navy, engaged in actual service at sea, received sixteen or eighteen hundred dollars a year, an officer of the same rank, who stayed on shore, and did nothing but superintend a Navy Yard, received emoluments to the amount of three or four thousand dollars a year. This surely was a state of things that called for revision, and for reformation. Some different rule appeared to be observed on the subject of pay, than that which was prescribed by the statute. He would, therefore, send the whole subject to a committee: but he was opposed to the present amendment, because it was pointed exclusively at a corps, in which ambition had but a very limited scope, and which, so to speak, had been already sufficiently degraded by acts of our legislation.

Mr. DWIGHT now moved to amend the amendment, by inserting after the words "according to his brevet rank," the following: "or command upon a separate station."

Mr. POWELL objected to this amendment, as going to leave the law precisely where it was.

Mr. McLANE said, that if any amendment went to change the law, he should be opposed to it, as an appropriation bill did not furnish the proper means for altering the laws. If the amendment only went to enforce the law as it stands, it might be a very proper one. If any abuse does exist, it ought to be corrected.

Mr. COOK, having the same impression as Mr. POWELL, asked the mover of the original amendment for a farther explanation.

Mr. COOK then went into a further illustration of his proposition; insisting that, if the officers do receive no more than the law allows them, his proviso could do no harm; and if they did receive more, his proviso went to prevent it.

Mr. COOK insisted that the amendment was only to say, that the law should be obeyed, and it was idle to re-enact what had already been enacted.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that he had no objection to the amendment, provided it contained a literal transcript from the act of Congress. In that case, he thought it could do neither much good nor much harm, and was willing to consent to it to gratify the mover. But he should certainly object to the gentleman's giving his own interpretation to the law, instead of the law itself. He was inclined to believe, for his own part, that the head of the Navy Department had, in this matter, acted quite correctly. He knew, personally, that one of these officers does hold a separate command; he presumed the same to be the case with the other.

The question being then taken on Mr. COOK's amendment, it was rejected.

The amendments to the Navy Appropriation Bill, made in Committee of the Whole, were read and agreed to in the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 15.

Breakwater in the Delaware.

The House then passed to the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the once rejected but reconsidered resolution of Mr. MASON, calling on the President of the United States for certain statements relating to the receipts and disbursements in the ports within the Delaware.

The resolution having then been again read,

Mr. WOOD, of New York, said, that when this resolution was before under consideration, he had objected to it on the ground of the principle on which the call was founded, which was of a nature not to be tolerated in this House, being, in substance, this: that local interests were to influence the House in deciding on objects of a public nature; and that the amount of revenue which happens to be collected in any particular port, is to be used as an argument why that port should receive a corresponding portion of the public resources expended in its accommodation or defence. This principle had been distinctly avowed by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, who addressed the House yesterday. The gentleman had said, that, in selecting the object on which the Government should bestow its patronage, reference was to be had to the different amounts of revenue collected in different parts of the Union: and that those States where the revenue was collected, had a prior claim to States where it was not. Sir, this is a principle which I utterly disclaim; although, as one of the Representatives of the State of New York, I come from a State where a much larger amount of revenue is collected than in the port of Philadelphia. Another gentleman, in the course of his remarks, had said that the harbor of New York is now secure, and if the proposed improvement in the harbor of the Delaware does not take place, much of the commerce of Philadelphia will be invited to New York. Sir, the gentleman is mistaken in point of fact; the harbor of New York, instead of being rendered secure, is, in reality, scarcely defended at all: it is naked of defence: it has only one fort of any practical utility, which is Fort Lafayette. The report of the Engineers recommended the erection of six different works for the defence of that port; but of these only one has been commenced, and that one is the least of all that were proposed. The gentleman seems to infer, that, because much money has been spent, the harbor must, of course, be safe; but he doubted if it would successfully keep out a single seventy-four. But, though the proportion of revenue collected, to moneys spent in defence, was greater in New York than any other city of the Union, he was far from urging the smallest claim on such a ground; on the contrary, he repeated his protest against the doctrine.

The gentleman says that the public resources are to be distributed, either according to the relative importance of different national undertakings, or according to the population of the different States, for purposes of internal improvement; and that the latter was the opinion of a former President. The objects on which the President thought these surplus funds should be expended, were not great national works like that contemplated in the Delaware, but objects of a local importance, as schools, roads, &c. But since Congress had determined on exercising powers which certainly were never intended by the framers of the constitution, (though they might perhaps be covered by its terms,) they were bound to exercise them, in the first place, for the general defence. This was one main object in adopting the Federal Government. The old Congress had the power of peace and war, as much as the present Congress has, but it possessed no means of defending the country, because it had no revenue. The revenue of all the States being now placed in the control of Congress, the first object to which it should be applied is the public defence, then the payment of the public debt, and then the encouragement and protection of commerce. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania can claim an application of a portion of the revenue, collected at Philadelphia or elsewhere, to the object he has in view, he is bound to show that the whole country is amply defended, its commerce protected, and its debt paid: then he may claim that its surplus resources may be divided; but till then, Mr. W. held, that Congress was not at liberty to give the national funds away in any manner, to the prejudice of the great object he had mentioned. If a fortification is required on the Missouri, on Lake Pontchartrain, or for any of our commercial cities, it must be erected, before we can go to objects like that proposed in the Delaware. It is public necessity which gives a right to priority in respect to appropriation. If we adopt the narrow local principle which had been avowed by gentlemen, it will embarrass all the proceedings of the Government; will lead to painful contests of State against State, and result in a legislation of compromise, instead of a legislation governed only by public utility. His whole objection applied to the principle on which this call is to be made. Gentlemen say they want it for the purposes of showing that more revenue is collected at Philadelphia in proportion to the sums expended in defence, than either at Boston or New York. But as to works of defence, Philadelphia is better defended than any other commercial city in all the Union. The Board of Engineers have reported to this House, that the fort at the Pea-Patch is a complete defence of it.

Mr. WYMS said he was unwilling to occupy the time of the committee with a further discussion of this subject, and should have suffered the fate of his colleague's resolution to be determined by a silent vote, had the gentleman from New York stated the arguments of his colleagues and himself with fairness; but he seems to have conjured up a ghost, only for the pleasure of laying it himself. No such doctrine had been advanced as the gentleman imputed; on the contrary, they had both disclaimed it. They went no farther than to state a case, by way of illustration, whether, supposing there were two cities, which required works of protection, and at one of them much larger sums had been expended for the object than at the other, although the one least defended yielded the greatest revenue of the two, an argument would not lie in favor of granting a new expenditure at the latter rather than at the former. He admitted that those who may hereafter advocate the propriety of erecting a breakwater in the Delaware Bay, will be bound to show that it is intrinsically a national object, and one that deserves the appropriation it will cost; but if, when they have done this fully, they shall be able to show, in addition, that less of the public moneys have been expended there than in other places, though equally needed, will it not add strength to their appeal in behalf of the improvement? The gentleman from New York will answer, that if we are able to establish the fact, that the work we ask for is needed—that it is a work of national utility—we have done all we are permitted to do: we must stop there, and leave the question on its own naked merits. Sir, it is a beautiful theory; but, unhappily, it is a theory only, that objects will get forward in this House by their merits alone. He thought he might, without being guilty of disrespect to the House, be permitted to say, that a measure was not always able to work its way by such arguments. He might appeal, in confirmation of this position, to a very recent case: In the debate on the Judiciary, it had appeared, by statements of gentlemen from the West, that some remedy to the evils existing there had long been sought, and the case, with all its strong appeals to the justice of this House, had been presented, session after session, yet it was not until now that any relief had been obtained. He might, therefore, be pardoned, in supposing, that it would not be all-sufficient to show that a breakwater was needed in the Delaware Bay, on great national considerations—it was desirable to press on the House other arguments in addition to the simple expediency of the object itself. But if, when the information sought by the resolution is used in the heretical manner supposed by the gentleman from New York, it will be time enough then, to expose the unsoundness or narrowness of the principles on which it is attempted to be applied. But it would not be hard to show, by a reference to past legislation, that such were not the principles held and acted upon by the public men of Pennsylvania. Look, as one instance, at the appropriation for the Cumberland road. Did Pennsylvania advocate that appropriation on a mere local or interested policy? Was that road calculated to benefit her? Did it not tend to draw from her eastern seaport, and her western Birmingham, the current of population and of trade, for the improvement of Ohio? He might point, as another example, to the Ohio and Chesapeake Canal Company; that canal did not surely address itself, with any very strong claim, to the sense of mere local interest in Pennsylvania. The course now charged upon the Pennsylvania delegation, had never been pursued by them, and he regretted that such an imputation had fallen from one of the representatives of the great State of New York. She has power and influence enough in this House to crush the measure proposed for the improvement of a sister State, and for the benefit of the commerce of a neighboring city, while she is herself in no danger of being impeded or put down; but he had expected more of magnanimity than would be betrayed by such a course. As to hunting this information through the journals of the House, the same answer might be made to almost any motion for a call of papers; but he was surprised such an argument should be urged against the present resolution, (and one other of a similar kind, from Pennsylvania,) while it was not advanced against the very frequent calls which have been proposed and agreed to at the present session.

Mr. STORRS observed, in reply, that, as one of the delegation from New York, he would only say that, if he and his colleagues were governed by the principle on which the advocates of the resolution had argued, instead of opposing this call, they would give it their most hearty support. They must, at least, be acquitted of all intention to injure Philadelphia, in their opposition to it; because, if the principle be correct, that those cities are to have a preference where the revenue bears the largest proportion to the public expenditures, Philadelphia must long be postponed. Nothing could be more convenient to them and their constituents, than such a comparison; for, it would be manifest to all, that on such a principle the expenditure must begin in the harbor of New York; but he could not reconcile the principle with any of his views of propriety. It strikes a blow at the entire system of our internal improvements. He had always thought that the project of distributing the surplus revenue among the States, in proportion to their population, was extremely objectionable; and entirely inconsistent as it was with his understanding of the constitution, that, should such a law pass both Houses, it would, in his opinion, be the duty of the President to put his veto upon it. If it is supposed constitutional to enter a system of internal improvements, it must be shown altogether from the constitution itself, and not on the principle which referred to the points at which the national revenue is collected. Any principle of favor to any of the States, was one which could not be admitted. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asked the House to compare the amount of revenue collected in her harbors, with the money expended there on forts and light-houses, as an argument why she should have this breakwater. But, do the gentlemen consider how this principle is to operate on other States? Take, for example, the State of North Carolina. What would she receive on such a plan? Nothing, sir; nothing at all. The amount actually expended on light-houses and fortifications, built, or ordered to be built, would be greater than the whole amount of revenue collected there. The same observation might be applied to Savannah. What would become of Rhode Island? What is the amount of revenue collected in Narragansett Bay? And if the argument applies one way, gentlemen must remember that it applies the other way also. If much revenue is to have much defence, then no revenue is to have no defence. The principle strikes at the whole system of internal improvement. Congress made an appropriation for the Cumberland road: was that on the principle of expending the public money west of the mountains, and for the benefit of this or that particular State? Not at all. It was granted to be expended on a great national work, eminently conducive to the welfare of the country as a whole. So Congress subscribed 800,000 dollars in aid of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. Did they do this for the commercial interest of Philadelphia in particular, or of Baltimore in particular? Not at all. Local interest was not the point on which that measure was supported. It was argued by the gentleman himself, from Pennsylvania, on the ground of its being connected with the interests of the nation at large.

Entertaining these views, Mr. S. said, that, in appropriating for any improvement, he should direct his views to the whole Confederacy. He should not stop to ask how much revenue was collected at Philadelphia: for, if this work in the Delaware exceeded the amount of that revenue, ten times over, he should, nevertheless, vote for it, if he conceived it expedient and proper, in a national point of view. But, if we are to go on the ground of favoring the States, justice to his constituents would require that he should vote for beginning with his own State first. If this measure of the breakwater was to be placed on the principle of local legislation, he should vote against it altogether: a course he should be sorry to adopt, because he felt favorably impressed in regard to its propriety. But, independently of all this, what is the information asked for? First, for the revenue collected; and then, for the moneys expended in the building of forts, the erection of light-houses, beacons, buoys, &c., for the protection of commerce. But, asked Mr. S., why did gentlemen stop here? Why do they not go back to the period when Philadelphia was the seat of Government, and inquire what sums were spent there, in consequence of the presence of the Government? What was expended on the Navy Yard? What was laid out in the salaries of all the public officers? What was subscribed to the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal? What amount of the provisions and clothing of the army was purchased there? How much money the members of Congress expended there? (No mean item in the account, if living is as dear there, as it is in this city.) The mere mention of these subjects of inquiry was, in itself, sufficient to show how unsatisfactory any argument must be, which is attempted to be built upon such an investigation. It was impossible to determine. If gentlemen had every letter and figure before them, and even submitted to the House any thing like the comparative amount of public money that had been expended in different places, the account must be imperfect at the best; and if it is imperfect, it proves nothing. His great objection to the call, however, was not on this latter ground, but on considerations of principle. What he had at first stated, as to the work itself, he repeated, that his views at present were in its favor.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, said that he should not have been in favor of presenting this resolution to the House; but, as it had been presented, he hoped the House would not see in it any thing so very formidable as to prevent its adoption. He perfectly concurred with the gentleman from New York in the principles he had laid down, and he believed and hoped there were no gentlemen on that floor in favor of acting on the opposite principle; but there was no need to consider that question now. What is the House considering? The propriety of making an appropriation for this breakwater? Not at all. Was any question before it relating to internal improvements? There was none. Was it now asked to facilitate the commerce of Philadelphia? It was not. All that was asked, was information. And two questions only were to be settled. Is the information itself material to enlighten our judgments, in respect to the great interests of the country? And is it improper to make it public? No gentleman would insist that it was improper to make these facts public. They are public already. It would be the duty of the public officer to present every one of them to the House, whether they were called for or not.

They are all spread on our public documents, and may, though with great labor, be collected from the files, by any member of this House. The resolution calls for the amount of revenue received, and of moneys expended, on improvements within the Bay of Delaware. Was it an answer to say that gentlemen in making this inquiry, were influenced by a certain motive? Surely not. And it would not do for the gentleman from New York to say that he will not suffer a certain item of internal improvement to be made, because other gentlemen advocate it on a principle he disapproves. Let the gentleman from New York judge for himself, but let others do so too; and do not prevent them from getting all the information they may deem necessary, because they may found, upon that information, some argument they may think false. Besides, how can the gentleman prevent the friends of this resolution from getting this information? I, said, Mr. McL., can get it, whether the House passes this resolution or not. It will cost us some labor, but, if the House refuses to call on the President for this information, we can, we will obtain it for ourselves. The information is not improper, and why are we not to have it? For myself, I should consider myself bound, in courtesy, if any gentleman says he requires certain information for the right performance of his duty, to consent he should have it. The House, by agreeing to this call, establishes no principle. If it did, I should certainly reject the resolution. But the House is left wholly uncommitted. I, too, am in favor of this breakwater. But I shall take a different mode to show it from that pursued by the gentleman from New York.

At this point the Speaker interfered, and arrested the further progress of the debate, the time appropriated to the consideration of resolutions having expired.

Amendment of the Constitution—Election of President and Vice President.

The House then, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the following resolutions, moved by Mr. McDUFFIE, on the 19th of December last, viz:

“Resolved, That, for the purpose of electing the President and Vice President of the United States, the constitution ought to be so amended, that a uniform system of voting by districts, shall be established in all the States; and that the constitution ought to be further amended, in such manner as will prevent the election of the aforesaid officers from devolving upon the respective Houses of Congress.

“Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, with instructions to prepare and report a joint resolution embracing the aforesaid objects.”

These resolutions having been read—

Mr. McDUFFIE addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The resolution which has been referred to the consideration of the committee, is resolvable into two distinct practical propositions, as plain and obvious in their import as they are unquestionably important in their tendency. The first contemplates the establishment of a uniform mode of voting, by districts, for the President and Vice President of the United States, instead of leaving to the Legislatures of the respective States, either to prescribe and vary the mode of voting, or to assume and exercise that important function themselves. The second proposes that, in the event of no person receiving a majority of all the electoral votes, at the first balloting, some provision shall be made for the final disposition of the contest, that will supersede the eventual interference of either branch of Congress, in the election of the two chief Executive Magistrates of the Republic. As the resolution does not declare whether it is expedient that the electors should be dispensed with or retained, nor indicate the substitute by which the final election shall be prevented from devolving upon Congress, I will very briefly state the details of the proposed amendment, in reference to these particular objects.

As the electors, if retained at all, would hold their first balloting immediately after they are chosen, and under circumstances that would almost preclude the possibility of tampering or corruption, I am willing to acquiesce in any decision that a majority of the committee may make, upon the question of retaining them in the first instance. For, although I do not believe the electors to be of any possible utility in the system, and can perceive considerable objections to retaining them even thus partially, yet, if a majority of the committee should think differently, I will cheerfully sacrifice this minor consideration, to ensure the accomplishment of the great object of the contemplated amendment.

But, in case the primary vote of the Electoral Colleges shall fail to decide the election, I propose that the two highest candidates, respectively, shall be referred back to the people, voting directly for the President and Vice President by districts. For, when it is considered that at least three or four months must unavoidably elapse between the first and the second balloting, the argument against retaining a body of electors for so long a period exposed to temptation, becomes, in my judgment, irresistible. And, in addition to this view of the subject, when the contest is reduced to a simple issue between two competitors, there is an end to all the conceivable reasons for a discretionary agency, and the interposition of electors can only be regarded as, at best, a useless incumbrance.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is the brief outline of an amendment, which so emphatically speaks its own importance, that I need scarcely invoke the patient and undivided attention of those, who, under the most solemn responsibility to the present and future generations, are to pronounce and record their judgments upon it.

The first branch of the resolution we are considering, declares the expediency of establishing a uniform system of voting, by districts, for the President and Vice President. By adverting, for a moment, to the existing provisions of the constitution on this subject, it will be perceived that the important operation of electing the two chief Executive officers of the United States is not regulated by any constitutional rule whatever. The constitution, by declaring, that “each State shall appoint the electors, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may prescribe,” puts an unequivocal negative upon the idea of fixedness and permanence, which essentially enter into the elementary notion of constitutional regulation. Different rules prevail in the same State at different times, and in the different States at the same time, all liable to be changed according to the varying views and fluctuating fortunes of political parties. It may be assumed as a political axiom, that those creative acts of popular sovereignty which bring the machine of Government into existence, and put it in motion, ought to be placed beyond the power of any legislative control whatever. The reason is obvious. This superior stability of the fundamental law is essential to protect the rights of the minority from the injustice and oppression of the majority. All experience proves that it is in the very nature of political parties to “feel power and forget right.” The end which every party proposes to itself, as the object of its united effort, is power. In the pursuit of this object, the majority lose that sense of justice which should protect the rights of the weaker party. They easily persuade themselves that the good of the country will be promoted by excluding their opponents from power, and, under the delusive belief that they are sustained by patriotic motives, they commit the most flagrant acts of outrage upon the minority. What, sir, has been our own experience on the subject? Some ten or fifteen years ago, the dominant party in the State of Massachusetts made an artificial arrangement of the districts, so as to exclude the minority from power almost as completely as the change from the district to the general ticket system would have done it. After the individual, I believe, who was principally instrumental in bringing about this scheme of party tyranny, it is known over the whole Union, by the name of the Gerrymandering system. The people were roused to indignation, not only in Massachusetts, but throughout the United States. Under a lively sense of the injustice and oppression of this proceeding, and of perhaps some analogous occurrences in other States, the proposition for establishing a uniform district system of voting for the electors of President, was brought forward by North Carolina—a State which, to her other claims to consideration in the Union, adds a steadfast and uniform adherence to sound Republican principles. This proposition was concurred in by a large majority of the Legislatures of the States, and, amongst the rest, two of the largest States in the Union, New York and Virginia, adopted it by an almost unanimous vote of their respective Legislatures.

Proceeding to examine these several plans, in the order in which I have stated them, I shall very briefly dispose of the first. As to the power which the Legislatures of most of the States have assumed, at one time or another, of choosing the Presidential electors themselves, I feel assured that I shall have the concurrence of a large majority of those who hear me, when I pronounce it a usurpation. Yes, sir, the very first acts of the State Legislatures, in relation to the election of the President, furnish the best refutation of the doctrine held by some gentlemen, that the State Legislatures ought to retain an agency and control in the election of that officer. We see that these Legislatures can usurp power as well as abuse it. To settle this question, as to the power of the State Legislatures, a few remarks only will be necessary. The words of the constitution are, that “each State shall appoint” the electors of President “in such manner as the Legislature thereof may prescribe.” The State makes the appointment, and the Legislature has only the power to prescribe the mode. That the word “State” means the people of the State, is obvious, not only from its ordinary grammatical import, standing contradistinguished from the word “Legislature,” but also from the commentary contained in the Federalist, which, considering the authority of that celebrated exposition, supersedes the necessity of any further argument on this point. In a number written by Mr. Hamilton, relative to the appointment of the President, we find the following decisive words: “They have not made the appointment of President to depend upon pre-existing bodies of men, who might be tampered with beforehand, to prostitute their votes, but they have referred it, in the first instance, to the immediate act of the people of America, to be exerted in the choice of persons, for the temporary and sole purpose of making the appointment.” Assuming, then, that the power heretofore exercised by the State Legislatures, has been without the warrant of the constitution, I shall proceed to compare the only two remaining modes of voting, that have prevailed in the different States.

The first objection which I shall urge against the general ticket system, is, that it not only destroys the vote of the minority in the State, but actually transfers the votes which that minority give in favor of one candidate, to another. We know that, in almost every State in the Union, there generally exists a division of opinion amongst the people, on the subject of the Presidential election. Assuming that the people of New York, for example, should be thus divided in opinion, in the proportion of nineteen thousand for one candidate, and seventeen for another, what, let me ask, is the effect of the general ticket, upon the vote of that State? It forcibly gives the vote of seventeen thousand citizens to the candidate against whom they actually voted. The very votes which the people intended to defeat his election, are, by the State, wrested from their legitimate aim, and made subservient to the advancement of a man, who may, perhaps, be an object of abhorrence to the very people who are thus compelled into his service. It is thus, sir, that, under the delusive and mistaken idea of preserving the rights of the States, we sacrifice the fundamental principles of the Republican system. We literally immolate the people by thousands and myriads, at the shrine of an ideal phantom. But we shall be told that it is the duty of the minority to submit to the will of the majority. This, sir, is an obvious truth; but I beg gentlemen not to be misled by it. It has no application to the question I am considering. I am not complaining that the minority are compelled to submit, but that all the minorities in the States are annihilated, in making up the general aggregate of the whole Union, as if they were immaterial powers in a political equation. And the reason why I do complain of this is, that it gives the minority in the Union a chance for ascendancy equal to that enjoyed by the majority.

But, Mr. Chairman, the real question which we are called upon to decide, is, whether we will establish the district system, or have no system at all. It is certain, from the known state of public opinion on the subject, that the people will never consent to the establishment of a uniform general ticket system, by an amendment of the constitution. Shall we, then, rather permit the existing state of constitutional laxity to continue, than adopt the district system?

In estimating the dangers of the present state of things, I have often considered that Providence has been kindly regardful of us, or we should have been long since involved in the most disastrous civil conflicts. Perhaps we owe this fortunate exemption, in a considerable degree, to the moderation and temperance of our national character. But unless the constitution is fixed upon some certain foundation, there is serious ground for apprehending the occurrence of the most delicate and embarrassing question at no distant period. I will state a case that may probably occur at the very next election, and request gentlemen, if they can, to solve the difficult question involved in it. New York, we know, is now divided into electoral districts, by a law which is admitted on all hands to be constitutional. Suppose the Legislature of that State, under the plausible pretext of preventing the division of the elective power of the State, were, on the eve of the next Presidential election, to re-assume the power which they formerly exercised, and appoint the Presidential electors. Suppose the people of the existing districts, maintaining this act of resumption on the part of the Legislature, to be unconstitutional, were to vote for electors, different from those chosen by the Legislature; and that, under these conflicting titles, two pretenders should claim the sceptre of Executive power. This would be a contest which could only be decided by a civil war; and we should have a commentary on our present system written in blood. This is no imaginary difficulty. I solemnly declare, that I am utterly incapable of deciding which of the two competitors would be the real President, and would thank any gentleman for his assistance who thinks he can solve the difficulty. To one candidate I would say, you have the constitution on your side; to the other, you have on yours the practice of most of the State Legislatures, and the acquiescence of the country. And yet the question now presented is different from any that has heretofore occurred, because the law establishing the district system being clearly constitutional, peculiar ground is furnished for regarding the legislative assumption as an unconstitutional act. Such a question, sir, would never be decided by dispassionate reasoning. Passion, strife, blood—these are the elements that would enter into the argument.

I shall proceed now, Mr. Chairman, to consider an objection to the district system, which I shall examine with more attention, from the respect I entertain for the gentlemen who urge it, than its intrinsic importance would otherwise demand. It is conceived that the proposed system tends to destroy the sovereign rights of the States, and to produce what is denominated consolidation. Now, sir, if I cannot show that the tendency of my proposition is the reverse of that which is ascribed to it in these respects, I will surrender the scheme as indefensible. To a correct understanding of the objection I am considering, a precise and definite conception of the State powers affected by the proposed amendment is indispensable. As long as we deal in vague generalities, we shall certainly be involved in confusion, if not in error. What, then, are the powers which I propose to take away from the State Legislatures? The power of voting directly for the electors of President, which will be admitted to be a usurpation, and the power to change the district into the general ticket system. So far as the proposition tends to prevent future acts of usurpation by the State Legislatures, it must be admitted to be salutary. The only power, then, which merits a moment's consideration, is the power of changing the mode of giving the popular vote. Is that a power that ought to belong to any legislative body? Is it not obvious, as well from our own experience as from the nature of things, that it is a power which will only be exercised abusively, and for the accomplishment of party purposes? What other conceivable purpose can it answer? I will venture to assert that, in every instance in which the district system has been made to give way to the general ticket, party objects have constituted the avowed motive of the change.

But, sir, on this subject of State rights, let me warn gentlemen to beware of running the national barque into the vortex of real danger, while attempting to escape from those which are purely imaginary. They regard the State Governments as sentinels, standing on the watch-towers of liberty, and yet place those governments in a relation to the General Government that must destroy both their fidelity and vigilance. I have shown, sir, that where the general ticket exists, the State Legislatures, by nomination or other modes of indication, will, in practice, control and decide the vote of the State, for President. By bringing the State Legislatures into the operation of choosing the President, you make it the duty of those to sound the alarm of approaching tyranny who have been themselves instrumental in making the tyrant. It would be just as wise to expect the disclosure of a felony by a participant in the perpetration of it. The true mode of preserving the guardian vigilance of the State Legislatures is to keep them entirely out of the sphere of the Presidential canvass. Let them stand by, as disinterested spectators, while the people choose the President. It is thus only that they can be preserved in the attitude of sentinels.

Allow me now, sir, to go a little farther on this subject, and ask gentlemen if it has never occurred to them, that the State Governments may communicate an artificial energy, a morbid action to despotism in the General Government.

Upon what principle is it assumed that the State Legislatures will be always on the side of liberty? Does our experience warrant the supposition? I beg that gentlemen will do me the favor to open their eyes, and look around them at political events that are passing almost the very moment in which I am speaking. Have not attempts been made during the present session by the resolutions of State Legislatures, to goad our sluggish pace and stubborn temper into a celerity and pliancy more compatible with the views of the Executive Government? Such, sir, is the frail security of liberty, when we rely exclusively upon holding one power in check by another, instead of subjecting all to the control of the people. The experience of all nations that have made the experiment demonstrates, that it will eventually result in a meretricious combination between the powers designed to act as checks on each other. What was the real power to which the fathers of the Republic looked with dread and apprehension? Not the legislative power of this House, but the power of Executive patronage. Upon whom is it that this power is likely to exert the most dangerous influence? Unquestionably, sir, upon small pre-existing bodies, like the State Legislatures, and not upon the mass of people. The people of a single electoral district would be more difficult to move, by Executive patronage, than the Legislature of a whole State. And I will venture to assert, that there is not one of those districts, in the whole Union, that could have been induced, without any information on the subject, to instruct their representatives here to give their support to a particular measure of the Executive Government. Sir, a President coming into power by the aid and concurrence of the State Legislatures, would be irresistible. These bodies would lull the people into false security, and, while professing to defend, would actually betray their liberties. But the most extraordinary objection that I have yet heard urged against the district system, is its tendency to produce consolidation. What, let me ask, do gentlemen mean by the term consolidation? Do they use it as synonymous with union? If that be the case, I admit that the tendency of the district system will be to "consolidate the Union;" the very thing which the Father of his Country declared to be the primary aim of the Federal Convention, in framing this Government. But, that consolidation which is really dangerous to liberty, and which would destroy the federative character of our Government, is the concentration of power in the Government here. In this sense of the term, I deprecate consolidation as much as any man, and the tendency of my proposition is to produce a result almost precisely the reverse of this. Instead of concentrating power into the hands of the Government here, it diffuses the most important of all powers among the great body of the people, and fixes it there irrevocably.

FEBRUARY, 1828.]

It seems to me that a new reading of State rights is now, for the first time, introduced. I have always regarded State rights as standing in contradistinction to the powers of the General Government. But now the rights of the States are brought out in array against the rights of the People. How can it be conceived that we impair the rights of a State, by vesting the highest prerogative of sovereignty in the people of that State? Virginia, voting by districts, is Virginia still—divested of none of her attributes as a separate member of the confederacy. God forbid that I should propose any thing so absurd as to break down the barriers which separate her from the rest of the Union, and let in any foreign influence to control her political operations. I do not propose to impair the federative character of the Government in the slightest degree. Each State will give precisely the same number of electoral votes for the President that she is now entitled to give under the existing provisions of the constitution.

But the concluding argument which I shall urge in favor of the district system is this: The small States will never consent to give up their eventual equality in voting for the President in this House, unless the large States will consent to break their power of concentration and combination, by the establishment of the district system. In reference to this indispensable compromise, all the arguments which go to demonstrate the expediency of depriving this House of the contingent power of voting for the President, are so many arguments in favor of the district system.

THURSDAY, February 16.

Amendment of the Constitution—Election of President and Vice President.

Mr. McDUFFIE resumed his speech, as follows:

This brings me (said Mr. McD.) to the consideration of the second and incomparably the most important branch of the amendment—that which provides, that, in the event of a failure of the primary electoral vote to decide the election, the two highest candidates shall be referred back to the people, instead of referring the three highest to the House of Representatives.

In entering into the investigation of this part of the plan, which illustrates the genius of the whole amendment, I propose to develop what I deem to be the true principle of liberty, in the organization of our system of Government. In all the free Governments that have existed, it will be found, upon examining their structure philosophically, that their liberty was resolvable into some fundamental principle, and that the final loss of that liberty was owing to some inherent defect in that fundamental principle. The great conservative principle, then, that pervades and sustains the whole machinery of our Government, is the responsibility of public functionaries to the people. From its exact analogy to the principle which sustains the harmony of the material universe, it may be appropriately denominated the gravitation of our political system. And in looking forward to the brilliant and glorious destinies that open upon his vision, the hopes of the American patriot will cling to this, as the safe and steady anchorage that will enable us to ride out the storms that have overwhelmed the liberties of all other Republics. It results, from the very nature of our scheme of Government, that, in proportion as the power of the functionary is increased, should be the directness and efficiency of his responsibility to the people. Responsibility and power are the antagonist principles of the system, and its perfection consists in their equipoise. Without this equipoise, the eccentric movements of power will as inevitably destroy our free system of Government, as the suspension of the centrifugal or centripetal power in the planetary system, would destroy the equilibrium of the universe. If we will attentively consider the nature and tendency of Executive power, we shall be satisfied, that, of all the kinds of power that enter into the system of Government, none requires so decidedly the restraining influence of the principle of responsibility. There is no power more active, encroaching, and dangerous, operating, as it does, through the influence of its patronage, upon the hopes and fears of a large portion of the community. But, by rendering the President directly responsible to the people, we shall solve the great problem, never before fully realized, of uniting in the government of so extensive a country, the elements of liberty and power. All the essential powers of sovereignty may be safely entrusted to a Government emanating directly from the people upon whom it is to operate. In this particular, ours is distinguished from most of the free Governments that have been known to history. Every attempt to secure liberty by withholding those powers which are necessary for the defence and security of the nation, must speedily end in the loss of that liberty. They have always ended so. No generous and high-minded people can long tolerate the existence of a Government that is not capable of defending them. Such a Government is inevitably destined to pass from a rickety state of feebleness and distraction, through anarchy, to despotism. Hence, the importance of that peculiar organization, which enables us to clothe the President with such extensive powers, without endangering public liberty.

I am not, I trust, one of those visionary advocates of the abstract rights of man, that would extend the power of the people farther than is conducive to the happiness of the political society. It is idle to suppose that the people can have any rights incompatible with their own happiness. Although, therefore, I have shown, that they are necessarily virtuous from their position, yet I admit, that patriotic intentions would furnish no adequate security for the wise selection of a Chief Magistrate, in the absence of sufficient intelligence. It would be a vain and delusive mockery, to invest them with an elective power, which they could only exercise to the destruction of that which is the end of all government—the national good. There is no political truth more worthy of the attention of a practical statesman, than that the freedom of the people cannot rise higher than their intelligence. Such is the indispensable condition of freedom; and all the attempts which have been made in modern Europe to render Government more free than the intelligence of the people would warrant, have resulted in bloody and disastrous reaction. I do not hesitate, therefore, to admit, that the people have no abstract right to any power, which they cannot exercise with intelligence. It is true, then, that the people of the United States have not sufficient intelligence to choose a President?

On this subject, we are told, that history furnishes no example of a chief Executive magistrate chosen directly by the great mass of the people. This, sir, is a melancholy truth; and it furnishes the true solution of the fact, that there never has existed a Republic that has lost its liberty.

It is easy to demonstrate, that, previous to the establishment of this Government, liberty never had any thing like a fair experiment. This, sir, will conclusively appear, when we come to consider historically and philosophically the causes, why it is that the chief magistrate of an extensive country never has been chosen by the great body of the people. But, then, has this happened?

As all the Governments of modern Europe had their foundations laid in the principles of the feudal system, the only experiments upon the republican system which deserve to be recorded in history, are those made by the ancients.

Now, the election of a chief magistrate by the mass of the people of an extensive community, was, to the most enlightened nations of antiquity, a political impossibility. Destitute of the art of printing, they could not have introduced the representative principle into their political systems, even if they had understood it. In the very nature of things, that principle can only be co-extensive with popular intelligence. In this respect, the art of printing is more than any invention since the creation of man, is destined to change and elevate the political condition of society. It has given a new impulse to the energies of the human mind, and opens new and brilliant destinies to modern republics, which were utterly unattainable by the ancients. The existence of a country population, scattered over a vast extent of territory, as intelligent as the population of the cities of antiquity, was a phenomenon which was utterly and necessarily unknown to the free States of antiquity. All the intelligence which controlled the destiny and upheld the dominion of Republican Rome, was confined to the walls of the Great City. Even when her dominion extended beyond Italy to the utmost known limits of the inhabited world, the city was the exclusive seat both of intelligence and empire. Without the art of printing, and the consequent advantages of a free press, that habitual and incessant action of mind upon mind, which is essential to all human improvement, could no more exist, amongst a numerous and scattered population, than the commerce of disconnected continents could traverse the ocean without the art of navigation. Here, then, is the source of our superiority, and our just pride as a nation. The statesmen of the remotest extremes of the Union can converse together, like the philosophers of Athens, in the same Portico, or the politicians of Rome, in the same Forum. Distance is overcome, and the citizens of Georgia and of Maine can be brought to co-operate in the same great object, with as perfect a community of views and feelings, as actuated the tribes of Rome, in the assemblies of the people. It is obvious, from these views of the subject, that liberty has a more extensive and durable foundation in the United States, than it ever has had in any other age or country. By the representative principle—a principle unknown and impracticable among the ancients, the whole mass of society is brought to operate, in constraining the action of power, and in the conservation of public liberty. The extent of territory, which, by the operation of fixed and obvious laws, caused the Roman Republic to sink under its own cumbrous weight, is our best security against a similar catastrophe. The extensive provinces of that Republic, incapable of being brought into the constitutional action of the political system, presented a mass of unenlightened brute force, unconnected with the Republic, by political sympathy or interest, and ready to be wielded by any military adventurer, for the overthrow of public liberty.

In adverting, and I do it with peculiar pleasure, to the situation, and probable destiny of the United States, as contrasted with those of other nations, I would ask, emphatically, what would be the condition, what the security of our liberty, if it were dependent upon any single city? Sir, all cities, however intelligent and virtuous, must, from the very structure of their society, have a populace of greater or less extent, which, when roused to action, by any extraordinary excitement, are impelled by mutual sympathy, and the contagion of feeling, resulting from contact, to acts of turbulence, riot, and outrage. In a word, they degenerate into a tumultuous rabble. I will take Boston for an example, as furnishing the strongest illustration—a city, which I cannot mention, without having excited in my breast strong emotions of reverence, connected with the proudest recollections of our Revolutionary history. In this city, sir, inhabited by the unmixed descendants of the genuine old English puritans—in this city, distinguished for the general intelligence and steady moral and religious habits of its citizens—in the cradle of American liberty, and the emporium of American literature and arts, what is the spectacle we have recently witnessed? We have seen a miserable strolling player, an outcast from his native country, throw the whole city into a scene of riotous commotion, that might have swept away the liberties of the Republic, had they depended upon so frail a security. But I thank God that the liberties of this country do not rest upon the trembling and unsteady basis of any city—neither Athens, nor Rome, nor Boston—but on the intelligence of the great mass of the people, scattered as they are, over our widely extended surface.

Upon the question of the capacity of the people to choose the Chief Magistrate, I would remark, that the citizens of all free countries have been found competent to the selection of the highest officers. For the last half century, the talent that has governed England, notwithstanding her artificial distinctions, has been brought forward by the people, and has made its way to power through the House of Commons. Of the distinguished statesmen who have figured in her councils during that period, I know scarcely a single exception. Pitt, Castlereagh, and Canning, were all indebted to the people for their political elevation; and it is certain that no statesmen in modern times, have exerted a more decisive influence over the current of human affairs; whether for good or for evil, it is not now material to inquire. But, sir, let us come a little nearer home, and consult our own experience upon this point. Out of the six Presidents who have been called to preside over the Republic, five have been the unquestionable choice of the people of America. Looking back upon the history of the past, with the impartiality of posterity, and the benefit of subsequent experience, we can have no hesitation in admitting, that the selection of the people has been the very best that could have been made. In fact, such is the course of political service through which a statesman must ordinarily pass before he can aspire to the Presidency, that it would not be going too far to say, that the people are more capable of selecting that officer, than almost any other public functionary. It is much easier to form a just estimate of a statesman, by palpable measures of wisdom and foresight, than to discover and bring to light latent capacities that have never been exhibited in the theatre of political action.

But, sir, let us, for a moment, compare the Presidents chosen by the people, with the officers chosen by those Presidents. It is a subject of curious speculation, and will lead us, I think, to a very decided conclusion, that the people are more capable of choosing the President, than the President would himself be to choose his successor. Sir, what criterion of talent have our Presidents adopted in the organization of their cabinets? They have either adopted the popular standard, and promoted those who had been previously distinguished, or they have exhibited the most signal infelicity in their choice. How many instances can be shown of statesmen, of first rate talents, brought into the Executive Government, who had not first distinguished themselves here as the immediate representatives of the people? I will particularly refer to the Administration of Mr. Madison, for whose character, as a profound statesman, I entertain the highest respect. He was, at the same time, a monument of the capacity of the people to choose public agents, and of the frailty of any other reliance. For, if I may speak with the freedom of history on such a subject, his cabinet was most wretchedly feeble, and from no cause more strikingly so, than from the attempt to discover the secret treasure of talents that had escaped the searching sagacity of the people.

It is not unworthy of remark, that there is no officer in whose election the people are so likely to be actuated exclusively by patriotic and elevated motives, as in that of the President of the United States. Personally unknown to the great body of them, and seen only through the medium of his deeds and his character, they can have no personal predilection or interested motive, to swerve them from the dictates of wisdom and patriotism. On the contrary, in the election of mere local officers, and particularly those ministerial officers of the law, whose official duties have a bearing upon the pecuniary interest of the debtor and creditor classes of the community, it not unfrequently occurs that even the people are actuated by factious motives. And this from the only cause that can produce such motives—the existence of an individual interest in the election, different to the public interest, and paramount to it.

But, sir, I must hasten to consider another objection that has been urged against referring the election of the President directly to the people. We have been told, from high authority—an Executive message of one of the States—that it will produce popular excitement and turbulence. It does really appear to me, sir, that the grave statesmen of the country are mistaking, on this subject, the images of their classic recollections, for the sober and substantial realities of life. They seem to forget that they are not walking in the groves of Athens, nor mingling in the conflicts of the Roman Comitia. They permit themselves to be carried away by false and delusive analogies. I believe it would be a vain attempt to try to rouse the people to scenes of turbulence and strife, on the subject of the Presidential election. The extent of our territory, and the dispersion of our population, circumstances once deemed incompatible with Republican freedom, are our absolute guarantees against those stormy commotions that distinguish the history of simple democracies. I do not believe it would be possible to excite even Boston to a riot on the subject of the Presidency, although Kean, the player, roused the mob to acts of violence: for, by the district system, Boston would only have one electoral vote, and that would scarcely be an object of sufficient magnitude to produce such consequences.

This idea of exciting the people to violence on the Presidential election, is founded on absolute inattention to the situation of our country, and would be scarcely excusable in a youth at college, in his sophomore year. I will appeal to the experience of every member on this floor, and ask whether he has ever heard of a solitary instance of popular outrage on this subject. No, sir: in ten presidential elections, we have given a practical refutation of the unfounded imputations that have been cast upon the republican form of Government in this respect. I will venture to assert—and I speak in the hearing of those who have been eye witnesses of the fact—that a single parliamentary election for Westminster has produced more popular excitement and violence, and outrage, than all the Presidential elections since the foundation of our Government. No American citizen has ever felt the slightest apprehension of outrage in the exercise of his elective franchise. The very humblest among us, marches to the polls with more confidence and security than even the Prime Minister of England. I have a friend: my eye who witnessed a Westminster election and it was regarded as an extraordinary instance of rashness, even in Lord Castlereagh, a Minister remarkable for his nerve, to vote for the ministerial candidate, in the state of outrageous excitement that existed. But, even that Minister, after giving his vote, was under the necessity of consulting his own personal safety by slinking, in his robes of office, precipitately from the hustings, like a felon. And yet, the turbulences of Republics, and the dangers of popular violence are the perpetual themes of declamation, applicable to this country, where every day around us looks more like the calm of death. It is idle to talk about popular violence. There is not a nation on the face of the globe, whatever may be its form of government, that is completely exempt from such an imputation.

What, sir, has been the fact, as exemplified in the occurrences of the recent election? However we may differ upon other questions connected with it, I believe few will dispute the fact, that the popular favorite, the undoubted choice of the nation, was not chosen by the House. This House disregarded the will of the people; and yet they have exhibited no indications of outrage, but have borne their disappointment in the very spirit of philosophical resignation. They have submitted, as they ought to have submitted, to the constitutional authority, with the stern dignity of freemen who understand their duties, and know how to vindicate their rights. In any other country, if a Military Chief had been the object of popular admiration and confidence, and defeated by the legislative body, some Cromwell or Bonaparte would have stepped forward, dissolved the contumacious assembly, and erected a throne of usurpation on its ruins.

But, sir, I not only maintain that the people are exempt from the charge of violence, but that there is a tendency to carry the feeling of indifference to public affairs to a dangerous extreme. From the peculiar structure and commercial spirit of modern society, and the facilities presented in our country, for the acquisition of wealth, the eager pursuit of gain predominates over our concern for the affairs of the Republic.

lic. This is, perhaps, our national foible. Wealth is the object of our idolatry, and even liberty is worshipped in the form of property. Although this spirit, by stimulating industry, is unquestionably excellent in itself, yet it is to be apprehended that, in a period of peace and tranquillity, it will become too strong for patriotism, and produce the greatest of national evils—popular apathy.

We have been frequently told, that the farmer should attend to his plough, and the mechanic to his handicraft, during the canvass for the Presidency. Sir, a more dangerous doctrine could not be inculcated. If there is any spectacle, from the contemplation of which I would shrink with peculiar horror, it would be that of the great mass of the American people sunk into a profound apathy, on the subject of their highest political interests. Such a spectacle would be more portentous to the eye of intelligent patriotism, than all the monsters of the earth, and fiery signs of the heavens, to the eye of trembling superstition. If the people could be indifferent to the fate of a contest for the Presidency, they would be unworthy of freedom. If I were to perceive them sinking into this apathy, I would even apply the power of political galvanism, if such a power could be found, to rouse them from their fatal lethargy. Keep the people quiet! Peace! peace! Such are the whispers by which the people are to be lulled to sleep, in the very crisis of their highest concerns. Sir, "you make a solitude, and call it peace!" Peace? 'Tis death! Take away all interest from the people, in the election of their chief ruler, and liberty is no more. What, sir, is to be the consequence? If the people do not elect the President, some body must. There is no special Providence to decide the question. Who, then, is to make the election, and how will it operate? You throw a general paralysis over the body politic, and excite a morbid action in particular members. The general patriotic excitement of the people, in relation to the election of the President, is as essential to the health and energy of the political system, as circulation of the blood is to the health and energy of the natural body. Check that circulation, and you inevitably produce local inflammation, gangrene, and ultimately death. Make the people indifferent—destroy their legitimate influence—and you communicate a morbid violence to the efforts of those who are ever ready to assume the control of such affairs—the mercenary intriguers and interested office hunters of the country. Tell me not, sir, of popular violence? Show me a hundred political factionists—men who look to the election of a President, as the means of gratifying their high or their low ambition—and I will show you the very materials for a mob, ready for any desperate adventure connected with their common fortunes. The reason of this extraordinary excitement is obvious. It is a matter of self-interest, of personal ambition. The people can have no such motives.

They look only to the interest and glory of the country.

There was a law of Athens which subjected every citizen to punishment who refused to take sides in the political parties which divided the Republic. It was founded in the deepest wisdom. In political affairs, the vicious, the ambitious, and the interested, are always active. It is the natural tendency of virtue, confiding in the strength of its own cause, to be inactive. It hence results, that the ambitious few will inevitably acquire the ascendancy in the conduct of human affairs, if the patriotic many, the people, are not stimulated and roused to a proper activity and effort.

I come, now, Mr. Chairman, to what I regard the most important consideration connected with this branch of the amendment: the expediency of excluding this body from all agency in the election of the President.

I will, however, first draw the attention of the committee to a very striking incongruity of principle, involved in the provision to refer that election to this House. The three highest candidates, indicated by the popular vote, are referred to the House of Representatives. Upon what principle? Is it because this body has more capacity for selection than the people? Admit this to be the fact, and what follows? You call in a competent body to select a President out of three persons chosen by those whom the argument supposes to be incompetent. If the people are capable of voting for three, why not for one? Upon what metaphysical or mathematical principle is it, that the people are capable of choosing three persons, one of whom must be President, and are not capable of going another step, and choosing the one of those three who is to wield the sceptre? If the House of Representatives have any superior capacity, you do not give them a sufficient latitude of discretion to exercise it to any effectual purpose. In a word, the scheme combines the disadvantages of both modes of election, and the advantage of neither, giving to this House just sufficient latitude for all the purposes of corruption, and not enough for any good end.

The first objection that I shall urge against the participation of this House in the election of the President, is its tendency to destroy that separation of the Legislative from the Executive Department of the Government, that is indispensable to the effective responsibility of the latter. From the very nature of Executive power, its operations are unseen by the people. Acting, not like Congress, by general laws, that are regularly promulgated, the President expends money, confers offices, and regulates the distribution of armies and navies—acts silently performed, and of which the people can have no precise knowledge, that is not derived from their Representatives here. We ourselves can only see the movements of Executive power, dimly and imperfectly, through the lumbering masses of documents on our tables.

It is not to be expected that this body will be inclined to enforce a very rigorous accountability, against the President of its own creation. Instead of standing to the Executive in the relation of an independent, co-ordinate Department, it becomes the partisans of his power, and the apologist for his transgressions.

Another effect which must certainly result from the habitual interference of this House in the election of the President, is the degradation of its legislative character. Instead of statesmen, profoundly versed in the sublime art of rendering the Republic flourishing and happy, the members of this House will degenerate into mere managing politicians, trained in the little arts of intrigue. Instead of devoting ourselves to the peculiar and appropriate duties of our station, the making of laws, we shall be exclusively engrossed in making Presidents.

When the members of Congress become arrayed into cabals, designated by the names of the several candidates for the Presidency, there will be an end both of our dignity and independence. I have no occasion, sir, to be ashamed of any man whose pretensions I have sustained for the Presidency; but every principle of my nature recoils at the idea of being characterized by the name or livery of any man living. A state of things will soon occur, in which the great politicians of the country will be those who are most dexterous at making political combinations, and public men will devote themselves to the huckstering arts of gaining power, instead of studying the more dignified art of using it wisely.

It cannot be disguised, sir, that, by bringing the election of the President into this House, we expose ourselves to the influence of those arts of political courtship, which the ambitious have ever been prone to practise. To say nothing of corruption, there are few among us, strongly as we may feel intrenched behind our own dignity, who are not liable to have the sternness of our purpose relaxed by a condescending smile, or an act of Executive confidence, or—a dinner. These little arts, which, in their combined operation, constitute what is usually denominated intrigue, are the means by which cunning aspirants address themselves to the vanity and foibles of those who fall within the sphere of their fascination. The people, sir, cannot be reached by these arts; but we, their wise and virtuous Representatives, thrown into the fatal circle, fall victims to an influence of which we are not ourselves conscious. It is in vain, sir, to dissemble. We may shroud ourselves in wise looks and a dignified exterior, but we are perhaps laboring under the fatal charm of the enchantress, at the very moment we are indignantly disclaiming it.

The peculiar circumstances under which the Presidential election will generally come before the House of Representatives, constitute a very striking objection to the exercise of the power now vested in this body. The election comes here with almost a certainty that, in nine cases out of ten, it will be decided against the will of the people. The small minorities will naturally combine against the popular favorite. They will do this upon principles as certain in their operation as gravitation. The man who is conscious that he is the choice of the people, stands firm and inflexible in the confidence of his own strength. You cannot approach him. He disdains to negotiate. He feels his title to be strong, and confidently reposes upon it. All the other candidates naturally regard him as the obstacle that stands most in the way of their hopes. United by their very feebleness, they defeat the will of the nation. For accomplishing this object the mode of voting here affords extraordinary facilities. We vote by States. The natural course of things will throw the whole power of the combination upon the small States. A single member is more easily brought into the arrangement than thirty-six. It may thus happen that less than forty members of this body will elect the President. This strong probability that the President will be chosen by a small minority of Congress, demands the most serious and solemn consideration.

Under what circumstances do you call him to the discharge of the high duties of his office? You place a sceptre in a hand which has not energy to wield it. The unavoidable consequence will be, that the whole patronage of his administration will be perverted to the purpose of sustaining and strengthening his popularity. He comes into power under circumstances that create a political necessity of action in this manner. Destitute of the confidence of the people, he must feel that his patronage is his power. This view of the subject brings me to the consideration of the great and conclusive objection to the interference of this House in the election—its tendency to corrupt the legislative body.

Corrupt Congress, and you assail liberty in the very seat of its vitality.

Sir, it is innocence that temptation conquers. If our first parent, pure as she came from the hand of God, was overcome by this seductive power, let us not imitate her fatal rashness, by seeking temptation, when it is in our power to avoid it. Let us not vainly confide in our own incorruptible purity. We are liable to be corrupted. To an ambitious man, an honorable office will appear as beautiful and fascinating as the apple of Paradise.

I admit, sir, that ambition is a passion, at once the most powerful and the most useful. Without it, human affairs would become a mere stagnant pool. It is the active principle that stimulates even the patriot to exertion, and, in its very excesses, it is the frailty of the most exalted minds. By means of this patronage the President addresses himself, in the most irresistible manner, to this, the noblest and strongest of our passions. All that the imagination can desire—honor, power, wealth, ease, are held out as the temptation. Man was not made to resist such allurements. It is impossible to conceive, Satan himself could not devise, a system which would more infallibly introduce corruption and death into our political Eden. Sir, the angels fell from heaven with less temptation.

That cannot, then, be a wise and political organization that requires us to resist temptations too strong either for men or angels.

The political truths I have advanced will be fully sustained by the authority of history. Look back, sir, into the vast and dreary solitude of past ages, and read the epitaphs which impartial history has inscribed on the tombs of fallen republics. What is the melancholy lesson they teach us? That no free Government has been overcome by force, but all by corruption. If we ever lose our liberties, which God forbid, this will be the euthanasia of the Republic. While the extent of our territory exempts us from the extinction of our liberties by popular violence, it increases the only other catastrophe to which we can be exposed—the concentration of power in the Executive Government. Sir Robert Walpole, one of the most able Ministers that English history can boast, and too fatally versed in the corrupt use of Executive patronage, expressed, as his deliberate opinion, founded upon his long ministerial experience, that, with the exception of three men, “every politician he had ever known had his price.” Though certainly not universally true, this remark is but too generally so in reference to all ages and countries. There is a precise accuracy in the phraseology of this sentiment, indicative of the masterly skill of him who expressed it. “Every man has his price.” That is to say, you must study the character and foibles of each man, to ascertain what it is that will make him subservient to your purpose. A man who would reject a pecuniary bribe, with indignation, would, perhaps, have no scruples to hold a negotiation for an office. Another, who would disdain to make an express stipulation, even for an office, might think it quite excusable to act under an implied understanding. And a third, who could not reconcile it to his conscience to have any understanding, either express or implied, might be seduced by accidentally hearing that a certain office was designed for him as a reward, not for his vote, but for his extraordinary merits. There is no end, sir, to the subtleties of that self-deluding casuistry, by which ambition is prone to silence the remonstrances of conscience.

There is a marked distinction between public and private corruption, that explains the reason why the one is so much more generally successful than the other, in conquering those who fall within the sphere of its influence. There is a dazzling splendor in successful ambition, that conceals the depravity by which it achieves its purpose. The man who steals a penknife is shunned as an object of abhorrence: the man who steals a sceptre is hailed as an object of adoration. Power diffuses a deceptive gloss over the crimes of the usurper, and corruption sheds indemnity over its victims. Such are the fascinations of power, that it often wins the homage even of those whose dearest rights it has violated. But, sir, I can never regard it in any other light than as a public crime of the most atrocious hue, to acquire power by fraud and corruption. The man who rises by such means is a felon, flagrante delicto, and the insignia of his office are the standing monuments of his guilt.

But, sir, it is often said, “True, the politicians of England have been corrupted by patronage, but those of the United States are of more inflexible materials.” Indeed! Where did we obtain this charter of exemption from human frailty? Alas, sir, we have no such exemption. The people of the United States, for the reasons which I have explained, are superior, both in virtue and intelligence, to those of any age or country; but their statesmen are subject to the same influences that operate upon those of England, not, perhaps, in the same degree, but in a degree that is destined to be constantly increased, if not resisted by measures similar to the present. Sir, there is no country on earth where office has greater attractions, or is sought with more avidity, than in the United States. Since I have been in public life, it has been a constant source of mortification to me to witness the spirit which prevails on this subject. There are those, it seems to me, who would rather eat the “very crumbs from the trenchers” of Executive patronage, than the bread of honest independence.

In one respect, it appears to me, we cannot stand a comparison with the statesmen of England. We do not estimate the dignity of a seat on this floor as highly as an Englishman estimates a seat in Parliament. To those whose objects are the public service, and an honest fame, there can be no theatre so desirable as this floor. But what mortifying spectacles have we seen, of eager competition among members of Congress, for the most pitiful and contemptible offices in the gift of the Executive, merely for the pecuniary emolument? Offices which I do not believe a member of the English Parliament would accept at the hand of his sovereign. Nor do I see among us any of that extraordinary inflexibility in the adherence to political principles, of which the history of England furnishes some honorable examples. The elder Pitt threw his commission in the face of his sovereign, as soon as he found that his own political principles could not prevail in the Cabinet. But, do we find any instances among us, of the sacrifice of power to principle? On the contrary, do we not find political principle and consistency, openly sacrificed at the shrine of power? We see politicians of every hue and description thrown together, in the most incongruous combinations, exhibiting all the colors of the rainbow, without either its beauty or proportions; a sort of crazy patchwork, held together by no community either of principle or feeling, that throws into the shade Burke's celebrated description of a motley cabinet in England. Sir, it is melancholy to witness what we cannot disguise from ourselves, that a fondness for the nominal dignity and ostentatious display of office—the mere exterior trappings of honor without the substance—should be more regarded than the solid consolations of a fame, which can only be acquired by a consistent course of public service. This seems to me to be one of our peculiar weaknesses. It is rapidly growing upon us. Never was there, in any country, such rapid advances in luxury and refinement, with all their associated frailties. Hitherto, the venerable fathers of the Revolution have presided over us. Their stern and incorruptible virtues, tried and strengthened in the crucible of a long conflict for liberty, were a sufficient guarantee against the use of corruption. But the sceptre has passed into the hands of a new generation, and I fear the mantle of Revolutionary purity has not descended with it. We have certainly seen the purest days of the Republic. The sterling virtues of the Revolution are silently passing away, and the period is not distant when there will be no living monument to remind us of those glorious days of trial. If their virtues do not survive, may their memory at least be long cherished! Let it not be supposed, then, from the example of the past, that there is no danger of corruption.

But we are often told that this Government has not sufficient patronage to produce corruption; and I have even heard the opinion expressed, that there was not enough to hold the Government together. Hold the Government together! Heaven preserve the purity of that Government that is to be held together by patronage! But it is a great mistake to estimate the patronage of this Government so lightly. It is even now great, and it is rapidly increasing. We are not the mere beings of a day, but must look forward at least to a few generations of our posterity. What, sir, is the prospect? I am almost afraid to contemplate the spectacle of our growth. In little more than half a century from this day—a period which many, I trust, of those who hear me, will live to witness—the population of these United States will have swelled to the mighty number of forty millions of human souls! With twice the present population of England, and the vast multiplication of offices, resulting from the increasing wants and growing interests of that population, what must be the extent of Executive patronage, and what the virtue of our successors here to encounter, and yet resist it? We are admonished by the experience of nations, that if we would resist corruption effectually, it must be done in the incipient stages of degeneracy. No nation ever has been seen to retrace her steps after having fairly and fully commenced the downward march. The tide of corruption never flows backwards. If once the fatal poison is infused into a vital part of the system, nothing is left to us but to await the issue with melancholy resignation.

With such perfect abhorrence do I look upon the interference of this House in the election of the President, that, if the small States pertinaciously adhere to the present system, and prevent the amendment of the constitution in time for the next election, I will myself, should no other person do it, propose a convention of popular delegates from the whole Union, to nominate a President; and I would stand pledged to sustain the nomination. If you will not amend the constitution, the people will rise above it. It is idle to think of preventing the people of this country from exercising the most legitimate and important of their sovereign rights, by paper restrictions. You had as well, sir, attempt to tie down a lion with a cobweb. Where, then, will be the small States, and what the value of a contingent equality, when the contingency will never occur? As a friend to the just rights of the small States, I beseech gentlemen not to persevere in the attempt to retain an unjust power, at the hazard of those combinations among the large States, that will inevitably result in the oppression of their more feeble competitors.

But, have the people of the small States any interest in the possession of this contested equality of power? Though it may increase the power of their politicians, and enable them to secure a large dividend of Executive patronage, yet what do the people gain, either in power or happiness? Has a small State, merely as a small State, any right or interest, which would be safer in the hands of a President chosen by Congress, than they would be in the hands of a President chosen by the people?

But, sir, is not this a delusive mockery even as to the question of power? Do the States really exercise it in point of fact? Consulting the actual operations of the system, we find that the Representatives of the small States have as often voted against the will of those States as in conformity with it. Will the small States contend, then, for the worse than unprofitable right of being misrepresented on the great subject of the Presidential election? Will they persist in a system that serves only to expose their Representatives to extraordinary temptation, throwing them into a scene of action, in which, if they had the virtue of a Cato, they could not avoid suspicion? But the strong argument in favor of the proposed amendment, in reference to this question of relative power, is the equitable compromise which it involves between the large and the small States. It is that very spirit of mutual concession in which our Government originated. By the district system, the large States give up the power of forming combinations to overpower the small; and by removing the eventual election from this House, the small States give up their contingent equality. What most forcibly recommends this compromise, is the consideration that the powers mutually surrendered by the large and the small States, are dangerous to the purity of the Republic. It is an offering which patriotism requires us to make at the shrine of liberty. Is it possible that we can hesitate?

I do sincerely believe that we have reached a crisis in our great political experiment, when the fate of that experiment will depend upon the wisdom with which we act. Never was there a human assembly invoked by higher considerations to act with disinterested magnanimity. The destiny, not only of the rising millions that are to come after us here, but that of the whole civilized world, hangs trembling on the issue of our deliberations. No nation on earth has ever exerted so extensive an influence on human affairs, as this will certainly exercise, if we preserve our glorious system of Government in its purity. The liberty of this country is a sacred depository—a vestal fire, which Providence has committed to us for the general benefit of mankind. It is the world's last hope. Extinguish it, and the earth will be covered with eternal darkness. "But once put out that light, I know not where is that Promethean heat, that can that light relumine."

MONDAY, February 20.

MR. BUCHANAN offered the following:

Resolved, That the constitution should be so amended, as to re-establish the third clause of the first section of the second article of the original constitution; except that portion thereof which confers the power of electing the President upon the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That the constitution should be so amended, that, in case no election shall be made by the Electors, then the States shall choose the President, from the two highest upon the list, in such manner as the Legislatures thereof may direct; each State having one vote.

MR. BUCHANAN said, it was far from his intention to enter into any detailed explanation, at this time, of the amendment which he had proposed. For the purpose, however, of directing the attention of the House to them, he would merely observe, that the object of the first resolution was, to restore the original provision of the constitution, in regard to the election of President and Vice President, to the time when that election would devolve upon the House of Representatives.

The second resolution proposes, that, in that event, the sovereign States of this Union shall choose the President from the two highest on the list. When no election is made by the electors, it simply confers upon the States themselves the power which is now exercised by their Representatives. It proposes that, in making the choice, the States, and not their Representatives in this House, shall each give one vote, in the manner which their respective Legislatures may prescribe.

MR. B. said he did not propose the last amendment, because he thought it the best possible method of taking the election from the House of Representatives; but because, after much reflection, he believed it was the only one practicable. That consummation was devoutly to be wished by all, and by none more than the Representatives themselves; and he felt persuaded that no amendment for that purpose will ever prevail, which does not leave the balance of power among the States, as it at present exists.

MR. B. said he did not intend to interfere with the debate now progressing. In case the House should appoint a Select Committee, he wished merely that these propositions may be placed in such a situation that they may be referred to that committee.

These resolutions were referred to a Committee of the Whole.

TUESDAY, February 21.

MR. POWELL offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the constitution ought to be so amended, that, in the event of the election of the President of the United States devolving on the House of Representatives, as to provide that no member of the House who shall vote upon such election, shall be capable of receiving an appointment to any office under the Government of the United States, where the power of nomination is in the President, for the term of three years thereafter, except when the nation may be involved in war, in which event, the foregoing disqualification shall not operate to prevent the appointment, or acceptance by any such member, of a commission in the army or navy of the United States.

MR. POWELL, upon offering his amendment, observed, that it was not his intention, at this time, to discuss the merits of the proposition he had offered, or any of the various propositions now before the committee, and under discussion; and, unless his present intentions underwent material alteration, he should not, at any future period, intrude himself upon the attention of the committee upon this subject. MR. P. observed, that it was due to himself and his feelings, in relation to the members of the last Congress, to disclaim any, the most remote, idea that the House, or any of its members, in the exercise of their high constitutional duty of electing a President, at their last session, were influenced by any hope of office, or by any other unworthy motive. He had too high a sense of the character of the members of the last Congress, to believe such an event possible. It was in reference to the future, and the fears expressed by gentlemen, that he had offered the resolution. The House would discover that the resolution would only be adopted in the event of the various plans already suggested, or which might be suggested, to take the ultimate election from the House, being rejected by the House. While we were distributing constitutional power, taking from one, and giving to another, it might be well for us to show our willingness to submit to this self-denying provision, and place the members of this House beyond suspicion.

The resolution was then referred to a Committee of the Whole.

WEDNESDAY, March 1.

Penitentiary for the District.

On motion of Mr. THOMSON, of Pennsylvania, the House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TOMLINSON in the chair, on the bill to provide for erecting a penitentiary in the District of Columbia, to reform the penal law of said District, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMSON said, the bill now submitted to the consideration of the committee, is one embracing principles of considerable consequence. He would desire it to be read through, before he proceeded to make any remarks on the subject, but it was very long, and would, of course, occupy considerable time. He thought a statement of its general scope and design would be sufficient to enable the committee to understand the arguments he had to offer. It proposes to establish, in this District, a Penitentiary, and so to alter the criminal law of the District, that confinement to hard labor shall be inflicted on most crimes, instead of the irrational punishments now in use.

When, said Mr. T., this subject was, by a resolution of the House, referred to the Committee on the District, it became their duty to inquire into the provisions of the present code of criminal law, administered in the District; the condition of the jails; and to provide a remedy for the evils they found prevalent in both. I will now, as briefly as I can, exhibit to the committee the facts on these subjects, which have come to our knowledge, and the reasons which have induced us to propose the remedy for the evils of the present system which this bill provides.

In the year 1791-'2, the District of Columbia was ceded to the United States by the States of Maryland and Virginia. By an act of Congress on the subject, the laws of Maryland, as they then stood, were adopted for the government of that part of the District ceded by that State, and the laws of Virginia for the government of that part of the District south of the Potomac, until they should be altered by act of Congress. As far as relates to criminal matters, the laws of the District have not been since altered.

The States of Virginia and Maryland have since changed their whole system of criminal jurisprudence. They have discarded the cruel system of hanging, whipping, and disfiguring malefactors, and substituted in their stead, the more mild and efficacious one of confinement to hard labor in a penitentiary. But these improvements do not extend to this District.

It is a maxim, in legislating on subjects connected with criminal law, that the prevention of crime is the only legitimate object of punishment. That system which secures to society the greatest amount of prevention, is the best, and ought to be adopted; and that which experience has proved is defective, in this respect, ought at once to be abolished. If we look into the practical operation of the present system of criminal law, in this District, we will find it wholly inadequate to produce the great beneficial results to society, which ought to flow from the administration of the penal justice of a country.

On the south side of the river there are above thirty crimes punished with the dreadful penalty of death; and on this side of the river, there are above fourteen for which the same punishment is provided. It is unnecessary for me to recite the whole of these bloody enactments. It will be sufficient to mention two or three, to illustrate the spirit of the whole code. Feloniously breaking and entering a store or warehouse, by day or by night, and stealing there to the amount of four dollars; breaking out of prison, if the prisoner were confined under the charge of a capital felony, whether he were guilty of that felony or not; a slave, preparing or administering any medicine with ill intent, or attended with any bad consequences; maliciously burning any house, whether it be a mansion house, or whatever may be its use. On this side of the river, breaking and entering a warehouse, storehouse, or tobacco-house, and there stealing to the value of five shillings, is punished with death. Thus, on one side of the river, the life of a man is valued at four dollars, while on the other, the law fixes its price at but five shillings. But the most horrid of all the bloody denunciations of the law here, is, the judgment which it requires to be pronounced on a slave, convicted of petit treason, murder, or arson. It requires that he should be hanged, his head cut off, and his body divided into quarters, and his head and quarters set up in the most public places of the District. Future generations will scarcely believe that in this enlightened age, after the District had been under the exclusive government of the Congress of the United States for thirty-five years, its laws would tolerate such a dreadful spectacle. What will they say when they are informed that the law not only tolerates, but commands it? How should we feel reproved for our supineness, in legislating for this District, if, unfortunately, a poor slave should be convicted of murder or arson, and we should be compelled to witness the execution of the dreadful penalty, by seeing the bleeding and mangled quarters of the unhappy malefactor exposed on the public avenues of this city?

Penitentiary for the District.

It is certainly unnecessary for me to prove that this system is wholly inconsistent with the genius and spirit of the present age. Its operation and effect proves this more forcibly than any argument I can use. The great first principle of our system of Government is, that the law is the expression of the public will. This is not only true in theory, but it is true in practice. When any statute falls under the general displeasure of the people—when the popular will is decidedly against it; if it be one which must be executed through the medium of courts of justice, and more especially if it be a penal one, it soon loses its force, and becomes a dead letter. This is the case with these severe enactments in this District. The unwillingness of the witnesses and prosecutor, the humanity of the jury, the lenity of the judge, and the clemency of the Executive, interpose themselves, aided by the irresistible force of public opinion, between the criminal and the execution of the sentence of the law, so that in all those cases falling within the range of the penalty of death, the offender is never punished, and society is left wholly without protection.

The laws now in force contain penalties wholly disproportioned in severity to the enormity of the offences against which they are enacted. It is true that no human ingenuity can devise a system of such perfection, in this respect, that every offender shall receive the precise amount of punishment due to his guilt. Human reason is imperfect, and human laws must necessarily be general in their provisions, and partake of the imperfections of those who framed them. But, because we cannot do every thing, we are not to conclude that, therefore, we ought to fold our hands, and not attempt to do any thing. If we are denied the power of making a system theoretical, beautiful, and perfect in symmetry, this furnishes no good reason why we should wholly disregard all proportion, and inflict the highest penalties upon the lowest grades of guilt. How atrociously unjust it must appear in the eyes of an enlightened and civilized people, to see the dreadful penalty of death inflicted on an offender whose only offence is, that he has escaped from prison, where he was detained on the charge of a crime punishable with death, and this, whether he was guilty of the crime for which he was detained, or not—a crime, to the perpetration of which there is the highest possible temptation. How does the heart of humanity revolt at the thought of hanging a man, because he has stolen to the value of five shillings! What can justify the barbarity of consigning to the gallows and the grave, the unhappy slave who administers medicine which has some bad effect? The injustice of these terrible judgments of the law is too glaring to require the least illustration.

Death, as was said by one of the ancients, "of all dreadful things, is the most dreadful." It ought, therefore, never to be inflicted, except for the very highest degree of guilt. There are few systems of law which set a high enough value on human life. Legislatures frequently forget the magnitude of the subject, when they are called upon to deliberate upon the life and death of their fellow-citizens. When the question is proposed whether we will consign a rational being to the untried destinies of a future world, to take up his abode, perhaps, in that house of pain, from which, throughout the never-ending flight of future years, "there is no escape," we cannot make up our opinion with too much caution.

But this is not the only part of this system which is objectionable. It is, throughout, a system of impotent cruelty. Its only instruments of punishment are, the gibbet, the whip, and imprisonment without labor. Its only end seems to be the infliction of corporal pain; and the only effect it produces is the hardening and confirming in crime, those upon whom its sentences are executed. The only punishment which the law presents in the District, besides that of death, is whipping, imprisonment without labor, and fines.

When crimes are committed, it is the duty of an enlightened Government to examine its laws, and the structure of society; to look to the peculiar genius of the age, and carefully to inquire into the habits, temper, and character, of the offenders, and the temptations which may have given occasion to their crimes; that it may ascertain what punishments will be best calculated to reform the habits of offenders, and give the highest security to society. In ancient times of barbarism, Governments, instead of calmly making this investigation, fell upon their criminal subjects, not like a father, intent upon reforming their children, but like infuriate maniacs, resolved to inflict upon them the highest possible corporal suffering. And I regret that too much of this spirit is still to be found in the world. Reasoning from the nature of things, one would be led to the conclusion that whipping and other corporal punishments could not have a tendency to reform the character, improve the morals, heighten the civilization, soften the temper, and correct the habits of those on whom they are inflicted. But experience has proved this truth with tenfold more power than abstract reasoning.

To bring the results of experience to bear upon this point, let us compare the effects produced by the system in this District, with those produced by the Penitentiary system in those States where it has been applied. An instance occurred lately of an offender who was in prison at the commencement of the session of the court, for the crime of larceny, who was tried, whipped, and discharged, and for two successive similar offences was twice afterwards arrested in succession, tried, whipped, and discharged, before it rose. Another person was, in the space of four years, convicted for larceny seven times. The population of the District is about 84,000. The convictions for the last four years, of crimes which usually are, and ought to be, punished by confinement to hard labor, were at the average rate of sixty per year; that is, in the ratio of one to about 560 of the population. In the State of Maine, last year, the convictions of offences punished in the Penitentiary, was in the proportion of one to 6,000 of the population. In the State of New Hampshire, the prisoners in the State prison, at the end of last year, were 67. If we suppose that one-half of these were received during the year, which is a large number, and, no doubt, above the truth, we will find, that, even on this computation, the convictions were, there, during the last year, in the proportion of 1 to about 7,400 of the population. In Connecticut, the convictions were, last year, in the proportion of 1 to 7,000 of the population. In Vermont, the convictions were as 1 to 8,000. In the State of New York, from the year 1797 till 1814, the convictions average, annually, at the ratio of 1 to about 5,000 of the inhabitants. In Pennsylvania, from 1794 to 1816, the average is, annually, in the proportion of 1 to about 6,200 of the population. During the latter part of this period, in these two States, their Penitentiaries had become so crowded, as, in a great measure, to destroy their moral effect. Yet they were nine times as efficacious to prevent crimes, as the punishments inflicted in this District. In Massachusetts, the convictions average, from 1806 to 1816, annually, at the ratio of 1 to about 8,000 of the population. And in Virginia, where the system of law is mild, and the Penitentiary has been conducted on principles well calculated to give it moral effect, the convictions were, last year, in the proportion of 1 to 10,000 of the population.

This statement of facts exhibits, with a thousand times more force and clearness, the effects of the system in this District, than any abstract reasoning possibly could. It is true that the population of the District is nearly all a city population. It must, therefore, be expected that crimes will be more numerous here than in agricultural States, in proportion to the number of inhabitants. But it must also be considered that the States I have mentioned, have large commercial cities in them. So that, making every allowance that could be asked for the character of the population of the District, we will find that the penal laws of the States I have mentioned, are, upon an average, more than seven times as effectual to secure society against crimes, as the system of hanging and whipping which prevails here. But I need not refer to statistical calculations to prove that the system of penal law, which governs the District, is one of the worst in the United States, or perhaps anywhere else to be found. We have almost every day occasion to see its total inefficacy, and some of us are every session taught, by personal experience, to know, that the law furnishes but slight protection to the rights of property.

they hold the direct dominion and absolute sovereignty, suffering the greatest evils that can be inflicted on a community, for want of a code of criminal laws, suited to the spirit of the age, and calculated to improve public morals: when they see crimes multiply, and criminals go unpunished: when they see property insecure, and that the laws, which ought to stand as an impenetrable wall of adamant round the civil rights of every individual, have lost their protecting powers: when they see that, instead of improving the morals of society, its condensed energies are poured out upon it, hardening the hearts and rendering obdurate in guilt, those on whom its penalties are inflicted, and disgusting and corrupting the rest of mankind—they must feel that a powerful appeal is made to their paternal justice, and that the authoritative voice of duty enjoins it upon us to give a system of an opposite tendency to this subject people.

I have thus endeavored, as briefly as possible, to state the facts exhibiting the provisions and moral tendency of the present system of criminal law of this District. These facts, without any argument from me, prove, in the most conclusive manner, that there is nothing in it which suits the present condition of mankind. The cruelty of its penalties has roused against it public opinion, and, of course, they are but seldom executed. This argument alone, if there were no other, furnishes sufficient reason to abolish it.

Mr. VERPLANCK followed Mr. THOMSON. He adverted to the experience of New York, in relation to the Penitentiary system, respecting which there was a division of opinion, but of which he declared himself the decided friend. He thought, however, that to be successful, it required to be conducted in a particular manner, which could be learned only by a careful reference to the experiments which had been made. He then proceeded to point out some particulars in which the bill stood in need of revision.

Mr. THOMSON stated, that the committee who had reported the bill were aware it might be improved, and had prepared some amendments which they should bring forward in due time.

Mr. VERPLANCK resumed, and, having stated other points in which the bill seemed defective, said he should wait till the committee suggested, more fully, their own views, before he made any motion to amend. He thought, however, it would be better to appoint three Commissioners to prepare and report a system of Penitentiary law, and of Prison discipline, together with a plan for the construction of the Penitentiary building itself.

Mr. POWELL replied to Mr. V., combating the objections he had stated, and deprecating further delay in the application of remedy to a crying evil.

Mr. BRENT thought it would be better to recommit the bill, and let the committee ingraft into it such improvements as they might think proper.

MARCH, 1836.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

The bill was then about to be read by sections: when

Mr. LIVINGSTON, after paying a deserved tribute to the efforts of the gentleman who had presented the subject to the Committee of the Whole, moved that the committee rise.

The motion prevailed and the committee rose accordingly, and obtained leave to sit again.

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 7.

Amendment of the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to consider the resolutions offered by him for amending the constitution.

Mr. CAMERLUNG said, the character of his State had made so prominent a figure in the debate, that it could not be necessary for him to make any apology for addressing the committee. He had supposed the peculiar circumstances of the times would have admonished gentlemen of the propriety, nay, necessity, of exercising mutual indulgence and forbearance. He regretted, however, to perceive, from the course of this debate, that while we were generously disposed to overlook the errors of the public men in power, and the conduct of all other politicians, during the late election, we were never to terminate our animadversions on that class of politicians who alone could be proudly denominated "no man's men." The State of New York had accordingly been selected as the theatre of the war; and that portion which had been left unravaged by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) had been laid desolate by his colleague, (Mr. STORRS.) He was little disposed to engage in a debate of this character; but, in such a cause, he should be unworthy of his station, were he not ready to break a lance with either or both the gentlemen. The remarks he should submit, would be applicable to the crisis and the question; for both had grown out of the late election by the House. In submitting them, he should not affect a delicacy he did not feel, nor preach a political morality he did not practise. He should treat it as every question should be treated, involving public men and public measures. And, while he should exercise due decorum, he should not forget that the question was one of the most important ever submitted to the attention of Congress. His impressions on the subject were strong—perhaps stronger from the circumstance of his having been a member, he might also say a spectator, during the recent election by the House. He might be mistaken—he trusted he was—but he approached the question under a sincere conviction, that, unless the electoral office be taken hence, the time was not remote when frequent elections here would produce a revolution in the practical operation of this Government, destructive of every thing like political principle and constitutional law, and, in the end, fatal to that sound public opinion upon which the Government was founded.

Before he paid his respects to his colleague, (whom he was happy now to have in his eye,) he would, as first in order, turn his attention to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) It was probable that that gentleman and himself had before them a long journey to perform together; but he was apprehensive they would make very unpleasant companions. We shall, most undoubtedly, said Mr. C., unless he learns to treat my old friends with more respect; for, unlike some others, I never desert an old friend. At the very outset, the gentleman had made an attack upon a venerated and respected friend—he was about to say, now no more—King Caucus. Now that the election was over, we could take a more sober view of the past. This was a spectacle raised during that election, by certain men, for certain purposes. A union was formed: each of the parties to it had his distinct object, ultimately, in view: they were united in but one, the overthrow of King Caucus. We know the result—a result little to the satisfaction of most of the parties to the compact. He had expected from the gentleman from South Carolina a sympathy for King Caucus—a sympathy arising out of similarity of condition. He never reflected on the fate of poor King Caucus, without being reminded of the brief and splendid career of an illustrious exile. He, too, was born a republican, among the wild mountains of Corsica: he, too, played an unceremonious game with Kings and Emperors. He was, unhappily, made a monarch: he became too powerful—excited the jealousy of his neighbors, and alarmed some of his friends. An alliance was formed to overthrow him: each of the parties had his own ulterior scheme: he was conquered: an ancient family was restored—very little to the satisfaction of any, but one, of the members of the alliance. Soon after the restoration here, another great man appeared, bearing a strong family likeness to our late monarch: but the name of Caucus having become somewhat unpopular, his sponsor gave him another name—they called him "Convention"—which, to drop our diadem, means a congregation of deputies, who meet, intrigue a little, quarrel a little, and, at last, agree upon a candidate not much to the satisfaction of some. And yet, in the view of the gentleman from South Carolina, there is a wide distinction: a Caucus is something corrupt, something loathsome—an incubus; while a Convention is a harmless popular favorite! He would not argue this question with the gentleman from South Carolina: he would leave the distinction to his acute and discriminating powers, referring him to the laconic and facetious remark of the celebrated "Doctor Ollapod, of the gilt Galen's Head, Cornet of Horse," to Miss Lucretia MacTab—"Rhubarb is rhubarb, madam, call it what you will."

If the gentleman from South Carolina, or his honorable colleague—who also seemed to think Convention "less offensive"—believed that the understandings of the American people were to be duped by such distinctions—where no difference substantially existed—they underrated their intelligence. These were the mere forms of party, which must exist in some shape or other, wherever parties exist—wherever the people enjoy the privileges of an election.

But the gentleman from South Carolina deprecates party. And does that gentleman expect to defeat the unwise measures of an Administration, sustained by the patronage of all the Departments and the Executive—backed, too, by an overflowing Treasury—without the agency of party? If such be his plan—if the opposition is to be regulated by the rules of the gentleman from South Carolina, he was not ready to engage in it. He was not prepared to embark in a cause, merely from the patriotic motive, in the language of Mr. Burke, of falling, "one by one, an unpitied sacrifice in a contemptible struggle." No party! What language is this? Are we not in the midst of party? What mean these movements which we have witnessed in our House, since the commencement of the present session? Is there not an Executive party here? The weird sisters appeared not more promptly, at the waving of the magic wand, than a phalanx rises here at the call of the Executive. Nay, we have seen them rise, even when a measure was only supposed to be of an Executive character. No party! This is no new language—it has often been held: but no one familiar with the political history of free countries, and practically acquainted with the politics of this country, ever could suffer his judgment to be deceived by it. Party is indispensable to every Administration—it is essential to the existence of our institutions; and if it be an evil, it is one we must endure, for the preservation of our civil liberty. It never yet injured any free country—the power of party was never abused here but once: the evil was instantly corrected by the people—the political revolution of 1800 was the consequence. Our public affairs were never better administered than during the Administration that followed—when measures were proposed and advocated by the majority, under the vigilance and correction of a minority. It is idle to talk of the violence of party spirit: the conflict of parties is a noble conflict—of mind to mind, genius to genius. It is to such periods of high excitement—to these wars of intellect, that we are almost indebted for all that is great and valuable in political science. In vindicating party, it was hardly necessary for him to say that he entertained no cold, narrow, or vindictive feelings: on the other hand, some of his warmest and best friends, socially and politically, were of the old federal school; but there was not a man among them who had ever deserted his party—not one of those who came like spies into our camp only to betray us. No: every man of them has been faithful to his cause. There is a sympathy among men of principle—between those who appreciate fidelity—that principle of fidelity, without which all free political communities would be dissolved.

While opposing the present Administration, it should have his support of every measure, which, in his judgment, would advance the public interest: for the rest, the gentlemen on the other side, should have an open, an honorable war. He would be candid with gentlemen: he could not judge every Administration by its measures. In the language of the great man whom he had just quoted, and who, of all other men, was from experience, most able to instruct as he would say, "he never knew men reformed by power," neither would he make the experiment to discover whether "their measures would prove better than their morals." He could not, if he wished, extend his confidence to the gentlemen in power—it was something not to be controlled. He would say to them, with Lord Chatham, "Confidence is a plant of slow growth"—and, moreover, differing from most plants of slow growth, it is of a delicate nature—once blighted it seldom revives. Penitence may restore men to the bosom of private friendship; but in public affairs, it seldom happens. The pulsations of a nation are slow: the career of ambition brief. An Administration enjoying his support must have the light of a nation's confidence, shining clearly and brightly around it: its foundation must rest upon something more solid than a compromise of opinion—something less volcanic than an adjustment of ancient but unextinguished animosities.

The gentleman from South Carolina had referred to a Boston mob, and a New York rabble. The gentleman must pardon him for saying that he was as unhappy in this illustration, as he was unsound in the principle of political philosophy he meant to establish. A Boston mob, he thought, had figured somewhat too gloriously in our Revolutionary history—it had shared too illustriously in those struggles which terminated in our independence, to be selected as the victim of a sarcasm even by comparison, or to illustrate a principle of philosophy. He would say something of its history in another war: but here he must touch lightly—he was treading on delicate ground: he must, however, in justice, be permitted to express a sincere regret, that public affairs, in our late war, had not been, in that region of country, less under the direction of some who were there in power and more under the guidance of a patriotic Boston mob. What had been performed by a New York rabble, he should refer to in replying to his colleague. Were he disposed to retaliate on the gentleman from South Carolina, he had an admirable weapon at hand—he might sketch a scene at Edgefield Court-House—a portrait of a riot at Old Edgefield. If the gentleman wished to see the portrait which might be drawn of Old Edgefield, he would refer him to a pamphlet by a celebrated itinerant, the late vicar of the parish of Mount Vernon. He should not judge that gentleman's constituents by any such standard. He would never condemn the respectable yeomanry of South Carolina, for the licentiousness of a few, nor the occasional aberration of the many: nor would he ever anticipate a revolution in this country, from a riot at Edgefield, or New York, or Boston. The gentleman from South Carolina need not seek, amidst the riots and revolutions of Rome, for the causes of our dissolution. He should look to the history of modern times, and to the character of nations as they are now. Were he in the Turkish empire, he might then seek for instruction in Roman story. What Rome was, Constantinople is. The citizen-soldier of the Roman empire, is the Turkish janissary of our times; and although under a different form of government, the revolutions in the two cities are essentially the same. If the gentleman from South Carolina would seek for the causes of a dissolution of our Confederacy, he need not travel far: they are at hand: they are within these walls; this is destined to become the scene of violence—the theatre of all our revolutions. When this House becomes corrupt, our Union is dissolved—the heart must perish, ere the limbs fall off.

THURSDAY, March 9.

Amendment of the Constitution.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House again went into Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, on the resolutions offered by him for amending the constitution.

Mr. EVERETT addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise to address the committee, in a state of indisposition under which I ought, in prudence, to be at home, rather than on this floor. I am opposed to the resolutions of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) It is, with me, a matter of serious question, whether the alterations in the constitution, for which they provide, are not, in their spirit and tendency, unconstitutional. I am not aware that this topic has been discussed, or that the limit, to which the power of amending goes, has been duly settled by the people of America. Meantime, I am strongly disposed to think, that the Parliamentary license of amendment, by which we make what changes we will, in propositions that are before us, has no application to the Constitution of the United States. In the ordinary business of legislation, and for the sake of facilitating our proceedings, it is permitted, under the name of amendment, totally to change the nature of a proposition; to convert it from positive to negative, and the reverse; and this, with good reason: for, the entire proposition and the whole subject matter of it, being within the control of the House, it is a mere matter of convenience, in point of order, whether we change one proposition by way of amendment, or discard it, and bring in another. But, our relation to the Constitution of the United States is very different; and no such latitude of amendment can be indulged with respect to that instrument.

The justice of this distinction may, I think, be illustrated by a simple supposition, that should go to vary the relation in which we stand, even to ordinary matters of legislation. In some Representative Governments, that of France, for instance, all bills are introduced by the officers of the Crown, who are bound by their duty and oath of office to support them, if required. Suppose something like this existed in our Government; and that you, sir, as Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, were under an obligation of this kind, to support the leading appropriation bills of the year. Should you esteem it to be consistent with that obligation, to introduce, under the name of amendments, essential changes in the provisions of those bills? Would not such a step on your part be a direct breach of official confidence? Now, with regard to the Constitution of the United States, our whole legislative action with respect to it, whether in the way of administering, interpreting, or amending, must be governed by the obligation to support it which is imperative on every citizen, and particularly so on us. It is about three months since, in addition to the obligation which we share with every citizen of the country, we were laid under the specific and solemn obligation of an oath, to support the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman from South Carolina comes into the House; tells us that, in its most important functions, the Constitution of the United States has wholly failed; and proposes alterations in it, so essential, so vital, as will, if adopted, (in the judgment of the honorable gentleman,) give perpetuity to our institutions; if rejected, leave us exposed, within fifty years, to revolution and ruin. I ask, sir, whether the latitude of amendment can be strained so far, in reference to a frame of Government, which is of the nature of a compact between the parties, and which we are under the strongest general and specific obligations to defend? I think, sir, it cannot.

I am aware, that these remarks may seem somewhat paradoxical; and that, as far as they claim to present an argument, the answer is ready, viz: that the article of the constitution, which provides for its own amendment, is an integral part of the instrument; that, therefore, the obligation to support it and adhere to it, as a compact, is modified by this amending power; in other words, that we do, while amending, support it. We do while amending support it and adhere to it; but the distinction still recurs, that to amend is one thing, essentially to change another. To amend is to make changes consistent with the leading provisions of the constitution, and by means of which those leading provisions will go into happier operation. Can this be the same thing as to change, what we call, while we propose the change, those essential provisions themselves?

Let us look to the article of the constitution, which ascertains the right and power of amendment. The fifth article of the constitution fixes the mode in which amendments shall be made, with this proviso, that, before the year 1808, no amendment shall be made, that shall reach the first and fourth clauses of the ninth section of the first article, and also that no State shall, without its consent, be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. These are the only express limitations of the amending power. Now, one of two propositions must be maintained: either that these two express limitations are the only limitations of the amending power, or, that there is a prior limitation of the amending power, growing out of the nature of the constitution as a compact. Unless we admit the latter proposition, there is nothing to prevent a combination of two-thirds of Congress, in the first instance, and three-quarters of the States in the second, from depriving the remainder of the States of any advantage they possess in those provisions of the constitution, which guarantee the Federal equality, which was not to be touched without unanimous consent. Nay, sir, without this prior limitation of the amending power, there is nothing to prevent the only express limitation which now exists from being itself removed by way of amendment, thus leaving the fifth article without conditions. The necessity of admitting this prior limitation is peculiarly apparent, in the case of all proposed alterations, which unequally affect the various portions of the country.

I am, therefore, strongly inclined to think, that the principle of this implied limitation must always be consulted; that this must show us in each case how far our alterations may go, and that it does dictate to us that our amendments must be confined to those changes which are necessary, not to alter the essential provisions of the constitution, but to carry them into more perfect and happier operation. In fact, I can conceive no maxim in politics more dangerous or more false, than that a written compact of Government can be construed to look forward to its own worthlessness; that it can be supposed to be within the competence of a body of political functionaries, assembled under a written constitution, to take a single step on the assumption that the constitution, which is their life and soul, without which they have no political existence, has failed in the exercise of its most important functions. The proposition carries political suicide in its very terms.

If, in the changing aspect of things, the time shall ever come, which God grant may never be, when the parties to this compact shall feel—for it will be a thing to be felt, not to be reasoned upon—when they shall feel that this framework of Government has wholly failed of attaining its essential objects, it will be for the unhappy generation who make that discovery, standing as they will do, by virtue of the discovery, in a state of nature toward each other, to reorganize the elements of the political body, as they may or as they can; in whatever way they do it, it will not be that of constitutional amendment, depend upon it. In the mean time, I am in the fullest persuasion, I am under the most perfect conviction, that every proposed alteration, which avowedly goes to change the essential features of this instrument, is neither more nor less than unconstitutional; we have, accordingly, no right even to consider it, which is all we can do at best—we have no right to propose it; it is not within our competence.

Having expressed myself thus strongly on this point, and less strongly I could not have expressed myself, and have done justice to my convictions, I am bound to say, that if there is any in this House of the class of politicians to which the honorable mover of the resolution alluded, those who feel an indiscriminate reverence for the perfect and imperfect features of the constitution, I am not one. In setting my face against all alterations of the essential provisions of this frame of Government, I am in no degree influenced by a belief or feeling that these most essential provisions, it is a perfect system. Far otherwise: perfect! how can it be? Was it not a compromise between parties equally balanced? Was it not a compromise between parties on the point of breaking up the convention, and going home? For, the scene which the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) thought was yet to be disclosed, was told, near forty years ago, by Luther Martin and Governor Randolph. Yes, sir; they were at the point of breaking up the convention, when the most essential feature of the constitution—the adjustment of the Federal and Popular principles in the General Government, was settled, by a compromise between the two parties in this excited state. Could we expect, under these circumstances, to find it perfect? No, sir. I say, boldly—if it requires boldness to make the avowal—that I regard it, in this most essential feature, an imperfect system of Government. I am astonished that the great States ever, for a moment, listened to it; (my own State was great at that time; it is now small, and I hope this circumstance will procure me the credit of sincerity in these sentiments,) that they ever agreed to give the small States an equality of power. I am sure they would never consent to it again. If the work were to be done to-morrow, they would not listen to the proposition a moment. And what then? Grant that the system is not perfect, shall I then support it and maintain it? Sir, it is one thing to hold that the constitution is perfect, so perfect as to be beyond amendment—I did not suppose that anybody held that opinion: I do not now suppose that anybody views it in that light, not even the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. AROBERG,) who regards it as the work of inspiration. Even he is in favor of one of these amendments, and acquiesces in the other; which, unless he supposes the amendments also inspired, would be patching up inspiration with mere mortal wisdom—sir, it is one thing to think the constitution perfect, and another to think that, whether perfect or imperfect, it is a compact which it is our duty, nay, which it is our interest, to support: and it is still another thing to believe, that, even in those points which are fully and clearly within the reach of the amending power, properly construed, and fairly applied, it is better, far better, to bear with almost any political evil, than to fly to the constitution with amendments. In my judgment, the very worst possible remedy for any evil, not positively intolerable, in this country, is an amendment of the constitution. It is an acknowledged maxim of political prudence, that frequent changes of the laws, even in matters of ordinary legislation, are pernicious. It is the opinion of every sound statesman, that it is far better to bear with any evil that is not absolutely intolerable, than to render the great interests of the country insecure, by indecisive and fluctuating legislation. But, the constitution—the constitution—the only thing permanent which we have: the only thing which the people of the United States have taken out of the grasp of this daily changeable legislation: the thing which is to stand us instead of all the perpetuities of the old world, ecclesiastical, political, social, and personal. Sir, I do not think it perfect; but it is good enough for me. I have lived under other political institutions; nearly a third of my life, since I came to years of discretion, has been passed under other forms of Government; and I have learned enough of the state of foreign societies, and enough of the political condition of the great majority of this race of man, to be well contented with what Providence has given to us, in the Constitution of the United States. I am contented to live by it: contented, when I die, to leave my children in its safeguard: and I would sooner lay down this right hand, to be cut off, than I would hold it up to vote for any essential change in this form of Government.

Amendment of the Constitution.

The honorable mover of these resolutions tells us, that he was induced to propose them, because he regards the subject-matter of them as the most important function of this Government. Highly important, sir, it unquestionably is: far too important, in my view of the subject, to admit a change in this part of the compact. But I cannot agree with the honorable gentleman, in thinking it the most important function of the Government; and, if he will permit me the reflection, I must say, that we do lower the tone of our politics, that we lower the tone of our legislation, that we lower the tone and spirit of this people, by allowing questions of this kind so much importance. I am free to confess, sir, that I regard very many functions of the Government as more important than the election of President. The constitution of this House; of the other House; of the Judiciary; the power of Congress over questions of internal improvement; the power of acquiring and governing territory, without limitation, beyond the bounds of the United States—these are far more important than the modification of the election of President. And if I believed the power of amendment was unrestricted, I would much sooner discuss, for days and weeks, amendments to the constitution, that should touch some of these questions, wherein the great interests and industry of the country are wrapped up, than those which we have now in hand. Sir, I take the error to be, that of confounding what is of importance to the individual citizen with what is important to the people at large. To the individual citizen, to the few prominent political leaders, whose talents and services place the office of President within the reach of a laudable and well-regulated ambition, it is, unquestionably, a subject of the greatest importance. To them it is a question, whether they shall attain the highest honor, which this or any other country, in this or any other age, ever did or can afford. But is this the light in which the office is presented to the majority of the people? No: the constitution of the United States has given no powers to the President, depending on the modification of the electoral choice, by which he can be made dangerous to the purity of the country. Do not mistake me, sir: I do not say, because I do not think, that we may not have a President dangerous to the liberties of the people—dangerous to the liberties of the constitution. But if we ever have such a President, it will be under circumstances not connected with the modification of the existing constitution, relative to the electoral choice. A dangerous President, depend on it, will be chosen by an overwhelming majority. I thought that the honorable mover of the resolutions was in a great mistake, in this part of his argument; where he maintained that, in proportion as the President was deficient in popular strength, his administration would be ominous to the welfare of the people. Within reasonable limits, I hold the direct contrary to be true: and that the event the most ominous to this constitution, and to the liberties of this people, would be, after a contested election, the triumph of a well-organized, embittered, and exasperated majority. A dangerous President will be a strong President; and a strong President, to make him unduly so, must be backed by a strong majority in this House, and a strong majority of the people.

But, sir, the gentleman argued, that this was not only the most important function in the constitution, but that it was a function in which the constitution had completely failed. This, I regarded, not only as an erroneous proposition, but as wholly at variance with another proposition, in a subsequent part of the gentleman's argument; which was, if I did not misunderstand him, that all the Presidents whom we have had, with one exception, were the ablest and best men which the country afforded, and were really the choice of the people. Now, sir, we have had ten Presidential elections: they have resulted, the gentleman says, with one exception, in the election of the ablest and best men—each of whom was the choice of the people: and that exception, if I understood his allusion, was of an individual, who, beginning with President Washington, and coming down, has received the highest marks of confidence, and has been placed in the most responsible stations, by all those ablest and best men. And this, the gentleman calls a complete failure. I call it complete success. I beg leave to tell the gentleman that, if he expects, by an amendment of this constitution, or by a new constitution, in this or any other country, to the end of time, to get a Government that will not be found to fail, at least once in ten times, in its practical operation, he will be disappointed. A result like this, stretching over our whole history, and giving us the ablest and best men of the country, in succession, with a single exception, and that exception made by a political opponent, which (I know the gentleman's candor will permit me to add) detracts something from its weight—such a result, I say, is perfect success, unexampled success, glorious success; and I would not alter a letter in the constitution, in the hope of obtaining a happier operation.

In respect to the controversy which forms a leading part of the honorable gentleman's argument, the alternative of the General Ticket and District system, I have not much to say: the rather, as I conceive the practical operation of the two systems to come nearly to the same thing. I say this, on grounds of reasoning, and I am not aware that there is any thing in experience, to bring us to a different conclusion. The two systems, in the long run, must come to the same thing. On the general ticket system, supposing it to be uniformly adopted throughout the United States, the unrepresented minorities would be balanced by each other; or, in other words, the minority, whose voice is not heard in one State, on one side of the question, would be balanced by the minority, whose voice is not heard, in another State, on another side of the question. On the district system, the same result would take place. The minority represented in the Electoral Colleges, on one side of the question, in one State, would be balanced, and being balanced, would be neutralized, by the minority represented in another State, on the other side of the question: and therefore, in their practical operation, there would be very little to choose, between the two systems.

I grant to the gentleman from South Carolina that diversity, in this respect, is an evil. It is an evil that one State should appoint its electors in one way, and another State in another way. I admit that this is an evil, for which a remedy is desirable; though I do not know—if no other remedy could be applied—whether it would be expedient (if it were competent to us) to alter the constitution for this purpose. But the gentleman himself tells us there is another remedy. He says that, as the constitution now is, without any alteration, the States will all be led to adopt the General Ticket system. If the States will all adopt the General Ticket system, without an amendment to the constitution, then the only evil which admit to exist, is remedied: for I maintain that it is no evil that the General Ticket system should prevail, rather than the District system; because, in their practical operation, they must come to the same result. In the few observations, therefore, which I have to make on this part of the gentleman's argument, I desire to be understood not so much as being opposed to the District system, as wishing to show, that some of those inconveniences, which he traces to the General Ticket system, are equally incident to the District system: and that others flow, not from this or the system, but from human nature itself, and are evils inseparable from any kind of choice.

The first argument by which the gentleman supported the amendment, which goes to introduce the District system, is, that, as the constitution now stands, we have no constitutional provision at all. He even said that, on this subject, we have no constitution. In other words, because the constitution gives to the States a discretion on this point, and because the States have exercised this discretion differently, in different States, and at different times, in the same State, we have, therefore, no constitution. But this is confounding constitutional provision with constitutional restriction. This proposition is at war with the substantial principles of all our institutions: with that principle which lies at the basis of the entire Republic—to throw back on the States as much of the detail of the system as is possible. There is as much constitution here, sir, as in the other most important functions of the Government. There is as much constitutional provision for the choice of electors as for the choice of the members of this House. I have never heard it suggested there was no constitutional provision to fill these benches. They do certainly get filled without much difficulty; and the people are as well satisfied that they have the power to fill them, as they would be if there were a constitutional provision that prescribed the mode. We have the power to alter the laws passed by the States, regulating the time, place, and manner, of choosing representatives, and the time and manner of choosing senators; and we have never exercised this power. Is there, therefore, no constitution in these respects? There is another constitutional provision, that guarantees to each State a Republican Government. What is a Republican Government? Of how many branches does it consist? How to be chosen? For how long? What are the checks of these branches on each other? There is a word of all this in the Constitution of the United States; and yet will the gentleman say, that the whole institution of Republican Government is of less importance than the particular modification of the electoral suffrage for Presdent; or that, being (as it assuredly is) infinitely more important, we have no constitutional provision for it?

Amendment of the Constitution.

I repeat, sir, that it is the life and soul of this Government, to exercise no more power than is absolutely necessary, and to leave as much as possible to the discretion of the States. It is for want of some such adjustment as this, that all the Governments that have ever been established over widely extended regions have fallen to pieces. Sir, I am willing to retract what I said. I am ready to think that, in this respect, this constitution is perfect. When I consider this partition of powers, when I see how the separate States are relieved from all the perplexity of foreign relations, and how the General Government is relieved from all the odium of local administration, I am ready to pronounce it in this part, a perfect system. I apprehend there are no limits to the possible extension of this Government in this respect. I believe it might go into harmonious operation, from Labrador to Cape Horn, as easily as it does from Maine to Florida—I mean as far as this part of the system is concerned. I think this is a part of the constitution which, of all others, ought to be treated sacredly.

But, at least, the gentleman contends, we have no constitutional provision which results in uniformity. Even this, as I have already had the honor of stating to the committee, is at war with his admission, that the constitution, such as it is, will practically result in uniformity. That uniformity is not, I know, the uniformity which the gentleman prefers; but it is the uniformity of one system, if not of another. But I will waive this point, and will follow the gentleman for a moment, in the argument on this subject of uniformity; and I must ask leave to say, considering that this idea of uniformity is the basis of his system, that I could wish he had applied a little more of that sagacity, in which few men equal him, in analyzing the idea of uniformity.

There are many incidents to the electoral choice. In some of these, uniformity is provided for by the constitution, as we have it. In others, where it does not exist, the gentleman wishes to provide for it; while, in others, and in those, in my judgment, not of less importance, he leaves it still wholly unprovided for. We have a uniform constitutional provision, which ascertains the power that shall appoint the electors; the States shall appoint them. We have a uniform constitutional provision which ascertains the tribunal that shall decide how this appointing power is to be exercised; the Legislatures of the States. We have a uniform provision that ascertains the number of electors to which each State shall be entitled. Here is a great deal of uniformity, as much, as I have already said, as exists in other most important parts of this Government. But the gentleman maintains that it is not enough. There is one discretionary element in this system, and the States have exercised that discretion by no fixed rule. This must be remedied; and he proposes, as a remedy, to prohibit the States from exercising this discretion, and to lay out the United States into a uniform system of Districts. I beg that the order of the words may be marked, a uniform system of Districts. Sir, that is one thing; but is it to be a system of uniform districts? for that is another thing; though the vital difference between them has been overlooked by the gentleman from South Carolina. I will suppose that the State of which I have the honor to be a representative, shall be entitled, as now, to fifteen electors, and that it shall be required to be laid out into a system of districts, and that the districts are to be uniform. Suppose this operation to be begun by running a line through the State, a parallel of latitude or a meridian, and dividing it into two portions, as nearly equal as may be, so that we shall have eight electors on one side of the line, and seven on the other. Suppose that, on one side of the line, those qualifications of voters shall prevail which obtain in Virginia, which my friend from that State (Mr. AROBER) thinks the very perfection of the electoral franchise, which shut out from the polls more than one-half of the arms-bearing and tax-paying free citizens, while on the other side of the line, universal suffrage shall prevail. Now, sir, when we come to divide these two portions of the State into districts, though we may call the system uniform, are the districts uniform? Does each of the districts on one side reflect the same quantum of popular voice and popular will, as on the other side? No, sir; we have the word uniformity, and it is the only thing we have; and that is in the wrong place. The very object at which the gentleman aims, under cover of this word uniformity, eludes his grasp. The system is uniform so far as this, that all the States will be divided into districts; but the districts are as un-uniform as possible.

Is this doubted, sir? Look, for a moment, at the qualifications of voters in the different States. I have, for this purpose, looked through the constitutions of the United States, as contained in the collection printed in eighteen hundred and twenty, and comprehending all of them but the very last; and I think I may say that I have not found two States in the Union where the qualifications for voters are precisely the same. It seems as if the ingenuity of the framers of them had been tasked to find out some qualifications for voters in each State that should differ a little at least from the qualifications in every other State. In some of them it is required that the voter should be a citizen of the United States; in others it is not. Now, from one Presidential term to another, we have forty thousand emigrants arriving in this country. Under one State constitution they may be voters if they possess the other requisites; and under other constitutions they cannot be. This is of great importance: for it might put it in the power of an irruption of this kind from abroad to change the fate of a contested election. Then, apart from slavery, there is the discrimination of color. In my State, that forms no disqualification; in most other States it does. Now, sir, in the State of New York, there is a free colored population near half as large as the entire population of that State (Delaware) which you so worthily represent, and which, in New York, is not entitled to vote except under a burdensome qualification of property, and, in most States, is not entitled at all. Is not this a great difference? The distinction of sex; even that is not a constant discrimination. In one State (New Jersey) all the inhabitants possessing fifty pounds of proclamation money may vote; and, in times of high party excitement, the inhabitants have all voted, male and female, till the evil was thought so considerable that an honorable gentleman over the way, (Mr. CONDICT,) fearing the possible effect of this new gynocracy, more prudently than gallantly undertook to apply a remedy; and proposed a law, which took from the fairest and best part of creation that influence at the polls which we are all willing to concede to them everywhere else. But this exclusion is only a matter of law; the constitution remains the same; and, in times of high party excitement, should they ever return, who shall tell us that sex will not again make a variety in the qualifications of voters in the different States? Again, the diversity in property, as a qualification of a voter, is so great that, in one State, more than half the free population, who pay taxes and bear arms, are excluded, while other States admit to the polls the poor man who has nothing but his life to bind him to the community, nothing to contribute to its support but the labor he bestows on the highway, but whose life and liberty are as dear to him as the broad acres of his rich fellow-citizen to their possessor. Lastly, there is the great distinction between freedom and slavery, which allows the friend who sits at my right hand, (Mr. HAMILTON,) to have near twice as much political power as is conceded to me, being a citizen of a non-slaveholding State. Yet, you tell me, sir, that a system, which takes no account of this discrepancy in the qualifications and numbers of those who compose the districts, is uniform. Certainly, it is any thing but uniform.

The answer made by the gentleman from South Carolina to this difficulty, is, that, if this were a matter of ordinary legislation; if it were a matter within the grasp of the changeable discretion of a State, he should think it was an evil that called for a remedy. Sir, if it were, as he represents the matter, a constitutional fixture in the States, it would only prove that no remedy could be had. It would only prove that uniformity was not merely difficult to be had, but positively unattainable, the obstacles to it being guaranteed in the constitutions of the States. But it is not competent for the constitutions of the States to make any limitations on this subject. The constitutions of the States cannot fix the qualifications for voters; electors of President and Vice President. It is left to the legislatures of the States, and is much within reach of amendment (or alteration as I should rather call it) of the constitution as any thing in this connection. If the gentleman, therefore, wishes to have a uniform system, he must—there is no avoiding it—bring the proposal of an amendment, which will lay off this country into districts, each of which shall represent an equal portion of the population; of the power, the knowledge, the desires and interests of the people of the United States. Any thing short of this, may have a greater degree of merit; but it will not have the merit of uniformity.

Further, sir, it is in the regulation of the qualification for voters, that the most successful attacks may be made on the purity of the electoral franchise. Will gentlemen consider what is now passing before us, in the great Kingdom of France—a kingdom, at this moment so instructive to the American statesman in its events there passing, (though they may be as astonishing and alarming than those of former periods,) than it has been at any time within the last fifty years. There they are making the experiment of a grand electoral system. The vast territory of the kingdom, comprising thirty millions of inhabitants, is laid out into departments and arrondissements, they have electoral colleges of arrondissement, and electoral colleges of department, and all looks so fair and systematic as the diagrams in your General Land Office; and what is the result? It is so contrived, by regulating the qualifications of electors, that, in a Chamber of Deputies consisting of four or five hundred members, and at a time when popular opinion was perhaps equally divided in the Kingdom, there were some fifteen or twenty members of the royal party, and all the rest were on the side of the Crown. This is what an artificial regulation of the qualification of voters can do, in perverting the purity of the electoral franchise. I wish to be understood, sir, as speaking on American principles; I am not sure that a representation like ours would be safe in France.

And here, sir, I feel it my duty, in reply to some intimations of the honorable gentleman, to make a single remark, showing the inconvenience of treating this subject, not as a constitutional question, resting solely on the terms of the compact, but as one of abstract political right. The gentleman spoke of the spectacle of ten millions of freemen marching to the polls; and he alluded to the late election as an election that had resulted in the choice of a candidate, who was not the favorite of the people. Now, sir, if I enter into a political compact, by which I agree that my friend shall have two votes, while I shall have but one, I will not afterwards murmur at the terms of that compact. I will not say it is a hard compact, especially if I do not think so, as I do in this case. When you come to count up result of the election, I will not refuse to admit that his candidate has twice as many votes as mine, if that be the arithmetical balance. But when we come to talk of popularity, that is another thing; and I cannot permit it to be calculated by the ratio of the three-fifths. And for this reason I must insist that the honorable gentleman is not authorized to say, that the last election resulted in the choice of an individual who was not the favorite of the people; I mean taking the majority of the votes as the guide to that conclusion.

Amendment of the Constitution.

Having touched on this point, I ought, perhaps, to add that, if there are any members in this House of that class of politicians to whom the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SAUNDERS) alluded, as having the disposition, though not the power, to disturb the compromise contained in the constitution on this point, I am not of the number. Neither am I one of those citizens of the North, to whom another honorable member lately referred, in a publication to which his name was subscribed, who would think it immoral and irreligious to join in putting down a servile insurrection at the South. I am no soldier, sir: my habits and education are very unmilitary; but there is no cause in which I would sooner buckle a knapsack to my back, and put a musket on my shoulder, than that. I would cede the whole continent to any one who would take it—to England, to France, to Spain: I would see it sunk in the bottom of the ocean, before I would see any part of this fair America converted into a Continental Hayti, by that awful process of bloodshed and desolation, by which alone such a catastrophe could be brought on. The great relation of servitude, in some form or other, with greater or less departures from the theoretic equality of man, is inseparable from our nature. I know of no way by which the form of this servitude shall be fixed, but political institution. Domestic slavery, though I confess not that form of servitude which seems to be most beneficial to the master—certainly not that which is most beneficial to the servant—is not, in my judgment, to be set down as an immoral and irreligious relation. I cannot admit that religion has but one voice to the slave, and that this voice is, "Rise against your Master." No, sir, the New Testament says, "Slaves obey your Master;" and though I know full well, that, in the benignant operation of Christianity, which gathered master and slave around the same communion-table, this unfortunate institution disappeared in Europe, yet I cannot admit, that, while it subsists, and where it subsists, its duties are not pre-supposed and sanctioned by religion. I certainly am not called upon to meet the charges brought against this institution, yet truth obliges me to say a word more on the subject. I know the condition of the working classes in other countries; I am intimately acquainted with it in some other countries, and I have no hesitation in saying, that I believe the slaves in this country are better clothed and fed, and less hardly worked, than the peasantry of some of the most prosperous States of the Continent of Europe. Consider the checks on population. What keeps population down? Poverty, want, starvation, disease, and all the ills of life; it is these that check population all over the world. No wth the slave population in the United States increases faster than the white, masters included. What is the inference as to the physical condition of the two classes of society? These are opinions I have long entertained, and long since publicly professed on this subject, and which I here repeat in answer to the intimations to which I have already alluded. But, sir, when slavery comes to enter into the constitution as a political element, when it comes to affect the distribution of power amongst the States of the Union, that is a matter of agreement. If I make an agreement on this subject, I will adhere to it like a man; but I will protest against any inferences being made from it like that which was made by the honorable mover of these resolutions. I will protest against popularity, as well as votes, being increased by the ratio of three-fifths of the slaves.

I shall proceed now to offer a few cursory remarks on the merits of the different modes of choosing Electors, as discussed by the honorable gentleman.

The gentleman passed lightly over the appointment of electors by the State Legislatures: he treated it as a manifest usurpation, in which he had the concurrence of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS.) I did intend to have said something more in detail on the subject, but the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) has so exhausted it, that it is not necessary for me to go into that argument. I shall only remind the committee, in addition to what was stated by that gentleman, that, in the first appointment of electors, in 1788, before the constitution can be said to have gone into complete operation; at that early moment, a very considerable proportion, all the States but three, did appoint their electors by the act of their Legislatures. In my own State they were appointed by the concurrent act of the Legislature, and the people—the people in large districts making a nomination of twice as many persons as the State was entitled to appoint, from which the Legislature selected the electors. We hear a great deal about contemporaneous exposition, and we have the Federalist quoted, and Mr. Dickinson quoted, and other sources of the same kind, which certainly I hold in all respect. But I do think the solemn acts of the great majority of the Legislatures of this country are as good a contemporaneous exposition as the speculations of any individual statesman, however respectable. An appointment by the State Legislatures is not a mode that I am partial to—nor is it popular in my State; but I cannot agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, and the gentleman from New York, who spoke first, on this subject, in calling it a usurpation.

Let us pass to the consideration of the General Ticket system. The first objection to this system, which the honorable gentleman urged, was, that it had the effect of crushing the minority; and he drew a distinction between that submission of the minority to the majority, which is necessary in all Governments, and a total annihilation and prostration of the minority. I must say, sir, with great deference, that this seemed to me a distinction without a difference; because the choice is to result in an individual. Suppose the President to be chosen by Districts—there are two hundred and sixty-one votes: He may be chosen by one hundred and thirty-two. What will become of the remaining one hundred and twenty-nine in the minority? Are they not annihilated? Are they not crushed? are they not prostrated? Where are they represented? where is their voice? who knows or cares what they think? The President is chosen by the constitutional majority of Districts. This is a result from which, on the principles of the honorable gentleman, you cannot escape. The same holds in our State elections—in the election of Governor, the election which calls out, and that for very good reasons, the heartiest zeal of the people, in the State I, in part, represent. There have been great heat in these elections: they have been very closely contested, and in a vote of eighty or ninety thousand citizens, the successful candidate has sometimes been chosen by a majority of two or three hundred; yet I have never heard it hinted that, even in that extremity, the minority was not fairly and fully represented.

But the view of this subject on which the gentleman seemed most to rely, to demonstrate the unfair operation of the General Ticket system, was the case of two States, one of which should be unanimous in its preference of a candidate, and the other, a little larger, should be almost equally divided. By the operation of the General Ticket system, it might happen, that the favorite of the majority in the large State, though the choice of but about a quarter part of the aggregate population of the two States, would still be chosen. Why, sir, that is one possible result of the General Ticket system, as considered between two States. But I will show you another result, not only equally possible, but far more probable. Take the case of Pennsylvania and New York: Pennsylvania, being unanimous, and giving twenty-eight votes to her candidate; New York, not being quite unanimous, but giving thirty-one votes to her favorite candidate. There is a great contest between these rival States, their candidates are each aiming, and their States for them, at the brightest, the most glorious prize in the world; and you call in the small, discontented, factious minority of New York, five votes only out of thirty-six, and say to this minority, you shall be the umpires in this great question; we will leave it to you, impartial unprejudiced men! to assign this most precious prize. Sir, to whom will they assign it, under the influence of those feelings, which cannot but actuate so small a minority in so great a struggle? Unquestionably to the Pennsylvania candidate; unquestionably against the majority of their own State. Is this a result which would tend to harmonize our Republic? No, sir, it would tend to civil war, as much as any ground of contention between two powerful and neighboring States in the Union, on the subject of this election.

But, I have a better answer to the case of the honorable gentleman. It is a case, which, on his principles, cannot happen. The remedy he provides, supposes the non-existence of the disease. If his premises are true—I will not say his conclusions do not follow—I say they cannot follow. What is his general supposition? That States are not unanimous—that States have minorities; and the evil is, that those minorities should be unrepresented. What is the gentleman's particular case? Why, that out of two States, one is unanimous, and one is not; whereas, the first supposition is, that the States are not unanimous. Now, if, out of two States, one is unanimous, out of twenty-four States, twelve will be unanimous. The probability is, that States will not be unanimous; the probability is, that the minority in one State will be balanced by the minority in another; the further probability is, if there is a unanimous State in one part of the Union, on one side of the question, there will be a unanimous State in another part of the Union, on the other side of the question. In contradiction to these premises, the gentleman puts a case, amounting to this, that out of any two States, one will be unanimous, and that one will be nearly equally divided. The supposition, therefore, is contrary to his own premises.

This leads me to remark, that the fair protection of the minority is in the majority of the other States, and it is not necessary to make any further constitutional provision for it. The gentleman from South Carolina seems to be, as was very forcibly shown by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) in the error of confounding the choice of an Executive officer—who is not a Representative of any part of the people, not even of those who choose him—with the constitution of a representative body like this, for which it is necessary that the country should be divided into the smallest practicable sections, and that each section should have its representative, in order that its local peculiarities and interests should be attended to. But far different is the case of the President; he is an Executive officer; he must carry the laws into execution equally for all—Tros Rutuluave—he is not the President of this or that party. He cannot say, if he would, this law, which bears hard on my friends, shall not go into execution against them; but for those others, my opponents, I will grind them to powder with it. If the representative of any, he is a representative of all, and this by the necessity of his office; it is not a matter of choice with him. Now, in creating this President, the constitution provides two hundred and sixty-one moments of power. To New York it gives thirty-six of them; and how shall New York exercise this her share of that power? In such a way, certainly, as to gratify the greatest portion of her citizens; and to obtain that result, the question must be put to a vote of the people, as the people of New York. No, says the gentleman, if New York happens to be divided, as nineteen to seventeen, I will take away thirty-four thirty-sixths of her power. Just in proportion as her citizens deviate from unanimity, I will mulct them in a thirty-sixth of their voice in the election of the President, and when they are equally divided, they shall have no power at all. The gentleman will contend that this evil will find a remedy in other States, where a similar result will be produced; and what New York loses in one way, she will gain in another. That, sir, I grant, is the practical operation; I have allowed, I have urged that, on this very principle of compensation, there is between the General Ticket and the District system very little practical difference. But, in the one system, it is a stipulated provision; in the other, it is a practical effect.—The majority, not the minority, are entitled to the stipulated provision, that their will shall prevail; and it is enough to console the minority, that, in the practical operation, what they lose at home, they gain abroad.

I think the gentleman's next objection to the General Ticket system was, that it tended to form and keep up geographical parties. This would have been plausibly and even forcibly stated, if it had been true that the States are geographically peculiar, or that those sections of country which are geographically peculiar, are so many States. But this is not the case. We have in this country, and I am not sorry to see it, because I believe it is one spring of our prosperity, the materials, perhaps, for five or six geographical parties or geographical interests. I think we may carve out of the map an Eastern, a Central, a Southern, a South-western, and Northwestern section. I do not think at present, you can get more. Now these sections are not States, to be bound together by the General Ticket system, so that they will, in virtue of that system, vote unanimously in any given case. I think they never will do it. Even in New England—which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) named as the part of the Union most likely to march in phalanx—even in New England, a unanimous vote will rarely, if ever, be given. Geographical parties must rest on geographical bases. You might as well talk of the sound of a color, as of a geographical party, that rests upon any thing but a geographical basis; and when you get a geographical basis, when you get any thing that interests New York as New York, or South Carolina as South Carolina, do not you think, sir, they will go in a phalanx, whether you have the District or the General Ticket system? Believe me, they will. Geographical parties are not to be divided by those imaginary lines which you are going to run between your electoral districts. The Alleghenies, the Mississippi, the Potomac, the Hudson, the great Lakes—these will make geographical parties, if any thing is to make them.

But, sir, I am not prepared to admit that geographical parties are the greatest evils this country has to fear. Party of all kinds, in its excess, is certainly the bane of our institutions; and I will not take up the time of this committee by disputing, which is most deleterious, arsenic or laudanum. It is enough that they are both fatal. The evil of geographical parties is, that they tend to sever the Union. The evil of domestic parties is, that they render the Union not worth having. I remember the time, sir, though I was but a boy, when, under the influence of domestic parties, near neighbors did not speak; when old acquaintances glared at each other, as they passed in the streets; when you might wreak on a man all the bitterness of your personal and private enmity, and grind him into the dust, if you had the power, and say, he is a democrat, he is a federalist; he deserves it. Yes, sir, when party spirit pursued its victim from the halls of legislation, from the forum, from the market place, to what should be the sanctuary of the fireside, and filled hearts that would have bled to spare each other a pang, with coldness and estrangement. Talk not to me of your geographical parties. There does not live the man, I thank God, on earth, towards whom I have an unkind emotion—one whose rights I would invade, whose feelings I would wound. But if there ever should be a man to whom I should stand in that miserable relation, I pray that mountains may rise, that rivers may roll between us—that he may never cross my path, nor I his, to turn the sweetness of human nature into bitterness and gall in both our bosoms.

I believe the gentleman's next objection to the General Ticket system, was, that it tended to throw the power of the State into the hands of political intriguers, through the instrumentality of that much-famed political institution—the caucus. On this subject I cannot speak with much confidence. I never attended a caucus in my life, except as an edified spectator—one among four or five thousands, assembled in Faneuil Hall, to do what we are now doing—consider the state of the Union. Farther than this, I know nothing from experience on this subject. The gentleman tells us that it is of the nature of the caucus, that by the aid of that political organization, it is in the power of five or six leaders, in the command of four or five thousand well-drilled veteran troops, to put to flight twenty thousand of the ordinary voting militia. But I suspect the gentleman overrates, or he mistakes in his haste, the power of the caucus. I believe it may reconcile, on one great point, a previously ascertained majority, of which the members had been separated only by subordinate divisions—I believe it may enable a previously ascertained majority to act in concert and unison with each other—I believe it may serve to reduce a question to an issue between a majority and the minority. Farther than this, I cannot believe that caucusing can go. It is a game at which more than one side can play; and I do not believe we are so wanting in “political magicians,” or whatever you choose to call them, that four or five are all that this country, or any State in it, at one time, can produce; and that they will all be on one side. I believe, that, taking things as they are, the only way you can put twenty thousand voters to flight, is by marching up to the polls with twenty thousand and one—that will do it, and nothing else will.

But, how does the gentleman's system afford any remedy to the evil of caucusing? The only effect of the District system will be, that we shall have two hundred and sixty-one caucuses, instead of the twenty-four already provided for; or, (if you double the number, that each side may have its caucus,) five hundred and twenty-two instead of the forty-eight now likely to exist. This would most probably be the effect of introducing a uniform District system. Another thing: what is to become of the minorities on the District system? I could here tell the gentleman something about that arrangement in my own State, to which he alluded by a name—which, out of respect to a venerable patriot and statesman of the Revolution, now no more, and who had nothing to do with the transaction, I shall not repeat. At a time, when the parties in the State were nearly balanced, there was a small majority on the Federal side; fifty-one thousand, perhaps, on the one side, and forty-nine thousand on the other. In that state of public feeling, by virtue of a system of districts, consisting of adjacent territory, and the same amount of population, (for in all these details, I believe the division was perfectly fair,) it was so contrived that the minority chose twenty-nine State Senators, and the majority chose eleven; and more votes were given for these eleven, than were given for the twenty-nine. This is, indeed, an effectual protection afforded by the District system to the minority! The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) pointed out to you, in the State of Maryland, at the last election, a similar result; affording an illustration equally strong of the benign effects of the District system.

In this part of the subject, the gentleman made a pathetic appeal to the political leaders of New York. He told them they must have felt, in the fluctuation of their parties, that it was really better for themselves, that they should not possess the power of alternately warring against each other the whole strength and patronage of that vast State. Sir, I care not how often the parties of New York have been up and down. What are these fluctuations of party in New York to us, to them, to anybody? When I look at New York, which I always take a pleasure in doing, I can see nothing but her magnificent metropolis; her ever-multiplying institutions for charity, for science, for the arts, for social improvement; her Western paradise of abundance and prosperity; and the glory of the age, her great canal. These have gone on, are going on, and I trust will go on, under all the fluctuations of her parties; whilst I could name to you States which have always marched to the polls in a Macedonian phalanx, that have fallen far behind New York in these great objects of social organization. As to the parties in New York I have read their papers more or less for fifty years, and I do not now know the meaning of their little local appellations, nor am I going to lay my hand on the constitution, and alter it in order that the factions in New York

“May fall with dignity, with temperance.”

No, sir, this consideration will, I trust, a mature reflection, have no weight even on the mind of the honorable gentleman who suggested it, as an argumentum ad hominem, addressed to the politicians of that State.

The last chief argument of the gentleman on this subject was, (for I must pass over some topics in this discussion,) that the admission of the District system was the only compensation which the large States could offer to the small States, to induce them to give up their equality in the eventual choice of a President in this House. Why should they give it up? The gentleman says they should give it up, because in the first place, it is an illusory power—a power not possessed by a small State, but possessed by the single individual of that State called to exercise it on this floor. But there are States which have more than one Representative, and which are yet to be called small; and I think, on his own principles, I could prove to the honorable gentleman, that it is a real substantive power possessed by these smaller States, that, as such, they stand on an equality with the large States when the election comes to this House. At any rate, if the gentleman objects to the exercise of the power here, he must consent to adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN,) which, though it takes the eventual choice from this House, secures to each State its equal vote. No, says the gentleman from South Carolina, the majority of the people will not consent to be governed by a minority.

I entertain a high respect—the gentleman, I am sure, believes that I do, an unaffected respect—for his talents and political sagacity; but when I heard this proposition fall from him, I was at a loss in what light to regard it—serious I could hardly consider it; less than serious, of course, the occasion did not admit.

The majority not submit to be governed by the minority! Look at the other end of this building, sir—look at the Senate—of which it was so justly said by that distinguished statesman, who, in his constitutional capacity, sits in the chair of that House—when he acceded to that chair, by the almost unanimous voice of the nation, while the other branches of this Government are confined, with few exceptions, to what may be considered their appropriate powers, to the Senate alone is granted a participation in all the different powers of the Government, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary. Yes, sir, and what is the constitution of that Senate? What is the power of the majority of the people there? Pass what bill you please in this House, by a majority of four to one, and send it to that House, and it may be rejected by the Senators from those States whose representation on this floor is forty-five out of your two hundred and ten. Do you impeach a functionary of this Government, and demand justice on him, by a vote of one hundred and ninety to twenty? When you carry the impeachment up to that House, the Senators of the States represented on this floor by twenty members, can deny you the justice which you, and the people, through you, demand, in a proportion of nine to one. Fall into a state of war; let the country be reduced to the last point of exhaustion; let a treaty at length appear, with the olive branch of peace; let there be a faction in the Senate, from States which stand in the proportion of one to ten in this House, and they may reject that treaty. In the very last convention which that body did reject—the convention relative to the slave trade—one article was stricken out, though the vote stood, twenty-nine for retaining, and sixteen for striking out; yet it was stricken out, because there was not a constitutional majority for ratifying that article. Consider the power of the Senate over the Judiciary branch of this Government, which, in the late debates, was justly called the sheet anchor of the constitution. It is probable that, on the bench of the Supreme Court, there may soon be four vacancies. The Executive of this country might be prevented from sending the best man of the country into either of these vacancies, by a union of the Senators from the States whose representative power is only forty-five out of two hundred and ten; while this House would be prevented from driving the most undeserving individual from that bench, (in the supposition that any one could be there to whom such a character belongs,) though he united the venality of the Chancellor with the cruelty of Jeffreys, by a combination of the Senators from States who possess but a tenth part of the representative power on this floor. Yet, the gentleman tells us, that the majority of this people will not be governed by the minority.

Sir, disguise it as you will, this is a constitutional question. It goes to the compromise between the States, on which the Government rests, as on its corner-stone, as on its foundation. In this system there are some features which are purely federative, some which are of a mixed federative and popular character; not one that is purely popular; yet, all that part of the honorable gentleman's argument—I do not certainly mean to misrepresent it—which insists on the right of the majority of the people to govern, would be applicable only to a system that was purely popular throughout. I should not have to vary this part of the gentleman's argument in the least, if I should adduce it, in support of an alteration of the kind I mentioned in opening my remarks, which would go to take away the equality of the representation of each State in the Senate. What is more unjust, on abstract principle, than that your State, sir, (Delaware,) should have as much power as Virginia, and my State should have as much power as New York? But these abstract principles here go for nothing. It is a compact, entered into by parties who said they would not agree to any thing else. When this constitution was drafted, Governor Randolph proposed to have a proportional representation in the other House, as well as in this. What did the small States do? They said, we will not take it, we will not agree to it; and, rather than accept such a constitution, we will break up the Convention. They said more, sir; that they would sooner take a foreign power by the hand, than have a constitution on the principle by which the honorable gentleman supports his resolutions. The election of President, and the adjustment of the two principles in that part of the constitution, was the other most difficult point. Mr. Wilson informs us, in his speeches in the Convention assembled in Pennsylvania to ratify the constitution, that this was the point on which the Federal Convention most labored; as it was also the point on which they thought themselves, and were thought by their contemporaries, to have met with the most perfect success. Now, sir, it is on this most delicate adjustment, that the gentleman lays his hand. In the primary election he proposes to take from the States the right to exercise their voice without division; and, in the secondary election, to take from the small States their equality of power in this House. As far as this goes, it is making a new constitution; it is opening the question from the foundation: it is breaking up every compromise which the constitution contains; and, as was observed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) when this is done, it is not a matter of question, it is a matter of certainty, that you could not renew any of these compromises. At all events, any argument addressed on this subject to the committee, in order to have weight, must be, not an argument on general principles, as to the right of the majority to prevail over the minority, but a constitutional argument, to show that the adjustment of the Federal and popular principles of the Government requires to be revised, and settled on a different footing.

But, sir, I will briefly follow the gentleman in some of those arguments, by which he urged on the House the adoption of his first resolution, which goes to prevent the election from devolving on this body. I accompanied the gentleman, with unfeigned delight, in the broad and philosophical views, clothed in most eloquent language, which he took of many important subjects in general politics; and if I ever felt obliged to differ from him, it was not so much in establishing his principles, as in drawing his conclusions.

His general train of thought, in this part of his argument, appeared to be somewhat as follows: A vast extension of liberty has taken place in modern times, particularly in the United States of America. The great political problem to be solved, has been, to reconcile this great extension of liberty, with the strength of an Executive, sufficiently powerful to administer the Government. This, especially, was the problem to be solved by the framers of the Constitution of the United States, and the mode in which they decided it, was this: they created an Executive of great powers, and reconciled this power with the security of the constitution, and the preservation of the liberties of the people, by the principle of elective responsibility. This responsibility is to grow out of a popular choice; and, therefore, the honorable gentleman inferred that the choice should be sent back from this House, in some form or other, to the people. This appeared to be the general train of his argument.

Agreeing, as I cordially do, in the first proposition, that an unexampled extension of liberty is enjoyed, and constitutionally secured, in the United States, I cannot, on this part of the subject, go farther in unison with the honorable gentleman.

In the first place, the power of the Executive is not great, as the gentleman describes it, but very small. The gentleman stated it to be equal to that of the king of Great Britain. Sir, I must say that this seemed to me to be an exaggeration too violent to be admitted, even in the heat of argument. I shall not follow my friend from Connecticut, (Mr. INGRAMSOLL,) in the comparison of the powers of the king of England with those of the President, nor shall I trouble the committee by referring to the chapters in the Federalist on the subject—which I doubt not are better known to the gentleman from South Carolina, than to me—in which the same comparison is so forcibly pursued. I will confine myself to the single point of the tenure of the two officers—the President of the United States being elected for four years—the king of England being hereditary, and for life. In consequence of this single difference of tenure, the difference of influence between the two functionaries (and it is a question as to influence) is positively infinite:—I cannot use a weaker term. I hesitate not to assert that, if I have learned any thing of English history, it is this: that, if the king of England had been elective, and for four years, there has not been a ministry, since the time of the Cecils and the Walsinghams, that could have sat on their benches for four weeks. Sir, the President has no power of the nature to create influence: he can do nothing of himself, in that way. The only power that he may be said to have, which is absolute—and this is not of a nature to confer personal influence—is that of negating a law passed by less than two-thirds of Congress. As to patronage, he cannot appoint to an office of one hundred dollars per annum, without the consent of thirteen sovereign States. He cannot treat with a foreign power to build a light-house on a desolate rock, without the ratification of sixteen independent States. There is only one office, I believe, to which he has the power of appointment; and I have now, in my drawer, a resolution to take from him that solitary piece of patronage—the office of Librarian to Congress.

No, sir, the Executive is not strong. It therefore needs no curious search after the principle, by which the strength of the Executive is to be reconciled with the liberty of the people. The framers of the constitution went on no such search, for a principle of reconciliation between the liberties of the people and the powers of Government. They went on a far simpler and nobler principle; that of giving to the Governors no power likely to be abused, in the circumstances under which it is given to them. They went rather on the principle of having no Governors at all. I thought it was very justly said, on this floor, a few weeks since, that we have no Government; there is nothing in this country which deserves the name of Government; or, if there is any Government, it is here: if there is any throne, you, sir, are seated on it. The people are, what they are often ironically called, the Sovereigns.

The gentleman may tell me that, if this be the case, our Government does not differ from the ancient democracies. Widely, totally, sir; and let us consider how: for it is in this that the great improvement of the modern political system resides. The improvement is, that we have, and act upon, what they had not, or in very imperfect degrees, and in very limited measures—the idea of delegated power. What is the nature of delegated power? That the people who delegate it, shall delegate just as much as is safe in the hands of man, as he is, and this upon the terms of a written compact, and for a limited period. And shall we be told, that one of the depositories of this delegated power, on the terms of a written compact, for a period of four years, has all the Executive power of the king of England? Who makes war, who makes peace, who issues Orders in Council with the force of law? who governs half the world in the form of colonies, possessing only the right of appeal to his little

Privy Council? who grants pensions out of the droits of the Crown, over which Parliament has no control? that king who can do no wrong; that king who never dies; and who can raise the commoner to the peerage, by his sovereign will. The single power of pensioning, out of a fund over which Parliament has no control—the single power of raising to the peerage—exceeds all the power which, not the President alone, but all the branches of this Government united, possess, to corrupt the citizens of the country. And here, permit me to say, that, if my recollection does no injustice to the gentleman, he did injustice to the constitution, in quoting from it the specification of the Executive power. In the printed report of his speech, the words are, “all Executive power” is given to the President. But the words of the constitution are, “the Executive power;” and, instead of understanding, with the honorable gentleman, all the power given to any Executive of any country, the expression in the constitution imports the Executive power, which this written system gives to this officer, called the President.

This, I conceive to be the theory of our liberty, as far as the power of the Executive is concerned; and this liberty is farther secured by our statute of distributions, by our prohibitions of nobility, by our absence of standing armies, and other republican institutions, at war with those institutions in the old world which are the support of their monarchies. The gentleman's theory, on the other hand, is very nearly the theory of despotism. If the gentleman from South Carolina should go to an acute and philosophical subject of an absolute Government, he would find him to state the relation in which the monarch stands to his subjects, in very nearly the same terms in which he has stated the relation between the President and the people of the United States—the relation of almost indefinite power, exercised on principles of benevolence, love, and paternal feeling. He, too, would disclaim checks and balances, as power clashing with power. This is the motto of arbitrary Governments, since the world began:

nunquam libertas gratior extat,
Quam sub rege pio.

This is not the theory of our liberty: the framers of the constitution did not provide us a kingly President. They provided an Executive, in the form of a dependent, a concurrent, a transitory, and an impeachable agent. The residuum, the greater part of the power, they kept in their own hands. There, sir, I love to see it too; there, I will also idolize it. In the hands to which it is constitutionally delegated, I will pay it proper honor, be they the hands of Presidents, Senators, Representatives, Electors. And, for the very reason that the honorable gentleman places confidence in a President chosen by the people, I also will place confidence in the Representatives, who claim it by the same title.

In this confidence in delegated power, the gentleman ought to go along with me, thinking and speaking as he did, of the system of the ancient democracies, which we all regard as inconsistent with permanent and rational freedom. How have we improved on these democracies? The gentleman says, we have created an Executive, indeed, of kingly power; but we have reconciled that power with their liberty, through the elective responsibility, and the mutual love and confidence inspired by it, which (and not checks and balances) are the securities of the people's rights. Now, I have shown, on the one hand, that this is the principle of absolute despotism; while, on the other hand, by an unexpected fatality, it is the principle of unlimited democracy, and goes to the root of delegated power. He throws back the election, as far as possible, into the people's hands, because, if they do not exercise it themselves, it will not be safely exercised. The gentleman is certainly inconsistent. He asks us, with a tone of emphasis, whether the people are not fit to choose their President? I say they are. I am not going to be placed on the ground of denying that the people, in any and every resort, from first to last, in every stage, are fit to choose their President. I think they are most fit; and that is an answer to his question. And now allow me to propose my question to him: Are they not fit, also, to choose the four heads of Department? The gentleman answers, Yes. More fit than one of the most sagacious of our Presidents was to appoint them: more fit than the wisest President ever will be. Well, do not let us stop here: the argument gains by admission, as we proceed. Are not the people fit to choose the Attorney-General, the Postmaster General, the Judges of the Supreme Court, the Officers of the Army and Navy, the Foreign Ministers, the Collectors, the Surveyors? Whom are they not fit to choose? Will any gentleman pretend to say, of this, of that, or of any office, that it is one to which the sober sense of this people is incompetent for the election? I answer for every gentleman who hears me, there is not one who will take it upon him to say, that there is such an office. Then, sir, do not let us play with this subject: let us put our hand on this lion's mane: let us have an amendment which will go to the root of the matter: let us have an amendment to introduce universal suffrage, under which every officer, civil, military, executive, or judicial, shall be chosen by the people. Why will not the gentleman do this? His principles carry him to this extent. I will tell him why he will not do it—why no sound Republican statesman will do it—because this would be the ancient democracies over again: it would be forswearing all the improvements which have been made in political science. It would be giving up our representative institutions: shutting our eyes on the advantages of a well-regulated system of delegated power. This I hold to be the reason; and a full and fair answer to all that the gentleman urged, on the fitness of the people to elect the President.

A word more, in this connection. The gentleman spoke with great force and eloquence on the subject of the art of printing, and of its power in diffusing intelligence and knowledge amongst all the members of the community; all the members of a State; throughout the world; and he contrasted our situation, in that respect, in reference to a capacity for a free Government, with the situation of ancient nations. I shall certainly not be one to contest the almost miraculous energies of the press, in the application for which the gentleman himself contends; and in which he is borne out by the facts. Still it is important to the argument to draw a distinction. It will not do for us to argue from what we should be, without the art of printing, after having, for four centuries, been building our whole intellectual system upon it, to what the ancient nations certainly were, never having had it. They had other instruments of improvement; not, indeed, so efficacious, but by no means contemptible. At the meridian of the refinement of Greece, there was not a considerable city in that country, not an important settlement on the Ionian, Syrian, Libyan, or Italian shore, not an island in the Archipelago; in a word, not a place of note on the map of ancient Greece, that had not made improvements in many of the most important arts of life, which we, with all our libraries, and all our books, have been able but partly to imitate. Among the means and instruments of this improvement, were domestic slavery, which delivered the free citizens from all the cares of gaining a livelihood; the itinerant minstrels, (Homer—who lived not only before printing, but before writing—was no more,) the traditionary wisdom of sages, travel to the seats of science and cultivation, manuscript circulation, and the living voice of living instructors. These were means of diffusing and transmitting intelligence and improvement, which I will not certainly put on a level with the art of printing, but which were adequate to the existence of free institutions. Sir, it was not want of intelligence—nor want of light: it was the want of something else, which we have: not the art of printing, but the representative system; the plan of delegated power; that great conception of modern times. If Athens, Sparta, Thebes, instead of arrogating to themselves successively a despotism—not over barbarous provinces, for that would have been a smaller evil—but a despotism over States as enlightened as themselves, had entered into a grand electoral and representative system; if they had given to each province its relative power in the General Government, convened their electors, from all those widespread States, from every part of the world where Grecian liberty had taken root, and Grecian letters had spread; had they thus done as we have done; if it were not idle and pedantic to talk of what might have taken place, under different circumstances, two thousand years ago, I would say, that Greece might have stood, in all her glory, to the present hour. I see nothing to have prevented her, filled as she was with cultivated cities, with enterprising, intelligent population, and now more abundantly than at the moment when her liberties were overwhelmed. And what can I tell me ask, overwhelmed her? The consequences of that jealous policy which the gentleman enforces; which, to a certain extent, he wishes to engraft in the constitution. The language he holds to them is this: You did not like to cling to your local power, each within his little domain. You might have elected provincial representatives every year, but you could not have trusted them, in any given contingency, to designate from the few who yourselves had selected, one who should be your head. You might have taken the electors in your provinces into your own hands: you could not have trusted even yourselves. The people of Athens could not have trusted themselves to meet as the people of Athens, and express the will of the city of Athens. You must have stolen aside, the gentleman tells them, to your little districts. You must have given a voice to the virtuous minority in the Spartan interest, a voice to the virtuous minority in the Theban interest, a voice to the virtuous minority in the Macedonian interest, and a voice to the virtuous minority in the Persian interest. You might have called up your electors, your representatives, your presidents before you, as often as you pleased, and summoned them to account for what they had done. Every two years, every year, you might have passed them in review, and as each passed you, you might have thrust him from the line, if he had been unfaithful. It is all idle, all vain; that power is safe, of which you keep the exercise to yourselves: you cannot trust the purest hands in the community to be left up to vote for you.

If I did not fear to do injustice to an argument to which I listened with as much attention, I am sure, and I doubt not, with as much pleasure, as any member of this House, I should say, that, in this part of the gentleman's argument, he did not appear to pursue a consistent train of thought. He denounced the ancient democracies: and the arguments by which he supported his amendment, go to the root of delegated power. He spoke much and justly, of the essential virtue of the people in the community, and yet said, that the moment an individual was designated from this virtuous community, and by this virtuous community, to act in a constitutional function, he was open to suspicion. He enlarged on the intelligence diffused through all parts of the community, by the instrumentality of the Press; yet, I do not remember that he depended, in any degree, on the power of a virtuous public sentiment, and of an untrammelled free press, to preserve the balance between the people and their rulers; though it is, in my judgment, an element of our liberty inferior in value to none other.

And now I am brought to what I must deem an extraordinary part of the gentleman's argument, that which concerns the corruptibility of this House. But, in the first place, I would offer a few words in reply, on this subject, to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) who last addressed the committee. He said, with a liberality which, while I commend it in him, I certainly do not intend to deny to any other gentleman, that he would take the eventual election from this House, not because he believed in its corruptibility, but because he was desirous of placing it beyond suspicion. Beyond suspicion, sir: are we going, then, to alter—if you please, to amend—the Constitution of the United States, until, after a contested election, or before a contested election, the purity of leading individuals shall be beyond suspicion; and that, too, in a state of society, where the mild and merciful maxim is proclaimed and acted upon, that "the private character of a candidate for office is fair game to be hunted down?" Sir, beyond suspicion! Can any gentleman tell me how long it is, since an anonymous miscreant, in the papers, accused THOMAS JEFFERSON of having pillaged thirteen hundred dollars, I think it was, from the public chest? Has any gentleman forgotten that pathetic complaint of GEORGE WASHINGTON, that he had been assailed, in language fit only "for a pickpocket, for a common defaulter?" Sir, beyond suspicion!

"Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as Snow, thou shalt not escape calumny."

But, as to the corruptibility of this House, I thought, in the first place, the argument which the gentleman from South Carolina built upon it, was at war with his own system. On this system, he says, choose your electors in districts, because, coming from the people, being chosen by the people, they will not betray the people. But how are we chosen? The greater part of us are chosen in districts. We came from the people, and we must go back to the people; we must meet them face to face. If the President is chosen by the people, says the gentleman from South Carolina, he is entitled to confidence; he is beyond suspicion;—beyond suspicion, because he is thus chosen. I say, then, by the same reason that this House is beyond suspicion—I mean, if the argument of the gentleman is good—and the rather, as we hold our places for two years, instead of four, and must sooner go back to the people from whom we came. I could not but think, therefore, that the gentleman's argument, in this respect, was inconsistent with itself. He says, choose the President yourselves, because he whom you choose will not betray you: and then choose him yourselves, for this House (though of your choice) will betray you. He deems, at one moment, that kingly power, in the hands of the President, is safe, if the people have elected him; but, at the next moment, he maintains that a very limited power in our hands is unsafe, though we are chosen directly by the people.

But let us look at the matter of fact. I deny the peculiar corruptibility of this House. The gentleman compared us with the British Parliament, and the patronage of this Government with the patronage of that. Has he duly considered that, out of six hundred individuals, of which the House of Commons consists, it was asserted by Mr., now Lord Grey, in 1793, that about three hundred and seven, "forming a decided majority of the House," hold their seats by the gift or influence of one hundred and fifty-four individuals? Do we hold our places here by such a tenure? Does the American Representative buy his seat, and thus get a kind of equitable right to sell his vote? Can he unite high civil and military character with his Congressional station? Above all, is the coronet—that bright and splendid prize, which no subsequent demerits can abate, no revolution in politics take away, and which time and death, that conquer all things, can but partially tear from his hands, which, when wrested from the possessor, goes down with his name and fortune to posterity—that bribe which even Chatham, the gentleman's great exemplar of political purity, was unable to resist—is any such bribe held out to assail our purity? Sir, I cast off the character of a politician; I speak as a man; I say what I feel, and nothing that I do not feel. I was shocked when I heard the honorable gentleman—an intelligent and patriotic American citizen, as I know him to be—I was shocked when I heard him repeat, and, repeating, sanction, what, when it was first uttered, thirty years ago, was considered the insolent calumny of a foreign envoy; and which, taken in connection with his reference to what was said by Walpole, went the length of declaring that every member of this House had his price—that this price was so cheap as one as a dinner. Yes, sir, that we were literally ready to sell our consciences, our constituents, our country, for a mess of pottage. Sir, if this House of Representatives is not essentially pure, I ask, in the name of Heaven, what are the prospects of liberty in this world, under this dispensation? Where and when are you to have a free, safe, and representative Government? How are you to get it? How are you to keep it? The gentleman says, "lead me not into temptation." This is his remedy against corruption: do not set me to choose a President, and I will not abuse the power you give me on that occasion. This is, indeed, compendious politics. It does seem to me like the children's play: "Ask me no questions, and I will tell you no lies." The choice of a President is not the only, not the greatest thing, we have to do. Have we not peace and war, life and death, prosperity and adversity, for ourselves, for our posterity, for all the nations perhaps to come, whose fate is involved in the success of this great example of popular institutions,—have we not all this in our power? Can we not, any day, by law, by constitutional law, turn half the industry of the country out of its channels, and spread bankruptcy, and ruin, and despair, over the land? Choose a President, sir! If we stop the passage of the Appropriation Bills, for the support of Government, where is your President and his Cabinet then? Scattered to the four winds of heaven, by the exercise of an ordinary act of legislation.

But the gentleman says, it is not merely office which is to be the bribe, but it is the emolument of office. Sir, if this House be what the gentleman represents it to be, does he not suppose, that in 1807 or 1811, the British Government would have paved this floor, and filled these desks with gold, to have had us choose France for our enemy? But, without resorting to the extreme supposition of foreign bribery, let me allude to what might have passed within our own country. Those "factious cities," those seats of corruption and intrigue, in the dark days of the restrictive system, when the grass was springing up between the paving stones of their streets; when their ships were rotting at the wharves; when the arm of humble industry, not less than that of gigantic speculation, was palsied; when the contriving head of that daily labor which must work for daily sustenance, was struck with stupor and despair; had this House been what the gentleman represents it, and those cities what he represents them, I would have raised the embargo in three weeks, and would have found the ways and means very easily to do it. But I will put this matter to a prompter test. If the gentleman from South Carolina will give me his vote, and that of twenty or thirty of his friends, not in the cause of corruption, but in one of the purest causes a politician ever maintained; if he will only give me his aid to procure a just indemnity for those fellow-citizens who, some fifteen, some twenty years, have been knocking at your door—some of them, as the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SAUNDERS) forcibly expressed it, shivering beggars at a bolted door—asking just compensation for those claims on a foreign Government, which, for your own political purposes, you renounced, and others equally strong, on the same Government, which you now neglect to enforce;—if he will give me his vote, and those of twenty of his friends, to procure our fellow-citizens this bare justice, when I come to call his attention to this subject, as I hope ere long to do, I will send him home in a coach and four. I believe there are about thirty millions at stake in that controversy, of which I will undertake for the claimants to pile up ten millions in that area for every gentleman to fill his pockets, till he cannot stagger from the Hall with the weight. Does the gentleman object to the publicity of the proffer? Sir, we will do it with the silence of death; the contract shall be sealed at deep midnight; the conscious stars shall not look down upon the gentleman's left pocket shall not know what his right pocket receiveth.

I do but jest, sir, indeed, and perhaps too broadly, on a subject so serious as this; yet what have I done? I have supposed the gentleman to do in a single case, what he supposes the House always prone to do. I have supposed him to do, in a just cause, and for the tune, what he says we are all prone to do corruptly and for a dinner. But, perhaps the gentleman thinks I am doing him injustice: pushing his argument, to an extreme which he never contemplated, and in speaking of a bid of corruption he disclaims. I own, sir, that he did state, that he did not mean to say that the corruption was of a direct and pecuniary kind, although he did aver that gain was our aid, and that it was the emoluments of office that created the temptation. He said, however, I will grant, that the temptation was to come in the guise of honorable station and confidential trusts.

In this part of the subject; which is somewhat delicate, the gentleman very handsomely disclaimed all historical allusions to what we passed. He, however, alleged, if I did not misapprehend him—for I took no notes of his speech—that this House had been warned by experience, that corruption was on the threshold, and he made a somewhat significant allusion to that Mosaic Cabinet, which Burns has so happily and so memorably described.

In reference to this, and to ascertain by practical example, the extent of this danger to which our purity is here exposed, I desire to ask, what were the differences in political opinion which divided the various candidates for the chair, at one time, five or six in number, and their friends, during the late Presidential election? I had thought that, in the subsidence of the great parties which formerly divided the country, the choice had become, in a great degree, one of personal preferences; that every citizen was free to give his voice for the individual whose success he most wished to promote. I know, in the part of the country with which I am best acquainted, that the differences of political opinion were assumed to exist among the candidates or their friends. There was, indeed, an attempt made to enlist under the banner of that eminent statesman of Georgia, to whom a tribute so feeling, and I doubt not so just, (for I have not the honor of his personal acquaintance,) was lately paid by the gentleman in the chair, the remainder of the old Federal party against whom the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENGE) says his city had to throw the shield of the country in the last war. But I never heard it suggested, that those who proposed, or those who acceded to this arrangement, had sacrificed their principles, or did any thing unbecoming of honorable men to propose or to do. They gave their support to the candidate they preferred.

Besides, sir, consider the necessity of the case. The candidates for the office are numerous: and but one, of course, can succeed. Is it not necessary that he who succeeds should take to his confidence some of those who, in some stages of the controversy, have been his rivals or competitors, or the active supporters of his rivals and competitors? If the distinguished citizen, to whom no man in the country feels greater gratitude than I, the Hero of New Orleans, whose services no one more heartily, more enthusiastically appreciates—if he had succeeded in this high contention, would he have driven from his councils every one, who, in any stage of the canvass, had been a competitor, or a leading friend of a competitor; or if he had acted in concert with any one, who had at first been his competitor, would it have been a proof of corruption against them both? And if, to avoid the suspicion of corruption, he had driven from his confidence, and excluded from his councils, every one of his four competitors, and all their leading friends, would he not both have stopped the wheels of the country's progress, and acted in direct opposition to that manly advice, which, so honorably to him the giver, so honorably to him who was the object of it, the gentleman near me, (Mr. DEATON,) he pressed upon the late President some nine years ago?

While I am on this topic, I will beg gentlemen to remember, that there is diversity of opinion on all these matters. Of political questions we may, with special propriety, hold with Sir Roger de Coverly, that a great deal may be said on both sides. The gentleman from South Carolina says it is universally admitted, that the favorite of the people was not chosen at the late election. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) says that the people universally demand this amendment. I have only, on the other hand, to say, that it is universally admitted, that the favorite of the people was chosen; (and I trust some gentleman in this debate, will bring forward the facts, which I believe to exist, though I am not in possession of them, to prove that, as far as plurality of votes is the index, the favorite of the people was chosen.) I have only to say that the people call for no amendment whatever. What does it all prove? That the gentlemen think one way, and that I am so unfortunate as to differ from them.

Before this case of corruptibility is made out, the gentleman ought to take into consideration one element of political responsibility, to which he alluded at large in another part of his argument, but which he seemed wholly to omit here, where its most direct application exists: I mean the responsibility of the representative to his constituents. This is a test from which no man can escape; a pledge of the integrity of every leading statesman, at least, beyond the power of any Executive patronage to counter-vail. Coming from the people, must he not go back to them? None is so high that he can be raised above this standard, and none is so obscure that he can sink away and creep below it. He must come up or come down to it; as the case may be. If a representative of the people, a member of this House, on a trying and a critical occasion, has defied the will, and bartered the interests of his constituents, think, sir, of the return of that man to his home. Will not shame sit upon his brow, and heaviness weigh on his heart, as he goes to meet the people whose will he has resisted, and whose rights he has sold? Will the trappings of Executive patronage save him in that awful hour? Will they not press him down, with tenfold heaviness, to the dust, which he degrades while he treads on it? But if, with the same influence, in the like critical juncture, he has done what he thought his duty to the republic, unawed by menace, and unseduced by blandishment, his homeward march will be a march of triumph; his constituents, as they come out to meet him, will exult at the "sound of his well-known voice;" and he will receive, at their hands, that reward which is beyond all the pride and power of office—the hearty welcome of the people who created, the people who sustain, the people who approve; of the people who send him back, with added confidence, to the service of his country.

Sir, I deny the power and the application of this whole argument of corruption. I will speak on this subject with perfect plainness. I care not what inference may be drawn from what I say. I say the Administration of this Government, at this time, is one, under which any honest man may take office. To the councils of the nation any man is free to go, with honor, who can contribute any thing to the administration of the public affairs: and, as a practical proof that this is so, I point to the honorable and honest men, men of all names and of all parties, who have taken office under the present administration—men who are as pure, and as free from suspicion, as any other men in this House, or out of this House, or in this country.

And, then, as to a coalition, on which the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) was so learned—of which he had such an abhorrence—an abhorrence which he endeavored to communicate to this House. Sir, the gentleman should be cautious in giving us his authorities for and against coalitions. If he arrays Obatham, Burke, and Fox, on one side, and Sheridan, (who, by the way, was in all the coalitions,) Mr. Moore, and even himself, on the other, the House may regard it as a case of the malum errare. I know not what standard the honorable gentleman may have fixed for himself, nor what point he hopes to reach, at the end of the long political journey which he considers to be before him. He will not be much to be commiserated, if, when he retires, it shall be said of him, he was no more independent than O'Connell—no more pure than Burke—no more patriotic than Fox—their coalitions included.

Besides, sir, while the honorable gentleman was speaking with such severity of coalitions, did he not, in the same part of his argument—in the same breath, in which he denounced them, exult in the Union which was taking place in New York? The Union! What a beautiful, immaculate word! How that word flows, like honey, from the lips! The Union in New York! Of whom, and for what purposes? The gentleman says, "to enable New York to present an undivided front to the nation;" and this, too, in what the gentleman meant for an argument in favor of the district system. Sir, are there two rules of political morality? Does that gentleman say that it is corrupt for the administration of the Government to seek a union of councils, where there is no difference of principles, and not corrupt, but virtuous, that a union of councils should be sought against it?

The gentleman from South Carolina spoke of a Mosaic Cabinet. I will ask that gentleman if there is no such thing as a Mosaic opposition? The gentleman said, with great justice, as far as I know his history, that he had no reason to be ashamed of any political banner under which he had fought. But, if I mistake not the signs of the times; above all, if I understand this doctrine of political Mosaic, the time may soon come, when he will be not ashamed, certainly, but somewhat amused, to find with what banners he is fighting in conjunction. He will find himself in the position of some of those shrewd Ministers of France, who, while by one courier they sent aid to the Protestants in Germany, by another sent letters of arrest and dragonnade to the Protestants in France. The principle of union I take to be at least as good, on one side of the question, as on the other.

Sir, I shall intrude on the forbearance of this committee but a moment longer, exhausted as their patience must be, and my strength is. I listened to the honorable gentleman with alternate delight and thrilling horror; as, with such touching eloquence, he expounded to us the apologue of our frail first parents in the garden of Eden. When I found him going back to the primitive records of our race, and searching the pages of inspiration, to find the key to our political situation here; and when I saw him returning with the discovery, that the President of the United States was the devil; that the Senate were advising and consenting spirits of darkness; and the service of our beloved country, in the highest and most honorable trusts, the everlasting curse; I was almost ready to exclaim, under the excitement to which the honorable gentleman had wrought us all—

"O star-eyed science, hast thou wandered there,
To bring us back the tidings of despair?"

Certainly, sir, if I had made this cheerful discovery, I should not have brought it to the House, to be set forth in an elaborate argument. I should have packed up my trunk and stood ready for the convention bill to pass in Virginia, that I might have started with my good friend from that State (Mr. ALEXANDER) for the interior of Africa, or with "long suffering Captain Symmes," for the interior of the earth. But I read that interesting lesson, which, I allow, appears to have been dictated in reference to the Presidential election, with a different moral. Our first parents abode in ease and in peace; their action, like their being, was one. The ambitious tempter plotted against this harmony and concert. In despite of prevailing over their united strength, he sought to divide and conquer. He drew our frail mother to a solitary spot, to a lonely belvedere, in the garden. He talked to her of artful words, of amending her state; he had her exercise the right of acting for herself; he flattered her wisdom, her vanity, her love of power. Had she remained by her partner's side, this eloquence had been vain; but bereaved of his counsel, separated from his presence, with no arm to support, no eye to witness—

"—— Her rash hand in evil hour
Forth reaching to the fruit, she plucked, she ate:
Earth felt the wound; and Nature from her seat
Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe,
That all was lost."——

Ay, sir, that all was lost. And let the States that now compose this happy Union, misled by the eloquence of the honorable gentleman, contract the habit of tampering with the constitution; let them, in the excitement of an election passed, or of an election to come, disturb the curious, that happy adjustment of power, which is now our life and our peace, and all will be lost for them. Sir, let the people of this country believe what the gentleman has so earnestly told them, of the corruptibility of the House, of their representatives, and I say not all will be lost, but that all is lost, irretrievably—totally—forever.

But such, I thank Heaven, is not my opinion—all is not lost—all is safe—very safe. The country stands at this moment in that position firm and erect, in which Providence intended that it should stand: at home, a model of a wise and prosperous administration of domestic affairs; abroad, an exemplar to the discouraged nations of that long desired union of liberty and law. Sir, if I held the opinions to which I allude—which I hope, on mature reflection, the gentleman from South Carolina himself will reverse—I say sincerely, I would not come here to proclaim them. Here they can do no good; the hour is gone by; the battle is fought and lost. But I would go with them to England, and I would there sound them in the ears of the reformers, so called; that poor deluded company; who, without leaders, without counsel, are following the phantom of reform through the dark paths of treason and assassination to the scaffold. I would fly with them to the continent of Europe, and see if I could there do nothing to repress the movements of revolution, ready to break out in that fair quarter of the globe, in pursuit of the same delusive good, proved by the failure of our experiment in this favored land, to be thus delusive. I would go with my doctrines to Turkey, and there strive to nerve the arm of the Sultan, that he might drive the steel still deeper into the bleeding heart of mangled Greece, fighting for the same insulting mockery of freedom for which we fought, and, at best, for the same treacherous and short-lived success. Then, sir, if I could find on the face of the earth one mild, parental, beneficent despot, who loves his people as his children, I would go and lay my forehead on his footstool, and beg him to set his foot on my head, as a recreant citizen of a recreant Republic. If I could not find such a living monarch, in weeds of deepest sable, I would join that mournful procession, that spectacle, perhaps never before witnessed on earth, the funeral convoy of the nations, which even now, while I utter the words, is following the kind and departed arbiter of life and death of fifty millions, from province to province—from mourning Asia to mourning Europe.

FRIDAY, March 10.

Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Kentucky.

Mr. T. P. MOORE, of Kentucky, moved to postpone all the orders of the day before the bill "for the benefit of the Asylum for teaching the Deaf and Dumb of Kentucky," and the bill was taken up, in Committee of the Whole:

The bill having been read, Mr. MOORE addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In recommending to the committee the bill for the benefit of the asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb in Kentucky—in urging a measure which will effectually extend the patronage of the nation to that benevolent institution—I am sensible that I present a subject not calculated to kindle the zeal of politicians, nor in any manner to rouse their stormy feelings which serve to augment the force of declamation, and to deepen and prolong the course of debate.

It is not a proposition to erect a fortification, or to construct a canal: to lavish millions in removing mountains from the land, or up-rearing towers in the sea; to push discoveries through the ices of the poles, or form alliances on the verge of the equator. No, Mr. Chairman; the cup that I present to the lips of the committee contains a draught of pure benevolence; no poisonous drug lurks at its bottom; no dangerous spirit sparkles on its top. It is innocent and salubrious, and wherever there is a taste for justice and humanity, it must be palatable.

It is now an axiom amongst all reflecting men, that the diffusion of knowledge is the surest support, as well as the highest duty, of good Government; and it is a maxim, I believe, among American statesmen, that, as our Government is thoroughly popular and representative, the universal education of its citizens is essential to its perfection and stability. The justice of this position cannot be disputed, nor can its application to the interest of that afflicted portion of the community in whose behalf I appeal be denied. They have a claim of right upon their fellow-citizens to be elevated to the rank of intellectual beings; to find their proper place upon the scale of society; to enter into the world of thoughts and reflection; to have their capacities invigorated; their passions impelled; to be enabled to sympathize with their fellow creatures; to love their country; to adore their God; and to share in all the varieties of suffering and beatitude of which human destiny is composed. It would be neither equitable nor politic, I apprehend, to confine the blessings of education to youths of the highest promise. The sum of knowledge, like the great lamp of Heaven, while it shines on the mountains, must pour its beams into the lowest valleys. The whole surface of national intellect is to be visited by light; and if the reflection of man is to imitate the wisdom of his Creator, the gloom of humility and misfortune should not be permitted to obstruct the penetration of its genial influences. These general remarks, I indulge the hope, will dispose the committee to consider that the public patronage, and private beneficence, of Kentucky, which have been so long, and so liberally exerted in this interesting service of humanity, should no longer remain without their encouragement and assistance. The means derived from these sources have been employed (as will be rendered apparent by a perusal of the documents connected with this application, all of which have been printed and placed on each member's table) to the very best advantage in the establishment and conduct of the Asylum at Danville.

In the year 1822, the Legislature of Kentucky incorporated and endowed the asylum for teaching the deaf and dumb, and located it at Danville, a central point in the State, combining as many general and local advantages for the site of such an institution, as any spot which could have been selected in the western country. They threw open its doors to the whole deaf and dumb population of the adjacent States, and placed it under the control of a superintending committee, who have employed competent teachers, purchased ground, buildings, &c., and whose vigilant and enlightened devotion to the interests of the institution have been demonstrated by the rapid progress of the pupils confided to their care. The judicious management of the asylum has led to a constant increase of its numbers; but this philanthropic institution is without adequate means to sustain an augmentation of its numbers. It has struggled on to this time by the aid of private charity, and the endowments made by Kentucky; but it would be improper to conceal the fact, that the Legislature cannot afford further assistance. The people of Kentucky have done much for the cause of literature and humanity—they are generous—their soil is rich—but they are remote from market, and their moneyed concerns embarrassed—and it cannot be denied that the various States, and the entire population of the Valley of the Mississippi, are dependent on this single institution for the means of this particular instruction; and in its present condition it cannot completely answer the wants of Kentucky. Experience has proven, both in Europe and America, that the instruction of the deaf and dumb can only be usefully and successfully imparted, in institutions regularly established, and superintended by competent teachers. The estimates which have been made in Europe and America lead to the conclusion, that in any given mass of population, one out of every two thousand is deaf and dumb; and it may therefore be fairly inferred, that unless the asylum at Danville is enlarged, about one thousand of our fellow-citizens now living must pass from youth to death in a state of torpor and ignorance. Let gentlemen who are not alive to the importance of the subject, conceive this number of unfortunate wretches collected. This misery amassed, these specimens of misfortunes assembled together, could any exhibition of human degradation exceed it in horror? Does not the mind shrink and startle at the very conception? And does the conception surpass the reality? The diffusion of this calamity, though it may conceal, does not diminish it. It is immeasurable, indescribable, and cannot be exaggerated by fancy or equalled by fiction. To remove all this distress, and to furnish the means of preventing it in all time to come, will require of Congress but a small expense of thought, and a few acres of land. An appropriation which would hardly suffice to complete the capital of a Corinthian column, will effect this great purpose of wisdom. The expense of that clock to count the fleeting hours of the day, will erect this lasting monument of philanthropy. Nay, sir, the money expended on the frivolous embellishment connected with it, graven upon inanimate stone, will kindle into thought and awake to rapture, thousands of spell-bound and inert intelligences. I cannot believe that this useful bounty will be withheld, especially as the asylum of Connecticut received a donation from Congress in the year 1819, of a township of land, from which it has derived a handsome revenue, and has been rendered permanently useful, and which sanctions by precedent this application. But, Mr. Chairman, the bill on your table is freed from all the objections which have been urged against the appropriation to the Connecticut Asylum; it is restricted to the location of the land in one tract, and it is designed for the benefit of the indigent deaf and dumb. It is to alleviate the sad condition of that class of our fellow-creatures, whose betterment is a part of the vast machinery of eternal wisdom. To reclaim from native desertion their rich, though hidden faculties, and, by uniting the virtues of earth with the omnipotence of Heaven, to constitute man a fellow-laborer with the Deity himself, in the delightful office of ennobling humanity. The heart, at best, is but, seldom a fit lawgiver; yet, in such a cause as this, its impulses may be safely trusted: for it is the cause of oppressed and suffering indigence, and it appeals with cheering hope to those generous sympathies with which, on this floor, it needs no advocate. It may not, Mr. Chairman, be improper to add, that we of the West, with a liberal spirit, have voted thousands annually to erect light-houses, clear beaches, &c., on the Atlantic frontier, which, although some of them are national in their character, and indirectly beneficial to us, yet it will not be denied, that by furnishing profitable employment to the crews on the sea-board, it diffused comfort and happiness, and that appropriations from the public treasury fall light and seldom upon the West.

But I will not so far undervalue the force of the subject, or underrate the wisdom, humanity, and intelligence, of the committee, as to believe they will reject the bill, which a chairman of the committee, I have been instructed to report. Memorials from the Asylums of New York and Pennsylvania have been referred to the committee, no doubt for the purpose of offering amendments to the bill. Although I should be deeply mortified at the failure of the bill for the benefit of the Kentucky asylum, and would feel under many obligations to the gentlemen having charge of the New York and Pennsylvania memorials, if they would not encumber this bill with amendments; yet, if they should deem it their duty, I cannot vote against them, because I am persuaded Congress could not make a more beneficial appropriation to any object.

Mr. CONDICT moved to amend the bill, by inserting in it a provision for the benefit of the incorporated asylum of New Jersey.

Mr. C. said that he made this motion in pursuance of a joint resolution of the two Houses of the New Jersey Legislature; but, as the nature of the subject was obvious, and familiarly known, he forebore to offer any remarks in support of the motion.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought, from the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, there could hardly be a doubt as to the propriety and humanity of following the precedent set, in giving a township of land to the asylum for the deaf and dumb in Connecticut. At the proper time, he should agree to the proposition of his friend from New Jersey, but at present he considered the cases quite different. This application had been before the House for three sessions; it had been referred to a committee.

and that committee had made two reports; and this asylum at Danville has been in successful operation for several years. He trusted this bill would pass on its own merits. The State he represented, Mr. B. said, had also a similar asylum, but, for his part, he did not feel it his duty to embarrass the progress of this bill, by offering an amendment in favor of that asylum, though he knew it to be in successful operation.

Mr. MALLARY said, it was sometimes the practice to embarrass the progress of a bill, by offering an amendment, entirely differing in its object, though he could not believe the gentleman had that object in view, in the present instance. He could not ask for New Jersey what he would be unwilling to give to Kentucky. He presumed the gentleman was favorable to the principle of the bill, but he thought there was no necessity for the gentleman from New Jersey to press his claims in behalf of his State, as it had a tendency to embarrass the passage of the bill. It would be best to present it, meritorious as it was, disconnected with that of any other State.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he thought it right to state, that he had intended to have offered an amendment to this bill, embracing two institutions, in favor of which a bill was introduced last session of Congress; but not wishing to embarrass the bill, in which he took great interest, he did not do so. Petitions from New York and Pennsylvania, on the subject, were now lying on the table; and after the bill got into the House, he should move that both these petitions be referred to a select committee, that their merits might be examined. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman from New Jersey would withdraw his motion, and refer it to the same committee.

Mr. WYERS said, a memorial had been presented during the present session, in behalf of the institution established in Pennsylvania, for the deaf and dumb, and he had prepared an amendment to include that institution; and he believed he could show, if an appropriation was made anywhere for such a purpose, it should be made there also; but, in accordance with the views entertained by the gentleman from New York, he should not offer it. He believed, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that they could not make an appropriation for an object which was more valuable than the one now under consideration. He did not say this lightly, having been a director of an institution of this kind for some time, and being well convinced of the benefits which flowed from it. He should vote for the bill without amendment, under the conviction that this House would do, in other parts of the Union, that which it had done in the eastern States, and which he hoped it would do, in the valleys of the Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VINTON moved the following amendment, viz: to strike out the words "or a tract of land equal thereto;" which was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, moved further to amend the bill, so as to except from the grant of land section number 16; which was also agreed to.

Mr. McCOR said he did not know where this township was to be taken from. A good portion of the land which the United States pretend to claim, was ceded for special purposes, to pay the debts of the nation. He recollected, some few years ago, this House did, in one of their fits of humanity, grant to the asylum in Connecticut a township of land. They were immediately after applied to by the State of New York, and next session, the House took a stand, and refused to grant it, and now New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and New York, are all prepared again each to ask for a township of land. This House was gathering up a kind of legislation it would be impossible for them to get along with, and soon the people of this country would be unable to build a school-house, unless this Government gave them the money. He should forbear making any more comments on the bill—he was opposed to it, although he supposed it would pass, as it seemed to be a favorite.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The House adjourned.

Amendment to the Constitution.—In the Senate a resolution to inquire into the expediency of amending the constitution, to secure the election of President, &c., by a direct vote of the people, 863; amendment moved to secure the election from the intervention of the House, 863; wise to give the committee all the latitude possible, 863; the only object is to ascertain if the proposition can be carried into effect, 863; time gone by for amending the constitution, 863; desirable, by such an amendment, to place the members of Congress, not beyond temptation, but beyond suspicion, 863; it was practicable in this instance as it was to elect members of Congress, 864; amendment carried, 864.

Amendment proposed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution as to prohibit the appointment of any member of Congress to any office of honor or trust, under the United States, during the term of his election, 864; should remove from those upon whom the election might devolve, all temptation that might bias them in that election, 864; amendment carried, 864; other amendments, 864; the committee's report on, 875.

A resolution considered relative to the election of the President by the people, 554; a second election by the people impracticable, 554; understood the subject was not to be acted on the present session, 555; the great difficulty here in getting any thing done was to find the right time to do it, 555; subject to be continued, 555; action of the other House such that nothing efficient could be done here, 555; we must make all the States of the same size, which would be the effect of the district system, and then can we give the election to the people, 555; no time now for the discussion of the question, 556; an opinion the constitution was too sacred to be touched, 556; resolution laid on the table, 557.

In the House.—Resolutions relative to the district system for the election of President, &c., considered, 688; two distinct practical propositions, 688; the constitutional bearing of the subject, 688; the choice of Presidential electors by Legislatures a usurpation, 689; objection against the general ticket system, 689; we have the district system, or no system at all? 689; providence kindly regardful of us, 690; objected to the district system, that it tends to destroy the sovereign rights of the States, and to produce consolidation, 690; a caution on the subject of State rights, 690; on this principle is it assumed that the State Legislatures will be always on the side of liberty? 690; a new reading of the State rights now introduced, 691; the second point, of referring the election back to the people on a failure, 691; the true principle of liberty in the organization of our system of government developed, 691; idle to suppose the people can have any rights inconsistent with their own happiness, 692; history, it is said, furnishes no example of a chief magistrate chosen directly by a great mass of the people, 692; a political impossibility in antiquity, 692; what would be the security of our liberty if we were dependent on a single city? 692; citizens of all free countries have been found competent to the selection of their highest officers, 692; compare the Presidents chosen by the people with those officers chosen by the same Presidents, 698; it is said it would produce popular excitement and turbulence, 694; fact exemplified in the recent election, 694; it is often said the farmer should attend to his plough during the canvass, and the mechanic to his handicraft, 695; objections to the participation of the House in the election, 695; corrupt Congress, and you assail liberty in the very seat of its vitality, 696; the authority of history, 697; in one particular we cannot stand a comparison with the statesmen of England, 697; often told that this Government has not sufficient patronage to produce corruption, 698; have the people of the small States any interest in this contested equality of power? 698.

Other resolutions submitted, 699; referred, 700; an attack on King Canaan, 706; party is deprecated, 704; a Boston mob and New York rabble, 704; Edgelyield Court House scene, 704; doubtful if these alterations in the constitution are not unconstitutional, 705; the article on amendment, 705; the adjustment of the federal and popular principles, 706; the subject matter of the resolutions not the most important function of the Government, 707; the general ticket and the district system, 708; life and soul of this Government to exercise no more power than is necessary, 709; many incidents to the electoral choice, 709; the qualifications of voters in the different States, 709; in the regulation of these qualifications the most successful attacks may be made on the purity of the electoral franchise, 710; appointment of electors by State Legislatures, 711; instance of two States, 712; the fair protection of the minority is in the majority of the other States; objections to the general ticket system, 718; what is the constitution of the Senate? 715; this is a constitutional question, and goes to the compromise between the States, 715; the power of the Executive, 716; theory of our liberties, 716; further remarks, 717, 718; corruptibility of this House, 719; office and its emolument the bribe, 720; further debate, 721, 722. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7.

Appropriations. In the Senate the bill for the extension of the Cumberland road from the Ohio to the Muskingum considered, 173; the State of Ohio some reason to ask this of the General Government, 178; some investigation should be had before this bill passes, 178; the constitutional question, 178; the question involves all the principles relating to the powers of the Federal Government on the subject of internal improvements, 174; resolution of the Kentucky Legislature, 174; in this the anatomy of the Federal Government, 174; no subject of improvements presents as strong a claim upon Congress as this, 175; the question of right long settled by both Houses of Congress after the most able and solemn discussion, 175; but one opinion in relation to the present measure, 175; what has been the practice of this Government for twenty years past? 175; an estimate of the expense of making this road from Wheeling to the Mississippi river, 176; indefinite postponement lost, 177.

In the House the bill relative to, considered, 247; object of the bill to continue a great national road long since planned and partly executed, 248; the sense of the nation in favor of a system of internal improvements, 248; it has been said that what is contributed is not a gift, 248; objects of expenditure, 249; the Western States have a claim upon the Government for the road now proposed, 249; a diversion of the two per cent. contribution from Illinois, 249; objections considered, 249; the history of the measure, 250; the compact respecting the two per cent., 250; an agreement with Virginia, 251; motion to strike out the part which pledges the two per cent. fund, 252; inquiry respecting the condition of that fund, 253; the course proposed is not the best to be pursued in commencing a system of internal improvements, 252; tendency to arouse sectional feeling, 253; Government not bound to go on with the Cumberland road, 253; the Eastern and Middle States interested in the completion of the work, 253; the claims from the work already executed are entitled to consideration, 253; appreciation of the road, 253; this policy only can unite the different sections of our country under the adverse circumstances which may befall us, 253; will Congress withhold this boon from the country? 254; the compact between the United States and the States northwest of the Ohio, 254; exposition of these contracts, 255; further explanation, 256; it is said that Congress, by what it has advanced on the Cumberland road, has complied and more than complied with its contract with Ohio, 254.

The proposition premature, 257; the present application is for a sum of money, to be expended on internal improvements, 257; Congress have not yet determined they will adopt a system of internal improvements, 257; facts having a bearing on the question, 257; a question of direct appropriation for a road, 257; remarks on the measure as constituting a part of the general system of internal improvement, 257; a general view should be presented to Congress of the objects to be attempted, 257; the Treasury never has contributed any thing worth naming for internal improvement of any State except Ohio, 257.

Question on appropriating $150,000, 258; the question as to the existence and the exercise of a power in the General Government to carry into effect a system of internal improvements amounts to the question whether the union of these States shall be preserved or not, 258; no more right to ask the States to make internal improvements for the general welfare than you have to ask them to make war for the general welfare, or to build fortifications for the general defence, 258; is the object of the present bill of sufficient magnitude to authorize an application to it of the resources of the nation? 258; this proposition is to be considered in reference to what had been done and what remained to be done, 254; is not this object justly entitled to be considered a national one? 254; are not the United States under a positive obligation to extend this road? 254; the principle of preservation affords a sufficient argument in support of this measure, 255; causes which go to increase the tendency to separation in such a system as ours, 255; our duty to correct them so far as practicable, 255; it may be said, why should the General Government make a road for the State of Ohio? 254; it is said the West is filled with emigrants from the Eastern States, 256; question carried, 257; bill ordered to a third reading, 257.

Question on engrossment, 257; if a due appreciation of the great national objects to be attained by the completion of a system of internal improvements was a motive of conduct, no money should be appropriated for any such object until after a patient and deliberate investigation a general system should be devised, 257; what great national consideration calls upon us to adopt this system now rather than three years hence? 257; are we, by continuing this road, to preserve this Union? 257; the arguments in favor of this particular road may be either national or partly national only, 258; States to which the road is advantageous, 258; the idea that the navy, or other institutions for defence, are to be regarded as improvements analogous to roads and canals founded on an entire misconception, 368; the case of the army on the Western frontier, 368; bill passed, 361; the distress upon the currency of the country produced by the expenditure of the Government in any part of the country being less than the revenue raised in it, 369.

This bill may be passed without the assumption of any power different from what has been exercised for twenty years, 369; how did the concern of the Government in this road begin? 370; the true situation of that part of the Union, 370; this road is wanted now, 371; how are you to expend your surplus? 371; how much of your expenditures have crossed the Alleghenies? 371; a proposition to put the road under the superintendency of the Legislature of Ohio, 373; the beneficial influence of the expenditures, 373; New York no complaints to make against this Government for rejecting its application for assistance, 373; bill ordered to be engrossed, 373.

In the Senate, an appropriation for, considered, 474; early circumstances relative to the road, 474; facts relative to the admission of Ohio and Missouri, 475; article in the Intelligencer, 476; the people of Ohio all consider the immunities on the side of the General Government, 477; the Legislatures of the States through which this road is to pass have given up the right to the United States to make it, 477; the bond of union, 477; road is called by the people the Congress Road, 478; all the patronage of the Land Office should be in the hands of the individual States and not in Congress, 478; further debate, 479, 480; appropriation passed, 481. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7.

Armory, Western.—In the House, a resolution relative to an armory in East Tennessee, 598; sole object to obtain for a component part of the Western waters an equal participation in respectful examination with others which had been examined, 599; act of 1833, 599; one report already made, 600; amendment offered to examine West Tennessee, 600; already examined, 600; is this the best mode of ascertaining where the armory should be located? 600.

every army in Europe, 373; neither stoppage of pay or appointing of chaplains will prevent desertion, 374; is ordered to be engrossed, 374.

In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 602; the bill involves important principles, 603; the same recommended some years ago, 604; number of deserters, 604; bill laid on the table, 604.

Columbia River, occupation of.—In the Senate, a bill for, considered, 188; have the United States a right to the territory proposed to be settled? 188; is it politic now to occupy it in the way proposed by the bill? 188; a military establishment on the banks only proposed, 188; this settlement as a depot for commerce must be full of advantage, 184; republics are not necessarily limited to a small territory, 184; no obligation on Congress to provide for the occupation or population of this territory, unless the interests of the United States should require it, 184; the period never will arrive when it will be proper to adopt the measures proposed by the friends of the present bill, 184; their adoption now would interfere with existing relations between the British Government and ours, 184; these relations, 185; is this territory of Oregon ever to become a State of the Union? never, 186; how should a revenue be derived from such a State or supplies sent to it? 186; further considerations against the bill, 186; Long's description of the region beyond Coun-oil Bluffs, 187; best possible disposition of the Oregon Territory to devote it to the Indians, 188.

Our notions of military defences, 203; should we be involved in war with any power in Europe we shall always have time enough to prepare for the event, 203; the fortified places necessary, 203; part of the firm at Sackett's Harbor could be sent to Oregon, 203; it is hinted that the inhabitants of Oregon might, in time, become strong and be disposed to separate from us, 203; is there any thing very shocking in this, 204; this river must be occupied, 204; all the defences we have planned and are planning is to secure ourselves against the war of Europe, from all this Oregon is comparatively free, 205; it is the largest river on the whole coast which empties into the Pacific, 205; important considerations which will result from this bill, 205; the trade to China has never been properly regarded by us, 206; an expedition of the whale trade and the trade to the Western Ocean, 206; why should we not cherish and protect this trade? 207; why should we not have our own ships built on the Pacific and fitted out from our own port as the Columbia? 207; the means of subsistence, 207; course over land to Oregon, 207; a more practicable route than that of Lewis and Clarke discovered in the South, 208; the interests on the western coast, and the trade to China and to India, 208; the number of military posts not so important as that they be properly placed, 206; amendment moved to leave it discretionary with the President at what point the military post shall be established, 208; moved to recommit the bill, 208; no necessity for this motion, 208; two features of the bill, the establishment of a military post and the acquisition of a territorial government, 208; the agreement contained in the commercial treaty with England, 209; motion to recommit lost, 209.

Amendment to leave the location to the discretion of the President considered, 210; motion to strike out the section authorizing a port of entry to be established, 210; it would cause duties to be collected from other powers, 210; this establishment to take place only when the President shall deem it expedient, 210; moved to strike out all that part providing for a territorial government, 210; a territorial government would not be wanted for many years, 210; expediency of establishing the post on the mouth of the Columbia river doubted, 210; the question as to a territorial government or a military post, 211; fifth section struck out, 211; various objections considered, 211; moved to strike out the

- DELAWARE, COLONEL. — In the Senate a notice for a bill for the relief of, 481; Governor in upper Louisiana at the time of thecession, 481; transferred to West Florida, 481; captured by a rising of the inhabitants and money taken, 481; not restored, 481; considerations relative to the bill, 483; the case of, 557.
- Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. — In the Senate, a bill to authorize a subscription in behalf of the United States to the capital stock of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, 177; moved to authorize a subscription to the Dismal Swamp Canal, 177; identity of the two works, 177; the present not a proper time for this amendment, 177; only possible objection that of placing the United States in the attitude of corporators, 178; the amendment impedes the present measure, 178; attaching a new proposition to an object nearly consummated, 178; amendment will defeat the bill, 178; importance of the amendment, 179; the plan of internal navigation from St. Mary's to Washington an entire work, 179; associations between the government and people objectionable, 179; a similar amendment defeated this bill twenty years ago, 180; amendment lost, 180.

Every scheme proposed is for tying the people together, 180; this government was intended to be a limited one, and its great objects were war and peace, 181; Congress now stopped almost at nothing which it deemed expedient to be done, and the Constitution is construed to give power for any grand scheme, 181—following Great Britain step by step, 181; these schemes are monstrous strides, considering the character of the government, 181; the system recommended by a member of a certain foreign legislature, 181; bill ordered to a third reading, 181.

The bill authorizes a subscription of $300,000, 260; history of this canal, 260; distinction of this from other projects, 261; the greatest difficulty is to begin, 262; some imagine that the nation is too young, 262; example of New York, 262; bill ordered to be engrossed, 262.

The survey bill, 274; Congress has the right to construct roads and canals under the military power as well as the post-roads and post-office power given to it by the constitution, 274; whence do we derive our power to build a fort or an arsenal if we have not power to construct a road or canal? 274; this power confined in its application to national objects, 274; it should first be made apparent what is the outline of the scheme of internal improvement, 274; reasons for this, 275; this is one of those works which must and will be accomplished without the aid of Government, 275; not good husbandry or application of the means of Government to begin at such a work, 275; its importance in a military aspect greatly overrated, 275; not a single turnpike or canal company in the country which will not make a similar appeal if this stock is subscribed for, 275; manner of proceeding with a proper system, 276; public opinion has not only yielded to the powers of the general government to engage in internal improvements of a national character, but has outstripped and gone ahead of it, 276; ever since the last war we have been making surveys with a view to military defence, 276; this bill recommended by the wisest considerations, 277; the work is of the utmost importance as regards all the great interests of the nation, 277; we violate no State rights, 277; this chain of interior canals essential to the military power of the government, 278.

What is the system to which this bill has reference? 279; a plan emanating from the Executive, 279; Congress much safer in selecting objects for itself than in having them selected for it, 279; the measure extensively digested, 279; importance of the Susquehanna, 278; necessity of the aid of the Government to prevent this undertaking being entirely interrupted, 280; further debate, 280; bill passed, 280.

*Duties on Imports.—In the House, a question on the passage of the bill to amend the several acts, &c., 9; preliminary remarks, 9; difference in the relative condition of various parts of the Union, 9; the first cause, 9; the laying up of the debt proper of the United States by the Northern people at an enormous depreciation, 9; its assumption by the Federal Government, 9; poured a capital of eighty millions into the coffers of the North, 10; when the contest began with the mother country, Virginia was comparatively rich, Massachusetts poor—how is it now? 10; the price paid for the creation of all that portion of capital which consisted of the assumed debts of the States, was the fixing the seat of government where it is, 10; when are we to have enough of this tariff question? 10; this bill is an attempt to reduce the country south of Mason and Dixon's line, and east of the Alleghenies, to a state of worse than colonial bondage, 10; the British Parliament never would have dared to lay such duties on our imports or their exports to us, 10; it marks us out as the victims of more than Egyptian bondage, 10; all policy is very suspicious that sacrifices the interest of any part of the community to the ideal good of the whole, 10; no case on record in which a proposition like this, suddenly changing the whole frame of a country's policy, was ever carried by the lean majesty of two or three votes, 10; the constitutionality of the measure not argued, 10; the Constitution a dead letter, 11; it consists of the power of the general government and the power of the States, 11; no faith in parchment, 11; never was a Constitution in which, by an unwise exercise of the powers of the Government, the people may not be driven to the extremity of resistance by force, 11; if secundum artem you draw the last shilling from our pockets, what are the checks of the Constitution to you? 11; a fig for the Constitution, 11.*

Difficulty of governing with sobriety any people who are over head and ears in debt, 11; advantages of England enumerated, 11; her climate, 11; her defences, 11; her vast beds of coal, 12; destroy her coal in a day, and you cut at once the sinews of her power, 12; her metals and her tin, 12; if we adopt her policy, we must adopt her institutions also, 12; we cannot adopt her exterior system without adopting her interior policy, 12; it is said excise is the same thing except in name as customs,

12; no army the world has ever seen could collect an excise in this country, 18; what are we now trying to do? to drive the people from the plough to the distaff, 18; to turn the Constitution wrong side out—to abandon foreign commerce and exterior relations, 14; we are determined never to be engaged in another war for free trade and sailors' rights, for we are determined to put an end to them, 14; we are told that we have nothing to do but to postpone the payment of the public debt for a few years, and wait for an accumulation of wealth, 14; in all the beneficial changes in the natural world you find nature never working but by gradual and imperceptible changes, 14; it is true it is not said to us, you shall not send your tobacco or cotton abroad, but they prevent the importation of the returns we used to receive, 14; it is the same old question of the stamp act in a new shape—whether they who have no common feeling with us, shall impose on us, not merely a burdensome, but a ruinous tax, 14; shall we increase the taxes when the British Parliament are taking them off by the wholesale? 15; I reprehend the cold and ambiguous support of the Executive Government to this bill, 15; hope the President will scout the bill as contrary to the genius of our Government, to the whole spirit and letter of our Confederation, 15; the example of Russia has been introduced, 15; the merchants and manufacturers of Massachusetts and New Hampshire repel this bill, whilst men in hunting shirts, with deer-skin leggings and moccasins want protection for manufactures, 16; the true remedy for the iron manufacturer of Pennsylvania is a declaration of war in blank, 16; cities and States for or against the bill, 16; what will be the effect of this bill on the Southern States? 16; shudder to look at it, 16; we do not mean to be threatened out of our rights by the menace of another census, 17; the names of Say, Ganilh, Adam Smith and Ricardo pronounced not only in terms, but in a tone of sneering contempt as visionary theorists, 17; the work of Ricardo, 17; remarks of Butler and Fox, 17; it is said the economists are right in theory, but wrong in practice, 18; Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon, 18; it is said a measure of this sort is necessary to create employment for the people, 18; our fathers, how did they acquire their property? 19; we are told that this is a curious Constitution of ours—it is made for foreigners, not for ourselves—for the protection of foreign and not of American industry, 18; nature of our Constitution, 19; character of the present bill, 19; whatever may be said of the misguided counsels of the theorists of Virginia, they have the confidence of united Virginia, 19; what is there to induce us to plunge into the vortex of those evils so severely felt in Europe from this very manufacturing and paper policy? 20; if we adopt this policy, we must adopt European institutions also, 20.

The fate of this bill is no longer doubtful, 21; the principal objections urged against the bill examined, 21; the bill combated by the agricultural interest of the South, the manufacturing interest of the East, and the general interest of commerce and navigation, 21; the protection of manufacturing said to be hostile to the agriculture of the South, 21; gentlemen of the South mistake altogether the ultimate operation of this bill as far as their agriculture is concerned, 21; they deny that the cotton market of Europe is in danger, 21; the bill is said to be hostile to the general agricultural interest of the country, 22; whenever manufacturing establishments have been successfully located among us, the country has in all instances flourished around them, 22; the bill is said to be hostile to the interests of commerce, 22; impossible to say how far the feeble encouragement thus far awarded to manufactures has advanced the interests of the Treasury, 22; the origin, progress and results of the disastrous policy we have pursued, 22; this bill has excited the hostility of the manufacturing interests, 23; is it a correct policy to stimulate at this moment, by additional protection, the manufacturing interest of this country? 23; this is the growing and already favorite policy of America, 23; it is with nations as with individuals, 24; it is said England is tired of the restrictive system, and willing and anxious to abandon it, 24; the very fact that England has been enabled to accumulate her immense debt, and sustain herself under its tremendous pressure, carries with it strong evidences of the extraordinary influences of her system upon the resources and wealth of nations, 24; the adversaries of the bill affect to regard it as a question, whether we shall or shall not become a manufacturing people, 25; the bill is denounced as a novel project, 25; its principles are as ancient as history, 25.

More than usual interest of the subject, 26; does not prudence dictate to the most firm and independent statesman that a measure laying very heavy burdens upon the whole community ought not to be adopted with a bare majority of the national representatives in its favor? 26; this measure, all agree, is part of a system intended to produce a great and fundamental change in the policy of the country, 27; disclaimed that the pursuits of agriculture are more profitable than those of manufacture or commerce, 27; labor and capital, if left to receive their direction from individual sagacity, will usually seek and speedily find the most profitable employments, 27; exception to this general principle, 28; what are the principles upon which an interference of the Government can be justified? 28; during the restrictive system, our commerce with the manufacturers of Europe was almost entirely annihilated, and our own manufactures had little short of an absolute monopoly of the home market, 29; whenever large investments of capital have been made in consequence of a state of things produced by the necessary acts of the Government itself, the Government is under a moral obligation to extend to the interests thus created, a reasonable protection, 29; what is a reasonable protection in such cases? 29; the protection of those establishments which originated in the war is not the object of this bill, 29; the want of employment on the part of the citizens examined, 30; the Middle and Western States have at this moment as large a share of the means of positive enjoyment as any other portion of the Union, 31; a few words on the interests of the West, 32; the most important is the means of transporting their products to market, 32; the trade of live stock, 32; the recommendations of Hamilton were the reverse of those ascribed to him, 33; the practical operation of the bill on the community, 33; will operate as a tax to the extent of four millions, 33; sacrifice the laboring classes for the benefit of the capitalists, 33; the question is between those who produce more than they consume of the articles subject to duty, and those who purchase that surplus production, 33; experience of Great Britain, 33; upon what principle can the prosperity and happiness of Great Britain be ascribed to her system of commercial restrictions? 34; it is said, this Government ought to pursue, as nearly as practicable, such a policy, in relation to the different portions of the Union, as each of those portions would respectively pursue, if existing as a separate confederacy, 34; the cotton of the Southern States has reached that critical point in the competition with foreign cottons, when any material derangement of our commercial relations with Great Britain must expose us to the hazard of losing our market, 35; some consolation if it could be believed that the heavy impositions which must operate so oppressively upon the South, would produce an equivalent benefit to other portions of the Union, 36.

Losses on the collection of, a resolution relative to, considered in the House, 604, 605. See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

Duties, Discriminating.—In the Senate a bill authorizing the President to discontinue duties of tonnage or impost on vessels of any nation which has discontinued the same on vessels of the United States, 376; origin, progress, and effect of discriminating duties in our commercial history, 376; coeval with the Government, 376; first era, 376; second era, 377; third era, 377; alarm of navigators, 377; operation of the act of Congress of 1815, 378; remarks upon the third era, 378.

EASTMAN, NEREMIAH, Representative from New Hampshire, 596.

EATON, JOHN H., on petitions from foreigners, 111; Senator from Tennessee, 350; on post roads in Mississippi, 381. See Index, vols. 6, 7.

Edwards, Ninian, address of, to the House, preferring charges against the Secretary of the Treasury, 37; the address, 37; its specifications, 37; its reading, 38; style and temper in which it is written, 38; one reason for printing is that the individual whose character is assailed in the address stands in a very peculiar relation to the public, and the people will not be satisfied if this accusation is prevented from going abroad to the world, 38; if the charges deserved the character of malignity charged upon them, that malignity would recoil upon its author, 38.

First duty of Congress was to look to its own course and preserve its own dignity, 38; this House not to be converted into an arena on which prominent political men were to carry on their personal contests, or a mere instrument, through its power to order papers to be printed, of giving publicity to any thing they might choose to write against each other, 38; it should be examined by a committee before it is printed, 38; the charges are a mere reiteration of those made by the A. B. conspirators, 38; proceedings in the last Congress on the matter, 39; the attack then considered the most infamous conspiracy ever formed against the reputation of any man, 39; why has this Minister to Mexico left the subject of his defence, and referred to the subject of the illicit introduction of slaves by a man who was the friend of Crawford? 39; is he to be accountable for his friend's conduct? 39; a deliberate design to operate upon those feelings which at this time so much agitate this country and this House, 39; motion made to refer to a select committee, 39; motion to print withdrawn, 40.

More importance given to this subject than it deserves, 40; an ordinary question to print a long statement for the use and information of the House, and not for the public, 40; no evil had ever arisen from printing papers by the House, 40; it was intended as a sort of legacy by the author, 40; object of the writer, 40; committee appointed, 40.

Resolution offered to inform the President that an investigation was ordered, and that Edwards may be instructed not to leave for Mexico as Minister until after the investigation, 40; House refuse to consider, 40; suggested that the member from Virginia might not wish to serve from motives of delicacy, 41; his reply to the suggestion, 41.

Resolution, that the Clerk furnish the President with a copy of the memorial of Edwards, 41; the President should know the facts of this dispute between his own officers, 41; course pursued by Mr. Giles in relation to Hamilton, 41.

Proceedings of the committee, 43; motion to inform the President of the purpose to investigate, 43; similar motion previously offered, 43; object to prevent any collision between the Executive and Legislative branches, 43; committee determined to call Mr. Edwards, 43; courtesy requires that notice be given to the President, that the individual may not attempt to escape, 43; original resolution moved as a substitute, 43; nothing in the terms of the proposition which compromises the proceedings of the House, 43; acting by our own virtue and power, and have thought proper to advise the Executive that he may take such order as seems best, 43; no difficulty presented by this question to the House, 43; we inform the Executive that business before us requires the personal attendance of one whom he is about to despatch on foreign diplomatic service, 43; motion to lay on the table, 43; lost, 43; no necessity for the farther interposition of the House, and it might be improper to call for it, 43; the committee have power to send for persons and papers, 43; the committee can request the interference of the Executive if it is necessary to compel the attendance of this individual, 43.

No such indispensable necessity for the presence of Mr. Edwards, 43; if the accuser files, the investigation ought not to be delayed, 43; the committee are not going wholly to suspend the investigation to wait for anybody's attendance, 43; moved to recommit the report, 44; the writ is now on its way, and Mr. Edwards will be brought here, whether we vote one way or the other, 44; what do we ask of the President? 44; to aid us in bringing this minister before us? 44; we need no authority from him, 44; the course of the committee a proper one, 44; the individual now on his way to New Orleans, 44; he can yet be overtaken, 44; only object of the committee is to give the President, in a respectful manner, information of what they intended to do, 44; motion to recommit withdrawn, 44; the question is, whether it is necessary to call upon the House to aid the committee to carry its powers into execution, 45; motion for amendment withdrawn, 45; the committee has not power to communicate the fact of bringing back this individual to the President, 45; report of the committee agreed to, 45; message from the President stating that he had notified Mr. Edwards not to leave the country, 46.

Adjournment, day of.—Resolution of adjournment considered, 79; a committee of investigation appointed, and an officer of the House despatched for the person who preferred the charges, who will soon arrive, 79; a due respect to the parties interested, to public opinion and to consistency in the course of this body, would induce the House to continue its session until the person should have a reasonable opportunity to arrive, 80; length of time necessary to wait, 80; every one must have known when this investigation was instituted that it would be attended with serious inconveniences, 80; the public good demands the continuance of the session, 80; the arrival of Mr. Edwards of no importance to the country or to the distinguished officer whose conduct is implicated in the charges, 81; the House is not pledged to wait, 81; it will not subserve the purposes of justice, but vexatiously prolong the session, 81; what is the subject involved in this question? 81; Edwards can have no just grounds of complaint if the House does not wait his arrival, 81; is the testimony of this individual considered material or not? 82; the committee has decided that Mr. Edwards should be brought before them, 82; House bound to allow a reasonable time, 82; and bound to wait that time, even at great expense, 82; the individual expected his address would be printed under the sanction of the House, and no further notice taken of it, 82; in justice to the individual assailed, this investigation should be prevented, 82; memorial examined, 84; resolution to wait a certain time carried, 84.

Report on the Address.—Substance of the report, 82; ordered to be printed, 82; resolution that the committee sit after the adjournment offered, 82; laid on the table, 89; resolution to send a copy to the President offered and laid on the table, 89; resolution reported by the committee considered, amended and passed, 90; report of the committee, 90; its conclusion, exonerating the Secretary from the charges of Edwards, 90; Edwards requested by the President to resign his appointment as Minister to Mexico, and refund his outfit, 92. See Index, vols. 6, 7.

Executive Powers.—In the Senate—A resolution offered, protesting against the competency of the President to have appointed Ministers to the Congress of Panama without the advice and consent of the Senate, 483; we have an important task to execute in resisting the encroachment of ambition on the constitutional powers of this body, 483; opening message of the President at the commencement of this session, 483; extract, 483; asserts that he has a right to appoint Ministers independent of the Senate, 483; it is time to re-enact Magna Charta, 483; danger of precedent, 483; exemplification, 483; if he is bound in ordinary cases, much more is he so where the objects to be attained and the duties performed are not even understood, 484; the Ministers to Panama are of the first and most important character, clothed with powers of awful import, 484; if he is not bound to advise, the Senate has no right to act, 484; the Senate was wisely designed to act as a check upon the appointing power, 484.

An apology, 484; the durability of the constitution, 485; we are making an experiment which has never yet succeeded in any region or quarter of the earth, 485; I believe this experiment will fail, 486; this Panama Mission is no new thing, 486; extract from the proceedings of the House, 1824, 486; interference of the United States in behalf of Greece, 487; the Presidential question out of the House, 487; coming in, 488; Gil Blas, Don Quixote, 488; note, 488; Scipio, 488; Don Abel, 489; note, 489; circumstances of Adams coming into power, 490; further remarks, 491, 492; resolution postponed, 492.

Does the constitution confer upon the President that power which, in his message, he asserts to be within his exclusive constitutional competency? 524; tried by well-approved standards, it is clear and confessed, 524; explanation of the words removes all doubt, 524; rule of construction by which the words should be tried, 525; the right during the recess of the debate, 525; position taken by senators, 526; effect of the sole argument urged on the subject, 526; a satisfactory answer to all the precedents advanced, 526; the doctrine denied which seeks to create a new and fruitful source of power, 526; the constant practice where the language of the Constitution granting powers is doubtful, 527; not the practice of the Government, but the long and quiet acquiescence of the people, which gives a tacit assent to the power exerted in a doubtful case, 527; the argument of analogy cut up by the roots, 527; the precedent must agree with all the essentials of the case, 527; executive power in this Government is guarded by jealousy, 528; directly contrary to the written and express precepts of the Constitution, 528; the term "vacancy" in the Constitution, 528; as the Constitution has expressly declared the Executive power shall be vested in the President, this power of appointment to office would have necessarily belonged to him, 529; cases of its exercise examined, 540; John Paul Jones, 540; his appointment examined, 541; the case of Monroe and Pinkney, 542; the case of Mr. Short, 543; the case of Adams, Gallatin, and Bayard, 543; cases of consuls, 544; no one justifies the assertion that the President can in time of peace make any original appointment whatever during the recess of the Senate, 544; a fact existing in this case, which, when ratified and concluded, would give to the United States the right and impose on them the duty of sending Ministers so this Congress, 545.

A plain statement of facts, 546; is the assertion of this power on the part of the President, such an act as calls for a protest on the part of the Senate? 547; the Constitution regards the President as an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government, 547; the gentlemen say he has no such authority, except where the commission is directed to the successor of an individual who had previously filled the same station, 548; the proceeding in this case can only be justified by reference to the power of the President to commission a Minister in the recess of the Senate, 548; attempt made to lessen the effect of the cases, because the appointment was made during war, 548; the vacancy did not occur in the recess in the case of Adams, Gallatin, and Bayard, 549; the appointment of Mr. Pinkney was in a time of peace, 549.

A case altogether unknown to the Constitution, 550; no such claim ever before set up, 550; it has often been said that in this Government the departments are to balance each other, 550; no analogy between this and European governments, 551; we have the right to advise the President, 551; feeling among the people, 551.

Florida Canal.—In the House, bill considered, 73.

In the Senate a memorial relative to connecting the waters of the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, 363; action in the Legislative Council of Florida on the subject, 368; a bill for a survey and estimate, 369; explanation of the objects of the bill, 369, 370.

Congress have no power to make such a work in a territory any more than in a State, 385; this a question of mere expediency, 385; object of the committee in reporting the bill, 385; importance of the proposed communication, 385; the constitutional objection out of place on this point, 386; in relation to the territories, our power is sovereign, 386; object of the work, 386; practicability of the work, 386; present and future extent of the value of the commerce of this region, 387; other considerations, 388; strong position of the island of Cuba on the continent, 388; the dominion of this island and of this inland sea a prize to be fought for, 388; not only is the power of Congress, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, of either branch, or all combined—and much less of a single branch—not sovereign and omnipotent over the territories, but the power of no other government is sovereign, 388; the supposition a figure of speech, 389; Congress does not possess this power, 389; this question of canals, 389; explanations, 390; the power of Congress in this case the same as over the District of Columbia, 390; almost any thing should be done to avoid the capes, the keys, the reefs of Florida, 390; had been the graves of more persons than now inhabit Florida, 391; been in the practice of making surveys, 391; state of the question, 391; further debate, 392; the constitutional power of Congress, 393; the opinion that while the territories remain such, it was competent for the Government to make improvements in them, 394; supposed improvements begun, and, before they are finished, the territory becomes a State, 394; the Government is constantly gaining power by little bits, 394; constant applications before Congress for these objects, 394.

Duty of Congress to protect and cherish this infant State, and lead it to maturity as soon as possible, 394; only proposing to do that which was doing every day, 394; this principle so often adopted that it is unexpected any objection should be made on constitutional grounds, 394; not necessary to expend money in the territory in this way to advance the value of lands, 395; power of Congress over a territory and over a State on this point, 395; no power to expend money on roads and canals in States, 395; construction is a thing of inconceivable dilution, 396; improvement in a territory must always be a question of expediency, 396; the constitutional question not essentially connected with the object of the bill, 396; Constitution nothing to do with the subject now under consideration, 396.

Georgia Militia Claims.—In the House, motion to recommend the report of the committee, with instructions to bring in a bill making an appropriation, 226; Committee have reported against these claims on the assumption that they were adjusted by the treaty of cession of 1802, —which is a virtual admission they were just, 226; points proposed to be shown, 226; on what the claims are founded, 226; evidence in the case, 237; the service was rendered the United States, which they are bound to pay, 237.

Question on recommitting the report of the Committee, 226; the facts of the case, 226; did the General Government afford its sanction in a manner which would authorize the calling out of the militia by the Governor of Georgia, 226; the General Government considered the situation of Georgia as seriously alarming, and was inclined to repose every degree of confidence in the discretion of the Governor of the State, 237; it did not authorize the Governor to order out troops at his discretion, &c., 237; the circumstances were such as to fully authorize the Governor to act as his own discretion might point out, 238; the imminent danger on the frontiers of Georgia, 238; the force to be employed in the defence was not merely to be measured by the numbers of the enemy, but also by the difficulty of guarding an extensive and naked frontier, 238; opinion of Mr. Pickens, 239; summary, 239.

It is alleged by the claimants that they were called into the military service of the United States, to defend the western frontiers of Georgia against the Indians, 239; the services were performed in the most energetic and patriotic manner, 239; more than thirty years have elapsed since the soldiers were entitled to remuneration, 239; a new ground of opposition to these claims was discovered in 1808—it was fancied that these claims were adjusted in the contract between the United States and Georgia for the cession of the territory comprising the States of Alabama and Mississippi, 239; evidence, 239; why were certain words introduced into the compact? 239; the course pursued by the other States, 231; it is immaterial whether the Governor of Georgia acted right or wrong—he was authorized by the General Government to raise those troops—in doing so, he was the agent of the Government, and it is bound to pay the soldiers he raised, 231; it could be shown, if necessary, that instead of doing too much, he did too little, 232.

The fact of a reiterated rejection is calculated to produce a well-founded distrust of the justice of a claim so circumstanced, 232; the claims have been before Congress since 1797, 232; report of the Committee in 1808 that their complete payment was consummated under the treaty of cession, &c., 232; a minute recapitulation of the correspondence, to show that the unauthorized claims were always considered as liable to objection, in consequence of a belief on the part of the General Government that the Governor had not exercised a proper discretion in calling out troops, &c., 232; this not the only exception which was taken to the claims, 233.

Facts relative to reports of committees, 234; the Governor had contemplated an invasion, and was making preparation for it, 234; what are the arguments in support of the opinion that all difficulty was solved by the compact of 1802? 234; the United States wanted to have a cession of territory, and Georgia was willing to make it; all the State desired was, that the territory itself should pay all the debts due by Georgia, and for which that territory had been pledged by that State, 235; the Governor of Georgia was acting as the agent of the United States, 235; motion of recommitment decided in the negative, 235. See Index, vols. 2, 6, 7, Land claim. See Index, vol. 2.

Guatemala, Mission to.—In the House, moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision for a Minister's outfit, 675; friendly feeling of the new Republic, 675; in conformity with the views of the Department of State, 675; supposed to be the intention of the Executive to restore all our diplomatic functionaries in America, 675; motion lost, 676.

- Imprisonment for debt.—In the Senate, a bill to abolish, considered, 107; the bill, 107; amendment proposed striking out the clause relating to removal as a condition of imprisonment, 107; debate, 107; amendment has, 107; question on the passage of the bill, 109; to abolish imprisonment the declared object of the bill, 109; new oaths, new trials, new proofs, &c., are the means used to accomplish this object, 109; difficult to tell where the innovation may lead us, 109; what evidence that it is necessary for the good of the nation that such a system should be adopted? 109; objected that the bill is to abolish imprisonment only in certain cases, not in all, 111; the provisions of the bill inconsistent with its object, 109; it is said we have not brought forward any case of hardship to prove the necessity of this measure, 111; is it necessary to detain the Senate with the jail records of the several States? 110; the bill intended to restrain unreasonable and unjust creditors, as well as fraudulent debtors, 110; to confine the person of the poor debtor who has committed no fraud, is a violation of the common principles of humanity, 110; requirements of the bill, 110; a repugnance to the multiplication of oaths unnecessarily in the administration of justice, 110; every part of the system will be found to operate against the just rights of creditors, and involve them in litigation and expense, 110; no right touched by this bill, 111; bill rejected, 111.
- A resolution that a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing, 359; a uniform system of bankruptcy a suitable subject to be connected with this, 360; this measure now for the third time presented to the Senate, 380; this subject not embraced in that of bankruptcy, 380; a clear distinction between the two, 380; subject postponed, 380. See Index, vol. 1.

Judiciary System.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for three additional circuits considered, 158; motion indefinitely to postpone, lost, 158; motion to recommit the bill, 158; moved that the three additional circuit judges should not be justices of the Supreme Court, 159; its effect to degrade the Western States, 159; Kentucky wants a measure of justice extended to her that had been extended to the old States for forty years, 159; necessary to do away with the trouble and confusion arising from the words impairing the obligation of contracts, 159; equal justice would never be extended to the Western States without they were fairly represented, 159; the last amendment more inadmissible than all the propositions submitted for a reform or improvement of the judiciary, 159; our model the British system, which has been the admiration of the civilized world, 160; the plan contemplated, 160; objection to an increase in the number of judges who compose this tribunal, 161; it is said the number is now too large, 161; responsibility of the judges not a security for wisdom, equity, and justice in decisions, 162; it is said the judges are sufficiently national already, 163; further debate, 164, 165; amendment lost, 166; moved to reduce the number to two, 166; carried, 166; bill recommitted, 166.

A resolution relative to certain judicial proceedings, offered, 860; object of the resolution, 860; the benefits of the provisions of '89 have been adjudged to have application to the citizens of those States only which had existence when the act was passed, 861.

Further resolution offered, 861; at every term of the Supreme Court, from seventy to eighty causes left undecided, 867; establishment of circuit courts, 861; rules of proceeding in States admitted into the Union since the Judiciary Act, 869; a deviation from the laws of all the States had been permitted as unfriendly to civil liberty as it was vexatious and oppressive, 863.

A Bill to amend the system considered, 495; amendments reported relative to the Seventh Circuit, 496; nature of the amendments, 496; the grounds of complaint, 496; facts upon which the complaints are founded and the character and extent of the alleged evils, 496; in what the injustice and inconvenience to the States in question consist, 497; the plans which have been proposed at different times, 498; the Circuit Court system of 1801, 499; directing the Circuit Court to be held by the district Judges, 499; objections to these plans, 499; importance of a full knowledge of the local law is greater in the Western States than in the rest of the Union, 500; another view bearing against the separation of the Justices of the Supreme Court from the Circuit, 500; never existed a tribunal clothed with powers so various and important, 500; few States of the Union upon whose acts the seal of condemnation has not from time to time been placed, 503; the influence which these powers ought to have upon our legislation, 503; extent of the grounds of collision between the respective governments, 503; this is a subject on which it is difficult for one to speak without encountering the strong opinions entertained on different sides of the question, 503; bringing the Judges of the Supreme Court to the seat of government would bode no good to the State governments, 503; it is thought the tenure of the office of the Justices is the rotten part of the constitution, 503; it has been supposed that at some future day the exigencies of the country would require a different system, 504; amendment agreed to, 504.

Two amendments proposed, 505; one requires the concurrence of seven of the ten Judges in any decision denying the validity or restraining the operation of the constitution or any law of any State, the other that the ministerial officers of the Federal Courts shall, in levying and carrying into effect executions, be governed by the execution laws of the States, 505; the evils which the first is proposed to remedy, 505; result from the exercise of implied powers by the Judges, 505; the word State, 505; when and by whom was the Government of the United States formed? 506; by the people of the States in their corporate character, 507; the zeal to guard against an evil should be in proportion to its magnitude, 507; theory of a State, 507; is it illusory, 508; the government of a continent must be of necessity a despotism, 508; in Rome and Greece, wherever the people have been free, they have been happy and powerful while their freedom continued, 508; is it not more in accordance with the nature of our Government that the Union should depend on the States for its vigor, than that States should depend on the Union for their strength? 509; judicial corruption in England, 509; encroachments on the rights and powers of the States by erroneous decisions, 510; the English the only people who have found out the secret of judicial independence, 510; the Judges of the General Government are subject to no legal responsibility, 511; what law of Congress has been enacted which tended to trench on the rights of the States or the citizens, which that Court has not affirmed, 511; something in this matter which has escaped scrutiny, 512; strange infatuation to suppose that self-interest is the just basis of impartial and disinterested umpirage, 513.

Why should it require two-thirds of the Senate to convict a Judge, while a minority of the Judges may convict a State? 513; the execution laws of any people, who assert their right to self-government, should, in a more emphatic sense than any other of their laws, be suited to their condition, 514; we are taught that the liberty and property of the citizens are regulated, guarded, &c., by the States, 514; it is time it should be distinctly ascertained whether execution laws should be enacted by the States, by the Congress, or by the courts, 515; the people do not belong to the Judges, 516; away with this delusive jargon about the stability of the judiciary, 516; our own Government emphatically a usurpation, 517; power always progressive, 517; the want of this bill is a subject of universal complaint in the western country, 517; further remarks, 518.

This amendment tends rather to aggravate the intrinsic evil, 519; the defect now to be supplied is a growing one, 519; the multitudinous Supreme Court will be little better than a mere registering court of the judgments and of the decrees of the inferior courts, 519; no man will say that this plan for a judiciary will do for any length of time, 519; the fact of delay is too notorious to require formal proof, 520; what is the remedy for this intrinsic evil of the system itself? 520; to confine the Supreme Court to the duties of the Supreme Court, 520; the separation of the original and appellate jurisdictions was intended by the Constitution, 520; would this be advisable now? 521; the time must come when they will be separated, 521; it is said it will be dangerous to have the court stationed at the seat of government, 522; how would the intrinsic evil of the system supply the defect to be supplied by the proposed amendment? 522; it is said the system of local courts for the exercise of original jurisdiction will be unpopular, 523.

The grievances which exist and which it is the object of the bill to remedy, 524; the remedy, 524; the western States have been admitted on an equal footing with the original States, 525; the accumulation of business is said to be owing to temporary causes, 525; if the people had not confidence in the federal courts they would sue in the State courts, 526; objections against the bill, 527; it is said there are other numerous judicial tribunals from which no inconvenience is found, 528; many cases are decided in the House of Lords, 528; are we not more likely to get individuals qualified for the situation by selecting them from large districts? 529; the judiciary should not be put on a footing that will render it liable to fluctuation, 529; the idea of judicial representation is admitted to be absurd, 529; it is said the increase in the number of the judges will have a tendency to set afloat all the decisions in constitutional questions, 530; it is asked, do you secure this fixedness and permanency by rejecting the bill? 530; no difficulty with the business before district judges for a century to come, 531; they are said to be incompetent, 531; it is said the judges should not be shut up at Washington, 532; bill passed, 532.

Amendment disagreed to by the House and reconsidered in the Senate, 531; difference between the two Houses, 531; one related to the arrangement of the circuits, and the other to the requirement that the judges should reside within their circuits, 531; facts as existing heretofore, 531; a reprehensible and fallacious objection to the residence point, 532; objection to the form of the amendment, 532; the separation or connection of Ohio and Kentucky, 532; a view that should silence the opposition, 532; vote to adhere, 532; report on the message of the House requesting a conference, 534.

Moved to consider the report, 537; to appoint conference is to rescind the vote of adherence, 537; some points of the amendment, 537; no good effected by a conference, 538; the idea that in voting to adhere the Senate had exhibited a want of respect to the other House, 538; when a conference is asked has it not always been granted? 538; a question, is not the judge capable of doing the business in Ohio and Kentucky? 538; report agreed to, 539.

In the House, legislation on the subject, 611; the execution of paternal regard which each State feels as alone give strength and durability to the laws which bind us together, 612; the claims of the western States, 612; the provisions of this bill are not exclusively for the benefit of those States which are the most anxious for its success, 612; the claims of Tennessee, Ohio, and Kentucky, 612; it is said the number of judges for the discharge of ordinary business would be inconveniently large, 612; our system and the English, 612; an increase of the number, it is said, would weaken the responsibility of each, 614; it is with an eye to decisions on constitutional questions that an increase is desired, 614.

What are the evils of the present state of things? it is proposed to remedy? 615; the objects for which the system was instituted, 615; are these objects attained? 615; why do we desire the establishment of a circuit instead of a district court? 616; advantage to the defendant if a circuit sits with a district judge, 617; another disadvantage of this want of extension, 617; another evil peculiar to these States, 617; does the present bill apply a remedy to the evils enumerated? 618; objections urged against it, 618; this bill is important as fixing the policy which is to govern the old thirteen States in regard to new members of this Union at the West and South, 619; if the extension is to depend on the number of new cases, where will you find so wide a field as in the new States? 619; is it logical to argue against an entire system because you can find a single spot that is embarrassed? 620.

More than ten years since the attention of Congress was called to this subject by President Madison, 620; the people of the Western States have a right to demand all the immunities extended to any other State, 621; if the judicial is coextensive with the legislative, all questions relating to land grants in Ohio are subject to its jurisdiction, 621; a few considerations relative to the existing state of the Seventh Circuit, 622; situation of three north-western States, 622; situation of the United States when the judiciary was first organized, 623; judges were looked upon with great jealousy, 623; what the cause of alarm at the proposed increase of judges, 624; apprehensions that some of the decisions may be reversed, 624; the whole system of this country is radically wrong, 625; much said of the incorruptible purity of English courts, 625.

Moved to recommit the bill, 629; system proposed by the bill, 629; does the present system deny justice to any man? 629; why are the opposers of this bill from the old States threatened with retaliation by the new? 629; this doctrine is unknown to the Constitution, 629; it is said the bill will equalize a knowledge of the State laws, 630; this argument unsound, 630; what the bill proposes, 631; was the system of 1801 overthrown by experience? 631; the system of this bill cannot endure, 632; motion lost, 632.

On the decision of this question hangs the destiny of this great coördinate branch of the Government, 633; can the present system be so extended as to secure the objects in view? 633; we shall derive evident advantages from an increase of judges, 634; the suggestion of imaginary dangers should not be regarded, 634; in a government founded on opinion, it is necessary that the people should be satisfied with judicial decisions, 635; a constitutional objection has been raised to a union a the judges of the Supreme Court with the Circuits, 685; the people who have business in the inferior courts do not desire appeals, 685; further objections considered, 686; various motions made, 687; bill ordered to a third reading, 687.

LAFAYETTE, MARQUE, report on the mode of reception of, 100; introduced to the Senate, 101; communication from, 106; reply to the address of the Senate and House, 107; his reception by the House, 200; address of the Speaker to him, 200; his reply, 200.

Lafayette, gratitude to.—In the Senate, a bill reported to make compensation to Lafayette for his services and expenditures during the American Revolution, 101; on ordering to third reading, 101; full extent of Lafayette's services admitted, 102; others exerted themselves, also, to their utmost in the same cause, 102; principle of the bill objected to, 102; what evidence that the amount proposed was the proper amount of compensation? 102; moved to recommit the bill, 102; it was hoped this bill would give rise to no objections, 102; the adoption of this measure will be not only an act of justice to Lafayette but a duty we owe to ourselves, 102; income of Lafayette when he embarked for America, 102; his expenditures during six years of the Revolution, 102; under what circumstances was the sacrifice of one hundred thousand dollars, in the service of this country, made? 102; the balance in his favor far exceeds the amount of this bill, 108; the grant of land to Lafayette, in 1806, 108; located near New Orleans, 108; subsequently granted to the city by Congress, 108; its value, 108; surrendered to the city by Lafayette sooner than enter into litigation with any public body in the United States, 108; now worth half a million, 108; no indemnity ever asked, 108; according to precedent the Government would be bound to compensate him, 104; instances referred to, 104; can this bill ever be drawn into precedent or such a case ever occur again? 104; details of the bill, 104; the provision to be made should not only be worthy of the distinguished person for whom it is intended, but worthy the character of the American people, 104; the belief that Lafayette had ever made any intimation on the subject disclaimed, 105; bill passed the Senate, 105; House bill also passed, 105; communication to Lafayette, 106; reply, 107.

In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 209; this bill brought in suddenly and without opportunity for consultation, 209; a difference of opinion as to the form of the measure proposed by the bill, 209; more time to think and act upon it required, 209; motion to lay on the table carried, 210.

The objections not anticipated, 214; his services during the war of the Revolution were known and acknowledged by every one, 215; he also brought important and very necessary supplies to an immense amount, considering it was the offering of a private individual, 215; the location of his land in New Orleans, 216; moved to recommit with instructions, 216; this motion involves the principle that Congress is about to render compensation to Lafayette under the obligation of a bond, 216; there is a degree of indelicacy in the motion which would shock the sensibility of any honorable mind, 217; a motion which is, in effect, to test the success of the present measure, 217; such a case as this can never occur again,—if it should, will this people shrink from meeting it? 217; not understood that any opposition is made to the principle of the bill, 217; the present motion tests the strength of the bill, 218; one of those acts of which it might be said that, if done at all, it should be done quickly, 218; delay may be better in order to secure unanimity, 218; moved to postpone, 218; motion to lay on the table, lost, 219; the question presented by the opponents admits of but two doubts of the facts, or the inferences from them, 219; sum expended by Lafayette, 219; the grant of land, 219; what is the character of the example from which this unfounded apprehension arises? 220; the eyes of Europe are at this moment upon us, 220; various amendments offered and lost, 221; vote on the bill, 221; passed, 221. See Index, vol. 1, 2, 7.

Lake Superior Copper Mines.—In the Senate—a bill to authorize treating with the Indians for the right of discovering and working certain mines, 181; these mines, how long known, 182; a home supply of the metal, 182; the problem of these mines ought to be solved, 182; the country should be examined before any thing further was done, 182; indications on Lake Superior, 182.

In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 848; the mines of great value, 348; interference of government in mining property deprecated, 348; particulars of the mines, 348; bill rejected, 348. See Index, vol. 2, 7.

- New Mexico and Missouri, Inland trade between.*—In the Senate, a paper presented containing facts in relation to the origin, present state and future prospect of trade between the valley of the Mississippi and the internal provinces of Mexico, 106; the accounts of Augustus Storrs, 106; fruit of those enterprises the present year, 106; cotton our article of exchange, 106.
- A bill to authorize the President to cause a road to be marked out from the frontiers of Missouri to New Mexico considered, 126; the proof of the inland trade, 126; attacks of Indians and arbitrary duties of provincial authorities, 137; reasons why the bill should pass, 137; the trade is sufficiently valuable to merit the favor of national protection, 137; it promises to be permanent, 187; it is an object of great value to the people of the West, 128; it is not the West alone which is benefited by this trade, the North and South participate in the profits, 128; the claim for protection rests upon the same principle which carries protection to the commerce of the Union upon every sea, in the most remote countries, and upon distant seas, 128; a plain statement of robberies and murders committed upon our citizens on their way to Mexico, 128; the use of an unmolested passage is as necessary in a political as in a commercial point of view, 129; an object of vital importance to the Indians, 129; no constitutional objections, 129; precedents, 180; on this road we are met by the boundary line of the United States, and a road upon foreign territory is a novel subject of legislation in Congress, 180; a precedent, 180; conversation with Mr. Jefferson on this subject, 180.

Motion to strike out so much as relates to the road within the limits of Mexico, 181; not evident that we have a right to take money from the pockets of the people to expend in internal improvements within the limits of any State, 181; a great difference between making a road within our own territory and in that of another power, even with their own consent, 181; the ground upon which it is asked for, is protection to the commerce of the United States, 181; why should not an appropriation be made for the West, when so much was and had been done for the East? 181; nothing in the section incompatible with the rights or dignity of the Government, 181; no constitutional objection to the proposed measure, 181; Government called upon to afford the same protection to those people engaged in a foreign trade as to those in any other part of the Union, 182; as the friendship of the Indians cannot be bought, it may be safer for traders to go through their country by different routes than to have but one, 182; the West has never hesitated to vote for any measure that was necessary to protect the lives or property of our seafaring citizens, 182; the same indignation whether the hands of a pirate or a savage are imbued in the blood of our citizens, 182; the protection of commerce in the West Indies as much for the benefit of the West as any other part of the Union, 182; if the section is struck out, the effect of the bill will be destroyed, 182; the only question is, can commerce be carried on there to advantage? 184; this is something more than Indian trade, 184; what is proposed to be done? 184; motion to strike out lost, 184; bill ordered to a third reading, 184; the bill as passed, 184.

Niagara Sufferers.—In the House, a bill considered to authorize payment for property lost or destroyed by the enemy during the late war, 201; one of the most important measures of the session, 201; important to have the correspondence between Admiral Cochran and the Secretary of State, 201; the House as fully prepared to act now as at any future time, 201; the claim is just, inasmuch as it was in retaliation for injuries first inflicted on the enemy by the express order of this Government, 202; moved the Committee rise, 202; the principle of the bill is that, though the House should have been occupied on the first day of the war and destroyed on the next, the Government is bound to indemnify the sufferer, because the war is its own act, 222; doubtful if the Government is responsible in any case, 222; as Government is not bound in equity to repay losses of this kind, so neither is it a dictate of sound policy that they should do so, 222; the doctrine of retaliation, 222.

No difference of opinion as to the atrocious character of the enemy's operations during the late war, 222; if ever there was a case of military occupation, this appeared to be completely so, 222; if a Government was in any case bound to indemnify, this was one, 222; motion to strike out the enacting clause, 224; the great question is—what is the nature and character, and what is the extent of the obligation which a whole community owes to its individual members for losses sustained during a state of warfare from acts of the enemy, 224; the rule is, as to persons, non-combatants shall be as exempt from danger or injury as if the two nations were in a state of perfect amity, and with respect to property, unless in certain extraordinary circumstances, it shall not be subject to destruction or injury, unless it be immediately connected with and used for the purposes of war, 224; principle of the act of 1816, 225; we are not to allow claims for all the ravages which an enemy may perpetrate contrary to the law of nations, 225; no difference existed in these cases, whether the property was destroyed by the Government or the enemy, 225.

The principles of national law, as they have been laid down, 227; the circumstances of those persons such as to create an obligation something more than a mere appeal to humanity, 228; the sufferings of the Niagara frontier have been of the most poignant, severe, and aggravated kind, 228; the argument that payment for such losses would induce an enemy to make universal desolation, in order to ruin the financial means of the Government, unfounded, 228; an illustration, 228; was there an act of this Government relating to the property destroyed, which induced a change of its pacific character, and clothed it with a warlike one, and did that change produce its destruction? 229.

The character of the subject, 280; is each part of this country, and each man in it, to protect himself? 281; may there not be some cases in which an imperfect obligation is stronger and more perfect than perfection itself? 281; our own statute books furnish sufficient precedents, 281; look at the horses, saddles, bridles paid for at the West, 282; the sufferings on the frontier, 282; reference to Vattel, 282; principle established by the acts of 1816-17, 282; if the occupancy and the destruction are proved, that is enough, 282; the ravages on the frontier were not caused by the occupancy by our army, but were inflicted entirely on a principle of retaliation in consequence of the burning of Newark, 282; the proclamation of Gen. Prevost, 282; it deserves no other character than that of mere hyperbole, 282; facts of the case, 282; are there any more constitutional objections in the way here than in other cases? 284; circumstances of the case, 284; amendment offered, 284; investigations and report, 284; simple object of the present bill, 284; usages of civilized war did not justify the destruction of the Niagara frontier, 285; no right on the part of a belligerent to destroy private houses or individual property from which an enemy has been driven, 285; the laws of 1816-17, departures from them, 285; this Government is bound, as a matter of right, to indemnify individuals for the destruction of their property by the enemy, provided such destruction were in pursuance of the rules of civilized warfare, 286; was this act justified by the laws of war? 286; establish the principle of the bill and you offer the strongest temptation to an enemy to commit outrages, 286; the guilt of perfidy added to that of the violation of the laws of war, 286; these sufferers have claims upon our generosity, not upon our justice, 287; what has Government done, and in what condition are the claims of these individuals, 387; difficult to find any principle upon which the Niagara claims should be paid, 387; the principle of the bill does not differ materially from that of 1816, 389; was not this property a legitimate subject of destruction to the enemy? 389; bill read third time and passed, 373. See Index, vol. 3.

Occupying Claimant Laws.—In the House, the remonstrance of Kentucky relative to the decision of the Supreme Court involving the constitutionality of the occupying claimant laws of Kentucky, 51; resolutions offered requiring the concurrence of a certain number of justices in cases relating to the constitution or laws of a State, 51; decision of the celebrated case of Green vs. Biddle, had given great alarm in Kentucky, 51; occasion of the resolutions, 51; the compact between Kentucky and Virginia, one article of which involved in the decision of the above case, and the decision virtually declared that Kentucky has no legislative jurisdiction over her own soil, 51; what were the laws which that decision pronounced a violation of the compact, and, therefore, unconstitutional? 51; the object of each to secure to the occupant, in case of his eviction by a paramount title, when he had settled in good faith, a reasonable compensation for his improvements, 51; the necessity of these laws grew out of the condition of the country, 51; occasion for the passage of the laws, 52; third article of the compact, 52; extract, 52; exposition of the meaning of its provision, 52; how is it to be interpreted, 52; what was the nature of those private rights agreed to be made secure, 52; interpretation of the court proved erroneous, 52; the construction given by the court to the third article is wholly inconsistent with the stipulations contained in the fourth, 52; look to the effects and consequences of the construction contended for by the court, 54; the present proposition not of a mere theoretic and speculative character, it introduces no new and dangerous principle, 54; the resolutions cannot endanger the dignity or importance of the judges, 54; how does the matter stand according to the present state of facts? 44.

A substitute to the resolutions offered defining a quorum of the Supreme Court, 55; it involves a principle of vital importance to the whole Union, and although presented by a single State demands a dispassionate deliberation, 55; some of the causes which have brought this question into existence and forced it upon our attention, 55; these laws were rendered necessary to the prosperity and happiness of the citizens of Kentucky by the misguided policy of Virginia, 56; the law passed in 1789, 56; the parts of the compact connected with this subject, 56; passage of the law of 1812, 57; its effect, 57; it requires the efforts of refined legal subtlety to demonstrate clearly the unconstitutionality of those laws, 57; constitutionality of the law of 1812 questioned in Kentucky courts, 57; the sanction these laws received in Kentucky, 58; the power to decide upon constitutional questions involving the validity of the laws or constitution of a State appertains to this court, 58; Kentucky has no hope of relief from an act of Congress, 58.

A statement of the question, 59; number of judges who were present on the decision of the case, Green vs. Biddle, 59; a minority of the court, 59; was it right to suffer a minority of the court to exercise such broad powers? 59; look at the root of the question, 59; two modes of adjustment of controversies considered in the federal convention, 59; no one defends the propriety of letting a minority exercise the power, 60; can we deduce a sound rule from the theory or practice of our Government? 60; no state of things could possibly occur in which a minority of the whole court could invalidate a law, 60; shall we leave the court to regulate itself, or shall it be put under such regulations as the Congress shall make? 60; how shall we find a rule? 60.

Resolutions considered, 74; amendment offered, 74; objected to that part which prescribes a majority of judges as competent to decide, 74; equity and policy of requiring five judges to concur when the whole authority of one or many States was to be set aside, 74; it is said a minority might control a majority by refusing to concur in their decision, 74; general principles upon which the Supreme Court was erected, 74; no greater number should be required when a State was a party than when an individual claiming under a State law was a party, 74; a greater number should not be required to decide a case one way than the other, 75; power of the court practically to make the constitution by giving their interpretation of it, 75; necessity of guarding the State tribunals, 75; the attendance of the judges, 75; the argument respecting a jury, 75.

Bill reported to alter the time of holding the sessions of the Supreme Court, 75; amendment proposed relative to the number of judges, &c., 75; a poor man for an inconsiderable sum ought not to be subject to a suit in the Federal Court, 76; the thinking few and the tolling million, 76; the complexity of the Government, 76; if there is a disposition on the part of this court to encroach on the authorities of the United States, the proposition now under consideration will have a tendency to check it, 77; we hear frequently of conflicting claims of power, 77; how are we to check the growing evil? 77; if the eye of the patriot is turned to the present condition of the country, what a singular and diabolicaling spectacle does he behold, 77; how to remedy these evils and to guard and protect the people against the hurtful and pernicious consequences of these alarming conflicts, is the question, 77; other difficulties resulting from the unhappy faculty we have of misconstruing the constitution, than from any real defect in that instrument, 77; what is the consequence of the decision in the Kentucky case? 78; what opinion would a stranger form of the boasted excellence of our constitution, after being told of the decisions of the Executive and Judicial branches upon it, and of the consequences resulting from those decisions? 78; meaning of the decision of the court, 78; object of referring to the facts, 78.

The amendment operates practically to leave the constitutionality of any State law uncertain, 79; the principle well calculated to alter the whole theory of our Government, 79; this principle goes far to destroy rights of minorities, 89; a particular case specified, 79; bill ordered to a third reading, 79.

Panama Mission—Secret Executive Proceedings.—In the Senate, a resolution that the Senate ought to act with open doors relative to the Panama Mission, &c., and a call upon the Executive, &c., 417; passed, 417; resolutions relative to the reply of the Executive, 417; reply, 418; various resolutions, 418; proceedings relative to the mission, 419, 420; note, 421.

Resolution that it is not expedient to send any Ministers to the Congress of Panama, considered, 421; the character of that Congress, 421; it can be ascertained only from its declared and acknowledged objects, 421; sources whence this information derived, 421; when project of a confederacy was conceived, 421; treaties between the States forming it, 422; of alliance offensive and defensive, 422; a Congress of confederated belligerent States convened for the great purpose of bringing the war to a close by their combined efforts, and establishing a plan of general co-operation in all cases whatever, 422; language of the conventions, 422; its objects are essentially belligerent, 422; these objects publicly avowed to the world, 422; can a neutral State join in such a council, without violating its neutrality? 422; can we do so without departing from our neutral relations with Spain? 422; an attempt is made to remove all our apprehensions on this subject, by the assurance that Spain is just about to acknowledge the independence of her former colonies, 422; it has been said, no nation ever permitted such an interference as we are about to attempt without redressing the wrong by war, 424; not a single object specified in the invitations and answers which would justify the measure proposed, 424; the first subject to which our attention is called arises out of the pledge which Mr. Monroe is supposed to have given, "not to permit any foreign power to interfere in the war between Spain and her colonies," 424; Mr. Monroe never pledged this nation to go to war or make treaties to prevent European interference, 424; the declaration was intended to produce a moral effect alone, 424; substance of the statement, 425; we are free to act in any emergency according to circumstances and sense of our own interests, 425; are you prepared to send Ministers to this Congress to make effectual pledge of the President as understood by the past Administration and by the Spanish American States, 425.

The next subjects to be considered are the suppression of the African Slave Trade and the Independence of Hayti, 426; the only safe rule on the question of slavery is to treat it as a domestic question, 426; the great object of building up an American system, words which when applied to our domestic policy mean restriction and monopoly, and when applied to our foreign policy mean "entangling alliances," 427; the last subject specified is the fate of Cuba, 427; position of the Government on this question, 427; nothing remains but for Congress to interpose their authority in preventing the Executive from carrying these views into effect, 428; the subjects of this Congress belong to ordinary diplomacy; will be more speedily accomplished by ministers to the new States, 429; the President considers this wise necessary to prevent the new States from giving special favors to Spain, 429; other objects, 429.

The report would persuade us that the destiny of Cuba and Porto Rico are somehow connected with this mission, 429; our Government labored with much anxiety to prevent enterprises against Cuba and Porto Rico, 429; the spirit represented as existing at the North, 429; the origin, object, actual power and essential character of this assembly must be derived from the documents before us, 429; astonishing that it should be contended this was not a belligerent Congress, 429; are all our intuitions in joining this Congress in every respect commendable and pacific? 429; the object is to involve us in the end in the prosecution of the war, all nations look to deeds not words, 429; nature and tendency of these principles, 429; are these the doctrines of the American Congress or of the American people? or do they savor of the Holy Alliance? 429; but the United States have not yet pledged themselves to any such entangling and despotic principle in respect to any nation, 429; where is the crisis, where the emergency to justify any such measure? 429.

The only question is the expediency of the mission to Panama, 429; it is not true that the United States are pledged to take part in this war in any event whatever, 429; declaration of President Monroe, 429; if you and ministers and they discuss this subject and enter into proposed agreements, so far as you have power over the matter, your neutrality is not only broken, but you are in a state of war, 429; it is vain to say that we are not to take a part in any belligerent question; that our neutrality is not to be violated, 429; so far as we have any means of judging, this war is to be continued, and it becomes a very important question to settle in our own minds the direction it will most probably take, 429; the next subject specified is the entire abolition of the slave trade, 427; if any wish to see an end of slavery, let them cease talking and writing to induce Congress to take up the subject, 427; also to attend and settle the basis of our relations to Hayti, and others that may be in like circumstances, 427; if we send ministers will they not be considered bound to discuss and decide upon each of these subjects? 427; the invitations, 427; and whom the invitation comes, 438; it is assumed that the acceptance involves a violation of our neutrality, and that all the objects are either dangerous, inexpedient or unnecessary, 438; the confederation is of South American States, we are not a party, 438; invited as a guest, 438; no propositions made to us to become a party, and all the communications speak with the most guarded precaution, and the most explicit avowals, 439; if we took a part in the discussion of belligerent measures, what part would it be? 439; if the President was disposed to do wrong, and make a treaty, it would not be binding, 439; the whole of the argument which it is attempted to refute is founded on the fact, that we are to form an alliance, to make common cause, 439; not a fact to warrant it, 439; much has been said about a pledge, 439; some of the subjects suggested as proper to be discussed at Panama, 440; among the events of greatest magnitude and most anxious concern to this country, is the future condition of Cuba, 440; Colombia and Mexico have long contemplated the independence of that island, 440; the establishment of principles of liberal commercial intercourse is another subject, 440; mitigation of the practice and laws of nations in maritime war, 440; condition of Hayti, another subject, 440.

A correct understanding of the question most conducive to a just decision, 441; its statement, 441; first points recurring for consideration are the character of the Congress and the limitations under which it is proposed the United States shall become a party, 443; encroachments of Executive authority, 443; what is the character of the Congress as it respects the Spanish American States by whom it is constituted, and the footing upon which our Representatives are to stand? 443; is it to be an advising or acting body? 443; can the two specific objects and duties of the Congress be effected on the limited construction now given to its powers? 443; what is the business to be transacted at the Congress, and particularly that portion in which we are invited to participate? 444; the character and effect which has been given, or attempted to be given to certain declarations, is full of instruction as to the probable consequences of similar acts at this day, 445; letter of invitation from the Mexican Minister, 445; views entertained by some of the Spanish American Governments as to the condition of the United States in relation to its obligation to resist any attempts on the part of Europe, &c., 445; language of our Minister abroad and our Secretary at home amounts to a recognition on the part of the Government of the character claimed by the Spanish American Governments, 446; the design of the Executive to enter into an agreement to make common cause if the powers of Europe combine with Spain, 446; would it be wise in us to change our policy upon the subject of political connections with foreign States? 447; the general principle, 447; the grounds of distinction attempted to be made between its application to the Spanish American States and to those of Europe, 448; has the character of these governments been the principle upon which we have hitherto acted in relation to those States? 448.

What is this Congress? 449; what are its objects and powers? 449; have we any coincident objects and powers? 449; to become parties to a treaty-making or a treaty-originating Congress, is a new and extraordinary step, 449; it is said this is a diplomatic Congress and of perpetual duration, 450; suppose obstacles to be surmounted, and your deputies admitted to full communion, 450; the greatest lure to us is the thought of participating in a "council on great occasions," 450; objects pointed out by the President in his Message, 451; obstinacy and perseverance the characteristic of Spain, 451; examples, 452; the course we have pursued and ought to pursue in regard to Cuba, is a matter of much perplexity, 452; when you cannot see where to go and what to do, stand still and do nothing, 452; what good reason can induce you to unite in settling the political condition of Hayti? 453; we are required to abandon the wise and salutary policy which has hitherto conducted us in safety to form a political association with the Republics of Spanish America, 453; prosperous condition of the country, 453; what are the duties which this condition inculcates? 453; to embark in quest of novelty? 453; a necessary consequence of this mission is that we shall become parties to the Congress at Panama to the extent of the Monroe pledge, 454; the Spanish American States consider this Government as pledged to them to resist the interference of any European power, 454; does this pledge exist? is this Government bound by a contract so disastrous? 455; last year it was said, we had given a pledge to the nations of the world for the suppression of the slave trade, 455; if we go there, our own interests will imperiously demand that we should share in those deliberations which are to determine the fate of Cuba and Porto Rico, 455; we cannot be indifferent to the change of their condition, 455, with due regard to the safety of the Southern States, can you suffer those islands to pass into the hands of buccaners? 456; what, then, is our obvious policy? 456; we have been exhibiting the character of a political busybody in the cabinets of Europe, 456; we are yet free from these diplomatic fetters, 456; no change in the condition of these islands can be permitted, 456.

Next to a passion for war, a passion for diplomacy is most to be dreaded, 457; it is not the interest of these Republics that we should embark in their cause, and, surely there is no reason for their embarking in war, 458; what is the nature and character of the Congress to be assembled at Panama? 458; the powers which are denied to the Congress, 458; it is not to be considered as a sovereign power? 458; further remarks, 458.

The Senate is called upon to advise the President upon this proposition, 459; the circumstances out of which this proposition has grown, 459; the character of the Congress and its members are all fruitful sources of inconsistent and contradictory opinions, differing more or less from the treaties which would govern and control all, 460; the character of the Congress, 460; the powers of the Ministers, 460; is this information necessary to us? 460; the President exacts our advice and refuses our information, 461; this country ought not to entangle itself with the South American States, 461; the advisory power is a high one, and whenever it is given by consent or conferred by law, a high moral obligation is contracted by all the parties concerned to conform to the advice, 461; the advisory power is little less than a power to control and govern, 461; this is a council for something more than consultation and advice, 462; does it constitute a diplomatic assembly with power to negotiate treaties in the ordinary form? 463; in giving the names of plenipotentiaries it is not intended to give diplomatic functions or character, 463; why stipulate for ambassadorial privileges, if they were already possessed of them? 463; they have protected their plenipotentiaries at Panama with treaty stipulations, because they are not a diplomatic body, and not entitled to diplomatic privileges under the law of nations, 463; they stipulate far less for their plenipotentiaries than public ministers receive without stipulation, 463; the constitutional question, 463; power of the President and Senate to send ministers abroad, 463; let us try our intended Ministers by the tests, 464; they fall at every attribute of the character, 464; reading of the nominations, 464; is, then, the sovereignty of these nations present in fact? 464; there may be nominations to sovereignties without their dominions, 465; is there a representation of the sovereignty of these nations? 465; a closer view of this Congress, under its character of an organized body, 466; the simple idea of organization explodes every pretension of this Congress to a diplomatic character, 466; the President and Senate cannot send the nominees as public ministers to this Congress, 466; the proposed mission is unknown to the law of nations, 467; the power of the Congress to treat of the subjects at all, 467; the restrictions upon it, 467; the third object is the establishment of a league of Republics to counterpoise the Holy Alliance, 468; the relations of Hayti and the rights of Africans, are two other points to be established, 468; letter of Mr. Salazar, 468; our policy towards Hayti has been fixed for thirty-three years, 469; it is said to be only for advice and consultation, 469; the main argument relied on for sending these ministers is the fact of invitation, 469; report of the Secretary of State, 469; the invitation was not of a character to lay us under any obligation to accept it, 470; enough has been said to justify the Senate in withholding its advice, 470; but the mission is said to be popular, 470; note, 471; result of the mission, 471; resolutions relative to, 471; answer of the President, 472.

Congress.—In the House, a resolution calling on the President for the correspondence inviting this Government to take a part, &c., 637; what end is it proposed to attain? 637; reasons for the slumber of the resolution, 638; adoption of the resolution, signify that the House believed the information important, 639; the information called for is to be made to bear on an appropriation for the Ministers, 639; passing the resolution would not betray a want of proper decorum to the other branch of Government, 639; with our present knowledge we are not competent to form an opinion on the subject, 640; importance of the information, 640; the time for the information to be given is now, 640; who can tell what this Panama Congress is to lead to? 640; shall we not be called upon to consult what amount of men and money is requisite to liberate Cuba and Porto Rico? 641; the President tells us he shall send a Minister, and all we have to do is to appropriate for his expenses, 641; is an ambassador to be received there from the Republic of Hayti? 642; object of the resolution, 642; consequences, 643; nothing in the call which ought to consume the time of the House, 643; if there is any danger in the mission, that is a good reason to hasten the call, 644; it is said the measure is unprecedented, 645; that we have no right to examine into the propriety of this mission, 645; that the most tremendous consequences are to grow out of this mission, 646; calls to order, 646; various motions made, 647; amendment proposed, 647; unprecedented terms of the amendment, 647; instructions to foreign ministers are always private, 648; the measure proposed is one which ought not to be adopted without the consent of that body in whose hands is the question of peace or war, 648; the amphictyones of the New World, 649; the question now is, in what manner we shall ask for this information, 649; if we go, we go as a party to the Congress, and all we know of its subjects is from the treaty, 649; commercial treaties will not be formed there, 650; if this House has a right to inspect the instructions to ministers, it shows a power of interference incompatible with the treaty-making power, 650; the chairman has no authority to say for the committee that they are informed the papers will soon be forthcoming, 651; prematurity of the call, 651; considerations of delicacy should induce this House to refrain from this call, 652; indispensably necessary for the judgment of this House in deciding on the propriety of the mission, 652; the instructions are an ulterior matter, 652; if the President asks for an appropriation to defray the expenses of this mission it is our right and duty to demand an explicit disclosure of his views in constituting it, 653; amendment moved, 653; the demand of the instructions to be given to our Foreign Minister is an attempt to invade the powers the constitution has confided to the Executive, 653; we call for so much as in his opinion may be compatible with the public interest to disclose, 654; this debate will react somewhere, 654; the House would not adopt it unless clearly shown to be conducive to the public good, 654; the resolution as modified, 654; we want to know all the powers of the Ministers, 655; they go to stipulate, but with whom and to what extent? 655; the question is now whether the House shall take the course calculated to effect its object, 655; amendment offered and agreed to, 655; something peculiar connected with the history of its resolution, 656; this information should be presented in a proper form and come when necessary, 656; we have been told this is no new project, 656; object of sending Ministers, 657; should we decline acceding to their propositions what would be the consequence? 657; the way South America is to be benefited by the United States, 657; further amendments, 658.

Subject now before the House is of deep and vital moment to the country, 659; the only question the extent of the information we require before we shall be called on to act in relation to this mission, 659; we know what kind of arguments would be used to sustain the measure, 660; there is something peculiar in the time for pressing this restricted call, 661; many conjectures about the object of this mission, 661; do we know what may be the feelings of those powers we have not invited us to be present? 662; feared we are to become parties to a confederation, 663; that we are to unite political relations with them, 663; nothing in the subject to disturb our tranquillity, 663; authority on which the President has made this assertion, 664; why had we adopted any discretionary clause in this part of the resolution, 665; nothing to justify the opinion that any bad faith was intended, 665; let us have the information, and then proceed to deliberate calmly and fairly, 666; why do we request, instead of directing and commanding? 666; is this matter of such unparalleled importance? 666; striking out this clause may have a tendency more fully to express to the President what are the wishes of the House, 667; the subject was of such a character that it must be the duty of the President to give the House the fullest information, 667; further debate, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673; question on the resolution taken, 674; agreed to, 675.

Pay of Ministers.—See Index, vol. 5, 6.

PEARSON, DUTCH J., Representative from Rhode Island, 596.

Penal Code of the United States.—In the House, a bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, considered, 261; amendment moved to the fourth section "and not within the jurisdiction of any State or territorial Government," 242; object to prevent collisions between the authority of the General and State Governments, 242; State Governments fully competent to inquire into and punish crimes within their own jurisdictions, 242; the class of crimes had actually occurred without any law to punish them, 242; admiralty jurisdiction had been claimed and had been exercised within Kentucky, 242; this section will put the punishment of flat-boats on the Mississippi into the hands of the United States, 242; authority given by the constitution, 242; amendment lost, 242.

Moved to strike out the words "or rape," 243; if rape was placed on an equal footing with murder, where one was committed the other would be, 243; the present bill a mitigation of the penal laws as they previously stood, 243; amendment lost, 243; amendment relative to offences on American ships in foreign jurisdictions, 243; objected to as dangerous, and containing no safeguard to the citizen, 243; no power in the Government to carry its territorial jurisdiction within the jurisdiction of another, 243; object to protect our own property and punish offences against the Government by its own citizens, 244; want of distinction in the section, 244.

Relative to punishment for running away with a ship and cargo, 244; death too severe a punishment, 244; a modification of the bill suggested, 245; the federal courts should have cognizance of all cases where punishment was necessary and the State courts have no jurisdiction, 245; reasons for desiring to extend the present laws, 246.

Strongest objection to the bill that it extends the jurisdiction of the United States to offences committed within the territories of the several States, 261; if Congress under the clause to regulate commerce could provide for the punishment of offences within the States, all offences against private property and persons would fall within their cognizance, 261; what is the extent of maritime jurisdiction? 262; no necessity for the passage of this bill, 263; why should we undertake to perform this duty for the States? 262; case of navy yards, 263; objections answered, 263; amendment to the fifth section relative to offences in a foreign port, 263; other amendments proposed, 263, 264; moved to strike out the punishment of death in certain cases of arson, 264.

So long as capital punishment is retained, the crime of arson deserves it, 264; object of human punishment to deter by example from the commission of crimes, 264; necessary to consider in every case whether the crime be highly injurious and dangerous to the community, but whether it be easy or difficult of perpetuation, 264; the case of arson, 264; motion agreed to, 265; other amendments proposed, 265.

Moved to strike out death penalty in certain cases, 265; shall human life be taken away for the destruction of mere property? 265; is death a better remedy than the infliction of penalties less severe? 265; examination in the British House of Commons in relation to the subject, 266; another objection, the unequal effect produced on the convict himself, 266; this punishment once inflicted was irrevocable, and if inflicted wrongfully admitted of no redress, 266.

While capital punishment is retained in our code, what reason is there for exempting the horrible crime of arson? 267; not just to accuse the United States laws with being so much more severe than those of the States, 267; list of capital crimes in England, 267; the lives of convicts who often exhibited the most brutal insensibility not worth preserving to the State, 267.

Punishment should never be inflicted when it could as safely be avoided, 267; not worth while to go into a discussion of a general principle and apply it to a single case, 268.

Penitentiary for the District.—In the House, a bill to provide for the erection of, considered, 700; its general scope and design, 700; laws of the district, 700; penalties wholly disproportioned to the offence, 701; effects produced by the system in this district and the Penitentiary system of the States, 701; facts, 703; committee rise, 708.

Piracy in the West Indies.—In the House, report on, 84.

In the Senate, report on the suppression of, 107; report of the Committee of Foreign Relations considered, 118; it is said, on one hand, that the measures adopted are too strong, and on the other, that they are not strong enough, 118; the continuance of the evil is ascribed to the fact that these banditti find an asylum in the Spanish possessions of the West Indies, 118; nothing short of the pursuit of these villains on shore promises any thing like an adequate remedy, 118; the whole island of Cuba affected with the leprosy, 118.

The only difference of opinion as to the means which ought to be employed, 118; the people unite two most atrocious crimes, the slave trade and piracy, 118; extermination not too strong, 114; first section proposes building a number of ships of a certain force, 114; the second section provides for the landing of our forces in fresh pursuit of pirates in the territory, 114; lawful to enter the territory of any power in which pirates have taken refuge, 114; they are the common enemies of the human race towards whom there can be no neutrals, 114; the right of entry in pursuit of pirates a clear principle of international law, 114; these brigands are not only formidable by sea, but they find abettors by land, 114; local authorities, instead of putting down this evil, receive their share of the wages of iniquity, 114; these wretches, instead of being detested, are publicly justified; even Gen. Vivas is afraid to execute the authority with which he is invested, 115; it is said, the territorial rights of Spain would be violated were we to adopt the measure recommended in this section, 115; but under existing circumstances, what can Spain do? 115; we must act on one of these facts on her part—connivance or inability, 115.

The third clause authorizes a blockade under particular circumstances, 115; it is assumed that we have ample cause for war against Spain, according to the law of nations, 115; Spain stands obnoxious to the United States for every outrage committed on its citizens by her subjects, 115; redress has been demanded in vain, 115; from whence have you derived the precedents forming the law of nations? 115.

Moved to strike out the third section, 116; it is acknowledged to be a war measure, 116; if the existence of piracy in Spanish dominions is ascribable to weakness and not to the will of Spain; a just and generous people should not declare this weakness a just ground for war, 116; it is not correct to argue that because we have just cause for war, we may in times of peace adopt a war measure, 117; this measure authorizing the Executive to institute a blockade can operate on none but neutral States, 117; whenever war exists, all the inhabitants of the world must occupy one of two relations; either they are belligerents or they are not, 117; the case of citizens or subjects of the blockading nation, 117; this right never exerted by a nation against its own citizens, 118; if it does not act on your own citizens or your enemy, on whom does it act? 118; there can be no blockade of egress, 118; the right of instituting a blockade, 119; the right of instituting blockades is a mere incident growing out of the exercise of the higher right of war, 119; the right of limiting an enemy to his own resources is derived from the right of investing his cities by land, and his ports and harbors by sea, 119; it is said, the circumstance of the existence of piracy makes this case peculiar, 119; for half a century we have been struggling to establish the reputation of a just people, 120; is it wise to forfeit this character? 120; what are we about to do? 120; it is a fraud on neutral rights, and it cannot be expected they will submit to it, 121; in cases of capture while enforcing blockades, where is the condemnation to be made? 121; letters of reprisal are always understood as measures of peace designed to prevent war, 122; blockade is very different, 122; instance of the blockade of St. Domingo by France, 122; object of the bill is good, if the means are not, 123.

The proposition contained in the third section of the bill, 124; bound to show that we have the power to adopt this measure independently of war, and that the exercise of it is called for by the exigency of the occasion, 124; the idolatrous reverence inculcated for the writers on national law is at war with our reason, 124; the necessity of exercising the power, 125; it is asked, how is this measure to be enforced? 125; the extirpation of these demons is the common concern of mankind, 125.

What is the object of the bill before us? 125; the suppression of the foulest crime of which man can be guilty, 125; the third section compared with other parts of the bill, 125; it is said the third section provides for blockade, that blockade is a war measure, and only to be resorted to as one of the rights of war, 125; when blockade is instituted under this bill be at war with Spain, 125; could Spain complain if you were to reclaim a piratical vessel under the shelter of one of her armed ships? 126; the object is not to interfere with the rights of Spain, but to punish the outlaws of every nation, 126; may we not presume that these powers will be prudently exercised? 126; example of Great Britain, 126.

Historical view of the subject, 127; have direct unequivocal information of the existence of these atrocities, and of the inability of the navy to suppress them, 127; it is said other nations will take umbrage at this, 127; have you abundant cause of war against the inhabitants of Cuba? 128; three instances of enormities, 128; what has been done during the two last years? 129; the expedition of Porter and its success, 129; little done the next year, 129; what had caused the difference in the results of two years? 129; perhaps the suppression has been seriously affected by the multiplication and variety and supposed incompatibility of the duties required of the squadron, 140; the present position of affairs, 140; result of an application to the Captain General for an investigation at Regia, 141; the facts which have caused the action of the committee, 141; grounds of objection to the blockade, 141; our vessels have the right of fresh pursuit on the land, and the bill gives no more, 142; the measure of blockade utterly unwarrantable and wholly inexpedient, 142; what is the right of blockade? 142; one of the highest acts of sovereignty which the law of nations allows to a belligerent, and its exercise is universally conceded to be most harsh and oppressive in its operation upon the rights of third parties, 142; it is only in time of war that it is or ever was allowed by the law of nations, 142; why is it that we consider proceedings against the inhabitants of Cuba proper? 142; suitable provisions to be substituted for those in the bill, 143; remarks upon them, 144.

The proposed measure involves no sacrifice of principle, 145; a blockade is an act of war, but it does not follow that a blockade acts not upon the guilty but upon the innocent, 145; look at the practical operation of the blockade proposed by this bill, 145; taking blockade as an act of war, is such a measure called for by the circumstances of our present situation, 145; every resort to force by a power that has authority to make war is an act of war, 146; unfortunate for the cause of humanity if the law of nations required that declaration should in all cases precede acts of hostility, 146; if a declaration be necessary, may not the act of Congress which enjoins the blockade be considered the declaration, 146; this blockade puts us into a belligerent attitude in relation to Spain, 147; it may be said our redress is to be sought from the king of Spain, 147; must we submit to the depredations of the subjects of Spain because she is weak? 148; a nation which has just cause of war is not bound to go to war, 148; piracy in the West Indies can be suppressed by vigorous, energetic, unswerving efforts of a competent naval force, having authority to land and pursue the pirates into the settled as well as unsettled parts of the country, 148; statement of the Secretary of the Navy, 148; letters of Mr. Randall, 148; extracts, 149; the right to follow pirates on shore as a material means for the accomplishment of this object, 149; arming merchantmen is a measure entitled to support, 149; suggestions for the modification of the blockade, 149.

We have not a right to resort to any and every measure of redress which may be in our power, 150; against the commerce of friendly nations we are averse to enclose acts of unwarranted violence, 150; how can insurance be so low while so many piracies are committed, 150; this blockade of doubtful character, 150; clear a day that the President has the power of suppressing piracy, 150; not worth thinking of the effect of these measures on Spain, 151; this blockade is like the smut on Copenhagen by the British, 151; third section struck out, 151.

Specie Transportation.—Amendment to the bill proposed authorizing pursuit and capture on land and reprisals on cities which afford protection to the pirates, 151; amendment that no public armed vessel employed against the pirates shall transport specie or freight, not specially designated by the President, considered, 151; apparently a source of emolument to those engaged in it, 152; the practice, 152; the existence of the fact to any great extent doubtful, 152; amendment lost, 152; moved to prohibit all public armed vessels from the transportation of specie, &c., 152; this traffic prevents piracy from being suppressed, 152; necessary as far as regards the moral and physical force of the Navy, but this trade be prohibited in every part of the world, 152.

This transportation a very useful thing, 152; Great Britain expressly authorized her naval force to do it, 154; officers of the Navy have not done any thing to draw censure upon them, 154; their instructions, 154; never understood that the object of building a fleet was to make them carriers of gold and silver, 154; this transportation has prevented the suppression of piracy, 154; seldom occurs from the Pacific, 155; this provision goes to make a regulation which will affect the commerce of the United States to a great extent, 155; amendment lost, 155; other amendments moved, 155; carried, 155.

Aid to merchantmen to arm.—Various modifications to the proposition proposed, 156; debate, 157; lost, 157; further amendments moved, 157.

In the House, bill relative to the suppression of considered, 288; summary of the bill, 289; the committee conceived that no legislative provisions were required by the posture of our affairs with Spain, 289; as it regarded the piratical depredations upon our commerce no extraordinary measures were deemed necessary or proper, 339; no step been taken to make Spain responsible for the depredations on our commerce, 340; can we act on the dominions of a foreign power because the people are vicious or the tribunals impure? 340; you cannot act against the Spanish dominions without a previous demand for justice at the hands of their Government, 340; whenever our naval power was where it ought to be, piracy was suppressed, 340; this bill involves no question in regard to our negotiations with Spain, 341; is piracy of a character, and has it an existence to demand of us effectual measures for its suppression? 341; enormities committed, 341; will all these provisions remedy the evil complained of? 342; in our efforts to vanquish or exterminate a common enemy, we may make war with him upon the ocean, or upon land, or both, 342; this experiment, of this description of force, has been tried, and fairly tried, and failed, 343; another provision of the bill relates to the permission to arm merchant vessels, 343; what are we to expect from a frank pursuit of pirates by a force that in two years' search, has scarcely come in sight of one? 343; points shown, 344.

The President now has, and has had means and power to suppress it, 344; in 1823 you were told that light vessels were wanted to go into shallow waters, and you gave them, 344.

Moved to strike out the seventh section of the bill, 344; we cannot increase our rights in respect to other powers by municipal legislation, and certainly we do not wish to diminish them, 345; motion carried, 345; various amendments made, 345.

Moved to amend by reducing the number of sloops of war from ten to five, &c., 345; the bill is for the suppression of piracy, and not for an increase of the Navy, 345; the mode in which the expense is to be applied is to be considered, 345; can we not repose confidence in the next Congress? 346; was it proper at this late moment to enter into a discussion on the increase of the Navy, 346; tendency of the bill to diminish the expense of the Navy, and to improve its discipline, 346; motion carried, 346.

Question on the passage of the bill, 346; the bill is no longer a provision against piracy, but a bill for the increase of the Navy, 346; the bill is unnecessary and extravagant, 347; mistake to suppose this bill at war with the principles of economy, 347; if the House reject this bill it is too late to originate a new one, 347; bill laid on the table, 347. See Index, vol. 7.

In the Senate his letter communicated, 596; moved to refer the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and of the Court Martial to the Naval Committee, 367; facts relative to the matter, 367.

In the House, a resolution calling for the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry and Court Martial in the case, 602; what is the purport of this resolution? 602; it has been said that this House ought not to call upon an Department for any documents unless the mover will avow he has a specific object in doing it, 603; what is the nature of the question presented by the resolution? 603; resolution passed, 608.

Presidential Election in the House.—In the House, rules reported by the committee, 288; rules considered separately, 292; moved to strike out from third rule relative to clearing the galleries on the request of any one State delegation, 292; no good reason for putting it in the power of a State delegation to clear the galleries, 292; better make the rule absolute at once, 292; question should be considered as involving an important precedent, 292; why ought the galleries to be open? 292; who has a right to inspect my decision between conflicting claims to the Presidency? 293; members should be left to act from the cool dictates of their judgment, and they alone are the judges how they ought to act, 293.

The American people have a right to be present and inspect all the proceedings of their representatives unless their own interest forbid it, 293; in electing a President we are peculiarly the representatives of the people, 293; it is said there might be disorder, 294; no necessity for any farther rule than that now existing, 294; no practical inconvenience arises whether the motion prevails or not, 294; mode of conducting the ballottings on a previous occasion, 295; secrecy is not imposed by merely closing the doors, 295; it is said the people of the United States are not expected to be here, and those who will be present are not such as are entitled to any consideration, 295; it seems to be well settled that it is a great public misfortune that the election of a Chief Magistrate should devolve on this House, 296; it is as "what right has any man to go into the galleries to see what we are doing in regard to an election of President?" 296; danger at a future period if we adopt the precedent of admitting the people into the galleries now, it is said, 296; one gentleman declares he does not feel bound by the wishes either expressed or implied of those he represents, 297; we are bound to surrender our prejudices to carry into effect their wishes, 297; the precedent of 1801, 297; object to prevent the exertion of an influence which at some period hereafter might operate to warp and swerve members from the conscientious discharge of their duty, 298; there should be no secrecy on this subject, 298; no occasion to set a precedent now in anticipation of what has never happened, 299; allusion to the old Federal party, 299; they built a navy, and they sold it too, 299; the Federal party has contributed to the formation of these great and valuable institutions, 300; misapprehensions explained, 300; too much importance should not be attached to the question, 301; important as furnishing a precedent for future times, 301; the strongest objection to the measure grows out of the fact that it will furnish a precedent, 302; whence this extraordinary providence for the security of our successors, 302; the idea advanced is, that in the election of a President we act wholly independent of the people, and are under no obligation to regard their will, however solemnly expressed or clearly ascertained, 302; the pernicious uses to which this rule may be applied as a precedent, 302; are we, indeed, independent of the people in the exercise of the high trust of electing a President? 303; in matters of general legislation the re-representative is not absolutely bound by the will of his constituents, because he is bound by the still higher and paramount obligation of the Constitution itself, 308; never was a more paradoxical argument advanced in a grave legislation than that we are independent of the people in this election, 308; another ground which distinguishes an election of President by this House from an act of legislation, and shows that the obligation of the popular will should be much stronger in the former than the latter case, 304; another view of the Constitution which leads still more clearly to this conclusion, 304; another reason in favor of considering the members of this House the mere organs of the popular will on this question, 305; what is the peculiar nature of the power we are about to exercise as it respects our own honor and reputation? 305; let us advert to the practical operation of the Government, 306; the nature and operation of public opinion as connected with this subject, 306; this people have as much virtue and intelligence as has ever fallen to the lot of any people in the world, 306; how desperate would be the experiment of electing a President against the popular will, 307; called upon to complete an election which the people have left in an inchoate state, 307; it is said that the power we exercise in electing a President is not conferred upon us by the people but by the Constitution, 307.

The question is simply whether the galleries should be thrown open, subject to be closed at the motion of the Speaker, or whether they should be thrown open, subject to be closed at the request of the delegation from any one State, 308; a mere question of order, 308; whom are the minority bound to obey in giving their votes on the approaching election? 308; if we are not bound to elect that candidate who has a plurality of votes in the electoral college, by what rule are we to be governed? 309; is it by the vote of our respective States? 309; are we bound by the votes of our districts in point of principle? 309; no election could be made by the House if the States were all of equal size on this principle, 310; our duty to do what is right according to the best dictates of our understanding, 310; it is asked how we can hold up our heads at home if we go contrary to the will of our constituents, 310; it is said that on grounds of expediency the sceptre ought not to be placed in the hands of any man who has not a majority of the votes of his countrymen, 311; the first breath of a new party is holy and fervent love for the people, 311; how is the will of the people to be ascertained in this case? 312; the many difficulties with which the subject is beset, and the arduous task of framing a theory, according to gentlemen's views, that would harmonize in its practical operations with constitutional provisions on the subject, 312; contemporaneous expositions of the Constitutions on the subject, 312.

Is it right to indulge the intense anxiety now felt by the public in permitting an inspection of the proceedings of this House when constitutionally employed in selecting a Chief Magistrate? 313; is there any thing, in the duty now cast upon the House by the happening of the contingency provided for in the Constitution, to distinguish it from ordinary acts of legislation, or to demand an unusual measure of safety or precaution? 313; it is said the men who gave form to the Constitution, 314; in whose hands is the sovereignty of the Union repositied? 314; the public will point to the path of safety and duty, 315; otherwise the President will be the creature of the Legislature, 315; by vesting in this body an irresponsible power of selection you banish the great safeguard of the Constitution, 315.

The immediate constituents of a member of this House have no right to instruct him in his vote for a President, 317; the opinion of the people not absolutely imperative, but a sound and wholesome discretion to be exercised, 317; it is said the will of the people is the paramount law, 317; the right of choosing implies the right of selecting, 318; the doctrine of plurality, preference, and of instruction, would naturally lead to the most dangerous consequences, 319; if we are bound by instructions, who have the right to instruct us? 319; all attempts to sway or control the free exercise of our sober judgment are indecorous and improper, 320.

The question is, whether the power of clearing the galleries in case of disorder shall rest with the Speaker or with the delegation of a State, 320; further remarks, 320; committee rise and are refused leave to sit again, 321; in the House, motion to strike out the last clause of the third rule, 321; who the cause of the extended discussion, 321; motion carried, 322; other rules adopted, 322; the election, 323.
